Three New Pilgrim Press Books

In the Field of Religious Education

You Can Learn to Teach

By MARGARET SLATTERY

Author of "Talks to the Training Class," "The Highway to Leadership," "The Charm of the Impossible," etc.

Recommended for teacher training classes and individual study

The rich experience of twenty years actively engaged in the furtherance of religious education, together with a thorough knowledge of the most recent advances in the fields of psychology and pedagogy, has gone into the making of this lucid and inspiring handbook. While retaining all the simplicity and charm of style which characterized her deservedly popular "Talks with the Training Class," this more comprehensive work will bring fresh inspiration to the experienced teacher, and prove an unfailing source of wisdom and guidance to the beginner. $1.35

Hymn Stories

By ELIZABETH COLSON

A Year's Worship Programs for the Junior Department

A delightful collection of hymn stories upon which are built worship services for the junior department of the church school. This material will enrich the thought of older folks and may well have a place in any program wherever there is congregational singing, in meetings of young people and at mid-week services. The purpose is to create fresh and lasting interest and feeling in the hymn singing of youth. As the book is arranged, there is material for a short period of hymn study, every week in the year, and at certain seasons such as Christmas and Easter, programs or services are planned for the school as a whole, often including the congregation. $1.25

Song and Play for Children

By FRANCES WELD DANIELSON and GRACE WILBUR CONANT

Authors of "Songs for Little People"

A Song and Play Book for Beginners' and Primary Children

Workers with Beginners' and Primary children, especially in week-day schools of religion and similar organizations, will find in this song and play book an abundance of material to enrich their programs. It features a section of work songs, well-known folk games and simple marches; a section of songs on friendliness and service; songs of family life, songs for special days, hymns, seasonal songs, nature songs, animal songs; a section of songs for Beginners' children; music to suggest desirable moods. $1.25

Prayers of the Social Awakening

New and Enlarged Edition

By WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH

A collection of prayers which cannot fail to bring spiritual refreshment and comfort to their readers especially in these days of unrest and confusion. This revised edition carries several additional prayers which were not included in the first edition. We are quoting below excerpts from two letters which are typical of the hundreds of similar letters which Professor Rauschenbusch received before his death:

"These are real prayers. In no form of literature could you so fully breathe out your just social feeling. It is a contribution to the literature of human brotherhood."—Rev. Paul Moore Strayer, Third Presbyterian Church, Rochester, New York.

"The great thing in your splendid book is the exceedingly fine manner of expression along with the most ideal treatment intellectually. We all think of you as a poet as well as a social philosopher."—Bishop L. J. Birney, Methodist Episcopal Church, Shanghai, China. $1.00

OUR SHARE

Without even the suggestion of a tax the total budget of this going work is fraternally apportioned to the churches on the basis of members, home expenses, and willingness to participate. Facing conditions six years ago the National Council decided that our denominational task needed $5,000,000 in addition to income from invested funds. This does not include budgets of local churches. In 1924 the churches gave $3,112,520 of this apportionment. This averages one cent a day per member of the Congregational Churches, or $3.61 per member for the year.

OUR OPPORTUNITY

Our work has been blessed as never before. We live in a new world which opens new doors of opportunity. Changing standards of modern life make imperative renewed emphasis on Christian education in church and college. Social justice demands adequate safeguards for ministers and missionaries. The Negro is ripe for education and trained leadership, both North and South. The immigrant awaits Christian Americanization. The Oriental looks to the Christian church for the interpretation of the gospel of Brotherhood. China and Japan are ready to be molded and are asking for help. India offers the opportunity of a century. Africa presents openings for strategic service. World Peace waits upon Goodwill, and Goodwill follows the Ambassadors of the Gospel of Christ.

The Editorial Outlook

The President's Sound Americanism

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE sounded a welcome note when he said in his Omaha speech to the American Legion:

I can see no merit in any unnecessary expenditure of money to hire men to build fleets and carry muskets when international relations and agreements permit the turning of such resources into the making of good roads, the building of better homes, the promotion of education, and all the other acts of peace which minister to the advancement of human welfare. Happily, the position of our country is such among other nations of the world that we have been and shall be warranted in proceeding in that direction.

Also when he said:

Our people have had all the war, all the taxation, and all the military service that they want. They have therefore wished to emphasize their attachment to our ancient policy of peace. . . . We are conscious that no other nation harbors any design to put us in jeopardy.

The President spoke well of our composite American citizenship when he declared:

Whether one traces his Americanism back three centuries to the Mayflower, or three years to the steerage, is not half so important as whether his Americanism of today is real and genuine. No matter by what various crafts we came here, we are all now in the same boat.

His ringing appeal for tolerance, the spirit of friendship and good will, and real service to humanity was strong and effective. He said that "human nature is about the same everywhere," and that, "we are all united in a common brotherhood." His emphasis upon the need of demobilizing "racial antagonisms, fears, hatreds, and suspicions," brought hearty and deserved applause from the Legion.

A Novel of China

IF truth is stranger than fiction, fiction sometimes supplies the medium for the most vital and graphic portrayal of truth and fact. This is strikingly illustrated in a remarkable story of Western China, The Laughing Buddha, which Revell has recently published for the author, James Livingstone Stewart, a missionary of the United Church of Canada (formerly under the Methodist Board) in West China, and Vice-President of the West China Union University. Mr. Stewart went to China twenty-three years ago, after a brilliant academic career in which he majored in philosophy. Tragic personal experiences through which there was the anchorage of a strong faith, combined with philosophic insight to produce in him rare powers of understanding and of sympathy with human life. During much of his period in China he has lived in the midst of warring factions and unsettlement, and the story that he has woven is evidently drawn from the backgrounds of realism. The result is a book that more vividly than would be possible in volumes of formal description sets forth the unsettlement and uncertainty which is present-day China, at the same time shedding over the dark and terrible picture the light of real hope—the hope of a philosopher with faith and vision and not the shallow optimism that simply expects that everything will turn out for the best. The Laughing Buddha is not a missionary story of the conventional sort. It is a powerful novel of Chinese life, full of subtle mystery, variety, and depth. Few books have made upon us so profound an impression. It bears here and there the defects that one might expect in a first novel, but these detract little from the brilliance of its style and the swift-moving, gripping power of its narrative. One does not, of course, compare first novels of hitherto unknown writers with works like Victor Hugo's Les Miserables, but The Laughing Buddha has the quality and the power to produce in unusual degree a similar effect upon the reader. One finds in it something of the same approach to the imponderable things of life, sin, sorrow, misery, goodness, and the art of making them real, that characterize the incomparable French masterpiece. Reviewers in the public press have accorded Mr. Stewart's book a high place. The Vice-President of the West China University is not only a coming man in the field of literature; it looks as if he has already arrived.

Honoring Samuel Valentine Cole

FOUNDERS' Day at Wheaton College, Norton, Mass., this year, on Oct. 10, was made a memorial to the late president, Dr. Cole, beloved executive and man of true culture. An eminent Congregationalist, with ministerial service of note, he was well known to our readers through frequent contributions of prose and poetry. He was head of the college from the date of its charter until his death on May 6, and in previous years had guided the institution as a girls' seminary. The exercises were conducted by Dr. George T. Smart, acting president, with a devotional service in charge of Dr. Frederick H. Page, new head of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society. Dean Sperry of the Harvard Theological School gave the address, emphasizing the remarkable character and ability of Dr. Cole. The attendance was large; with the student body were many personal friends and former associates of the late president. It was an occasion befitting the man.

Is Justice Politics-Ridden?

THE complacency of good, conservative-minded people in the presence of revelations of the weakness and ineffectiveness of their government is appalling. Nothing has better illustrated it in recent years than the issue of the Teapot Dome scandal. In this case a Secretary of the Interior was shown to have accepted a loan, or gift, of $100,000 under the most compromising circumstances, a leading Washington newspaper owner publicly testified that he had lied about the matter, and circumstances so suspicious developed in connection with other men that four witnesses wanted by the government got out of the country to avoid giving testimony. Nothing was done to A. B. Fall, Harry Sinclair got a whitewashing of a sort in the Wyoming trial, because the chief witnesses were designedly in Africa, France, or South America, while the department of justice, weak and ineffectual in the presence of scandal, at the same time showed amazing alacrity and persistency, if not actual vindictiveness, in the vigor with which it prosecuted Senator Wheeler, first in Montana and, after his full acquittal there, in Washington. Wheeler's offence was that he had labored diligently to bring out the facts concerning the scandal, and the failure of the department to show anything against him, despite the most intense effort to do so, made the whole affair look like persecution.

Are these words too strong? Listen to what Dean Roscoe Pound, of Harvard Law School, has said regarding the matter in a symposium conducted by the New York Law Review. Among other things he has written:

There is much to create a popular impression that justice is politics-ridden. Thus the department of justice recently seems to have been acting in the spirit of the law officers of the Stuarts than in the common law. Such things as the recent decision in Wyoming, coupled with the easy way in which the department of justice allowed itself to be rushed into trial in the absence of testimony, the easy-going way in which the department of justice allowed the statute of limitations to run in Washington before proceeding to get a new indictment against Fall, and thus committed itself to prosecute a hypothetical conspiracy instead of a perfectly clear and certain case of bribery, while at the same time persisting in trying Senator Wheeler over again in Washington after he had been acquitted at a full, fair and complete trial in Montana in which the government succeeded clearly in establishing that it had no case—such things, I say, impair public confidence in our administration of justice beyond any repair in the way of manifestoes and pronunciamentoes from the bar.

The Proposed Social Creed

THE making of social creeds in the churches seems to be fraught with as much difficulty as the making, or re-making, of theological creeds. And the difficulties seem to lie in the same direction—the apparent irreconcilability of conflicting ideals and opinions, and back of that the individualism that tends to resent all effort to crystallize truth and idealism into exact categories and propositions. The man who views with a somewhat cynical eye the part that theological creeds have played in the history of the church is apt to look askance at the whole business of social creed-making. He is as fearful of the tyranny of possible new social orthodoxies as he is of the very real, but passing, tyranny of religious creeds. He would prefer to leave social and political life, as well as distinctively religious and theological life, under the dominance of the great basal principles as enunciated by Jesus, having each man interpret and apply these principles as reason and conscience might direct. The social philosopher, also, is likely to have a fear of the undue crystallization of idealism into formal propositions, institutions, and laws. He takes into account the matter of social incidence in the same way in which the economist seeks to determine the incidence of taxation, knowing that as the burden of a tax may actually fall upon the people whom it is intended to relieve, so social measures that have the highest purpose in view may actually achieve disastrous results. He finds a classic illustration of this in the effect of the Poor Laws in England—an effect that seems likely to be repeated historically in the unemployment dole.

Assuming, however, that social creeds are not intended to become intolerant and dogmatic bulwarks of a new orthodoxy, there is great value in the effort to formulate the implications and exactions of the Christian religion as they apply to our age and its problems. The value of such formulation manifestly depends upon the range and freedom of the discussions upon which it is based, and to this end the Committee of the Social Service Commission, having charge of this matter of a proposed Social Creed for Congregational Churches has wisely emphasized its desire to have the frankest and fullest reactions concerning the Proposed Creed, which was published in The Congregationalist of Nov. 13, 1924.

Among the most formidable criticisms of the Proposed Creed is a detailed analysis by Judson G. Rosebush, a prominent layman of Appleton, Wis., extensively engaged in industrial enterprises, and president and treasurer of the Patten Paper Company. Mr. Rosebush is a man of high repute in his own community, and, though he may be expected to see things from the standpoint of the business man and industrialist, he is typical of a large number of men who are willing to discuss the issues of business and industry in the light of Christianity, and who are earnestly desirous of knowing and following the Christian way.

Mr. Rosebush's article has arrived late, and the pressure of National Council material has been such that it has been impossible to publish it in full. Inasmuch, however, as he represents critical views, that are probably shared by others, and that as stated by Mr. Rosebush are valuable to the discussion because of their definiteness and frankness, it seems important that we should seek briefly to summarize his argument.

Mr. Rosebush criticizes the doctrine of leisure as expressed in the Proposed Creed. He says, "The validity of the assumption that Christianity implies 'education for leisure' is very doubtful, nor is leisure as such an ideal for the Christian Church to work for." He contends that it is only one of the many essential things needed for growth, and that it should not be singled out for extraordinary emphasis. He thinks that the real emphasis ought to be placed upon "education for usefulness" rather than upon "education for leisure," that Jesus did not emphasize leisure per se, and that there is much evidence to prove that Americans who now possess leisure are not any better Christians than those without it. The emphasis is wrongly placed, he thinks, upon the possession of spare time rather than upon the wise use of all time. It is our judgment that at this point Mr. Rosebush rather misinterprets this section of the Proposed Creed, but, of course, one of the things that ought to be safeguarded in creed making is the possibility of misinterpretation. The matter of actual statement in creed making is exceedingly important.

Mr. Rosebush is likewise strongly critical of the statement in the Creed calling for a frank abandonment of all effort to secure unearned income, and here his variance with the Creed does not seem to be a matter of statement or definition. It represents distinctly a different point of view. The unearned income, he assumes, in the conception of the Creed, should go to the state instead of to the individual as at present, and he raises the question which does seem vital under present conditions regarding the losses which are sometimes very real and which are always possible under the conditions that tend to create unearned income. He refers to the fact that according to U. S. income tax reports, American industry lost four billion dollars owing to the social readjustment which took place in 1919 and 1920, and he contends that "the Social Creed ought to be as specific on the matter of a social decrement of values as it is on the subject of an unearned increment of values."

Mr. Rosebush seems to perceive and share the ideal that evidently was in the minds of those who formulated this statement regarding unearned income, but he sees the practical difficulties, and he lays stress likewise upon the fact that in the last analysis it is doubtful if there is any income wholly earned by the individual. He lays stress upon the fact that man is always co-operating with natural forces. "Once we firmly grasp," he says, "the conception that this is God's world—and that is good religion—unearned income becomes a universal and fundamental fact, and the effort to distinguish between earned and unearned income a denial that God enters into the economic life of all his creatures."

He criticizes as ambiguous the statement in the Creed calling for recognition that the unlimited right of private ownership is un-Christian. He points out that under conceptions of Roman, Anglo-Saxon, English, and American law property has always been limited by the police power of the state. If the dictum of the Creed is intended to assert a theory of public ownership of property, he thinks that "business men are clearly entitled to be told ex-cathedra, and with much more exactness what phases or types of industry must be avoided by them and reserved for public ownership if they are not to be guilty of un-Christian acts." He thinks also that if this dictum means that a man becomes a sinner automatically after he has accumulated a certain amount of money, its validity may be questioned in the light of the Master's parable of the talents. Perhaps it should be said in this connection that Mr. Rosebush seems to confuse the matter of what may be individual sin with the demands of sound social practice and consideration for the rights and privileges of all.

Mr. Rosebush criticizes the statement of the Creed concerning Child Labor, pointing out that while the maximum physical development comes at about eighteen, the maximum educational and moral development would not come until some years later. He raises the question in view of this discrepancy as to what the legal age limit should be in abolishing Child Labor. In this connection Mr. Rosebush raises the whole question of work and play for young people. He thinks that the children of the middle and upper classes should do more work and not less, and that in some cases the emphasis needs to be placed not upon play and idleness, but rather upon a choice of educative as against debilitative activities.

He criticizes the Creed's proposal for the reduction of the working day to the "lowest point that is scientifically necessary to produce all the goods we need," as a frank adoption of the "pain" economy of work. He challenges the conception that all work is drudgery, painful and disagreeable, and the implication that any work above the minimum of absolute necessity is un-Christian.

He considers that the statement concerning unemployment insurance is inadequate, and that there ought to be some indication as to the nature of such unemployment insurance and the responsibility for its maintenance.

The conception of a minimum comfort wage as a first charge upon industry, he thinks, is an alluring proposal, but he points out some of the practical difficulties that would immediately emerge in the effort to work this out in practice. In connection with the demand for special legislation favorable to the farmer, he points out that industry moves forward because of the joint cooperation of various types of laborers and producers, and that to single out any class for special privilege would make for discord rather than brotherhood.

In general Mr. Rosebush criticizes the phraseology of the Creed at other points. He thinks, for instance, that the references to "unjust barriers of trade" and "dishonest imperialism" beg the whole question, that the real issue is what constitutes an unjust barrier of trade and when is imperialism dishonest. He thinks, too, that the statement with regard to the abolition of military armaments is inadequate and that it ought to be made clear whether the Social Creed stands for the principle of "prudent patriotism" or the doctrine of absolute pacifism.

It is our purpose to summarize rather than to criticize or discuss Mr. Rosebush's statement. We understand that the whole statement has been presented as material in discussion to the Chairman of the Social Service Commission. Broadly speaking, we are inclined to feel that while Mr. Rosebush's criticisms seem to have much warrant they are conceived too completely from the standpoint of present conditions. It ought to be borne in mind that one of the purposes of a social creed is to assert the principles of Christianity in relation to present-day life and industry in such a way that their application would modify and transform present conditions into something more in harmony with the demands of love and righteousness. While a social creed must be judged in some measure from the standpoint of its practicability, especially when it goes into detailed proposals regarding reorganization and legislation, it should be borne in mind that its real testing must be in the light of sound Christian principles. If these do not accord with present conditions and systems, it is the conditions and systems that ought to alter. The purpose of a social creed is primarily to define with clearness and exactness what a Christian social system ought to imply.

The Passing of a Great Teacher

HUNDREDS of his former students throughout the world will be reminded of their debt to a great teacher and friend, when they learn of the death of Dr. Albert Temple Swing, at Chicago, Sept. 21. For 23 years he taught church history in Oberlin Graduate School of Theology, becoming emeritus professor in 1916. After a brilliant student career in Oberlin College and Yale Divinity School, and twelve constructive years in the pastorate, mostly at Fremont, Neb., and Detroit, Professor Swing prepared for his church history chair by three years of European study and travel. During his active years of service in the college, Oberlin honored him with both the A.M. and the D.D. He became an exceedingly useful member of the faculty, both in the field of teaching and of administration. For many years his rare business judgment made him a valued member of the Prudential Committee. His abiding devotion to Oberlin was proved afresh only last year when he gave the college $30,000 to establish the Mead-Swing Foundation, for lectureship purposes in the fields of religion and science, and for two theological fellowships.

This beloved teacher's specialty was the history of Christian doctrine, and a number of books and monographs testify to his high standing in this field of learning, the most authoritative of which is probably his Theology of Albrecht Ritschl. He was also the biographer of former President Fairchild of Oberlin. His teaching was marked by unusual analytical power, keen insight, and the capacity to lead his students to find in the mass of historical sources the most useful materials for their construction of a personal faith. He was skillful in the German method of research and trained his young men in a relentlessly thorough regimen in the use of documents, which gave them high reverence for facts and genuine appreciation of the true historical spirit.

But he impressed both students and colleagues not only by his unusual insight as an interpreter of thought, but also by his simple sincerity as a friendly Christian gentleman whose home was always open in most generous hospitality and whose heart was ever ready to be shared when sympathy and friendly help were needed. With a modest self-effacement that grew with the years, he went about his duties very quietly but with a conscientious thoroughness that revealed a most punctilious sense of personal obligation. In every relationship of life he was conscience incarnate, but severe only with himself.

His nine years of retirement from active service have usually included Florida winters and Michigan summers, at Cocoanut Grove and Macatawa, with occasional visits in Oberlin and a half year in Europe. In recent months, before the final attack of pneumonia, increasing weakness brought deep experience of pain; but he bore with rare cheerfulness his share of the great fellowship of suffering. In a letter last July to Mrs. Swing's distinguished brother, Professor Mead of the University of Chicago, he reveals his truly heroic, indomitable spirit:

I have been trying to learn how "to get hold of myself," by facing pain, then deliberately turning aside from it to a new center of calm. I think the sensations of pain can be ignored or overcome or forgotten by just centering the will, or spirit, on this realm of calm, beyond and above it. I cannot make clear just what I want to say; but by looking pain squarely in the face, and experiencing all that there is in its content, then in centering on this point of calm, I have found myself ready to go to sleep.

As Dr. Mead says, "His was to the end an undefeated personality." Mrs. Swing, a beloved daughter of Oberlin, survives him, with two sons, both now in Europe, one a distinguished American journalist and the younger a promising student of music in Italy. G. W. F.

Write it down in your calendar, please: November 15—The Congregationalist Sunday. That will be a good day for a sermon stressing the value of good reading in general and our church and home journal in particular.

The daily papers of Monday, Oct. 12, contained the report of a gracious tribute paid by Dr. S. Parkes Cadman to Dr. George A. Gordon, of the Old South Church in Boston. Speaking to his radio audience on the preceding Sunday afternoon, and answering the question, Please name a great autobiography, Dr. Cadman replied: "The autobiography of Dr. Gordon of Boston, the preacher at the Old South Church, in my judgment the greatest preacher in the United States of America. He reviews his inner life in a most charming and satisfactory way, and I commend this book to all who desire to know what is really the autobiography of a truly noble soul."

Attitude and Temper

THE simplicities of religion in faith and practice settle down largely into matters of attitude and temper. It ould, of course, be absurd to suggest that what one elieves is unimportant. That, certainly, is not the logic f the emphasis upon life as greater than creed. The aim of that emphasis is, rather, that life is the actual reed, and that what one is is of more importance than hat one professes, or formally accepts. Real creeds e often very different from professed creeds.

Was not this essentially the significance of Jesus—at he expressed and interpreted religious belief in the ealm of attitude and temper? He did not make reli-on more a matter of emotion than of intellect, but he d assert the primacy for all thought and feeling of the ght attitude or viewpoint. This he established in Love -which, in a sense, is indefinable except as each man eks to define it in his own life. That is, it is as im-ssible to define love except in relation to all that is ghest in man himself, as it is to define red to a man ho is color blind. Love, in the thought of Jesus, found s supreme expression in God's attitude toward men. ere was the center and soul of the Gospel, and flowing t of it came the gospel of right relationships of man God and to his fellowmen. Primarily, persistently, iumphantly, however, this whole conception of religion id the profound emphasis upon attitude and temper, id not upon elaborate dogmas and highly developed in-llectual propositions. It is simply unthinkable that sus should have expressed his religion in anything like estminster Confessions, or Thirty-Nine Articles, or in y of the forms of theological dogma as they have be-me established in the historical development of the urch. The simplicity that is in Christ stands in riking contrast with creeds and confessions.

The Practical Tests

Nor is this contrast, plainly marked to the man in iest of simple faith, any less marked, or significant, hen these things become tested in the realm of prac-ce. Consider, in relation to such a man as Abraham incoln, a simple faith, emphasizing attitude and tem-er, over against a faith highly elaborated in carefully fined orthodoxies. Here, conspicuously, is a man hom the world has accorded a place in its canon of ints. He is in that canon, moreover, because of his al goodness. The qualities that place him in the orld's canon of saints should have given him a high ace as well in the church's canon. Yet he is not there -except in the vague and general sense that the church dges and appreciates him according to its own highest fe. and not according to its own creeds and constitu-ons. The Protestant Church, no more than the Roman atholic, had place for Lincoln in its membership, which could accord to him frankly and honestly, without ibterfuge or compromise. That Lincoln felt this is ident. for he spoke with a certain pathos of his being itside the pale of organized religion, and clearly, une-uivocally expressed his willingness to join a church hich would require of him nothing more than loyalty the simple elements of religion as defined by Jesus.

Are we forever going to be content that the church ould assume a lower and narrower place than that of sus himself? May we look for a time when the foun-dation, spirit, and practice of fellowship in the Chris-tian Church will be in accordance with the simple stand-ards of Jesus, when the right attitude and the right tem-per will have precedence over forms of thought and of expression that are inherently largely speculative, or outwardly chiefly of historic interest? Is there not a profound duty resting upon men who perceive the beauty and security of a simple foundation of religion to make their profession and practice of religion equally simple? The fact that a man can be larger than the creed that he professes, or broader and more magnanimous than the church to which he belongs, implies the surest con-demnation of such creed and church as inadequate and defective. If a man's church does not represent the highest that he can think or be; if it does not give sanc-tity to his noblest attitude and temper; it is not only far below the plane of Christ—it represents something less than the man himself. There is one clear duty that rests upon the Christian churchman—it is to do all in his power to make the church as high and holy, broad and deep, all-pervading and universal, as Christ, himself.

The President Sets an Example

The interest in bringing the simplicity that is in Christ into predominance in the faith and practice of organized religion is by no means speculative. It lies at the very heart of the world's spiritual problems and tragedies. In his Omaha speech President Coolidge has delivered a most significant utterance which ought to commend him highly in that character in which at the present hour we shall prefer to think of him, rather than as President—the Honorary Moderator of the National Council of Congregational Churches. The Omaha speech is entirely in accord with the briefer address at the Missionary Conference in Washington, last February, for which, at the time, we ventured the opinion that the President may yet be best remembered in history. In his plea for tolerance in these great public utterances Calvin Coolidge has touched squarely the world's great-est need. It is only in new attitudes and tempers that new understandings and co-operations can be effected and new tasks achieved. As long as men are obsessed with systems, and organizations and methods, rep-resenting partial or partisan attitudes and viewpoints, how can they be tolerant of one another? Tolerance depends on new attitudes of confidence and trust, or upon patience and kindliness where trust is impossible. Tol-erance sees the hope of evolving better systems, organi-zations, and methods when men are willing to learn from one another and work with one another; and it estab-lishes the hope of betterment through freedom, in place of the hope of betterment through some form of benevo-lent despotism on the part of a victorious and domin-ating group. Our goal religiously in America should not be a dominant and dominating Church, but a Church worthy to dominate in all life through the fact that it is as gentle and loving, as patient and persistent, as truth-loving and sincere, as tolerant and magnanimous, as the Christ whose Gospel it professes to preach and prac-tice. We enforce once more our plea and our hope that at Washington the representative gathering of Congre-gationalists may above all things give to the nation and to the world the clear witness of a simple faith.

The Pilgrim Way of Christian Fellowship

The Moderator's Address to the National Council in Washington, October 2

By Rockwell Harmon Potter, D.D.

"BEHOLD how these Christians love one another." So tradition affirms that the ancient Mediterranean world looking upon the Apostolic Church bore witness both to the fellowship of the Christians and to its own amazement in beholding the bonds of Christian love which united them.

"And this is His commandment that we should believe in the name of His Son Jesus and love one another, even as He gave us commandment. And hereby we know that He abideth in us." So testified the apostle whom Jesus loved, who as a youth had leaned upon his breast and who as a man had testified to the experience that had redeemed and illumined his life.

"These things I command you that ye may love one another." So spake Jesus unto his disciples gathered in the Upper Room beneath the strangely mingled shadows of their coming fear and sorrow.

The love of the Christians one for another was their first witness and their most effective witness to the experience of the love of God which they proclaimed in their gospel. The love of the Christians for one another was the first and the most effective witness of the Christian Church to the love of God for men, which they proclaimed as the hope of the world's life. Nothing could avail to darken the shining of this clear testimony. Nothing could avail to hinder the reach of this experience into the hearts of men. Nothing could avail to hinder the lift of this power of God manifest in the Christian life as it laid hold of the hearts of men to bear them up to the heart of the Eternal Father.

When Christians have loved one another they have always borne effective witness to the truth that God has loved them. When Christians have loved one another they have never been able to do otherwise than to love mankind. When Christians have loved one another they have found that this, their own experience, has ever been the most effective testimony to the gospel of God on their lips, which proclaims that God loves mankind.

The Witness of the Modern Church

He who turns from the contemplation of the holy love of the first Christians for one another to look upon the hosts of those who are named with the name of Jesus in the modern world of the twentieth century asks with a strange bewilderment, "What has become of the love of the Christians? Here is faith witnessed in creeds and confessions and councils and convocations. Here is hope witnessed in plans and programs, in institutions and ordinances, but where is love?" For to the hasty eye, even though it be within the church and sympathetic, modern Christianity lacks the note of love. Discussions and debates, charges and counter charges, parties and programs, courts and conventicles—these bear no witness to love.

Now we who know the church, we who are in the church, we who love the church know that love is here. It is in the fellowship of the congregation, breathing through their prayers and hymns, rising like incense where the love of God is invoked in assemblies of worship. It is in the service of the Christian people ministered from one to another in gracious deeds, offered in sacrificial devotion as each church reaches forth the hand of help in its own place to those that are near and to those that are far. It is in the fellowship of the denomination, in the bonds of brethren united to bear a common witness and to offer a common service. It is in the fellowship of the Christians in our communities, in our countries and in the world who are deeply conscious of the holy bonds of loyalty one to another which reach above and beneath and through the walls of our separations and distinctions in organization, ever seeking to unite all those who love the Lord Jesus in the service of all those whom he loves.

But we have not made Christian love the dominant note in modern Christian life. Until we do the world will not believe us when we tell them that God is love, that God loves us, that God loves them as he loves us, and that the hope of the world's life lies in learning this truth and in transmitting this power from the heart of the Eternal God into the living relationships of mankind.

Emphasis Upon Organization

We have tried to make the world know this and feel this by organization. We have said, "Let us give such obedience to the Christian organization that the world will come to know that God is love and that God loves the world, for this is the gospel of Jesus." But the world was not long impressed by the witness of organization to love. The world is less and less impressed by the witness of organization to love. The world of the future is not going to be impressed by the witness of organization to love. Organization is patently human. It is too manifestly mechanical. It does not and it will not tell the love story of the ages to the wistful heart of the world's life.

We have tried to do it by opinion. We have assembled our councils, we have gathered our scholars, we have collated our knowledge, we have set down our judgments, we have fashioned our creeds. We have sought to achieve the expression of love by declaring the identity of our opinions. But opinions have little to do with love. The world was not long impressed by the boasted identity of Christian opinion. The world is less and less impressed by the proclamation of the identity of Christian opinion. The world has a mind and it knows the minds of men and it doubts the reality of such identity, and if it were convinced of that reality its heart would be left cold. Identity of opinion does not tell the story of love to the waiting heart of a weary world.

We have tried to do it by united loyalty to a common history. We have named over the saints and the apostles and the martyrs and dedicated days and festivals to their memory. We have listed the great days and the great years and the great centuries and the great acts and deeds that have signalized them. We have sung their praises and gathered no little strength from their recollection, but the world is not greatly impressed. It is not deeply moved by those whose eyes are turned backward on the path of history. The world is less and less impressed, the world will be less and less moved by the spectacle of a church engaged in the contemplation of its own past. The love story of the world cannot be told in the past tense.

The Pilgrim Way

Our fathers, the Pilgrims and the Puritans, had a glimpse of another way. They joined their hands and their hearts under the shining light of that vision to seek to tell the love story of the world not by reclaiming obedience to an organization and not by seeking to enforce, or even to declare identity of opinion, still less by seeking to inspire loyalty to a common history. They sought to tell the love story of the world by the declaration of a common purpose, by the confession of a common ideal, by undertaking together a common task in bonds of mutual sympathy and loyalty and hope. They gathered their churches not by a word of obedience nor by a creed of opinion nor by a tradition of history but by the inspiration of a great purpose dimly discerned, of a great challenge deeply felt, of a great ideal seen shining above and beyond and within; by a great hope, glimpsed through clouds and darkness, held fast through the night in great trust that the morning comes.

So it is that we read in their ancient cov ants that they were united in the truth, t not in the truth that they then held, uch less in the truth that had been held. ather were they united in seeking to know e truth. Somehow they had discerned hat the seers had always seen, what the orld is coming to see, that truth moves er forward, onward, upward, that men can ver be united in its attainment, its cap- re, its imprisonment, for it ever breaks e bonds and bars in which they bind it. en may be united in the quest for it, in the eat adventure, the daring reach of the ul as it seeks in ever larger measure to y hold on that which ever runs beyond s complete grasp. They had caught the irit of the great apostle, "Brethren, I unt not myself to have laid hold, but one ing I do, forgetting the things which are hind and stretching forward to the things hich are before, I press on."

United in Adventure

There our fathers in the faith had the in- epid souls of great mariners. They dared sail under sealed orders. They put out on the sea of human thought, pledged to llow whithersoever the Spirit of the God truth might guide. They dared to give legiance to the discoveries God had made them only because they dared to pledge legiance to what discoveries he would reafter make. What a courage was in eir stout hearts. It was like the courage the loyal souls who sailed with Columbus. was like the courage of those dauntless en of the North who gave themselves in eir frail boat to fly on the wings of the r over the top of the earth. Out of such urage great love is born. By such cour- ge great love is revealed. Those who rose om their knees after Robinson's prayer ere bound together by deathless bonds. hey had committed themselves to each her because they had committed them- lves together to God to seek light, more ght and ever more light, and they had edged their fortunes and their souls to fol- w whithersoever that light might lead.

They were united in obedience but not an obedience to a rule laid down, to a w set forth to a ritual or an observance an organization established. They were nited in obedience to the will of God dimly t increasingly discerned, ever reaching twards upon the life of man and ever aching inward into the soul of man. with w revelations of those things which it hath ot entered into the heart of man to con- ive, even those things which God hath repared for them that love him and hath repared also for all those whom he loves, rom whom every family in heaven and on rth is named." They glimpsed the truth at as the truth of God cannot by any man even by any men at any time be com- letely comprehended, delimited and defined, neither can the will of God by any man. by any men, at any time be fully and ac- urately defined in statutes of man's legis- tion or ordinances of man's prescription. hey were united in the high search to dis- over the will of God for themselves, for very man in his own life, for their life to- ether in their little threatened communi- ties on the seaboard and for the life of man- kind reaching so immeasurably beyond the wildest dreams of their imagination. They pledged themselves ever to seek to know the will of God, searching the scriptures to dis- cern it in far history, searching the gospels to discern it in the Word made Flesh, searching the world of nature to discern it on the stony tables of the rocks and in the quivering cells of manifold life, seeking to discern it in their own souls and in the soul of man where the Spirit of the living God speaks with unutterable yearning to make known his purpose of good.

And again they sailed under sealed orders. They pledged themselves to follow that will of God made known to them, and to follow that will of God to be made known to them. Pilgrims they were and pioneers like Abram of old, going forth not knowing whither they went but pledged to order their going by the continuously opening purpose of God, disclos- ing ever to their eager eyes the new duties of their new occasions and committed each to the others and all of them to God to ful- fill their new duties up to the last full meas- ure of their brave devotion.

The Bond of Our Fellowship

Brethren beloved, messengers of the churches, in the spirit of our fathers are we come to the civic center of that nation for which they prayed but the range and reach of which they little dreamed. We confess we have not been brave as they were brave, nor have we been faithful as they were faithful. God forgive us. But we give God thanks, that by their prayers for us we have permitted him in some part to an- swer. For we confess today that we are united in striving to know both the truth and the will of God, and in our purpose to walk in the ways of the Lord made known or to be made known to us. This is the bond of our fellowship, the courage and faith of those who believe that the truth is in God and that God is in the truth, who are pledged to tax every faculty that they may know him and who believe that in every truth they dimly and increasingly discern that they find him. This is the meaning and this is the spirit of our schools and colleges and seminaries. This is the meaning and this is the spirit with which we seek in pa- tience and persistence to teach every child, every youth and maiden, every man and woman, that together we may be presented complete before our God and Father.

This is the bond of our fellowship, the courage and faith of those who, seeking the will of God do learn that his purpose is the establishment of righteousness and justice, of mercy and peace in the relationships of men, in their families and communities, in their states and nations and races, the cour- age and faith of those who believe that they increasingly discern what this means in the rooting out of ancient wrongs, in the re- building after a fairer fashion of the politi- cal and social and economic order, in the remolding after the mind of the Master of the passions and thoughts, the attitudes and policies of nations and races that there may be fashioned in them and through them the fulfillment of the fair dreams of the seers concerning the coming of the City of our God.

This is the meaning and the spirit of our churches and our missions and our mission- aries. This is the meaning and the spirit of our deliberations and councils and deliv- erances. We are seeking to understand our religion. We are seeking to learn how to use it. For we are united in a great convic- tion that in the gospel of Jesus at the heart of our ancient faith there lies the secret of the world's hope, the possibility of the blessedness of human life wrought in the fashion and in the power of the eternal love of God.

The Witness of Our Experience

We have tried the Puritan principle of Christian fellowship and we find it good. We believe that through it we are learning how to tell the love story of the world. We are come to bear witness to the experience that is ours. At a time when the hearts of the Christian world are saddened by the sur- face dissensions and disputes that so quickly catch the eye and the ear of a world all too ready to point the finger of scorn, we eagerly testify that Christian fellowship is possible without obedience to organization, without identity of opinion, without slavish follow- ing of tradition. It is possible to be achieved by unity of spirit, by community of feeling, by the united following of an ideal, by united sharing in a common purpose, by united un- dertaking of great enterprise for the en- lightenment of the mind with the knowledge of God and for the empowering of the will with energy to fulfill the divine purpose.

We dare to believe that our unity is real, we dare to believe that it is efficient. We dare to hope that it may become eloquent,— eloquent to tell the story of the love of God for all mankind. Here at the nation's Cap- ital we are heartened in this our faith; for so is unity being achieved in the nation. Not solely by loyalty to a common patriotic tradition are we one out of many; certainly not by identity of political opinion, much less by enforced submission and obedience to authoritative centralized control, we are willingly, eagerly, effectively, and eloquently becoming one people in the nation by unity of spirit, by common quest for the greater social value, by increasing conviction that the purpose of God leads America onward in the family of nations upon a path of hon- orable service for the welfare of her people and for the good of mankind.

The federal principle which in political life is making America a nation—may it not in the Church of the Living God become the principle of fellowship which will achieve the answer to the prayer of the Lord Jesus, and increasingly, effectively, and eloquently tell the story of the eternal love, so that mankind shall hear, and hearing be- lieve, and believing achieve, and achieving, rejoice?

It's not the walls of the church without,
That makes the building small or great,
But the Christ-light shining round about,
And the faith that overcometh doubt,
And the love that stronger is than hate.
—Longfellow.

Universal Christian Conference on Life and Work

II. Preliminaries and Program

By Theodore Ainsworth Greene
Associate Secretary of the American Section

LONG before eleven o'clock on Wednesday morning, Aug. 19, the galleries of the old Royal Chapel behind the Palace, in Stockholm, were jammed with visitors, and all the nave and the transepts with delegates and their Swedish hosts. The King and Queen entered, followed by the Crown Prince and Princess and their entourage. The conference dignitaries, in full academic and ecclesiastic robes, made their way up the aisle to the great altar. There were the Patriarchs, six of them, from the Orthodox Church, like Magi from the Eastern Mountains, keeping step with the Lord Bishop of Winchester in golden robes and miter, carrying his crook. Behind marched Garvie of England and Cadman from America. Our Bishop Brent was there also, and Dr. Arthur Brown in full court dress, beneath his robes and Yale hood. Words fail me to describe the magnificence of the Landes-Bishop of Saxony, D. Thmels, and the graceful elegance of certain French Pasteurs. Simplicity in panoply was not the order of the day. But very quickly one forgot the splendors of ecclesiastical millinery in the splendor of the service. From the high pulpit issued forth the voice of Bishop Theodore Winton of Winchester, taking as his text for the day the familiar words from Matthew 19 : 17, Repent ye, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand.

Change your mind, adapt a new outlook. Get a fresh point of view. That was Christ's challenge to his own generation. That is the challenge, which—in his name—we make to the men and women of these modern days. To accept that challenge is life. To reject it is death. Civilization has two alternatives. It can go down, or it can go up. It cannot remain where it is. Facilis descensus Averno. Difficilis ascensus per Christum.

We believe in that descent [he continued]. We believe in the Kingdom of Heaven. We are conspirators for its establishment. That is why we are here. That is the meaning of this conference.

And we were all with him. It was a magnificent introduction to an historic confe ence. We thrilled to the sound of Luther great hymn, Ein Feste Berg ist unser Got sung in the original German by many voice and in the French, English, and Swedish ve sions from the conference hymn, Communi by the rest. What an anniversary pæan! An what an occasion of joy! The Marsellais of Protestantism pealing forth upon th birthday of a reunited Church!

The welcoming address of the King at th Royal reception following, delivered in Eng lish and distributed in the three language of the conference, bids fair to become princely classic.

I bid you, the representatives of the Chri tian Church from the old world and fro the new, from Orthodox and Evangelica Christendom, welcome to the capital o Sweden. . . . Sixteen hundred years ag trusted men of the church of that time me at Nicæa to give expression to their fait in our Savior and in the fact of his bein the Revelation of God. Our meeting, mor than one and a half thousand years late has no less important aim. This confe ence will endeavor to make clear what Chri tianity ought and can do, faced with th burning questions of our time, which deman the joint and conscious efforts of all th best forces to reach a happy solution. So cial questions and international problem occupy constantly those entrusted with leg islation and the government of differen peoples, and with various other functions o public life. But, even if they may succee in passing good laws and effecting well advised measures, that does not mean the en in view is gained, because laws and statute are more or less ineffective as long as the are not in the hearts of men, founded o good will and on the mind which puts lov and justice above and before selfishness. I is in the hearts of men that we must la the foundation for peace and for mutua trust. It is the high purpose of your con ference, that it may contribute to the realiza tion of this ideal with all the spiritual mean at the disposal of the church. May it b granted you, during your proceedings her in Stockholm, to see clearer than hitherto that way which the church has to go i order to realize the spirit of Christ in ou present world, torn by unrest and strife.

Sweden, as one comes to realize in Stock holm, stands today as the great Europea champion of Protestantism. Religion enter largely into the life of her people. The spirit of Gustavus Adolfus and of the re former Olavus Petri, strong, virile, and se rene, still endures. By this royal welcome therefore, Sweden was simply avowing her hope that her National Church might prove indeed the Ecclesia Conciliatrix among the churches of the world. Her leaders held out hands alike to Catholic and Greek and Evangelical. It was not through any lack of invitation that Rome remained unrepresented at this conference. And our delegates were quick to see and admit that Sweden shows in her national life worthy fruits of her faith. The sanity of this great Northern people, its progressive social policy, its joyous, unfevered, well-rounded life, its riches in literature and art charmed us all. The city of Stockholm itself, with its physical early all the daytime sessions of the ference were held in the Academy of ic. The delegates, some five hundred sixty or more, were seated upon the r of the house. The visitors, and there e thousands of them, were crowded into two side galleries. The International mittee sat at the front, the French on right, the Germans on the left, the British the other Europeans together, with the ericans in the center behind the International Committee. This seating arrangement s necessitated by the fact that this conence had to be conducted in three languages, French, German, and English. Each ress, therefore, must be prepared in adce, translated, and printed in the other languages from that in which it was be delivered, and distributed to the delees at the opening of each new session. e Swedish printer kept five linotype manes working day and night for three weeks ring the period of the conference and the nographers labored at their typewriters ll midnight.

The four presidents and three vice-presints of the various sections took turns in siding over the conference sessions. The gram, printed in three languages, conned a list of one hundred and eighty-two akers upon the six great topics under cussion. In addition to this general pro am, daily programs were issued. Daily letins constituted a "Who's Who and at's What Today in Stockholm," and were tributed to all delegates before breakfast their places of entertainment.

In addition to the regular daytime sessions, great public meeting was held each eveng in one of the city's larger churches, which one or more of the prominent delees spoke to the point of the day's dission. One evening, a memorial service s conducted for the late Patriarch Tikon Russia. Another night a musical proam, with choral selections from Johann bastian Bach, was given in the Engleb[illegible] rka, Stockholm's newest and best example modern ecclesiastical architecture. On ll another evening, Selma Lägerlof, the edish novelist; Elsa Brandström, the ngel of Russia," and Dr. Nathaniel Beskow dressed a large assembly in the Blasieln Kyrka. On the two Sundays of the nference, all the pulpits of Stockholm, some irty-six in all, were occupied by delegates. obably more sermons were preached in fferent languages and by different branches the Church of Christ in one city than er before in the world's history. Had it en possible to hold all these services in e great hall, it would have been a Twenth Century reproduction of the Day of ntecost. Still other features of the proam, very much appreciated by us all, were e excursions to the Royal Palace at Drotngholm, and to the Cathedral Town of Upsala; also the dinner in the City Hall of Stockholm tendered the conference by the City Government. This gorgeous hall is one of the three great architectural wonders of this century. It stands upon a quay built out into the harbor, and is surrounded by beautiful gardens. We gathered first in the Blue Room, high, vaulted, and lit with flaming torches, and listened to music from the great organ high above us. We then adjourned to the Gold Hall and were seated—one thousand strong—about well-laden tables. There on Monday evening, August 24, were seated representatives of thirty-seven nations, forty-four countries and one hundred and four independent churches and denominations. Truly, the ends of the earth were caught up and set down in Stockholm. And the one indispensable tie, that which bound us all together, was our common loyalty to the Carpenter of Nazareth.

John Freeman and His Story

"Kennedy's Second Best"

The readers of The Congregationalist have a great treat before them in the thrilling and purposeful serial story which will begin in our December issues. Its title is Second Best what we have long sought,—a worthwhile serial story of sustained interest from beginning to end, having appeal for all ages, true to life and with real religion, as real men and women live it, running like a thread of gold through it all.

DR. JOHN D. FREEMAN

Kennedy's Second Best. Kennedy is an upstanding virile preacher on the way from success to still greater honors, when the crisis of his life comes in the far West of Canada. The story presents frontier life on the broad ranches near Calgary, with a swift-moving succession of dramatic incidents. A gripping romance is featured in this narrative. Heroism, love, ambition, conscience,—rise in the struggle of human forces which run their strong current through this remarkable story. The frontier life is vividly shown and some of the scenes carry the reader to Vancouver, to Toronto, and to old Quebec. We are fortunate to be able to give our readers in Kennedy's

The author is a writer and preacher of distinction. John Freeman is a native of Nova Scotia. He spent several years in public school teaching. He was graduated from McMaster University, and his degrees include that of Doctor of Divinity. A succession of successful pastorates in New Brunswick and Ontario, included that of Bloor Street Baptist Church, Toronto. During the last 17 years Dr. Freeman has conducted a notable ministry in England, for 15 years serving the historic Belvoir Street Baptist Church, Leicester. Dr. Freeman is widely known as a preacher and speaker at great denominational gatherings. In 1905, at the first World's Baptist Congress in London, he delivered the opening address on "The Place of Baptists in the Christian Church," making a profound impression. The call to Leicester followed. His notable work during the war included acting as honorary chaplain of Canadian troops in England and extensive service in military camps and hospitals. He has come recently to the United States, where he expects to remain, preaching and writing. He has been supplying prominent pulpits in New York and Massachusetts the last summer, and is now serving as interim pastor of Euclid Avenue Baptist Church, Cleveland, a church of 2,500 members, engaged in building a new Temple that will seat 3,400 people.

Dr. Freeman's religious books include Life on the Uplands, Concerning Christ, and The Edge of the Age. His novels include Fan of Belsey's, and This My Son, both New Brunswick stories, Punch and Holy Water (Polish), and God's Infidel (English).

Dr. Freeman knows personally the regions and the types of people that appear in his stories.

Fall Firesides

By Warren Prince Landers

Gleams and blazes the fire-light,
With incense, Autumn's best,
From out the burning hearth, bright
For those who seek clear rest;
Snapping its words to say:
A pillar of fire by night,
Cloudy pillar by day.

Offering us pure peace
In quickening warmth and glow,
After toil and studies cease,
Urging Life's joys to know;
In smoke seeming to write:
A pillar of cloud by day,
Fiery pillar by night.

And from cloud and fire a sound,
A Voice again from the wood:
With me ever is holy ground,
Give joy a reverent mood;
For flame and ash declare,
Beacons of fire and cloud
Guide and guard everywhere.

Our Developing Congregationalism

By Charles C. Merrill
Superintendent of Illinois Conference

IF the present rate of growth is continued, the membership of the Congregational Churches in the United States will have passed the million mark by 1930. That is, in a half century our membership will have tripled, the figure in 1880 having been 334,332. We shall probably have much more than kept pace with the growth of the country.

But it is not with the quantitative development of Congregationalism that I am concerned in this article. Even if the figures were more satisfactory than those of any other denomination, as they are far from being, their significance could easily be over-rated. As a denomination we may have sometimes taken too much pride in neglecting statistics, but in the main it has been a wholly sound tradition to place emphasis not on numbers but on principles, and to ask constantly not, "How many?" but "Of what kind?"

I. A Christian Organization of the Church

There are various ways in which Christianity may be expressed. In the present article I shall consider its expression through the form of its organization. At once I hear someone say: "Christianity cannot be expressed in organization. The moment you attempt to organize it you kill it." My answer is that Christianity, like any other interest of mankind, is bound to be organized. Perfectly true it is that grave danger lies in such organization, and history is replete with illustrations of the harm that has been done our religion through attempts to express it in organization. Nevertheless we are most usefully occupied, I think, when instead of futilely endeavoring to get on with an unorganized Christianity we endeavor to make the church just as perfect an organized expression of the Christian religion as it is possible for it to be. We gravely indict our modern society for its failure to express in a collective way the high ideals of the human spirit. We take it for granted that somehow it is going to be possible to embody our religion in social, industrial, and political organization. Is it not a denial of our faith if we do not similarly take this for granted in our ecclesiastical organization? In some way it must be possible to have an organization of the Christian Church so that when you read the New Testament and catch there the spirit of Jesus, you can turn to the church in your own community and to the church at large and find no underlying incongruity between the expression of Jesus in the New Testament and the expression of Jesus in the church. What does Paul mean when he says that the church is the body of Christ, other than that Christ is too great to be expressed by any individual or by any number of individuals acting separately, but only by a group of men and women who in their collective impact upon the world embody him?

From this standpoint we may estimate the present situation in Protestantism. The most pertinent thing to say about the denominational organization of Protestant Christianity today is not that it is wasteful and ineffective, but that it is un-Christian. We had better keep people away from the New Testament if we really want them to support our denominational competition. Whatever we may hold about competition as a factor in promoting business, or, indeed, in promoting churches, it is clear that competition has no place in promoting Christianity. Thoroughgoing cooperation is the only basis upon which the religion of Jesus can be advanced. Probably there is no place where this fact is so evident as in the American small community. It is enough to shake one's faith in the whole history of our religion for the last fifty or seventy-five years, to go into a small community where churches have been in existence for a half century or more, supposedly teaching the religion of Jesus, and yet there doesn't exist among those churches today enough of his religion so that they can work out and adopt a reasonable plan for coming together and unitedly, effectively, and from the standpoint of Jesus himself express and embody him. And while the situation is doubtless more glaring in the small communities, can anyone for a moment contend that Protestantism will ever come to anything like its own in the large cities of the country unless there be a tremendous step forward in the way of a more Christian organization of the Protestant forces.

There is coming a Judgment Day for denominations. They will be brought to account for the deeds done in the body, and in that day one of the principal questions will be: "What have you done toward church unity, that is, toward a more Christian organization of the church?"

II. The Peculiar Congregational Opportunity

Anyone who ever intimates that the way to achieve church unity is for all the other denominations to join his is obviously lacking in a sense of humor. Let us Congregationalists frankly say that we do not expect or desi that church unity shall be attained by th universal adoption of our form of organizatio Some of its defects are too clearly manifes for us to maintain any such opinion as tha Nor are we at all concerned about the Congr gational name. Who would choose, if he coul that the United Church should have the nam Congregational attached to it, even in paren thesis. It is plainly not the proper name fo the whole body of Christ.

The course for us Congregationalists to pur sue at the present hour seems a twofold one First, to be patient, undaunted, and aggres sive supporters of practical steps for doin away with over-churching in city and country Second, to develop among ourselves such spirit of co-operation and such a form of or ganization as may prove to be a kind of dem onstration of the essential principles upon whic any united Protestantism must be based.

In a peculiar sense we as a denominatio have been charged with the expression of de mocracy in religion. It is quite true that othe denominations have been as democraticall organized as we, but in the case of the Baptist and the Disciples, for example, this democrac has been joined with insistence upon adhe ence to the form of a single rite as a pre requisite to church membership. This ha undoubtedly been a factor in increasing thei growth, but whether it has been a factor i increasing their contribution to democracy i a fair question. In spite of a tendency in som quarters to assume lightly that democracy i a cure for all our ills, and the tendency i other quarters to say that it has been trie and has failed, the prevailing body of soli opinion is convinced that it is our only hop Democracy rightly understood is Christia because it aims to afford the most just wa and the most brotherly way in which individua men can live together and can express them selves collectively.

Strangely enough while Christianity has ha a profound effect in extending democracy in po litical organization and some effect in extendin it in industrial organization, it has not had a all the same effect in extending it in religious or ganization. The overwhelmingly dominant or ganization of the Christian religion is distinctl not democratic. The Roman Catholic Church, s far as organization is concerned, is in realit the projection of the government of the Roma Empire in the religious sphere. The Church o England and its branches, the Protestan copal Church and the Methodist Episco- Church in America, carry on the same tradi- although of course they make distinct ssions to democracy. One is indeed led as he thinks of what seems to be the lar verdict in behalf of the imperialistic iple in religious organization.

ıy do people want democracy in reli- as they seem to want it in government? nk we who have supposedly stood for de- acy are in part to blame. The same thing happened in the church that has happened and again in government. The dictator thrived when democracy has failed. Men have some government. They would r have a despotic government than none l. The truth is that democracy in reli- has not developed the forms by which it express religion with real power, and so e have turned to the less democratically nized Christian bodies.

II. The Meaning of Two Decades of History

king a period of approximately twenty , the real significance in the development ongregational organization is to be found ır effort to develop the forms in which democracy could be more effectively and appropriately expressed. Three illustra- may be given.

The very wide adoption in the local h of the Church Cabinet or Church Coun- a body which functions somewhat as the on in the Presbyterian Church or the terly Conference in the Methodist Church e Vestry in the Episcopal Church. The ch Cabinet or Council was organized be- it came to be seen that the affairs of urch could not be successfully conducted ut a body that would handle a good many ls which it was worth while to decide in urch meeting, and would also discuss a many matters and get them into shape for able action by the church meeting. In words, the Church Cabinet or Council not take the place of the administration e local church of its own affairs but aids cal church in the administration of those s. Moreover, such a Cabinet or Council the minister in his leadership of the local h. On the one hand it lessens the danger he shall assume too much authority, and e other hand it gives him a fuller oppor- y for the expression of his capacity for leadership. While some of the duties as- d to this Cabinet are the same as used performed, or are now performed, by a rganized Board of Deacons, and while is a similarity between this organization he bodies above named in other denomi- ns, it still seems pertinent to suggest that reful study of what has happened in a number of our local churches during ast two decades or so would reveal that hing new and much worth while and thor- y democratic and Congregational has been developed, and that on the whole working effectively.

2. The creation within all but a very few r states of a State Conference organiza- which will serve the churches in a variety cessary ways and will enable the churches ately to express their common fellowship do their common work. There is a simi- between the functions of this organiza- and the functions of the Diocese of the iopal Church and the Annual Conference e Methodist Church and the Presbytery or l of the Presbyterian Church, but there marked differences. At the head of this ization is an executive officer known ly as the Superintendent, who is elected by the ministers and delegates at a conference meeting, and holds his office for a definite term, or else is subject to recall on a sixty or ninety days' notice, as is the pastor of the local church. There is a similarity between the duties of this officer and the duties of the Bishop or Superintendent of other denominations, but there are vital differences. For example, a Congregational Superintendent is simply a Congregational minister to whom are entrusted certain administrative duties. He has no right to take part in an ordination which is different from the right of any of his brother ministers. In any proper use of the language, the ministers of the state do not serve "under him"; they serve "with" him. When he goes to a church, usually on the church's invitation, he is not there to give commands. He is only there to give counsel. In the long run his influence in the state does not arise from his office but from the wisdom and resourcefulness and the Christian characteristics of his service. He is coming increasingly to be called upon by churches when they make a change of pastors, and increasingly by ministers when they are seeking another church. In all this, however, he is a fraternal counselor and he takes it for granted that he can only recommend or suggest, the final decision on the one hand being in the local church as to whom it will have for its pastor and on the other hand with the minister as to the individual church he will accept. In one state, during the period from May 1, 1924, to May 1, 1925, forty out of a possible fifty pastoral changes were made through more or less consultation with the state office. There is quite no need that the proportion should reach one hundred per cent. The ten churches which did not consult the state office were perhaps making their contribution to the avoidance of the danger that that state office should come to have too great power. I hope that ere long this interesting development of state organizations since about 1910 will be adequately described, and when it is described I think it will be seen that here again we have a successful attempt, in accordance with real democracy and Congregational principles, to write a new chapter in the growth of ecclesiastical polity.

3. What the Congregational Churches of the United States did at the Kansas City Council in 1913 was to adopt a Constitution which would enable them in a democratic way to control their missionary work and also to perform more effectively the functions of a nation-wide group of churches. Attention has well been called repeatedly to the fact that the motive behind the Kansas City Constitution was not primarily ecclesiastical but primarily missionary. Moreover, the significance of the fact that at our National Council meetings the decidedly major emphasis is upon our missionary work should be fully realized. Any ecclesiastical organization that is shot through with the missionary motive and purpose is sure to be saved from many of the evils of ecclesiasticism. One does not dare to say that all the results which were looked forward to by those who were most enthusiastic for the new Constitution have been achieved. One must say, however, that there has been a fresh vitality, a new consciousness, additional momentum; and the reason why there has been this different feeling is because ministers and laymen recognized that they belonged to a body which was engaged in an honest attempt to bear witness to the worth of representative democracy in religious organization.

What has happened since Kansas City is in part due to the way in which this epoch-making action was taken in that Council. Those who were present on the Saturday morning when the final vote was taken will never forget it. You came away feeling as if you had been at a Communion service. You were proud that you were a Christian and you were proud that you were a Congregationalist. Here had been real difference of opinion, here had been vigorous debate, here had been intelligent leadership, and no less intelligent co-operation on the part of the voting delegates. You said that here was representative democracy at its best, facing a supreme issue, giving to it its keenest thought, but without rancor, without bitterness, in some real way after the manner of Christ.

The present Washington meeting promises to be another landmark in our denominational development. Doubtless the question before us is not so important as the one at Kansas City, but nevertheless it is one of profound moment. For it is at root a question as to whether a body of democratic churches, having gained control of their missionary organizations, can so co-ordinate and combine them as increasingly to avoid confusion and duplication, and increasingly to secure the maximum of missionary service. Congregational people will in the long run respond only to an appeal that is based on the worth of the work which their organizations are doing. They are never going to be rallied by any mere cry of denominational loyalty. They will ask that so far as possible one hundred cents' worth of good be done with every dollar they contribute, and this not because they are of a penurious frame of mind but because it seems to them to be simple honesty and real Christianity. They are not going to be frightened from making changes by any cry that there is too much "tinkering with machinery." They will constantly improve their machinery in order that in the fullest degree it may enable them to do the work which needs to be done, and in the fullest degree express underlying Christian ideals and motives. Whether the fivefold or the fourfold or the twofold organization of our missionary societies is adopted, this, if I mistake not, is the mood which will control the decisions at Washington. Let us hope and let us pray that at the hearings and in the discussions and at the session when final action is taken, there will be another illustration of ecclesiastical democracy at its best.

An Honored Leader's Council Message

By Hon. Thomas C. MacMillan

Moderator of the National Council 1907-1010

[EDITORS' NOTE. This message should have appeared in the National Council Number of "The Congregationalist," Oct. 8, with the messages from other former Moderators of the National Council. Its omission was due to a regretted oversight in this office. Mr. MacMillan is well past four score years, and his sight is impaired, but he is still keenly interested in Congregational affairs and has planned to attend the National Council meeting in Washington, where his presence will be heartily welcomed. His home is in La Grange, Ill.]

The National Council at the National Capital is at once significant and inspiring. It means a broader outlook and a larger opportunity for the churches of our faith and order. The fifteen years last past have been marked by the introduction and successful operation of a newer administrative system. A glance backward confirms the wisdom of the changes which have come to our several general agencies. Our churches have cordially approved these readjustments. Our councils, conferences, and associations have most happily worked together in perfecting the reorganization. We have maintained our freedom and unity in the bonds of peace. Many of our brethren of other communions have come the better to understand the life, the liberty, and the love for which we stand.

Our churches at home have been signally strengthened in pulpit and pew. Our representatives in the foreign field have kept up the high standard for which our missionaries for more than a century have been noted. Our members have learned and applied the lesson that our neighbors are those who need us most. We have been saved from divisive discussions; we have ever been for fraternity without fetters. Our writers and thinkers and leaders are in the forefront of religious, social, and industrial progress. Our development denominationally has been along administrative lines, and nowhere has there been a hint of the legislative or judicial spirit manifested. We have sought to preach and to practice the Word of Him whom we would serve that the truth shall make and keep us free.

I have no program as to the Council's thought and action. What I recall of the past makes me confident that all will be well at Washington this year. My covenanting ancestry in Scotland were not numerous, but their contribution to individual religious liberty has been neither small nor fleeting. We are not in point of membership among the "great denominations" but we have a heritage of incalculable worth, which has come to be recognized.

What shall it profit, if you have acquired books and lost the love of reading; acquired influence and lost the joy of usefulness; acquired power and lost the pleasure of service? He that thus gains his life loses it in the gaining. This is an enigma. Ponder it.—Lyman Abbott.

Opening of Campaign for First Church, Washington

The opening meeting in the First Church campaign for a new building, held in Memorial Continental Hall, Washington, Monday night, Oct. 12, was attended by upwards of 1,000 people. The program was broadcast by radio station WCAP, and included addresses by Dr. Jason Noble Pierce of the First Church, and Dr. S. Parkes Cadman.

Mrs. Coolidge attended the meeting and was very enthusiastic throughout the program. She was accompanied by Frank W. Stearns of Boston.

Preceding the meeting Justice and Mrs. Harlan F. Stone entertained at a dinner at the Mayflower Hotel in honor of Dr. Cadman, who was the chief speaker at the mass meeting. Most of the guests at the dinner came to the mass meeting later. The dinner list included Secretary of Labor and Mrs. Davis, Dr. David Jayne Hill, Hon. Mr. and Mrs. Robert Lansing, Mr. Justice Butler and Mrs. Butler, Mr. Justice Sanford and Mrs. Sanford, Mr. Justice Van Devanter and Mrs. Van Devanter, Mr. Justice and Mrs. Stone, Judge Katherine Sellers, Attorney General Sargent, Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Wilbur, Chaplain and Mrs. E. W. Scott, Col. Frank White.

The Parable of the Hookah

I was in Jerusalem, which once, with what stretch of charity I will not say, was called the Holy City. And it was a day when the followers of Mohammed were holding a Festival. And there were those of the followers of that Prophet who liked it not on that day that there should be any of my kind of folk on earth, especially in Jerusalem.

Now there sate on the pavement nigh unto the Jaffa gate, a group of these gentlemen in their red fez and Turkish garb, and they smoaked long pipes whereof the Smoak went down into Water, and bubbled, and came up again into the mouth of the Smoaker, which is a way they like to have it.

And one of them saw me coming, and he rose, and with a word of wrath unto his Companions, he walked out before me, and blew through the pipe instead of sucking it, so that the water smattered out upon the pavement. And albeit I had never seen it done in that fashion, yet had I seen men of his sort spit with a curse where their enemies were to pass, and I judged that he was doing what he intended for an Wholesale Spitting in my path, with a loud curse which I heard him pronounce as he stood out of my way.

I turned not to the right hand or the left nor did I cast mine eyes in his direction, and I walked past him as if he had not been there.

So he returned and sate him down again, and I heard him and his companions as they all commented on the performance, and I understood not the words, but I understood the tones, and it was as if they said, That Christian understood not thine intent; and as if he said, The fool had not sense enough to know that I insulted him.

But he underestimated my Intelligence. I knew his evil intent, as it showed in his wrathful countenance and his wicked tou and Behaviour, but I had sense enough no to let so angry and unreasonable a man in sult me. And I know that he will remem ber it as a wasted attempt.

For the day was hot, and he was Fat, an he reddened his face and wasted his breath and had to fill his Hookah with water again and all for a man who had not sense enoug to be insulted. But I know that he hat nothing on me in that incident.

And I have tried the same method in mir own land. There have been men who sough to be rude to me whose rudeness I ove looked to my profit and their discomfor For I am not inclined to be insulted by suc like folk. And if they think it is becaus I do not know enough to be insulted, the are welcome to their opinion; I think it because I know much more than they thin I do.

TIVE CHURCHES IN FOREIGN FIELDS, by SY HOSIE ROWLAND (Methodist Book ern. $1.50). This book deserves to rank Professor Fleming's Whither Bound in ions? as expressive of the same forward- ng spirit and appreciation of the need Christian democracy in the administra- of missionary work. The author has ten years of missionary service in h China and has evidently made a ugh study of his subject as related to fields. His definition of an indigenous h is one that is self-supporting, self-gov- g, and self-extending, with a culture that tive yet also Christian, and a religion ted to national needs. FROM OVER THE BORDER, by VERNON MONROE MCCOMBS (Council of Women for Home Missions and the Missionary Education Movement. Cloth, 75 cents, paper 50 cents). This is an additional study book provided this year in the field of home missions. Dr. McCombs has had years of experience among Latin Americans in Peru and in the Southwest region of the United States. His book contains a wealth of information clearly and attractively presented. Our close relations with Mexico and the importance of the problems presented by immigration from that country insistently demand a much better understanding of that people, in place of the misconception and misunderstanding which prevails all too largely in the United States. A study of this subject by our missionary groups in the churches is, therefore, to be welcomed, and Dr. McCombs' book will be a valuable guide. The pamphlet, "Suggestions to Leaders of Study Classes Using From Over the Border," by Jay S. Stowell (M. E. M. 15 cents) should be in the hands of every leader using this text.

Fundamentalism and Evolution

TENNESSEE EVOLUTION TRIAL: COMPLETE REPORT OF THE SCOPES CASE AT DAYTON (National Book Co. $2.00). We are not by any means convinced of the characterization of the Dayton case upon the cover of this book as "the world's most famous court trial." On the other hand, the element of fiasco in the whole business should not blind us to the fact that this trial symbolized a desperate issue in the freedom of thought and speech. One welcomes, therefore, the enterprise of the publishers in issuing so promptly this full report in book form.

THE LAST MESSAGE, by WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN (Revell. $1.00). This is the undelivered address which Mr. Bryan had prepared for delivery at Dayton when death intervened. It was written immediately after the close of the Scopes trial, and is now published with a foreword by Mrs. Bryan.

HIS PRONOUNCEMENT, by R. G. S. COLLAMORE (Dorrance. $1.75). A layman's contribution to the Fundamentalist-Evolution controversy. The author through 157 pages attacks the globular theory of the earth's form. His critical acumen may be judged by the fact that he evidently regards the last verse of the Book of Revelation as the last verse of the Scriptures chronologically.

A BOOK OF ORIGINAL PARTIES, by ETHEL OWEN (Abingdon Press. 75 cents).

FRIENDLY FROLICS, by ORA LENT DUNBAR (Methodist Book Concern. 50 cents).

Both of these little books give directions for young people's parties and games which include much of originality and wholesome, lively fun. The Book of Original Parties includes in its twelve chapters descriptions of artistic, travel, farm, favorites, suggestion, and other parties. Friendly Frolics is intended for Epworth Leagues and would serve just as well Christian Endeavorers and other similar groups of young people. The many parties include Letter Night, Handicap Social, Postal Evening, College Social, Christmas Party, Japanese Social, and Musical Evening.

General

CHARLES LAMB: A PLAY IN FIVE ACTS, by ALICE BROWN (Macmillan. $1.50). The life of Charles Lamb lends itself particularly to dramatic interpretation. In that strange and lovable character there was all the whimsicality and drollery of a Shakespearian comedy, and the circumstances of his life likewise encompassed deep and gloomy tragedy. To attempt the dramatization of that life, however, is a task calling for such gifts of sympathy, invention, and expression, that the bravest author might well hesitate. Miss Brown, none the less, has done her work well. The creative portion of her work is excellently conceived and expressed, as is best evidenced in the way in which she has blended it with the actual facts, and especially with the words of Lamb himself, so as to give a convincing picture and an impression of literary unity. No one could succeed absolutely in such a task, but Miss Brown's play is a decided achievement, justifying its description as "an authoritative mixture of realism and loving fancy."

RITUAL AND DRAMATIZED FOLKWAYS (Century. $2.50). This volume for use in camp, club, religious assembly, settlement, and school, has been written and adapted by Ethel Reed Jasspon and Beatrice Becker. It is illustrated by Albert R. Thayer. Its Ceremonies, Plays, Pantomimes, and Dramatized Folkways have been tested out under conditions of simple costume and stagecraft. The volume will be found valuable for its actual material in its field, and even more so for its suggestiveness regarding the use of other material in similar ways.

FRANCE FROM SEA TO SEA, by ARTHUR STANLEY RIGGS (McBride. $2.50). Another volume in the beautiful and competent books concerning other lands with which these publishers have recently enriched the literature of information and travel. The present author has already contributed to this series Vistas in Sicily. His work has a personal and literary quality that lift his books out of the class of guide-books, though their extensive treatment—this volume contains over 400 pages—bibliographies and adequate indices give them great value as introductions to the geography and life of the lands under description. This volume on France is particularly fine, and the text is assisted by numerous illustrations of good quality.

THE HUMAN TOUCH, by LYMAN P. POWELL (Putnam). Dr. Powell has had a varied career as an Episcopal clergyman, an educator, and a writer. This book is made up of reminiscences, impressions, and philosophizing, with emphasis upon the service in the personal relationships of his life. He delights in the many famous folk whom he has met. He moves swiftly in these sketches, and writes as he lives, brightly, cheerily, and with assurance.

The Fight Against Strong Drink

Comment on the International Uniform Sunday School Lesson for November 1 World's Temperance Sunday

Ephesians 6: 1-20

The fight against strong drink is like any other warfare against evil. Its success depends upon the same factors; though in this particular warfare there are both social and personal elements involved. It is well that in these temperance lessons the fundamental and personal aspects of this warfare should be emphasized.

The problem of the drink traffic became so acute that it was made long ago a conspicuous subject for legislation. In the evolution of such legislation, America has developed a drastic prohibitory law. Concerning the nature and results of that law there is, and there will continue to be, much discussion and much difference of opinion. It becomes increasingly evident, however, that law is after all a social measure which may do much for the protection of society, but which cannot entirely settle the problem of strong drink as it affects the individual. The Research Department of the Federal Council of Churches has recently performed a valuable work in emphasizing the continued need of sound educational propaganda in behalf of temperance. Hence we cannot over-estimate all that groundwork of temperance and self-control that the New Testament affords for the man who will give heed to its truth.

Here in our lesson Paul sets forth in a basal way the secret of mastery over temptation. He asserts at the outset the profound privilege of the Christian. He is a God-environed man. He need not depend upon his own strength, but he may be "strong in the Lord and in the strength of his might." To be "strong in the Lord," however, is not a mere matter of sentiment. It means definitely arraying oneself in the whole armor of God. Man has a task of equipment, appropriation, and preparation.

The figure that Paul uses relates to the warfare of a bygone age. Probably the symbolism would have to be differently expressed for today, but warfare has changed more in its outward form than in its essentials. Preparation, courage, endurance, clear vision, carefulness in safeguarding every weakness and in establishing every possible bulwark of defense and offense, these are the factors that are as necessary in successful modern warfare as in the days when fighting was a very crude and simple business.

If we are hoping to rid the world of war in the sense of physical combat, we may be sure that until the world changes and until human nature has developed a new mastery over evil, the symbols of physical combat will apply to the soul's activities. There is still a profound warfare to be carried on against principalities and powers, against spiritual wickedness in high places. It should be noted, however, that the weapons in this warfare are the weapons of truth, righteousness, and of the Gospel of Peace. We are too apt at times in symbolizing the warfare of the spirit, and of good aginst evil, by reference to physical combat, to imagine that this warfare of the spirit may be carried on in the spirit of the soldier rather than in the spirit of the Christian. What Paul emphasizes is the fact that the Christian in his particular sphere may learn from the watchfulness, vigor, and effectiveness of the victorious warrior in the crude, brute strife of physical conflict.

Are we doing all that is possible to enlist the young in the great fight of good against evil? Are we drilling into the minds and hearts of our young people the clear teachings that Paul expresses in such a lesson as this? We have seen in recent years how a nation can be roused in the presence of danger. Is it not an evidence of the relative failure of the church that we are not continuously as effective in enlisting all healthy and normal minded young people in the cause of right, as the State has been in enlisting the full vigor of youth in its service?

Armistice Day in Boston

The Greater Boston Federation of Churche has heartily endorsed the Armistice Day Cel bration by which Boston will dramatize on th afternoon of Nov. 11, the desire for a perpetu armistice among the nations of the world. Re George L. Paine, Executive Secretary of th Greater Boston Federation of Churches, chairman of this Armistice Day Committe Mrs. Colin W. Macdonald, vice chairman John F. Moors, treasurer; and Mrs. Lewis J. rome Johnson, recording secretary. The pr gram as so far planned includes a parade whic will start at Exeter St. and Commonwealt Ave., at 2:30, to be followed by a meetin at the Parkman Bandstand between 3:30 an 4:30 and to conclude with an evening meetin in the historic Old South Meeting House, co ner of Milk and Washington Sts., at whic two or three speakers of national reputatio will discuss constructive efforts which hav been made through the ages for peace, pa ticularly stressing the World Court as th next step toward World Peace.

The Community Service League has vo unteered to make all the plans and design for the floats, banners, and costumes of tho marching in the parade, and during the sum mer Mrs. Elizabeth Higgins Sullivan, of th organization, who is directly in charge of th pageantry and of the celebration, has be conducting exhaustive research into the histo of constructive peace movements. She h brought to light the fact that the first pea paper published came out in Boston in 18 under the auspices of Noah Worcester and l co-workers, who that same year organized t world's first peace society. The little pap was called The Friend of Peace. It was fu ther discovered by Mrs. Sullivan that in 18 the Massachusetts Senate passed a resoluti in favor of working for international peac so heading up a movement asking that t nations of the world unite. It was fro Massachusetts that Elihu Burritt, the "Learn Blacksmith," set out in 1847 on that journ to England and to other European countri in the course of which he met Cobden, Gira din, Bastiat, and others deeply interested the Congress which passed resolutions in Bru sels in 1859 in the interest of world peace.

The beautiful floats which are already beh planned for the parade will bring out the fa that the highest point in the peace idea w reached in Greece in the 7th century and th all peace movements have been of religious ethical origin. Thus it is peculiarly fitti that the suggestion for this Armistice D celebration should have come from the Great Boston Federation of Churches.

The Andover Decision

To the Editor of The Congregationalist:

I have read the editorial comments in Th Congregationalist on the Andover-Harvard D cision with much interest, and while it may b true that no such division in the Congrega tional body could take place today as tha which led to the establishment of Andover Sem inary on the one hand, and of Harvard Divini School on the other, yet in view of all the fac and on the merits of the question, I believ the decision of the Supreme Court of Mass chusetts is a just one. If the funds belongin to Andover are to be reapportioned, I say—giv them to Bangor. Bangor Seminary is doin a noble work in a needy field, and can mak good use of all the endowment which may b given her.

LIVING TOGETHER

See that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently.—I Pet. 1: 22.

It is good for us that we should help our brethren to make the circumstances of their life as much richer than they are now, as we possibly can. It is good for us that we should try to improve our own circumstances, and lift up our life so that we shall live among larger things and that we should refuse to live among the lower things in which we find ourselves placed so long as it is possible to live among higher things. But so far as we must live there in the midst of difficult circumstances, let us feel that they are God's circumstances and not ours, and let him be the judge and not ourselves of what should come forth from them.—Phillips Brooks.

To be really happy yourself you must have a passion for the happiness of others.—George Frederick Munn.

It is not having, but using the highest powers which gives worth to any man's life. Now man's highest powers are social.—E. H. Johnson.

The crest and crowning glory of all good,
Life's final star, is Brotherhood;
For it will bring again to Earth
Her long lost Poesy and Mirth;
Will send new light on every face,
A kingly power upon the race.
And till it come, we men are slaves,
And travel downward to the dust of graves.

Come, clear the way, then, clear the way!
Blind creeds and kings have had their day,
Break the dead branches from the path;
Our hope is in the aftermath—
Our hope is in heroic men,
Star led, to build the world again.
To this event the ages ran;
Make way for Brotherhood—make way for man.

Edwin Markham.

Let the love of your brethren be as a fire within you, consuming that selfishness which is so contrary to it and is so natural to man. Let it set your thoughts on work to study how to do others good. Let your love be an active love, intense within you and extending itself in doing good to the souls and bodies of your brethren as they need and you are able.—Robert Leighton.

You have a little joy, very little, hardly enough to keep your soul from starving. Share that joy with some one in trouble, and when you return you will find a great joy in your heart. In joy one divided by two is at least four.—John Hopkins Dennison.

Use us, our Father, for thy purpose, even as water-bearers and love-bringers to those whose souls are parched and desolate here. Let us go forth upon our daily journey, knowing that thou wilt help us to discern and to bring beauty and sweetness to those who know it not. Above all, touch our lives, we beseech thee, with the love of Jesus Christ. Make us lowly and kind as he was, following his example in word and thought and deed. Guard us against all that embitters our relations with others. Fill our souls with true charity in judgment and in utterance. Let us seek good rather than ill in the lives of those around us, that we may help to sweeten the world for the day of the coming of Christ.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

Life's Best Measure

Comment on the Prayer Meeting Topic for November 1-7

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: Can We Live by the Golden Rule? Matthew 7:12; Leviticus 19: 18; Galatians 6: 1. (Consecration Service.)

Light from the Bible Passages

In small compass the Sermon on the Mount is the best possible guide for the regulation of our relations one to another. Chapter 7 takes up the realm of captious criticism. The effect of this should be considered in the light of the feelings of the other person. Jesus is no advocate of the self-centered life. He believes in the law of the inevitable recompense for our good deeds. He urges the philosophy of first thinking and acting for the other fellow. In this, however, he is echoing an age-old word in Leviticus, thus setting his approval on it. Paul believed in being charitable rather than critical towards the failings of others. No one of us is absolutely safe from falling. Lifting the fallen rather than pushing them down further is the noblest Christianity.

Leads for Leaders

Is it possible to live our lives by rule? Are there too many irregularities, too many changes, too many unseen obstacles? Is it easier to regulate our own personal life than our life in its relation to others? Can you think of any better general rule than this one given by Jesus?

How would it work in the home? Is your home a group of people each living for himself? If so, is it really a home, or a boarding-house?

How would it work in business? Can successful business be done by any other methods than the cut-throat? Does "the law of the jungle" prevail or this law of Jesus? Would prosperity and happiness be more general if his law were the rule?

How would it work among nations? Can we have real nationality unless we selfishly seek—each nation—our own welfare first, last, and always? Does the Golden Rule ever sanction war? Is it the only way to peace?

Thoughts for Members

It is not always kindness to a person to ignore his faults. He may very much need helpful suggestions, but it is to be friendly and not censorious suggestion. The friendly critic needs to be sure of three things: generous attention to all good points in the person criticised; long and faithful thought on his own weak points; that his purpose in noting the other's faults is not to arouse sentiment against him, but to help him overcome them.—Dean Edward I. Bosworth.

We shall do so much in the years to come,
But what have we done today?
We shall lift the heart and dry the tear,
We shall plant a hope in the place of a fear,
We shall speak with words of love and cheer,
But what have we done today?

—Nixon Waterman.

A Moment of Prayer

Open our eyes, O Lord, to see the revealed depths of thine own heart in thy love and forbearance and forgiveness in the face of our many misdeeds toward thee, that we may more fully show those qualities to our brethren who are thy children even as we are. Amen.

WITH THE CHILDREN

Violent Waters

By Winifred Davidson

Joe Solton wanted to be a lighthouse keeper when he grew up. He had always lived near the sea and knew the ways of all the little boats in the harbor. He could paddle a flat-boat, row a skiff, manage a motor boat, and sail a yacht as well as some of the oldest sailors about Whatcom Beach.

Out on the rocks in front of the harbor, Whatcom Light stood up like a warning finger. It was the happiest time of Joe's life to be put to work by Abner, old Captain Head's assistant lighthouse keeper. Abner was very young to hold so responsible a place, but for that very reason he could understand Joe's desire to step into his shoes some day when he himself would get a still better position.

That was a long way off, however. At present Joe Solton's business was a boy's business: to go to school, to earn a little between school hours; and what time he had left—well, Joe was always over on the lighthouse rocks when he had nothing else to do.

One Saturday morning in early fall he set out to see if Abner had anything for him to do. Captain Head had been complaining of his being around the lighthouse so much, and Joe did not come directly up the worn path after he had tied up his skiff.

"That Joe'll come out here sometime when the sea is rolling too high, and something will happen we'll all be sorry for," the Captain had said.

The sea was dancing now. Joe wondered if he ought not to pull the skiff up higher still and make it fast to the concrete mooring block near the lighthouse foundation. Yes, he thought, that would be best, and he went down to the water again. Abner called him.

"Joe!"

The boy turned and ran to the lighthouse. Abner met him at the door.

"I'm glad you came over," the assistant said. "Captain Head went in to get his eyes fitted to new spectacles yesterday afternoon, and he telephoned last night that he had had an accident. An automobile knocked him down. He isn't hurt much, but the doctors wouldn't let him leave last night. There are about forty things to be done all at once this morning."

"All right," said Joe. "What shall I do first?"

"First, go down to the Indian Boy and see that she's in first-class shape. Oil. Gasoline. Water in the tank, and everything. She must be ready for action."

"I understand," said Joe.

"We may have heavy weather any time now, and she must be clean and shipshape, with life belts ready. You know."

"I know," echoed Joe, and ran down to the small motor boat.

As he worked, Joe felt the wind rising and was conscious that a mighty southwesterly storm was blowing up. Could not help rejoicing.

Perhaps Captain Head could not get over to the lighthouse that day! Perhaps he and Abner would have the whole responsibility of the light! Perhaps there would be rescue work to do!

By the time he had finished, the confused clamor of the winds and waves filled his ears. He struggled to the door of the lighthouse and ascended the circular staircase to the balcony just below the light, where Abner was standing gazing out to sea.

"We're in for it," said the assistant. "You'd better go down and make some tea and sandwiches. I'll stand watch here. Captain Head will be wild if he can't get out of the hospital and report for duty here. This is going to be a big storm."

Joe had the feeling of being aboard a ship as he set to work in the lighthouse kitchen. The windows were running with spray, and now and then a great wave dashed, first on one side and then on the other; and though the foundation went far below the surface and was anchored with concrete to the very bed rock, yet there was a perceptible tremor in the plankings and uprights.

When he carried the sandwiches and tea aloft, Abner was too excited to touch them.

"There's some one trying to get over here in a sailboat!" he shouted.

Joe could not believe his eyes. But there it was, a little flash of white that was the sail, lifting now and in a moment tumbling, it seemed, into a hollow of waters.

"He'll never live through it," Abner whispered, tensely, shrilling so that Joe heard the syllables above the whistling of the wind.

"Do you suppose"—Joe began to ask. Abner interrupted.

"Of course it's the Captain. He's bound to get over here and couldn't find any one to bring him—and this is what he is trying to do!"

"He's trying to bring her around!" said Joe. "Oh, he can't do it. He's filled and twisted."

"Here he comes again," and Abner's voice, a shriek at first, rose in a wail. "He'll go smash!"

"The Indian Boy could do it," Joe ventured to suggest.

He was trembling with excitement. He meant that he believed he could take out the motor boat and bring Captain Head around the point of rocks to safety in the cove on the more sheltered side of the little island.

"Yes, Indian Boy, with Captain Head at the wheel!" Abner agreed. "Neither of us could do it."

"I'm willing to try," Joe offered, eagerly.

"No. I daren't let you—a boy like you!" Abner protested. "I must not leave the light," he added. And then, suddenly gripping Joe's arm, he pushed him toward the stairs.

"You'll have to do it! He can't last! He's getting weaker!"

Joe was gone. It took him longer than he believed possible just to cast off the Indian Boy's moorings, back her out, and get her turned into the storm. He was not flustered. It seemed to him that he knew exactly what must be done, and he felt that he could do it. A heavy splash and patter of rain and salt water nearly blinded him, but he had taken time to seize one of Abner's old oilskin coats and his sou'wester was tied firmly under his chin.

There was something frightful and quick about the way the storm struck at him. It seemed to be on all sides, and as if it not only poured from the skies but as if the waters beneath the little boat had been blown up by some powerful explosion. Joe had never been out in any such bad weather as this; and it seemed to him that he was standing still for the first few minutes when he was in the mid of it. He had lost his sense of direction. Pe haps he was heading out to sea—and in t meantime the Captain had been swept awa farther and farther.

No. He gathered himself together, brace at the wheel as if he had been made of iro There was the little sailboat dancing wildl before him. He gradually overtook her, closin his eyes, as he ventured into the last upreac ing sea that lifted between the two boats. H saw the top of the wave break over him, an all but lost his footing in that moment as h felt himself suddenly being forced to let g Let go? No, he came out with his eyes ope And there towering above him on a rim of foa shivered the sailboat, with Captain Head read with a rope in hand, to fasten to the India Boy. In a moment Joe had his tow asteri and with the driving rain and spray over hi shoulder now, made for the cove—not fa away, to be sure; but through that whipping whirling, wind-writhing path, it seemed to hi and to old, seasoned Captain Head that it wa a struggle of long hours.

"I didn't think you could do it, boy," sai the Captain, as at last they staggered up th path to the lighthouse. "I've said many a tim that you should not be coming out this way s often; but hereafter come when you can, an I'll teach you myself all there is to learn abou the light. You know the sea—I believe—abou as well as any of us."

At a Quarter of Nine

By Bertha Gerneaux Woods

Who'll find his glasses? You, Lou? That's a dear!
Where is his sweater? It ought to be here
In the coat closet. (Oh, Bob, on the floor?)
And there is your cap, too—just back of the door.
Here, take your written work—what a smeared sheet!
Bobby, I wish you would try to be neat!

Put on your rubbers, dear—yes, son, you must!
Do learn to take mother's judgment on trust.
That's a clean handkerchief?—Fly, then, goodbye!
Yes, you can make it, I think, if you try!
(Then, as he speeds down the walk with the "Bunch")
Bobby, come back! You've forgotten your lunch!

A Little Boy's Pockets

A cherished knife, a grimy ball of string,
Some pebbles, shells, and nails, a safety pin;
A bit of putty and a curtain ring,
A marble and a tiny piece of tin;
And in the other pocket folded square
His handkerchief reposes white as snow.
Untouched by hands since first he put it there,
A small boy's handkerchief is just for show!

I pick his little suit up from the floor,
And hang it carefully upon the hook.
His weighty pockets tempt me to explore.
I have to laugh as cautiously I look,
Replacing carefully—I'll not mislay
The precious treasure of his magic day!

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

A Notable Thirty-One Year Pastorate

ıe churches of Litchfield County in Con-cut have had long pastorates. One of ears, five of over 30, and half a dozen of t 20 were all going on in the last five s. One such the people of Washington and minister, Rev. Robert E. Carter, have been completing with varied celebrations. town is made up of schools, dairymen, and ge summer colony. These have all joined is celebration. A special recognition serv- conducted by summer resident ministers, held on Sunday, Aug. 30. At this service Herbert Turner, former pastor of this ch, presided, Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis, or emeritus of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, ched the sermon, and Dr. Roger S. Forbes, or of the Unitarian Church in Phila-hia, gave the recognition address. Both ıese addresses emphasized the preaching in church. Dr. Hillis said Mr. Carter had ned to preach doctrine practically, and to ach duty doctrinally, while Dr. Forbes em-sized the poetical and spiritual qualities nifested both in the services and the ser-ıs. Dr. Hillis called the roll of noble men had served in the Washington pastorate—son Brinsmade, minister for over 50 years he 18th century, Ebenezer Porter, who went n Washington to the presidency of Andover inary, "Adirondack Murray," whose ser-ıs, first preached in Washington and then Boston, have recently been republished in eat Britain, Dr. Lyman, whose sons became lers of the business and newspaper world Minneapolis and New York. Then he dwelt the place which the families of Mr. and Mrs. ter had taken in religious activities. He ke of the grandfather, Robert Carter, the w York publisher, from whose bookstore for r half a century religious books went over whole country; Samuel T. Carter, the her, who was the leader of the movement the revision of the Confession of Faith in Presbyterian Church, and of the Congre-gational heritage on the mother's side straight from Plymouth Rock. The emphasis on Mrs. Carter's Congregational heritage from Deacon Sterling of the Bridgeport Church had a peculiarly appropriate illustration in the Litch-field County meeting of the Woman's Board that week when the afternoon program, over which Mrs. Carter presided as county vice-president, was filled by the report of Mrs. Carter's sister—Mrs. Frank Gaylord Cook—of her trip around the world in the service of missions, and by their niece, Miss Ethel Ster-ling, who was secretary of the junior work for the New Haven Branch.

After these Sunday services there was a large reception given to Mr. and Mrs. Carter in the public hall on Monday evening. In this the whole community co-operated, and at its close a purse of $2,000 was presented.

In the business meeting of the church, called to consider the necessary close of the pastorate, appropriate resolutions were adopted, which were beautifully engrossed and bound in leather and given as a continuing memorial to Mr. and Mrs. Carter. At the same time Mr. Carter was elected pastor emeritus of the church, and welcomed to continue in its service in whatever ways he might still find possible.

Surely there are still rewards abiding in the life and work of a country minister. "Once in a while it finishes in style," anyhow, or, to put it more reverently and scriptually, it is a race which, even in these rapid days, one may find it well worth while to run.

Dr. Potter's Quarter Century at Hartford

On Oct. 4 and 5 Center Church, Hartford, Ct., observed the 25th anniversary of the coming of Dr. Rockwell Harmon Potter to the pastor-ate. At the Thursday evening service, Oct. 1, Dr. Potter, speaking of that as the "real anni-versary," recalled some of the changes. A total of 1,499 new members have been received into the church; in 1900 Center Church had 659 members, now 1,176 are enrolled. There are about 200 members now in the church who were there when Dr. Potter came. The Communion service, Oct. 4, with Dr. Potter's sermon, was a part of the celebration; in the evening Dr. Charles R. Brown preached, and on Monday evening a reception was held in Center Church House for the members of the church and congregation as well as for the many in other churches who honor Dr. Potter.

His has been a remarkable ministry. Coming to this large and influential church less than two years after graduating from the Theological Seminary, he proved himself from the beginning the man for the place. He has been a leader, a preacher, a pastor; he has given himself generously to the work of the churches at large and to the help of his brother ministers. There has been something fine in his broad and catholic spirit as there is some-thing contagious and inspiring in his laugh. I recall a Sunday when I sat in the Center Church congregation and a lady who did not recognize me turned to me at the close of the service and said, "Do you know our Dr. Pot-ter? We are very proud of him and we love him." He has stood steadily for the dignity of the church, for the reality of religion, and for the application of the Gospel of Jesus Christ to life. C. S. L.

News Notes from the Central South

Following their ordination at Lake Worth in July, Rev. and Mrs. J. M. Dickey went to our Panhandle fields of Texas for a series of evangelistic meetings. The first was at Friona, where Rev. A. M. Sheldon was serving as pas-tor. Despite unusually heavy and continuous rains a helpful work was done. Interest grew, and at the few meetings when weather condi-tions were favorable attendance filled the house. Both Mr. Sheldon and laymen on the field commended the earnest and helpful work of these evangelists. The next work was at Spring Lake, Rev. W. T. Wilson, pastor. Here the response was hearty and the work fruitful, 18 members being received into fellowship.

Rev. J. G. Duling, after a brief visit to his family in Minneapolis, invested the rest of his vacation from the exacting work at Tulsa, Okla., by serving as supply of the village church at Goltry. Without a pastor for some months, the folks were disheartened, but the vigorous and inspiring preaching of Mr. Duling soon brought new courage. Sunday school attend-ance increased from 27 to 99. A Christian Endeavor Society was revived and meetings brought out from 25 to 30 interested young people. A delightful social was held, with an attendance of 50, and on the last Sunday of Mr. Duling's supply ministry the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was observed in the morn-ing. Mr. Duling studied the parish problems and made suggestions for carrying on the work, even making a visit to a nearby town to dis-cuss the possibility of a yoking of two fields under one pastor. We can hardly recommend this form of vacation as likely to be restful, but the Goltry folks will long remember with gratitude the ministries of one man who took a part of his vacation in that way.

Central Church, Dallas, Tex., has been called upon to suffer serious losses in the last few weeks. The passing of the minister's wife, Mrs. T. H. Harper, in June, has been noted in The Congregationalist, and in August, one of the loved and honored charter members of the church, Mr. E. M. Powell, was also called to rest. The end came, Aug. 9, in Colorado Springs, where he had been sent in the hope of bringing relief. Mr. Powell came to Texas half a century ago. For years he was in the em-ploy of the state, acquired extensive property, much of it being large land holdings in West Texas. He was a modest man, of deep reli-gious convictions and devoted to the Christian cause as he understood it to an unusual extent, using his means generously for the advancement of religious and benevolent interests. His will left large sums to such causes, each of the three Congregational churches in Dallas being remembered. A bequest was placed with a local religious extension society to be adminis-tered by them for Congregational religious interests.

Of a good deal more than local interest is the death of Mr. Alex Sanger, a princely mer-chant, head of the largest department store in the city. Upwards of half a century ago he came to Dallas with his brothers, and it is said of him that on the ship coming over, his sympathies for the steerage passengers led him to give all the money he had, and he landed at Ellis Island penniless. But modern wisdom in dealing with the emigration question had not then developed and he was admitted. It is the old story of small beginnings, unfailing diligence, good judgment in investment in the early days of a growing city, with sound and generous business methods, and in the end great wealth and a success that has made the name of Sanger Brothers a synonym of honor, kindliness, and high achievement. He came a "foreigner," but he became an American citizen of a splendid type, and his love for his adopted city, state, and nation shone resplendently always. He was a Jew. The final services were held in Temple Immanuel, but he was such a worshiper of Jehovah that he sympathized with all truly religious people and his many benefactions included Christian causes often, the local Y. W. and Y. M. C. As. justly holding him among their staunchest friends, and all good people honored and loved him. Such characters deserve our admiration. Among the highest fruits of Christian civilization are men in commercial callings who yet largely devote ability and money to moral, civic, social and religious betterment. And when such personalities arise from among other races and religious groups our praise should be the more generous and given with the greater joy. And with this peculiar joy do we pay tribute to this Jewish American citizen and patriot, Alex Sanger. A. E. B.

Important Decision in Boston

The recent decision of Shawmut Church, Boston, to unite with Park Street Church of the same city is of special interest, not only to the local constituency, but to the wider fellowship of Congregationalists. Shawmut for years was one of the strongest churches of New England. Its pastors have been men of national reputation among Congregationalists, and its gifts to our various mission boards have amounted to three-quarters of a million dollars. But the church has found itself stranded in the midst of a rapidly changing rooming population, unable to build a self-sustaining congregation or to do efficient work without aid from the missionary boards of the church. Since the coming of Dr. Albert F. Pierce over three years ago, the church has taken a new hold upon the community. Two Endeavor Societies have been formed numbering sixty members; a Sunday school with an enrollment of over 200, not including a Cradle Roll of 40; a Girl Scout troup of 40; Boy Scouts, 20; and other organizations for young people. Notwithstanding the new vigor and life which has come to the church, yet because of the recent loss of so many of its workers by death and by removal to other communities, and the expressed unwillingness of the missionary organizations to grant it aid, Shawmut has sold its house of worship and has decided to unite as a body with the strong and historic Park Street Church.

Out of the proceeds from the sale of its property, Shawmut has voted to contribute $20,000 to St. Mark Congregational Church (colored), toward the securing by them of a suitable house of worship. This gift is conditioned upon the other churches and missionary organizations raising a like sum for the same purpose (or any proportion of the same), the offer to hold good for three years.

The balance realized by the sale will be known as "The Shawmut Memorial Fund," and will be given to Park Street Church towards its Endowment Fund on condition that if Park Street Church should cease to be a Congregational church affiliated with the Massachusetts Association of Congregational Churches, or should remove from its present location on Park Street, then "The Shawmut Memorial Fund" should go to and be equally divided between the Congregational Church Union of Boston and the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society.

It is also understood that Park Street Church will continue a preaching service and Sunday school and special work for young people in the South End as long as results justify it; and that Dr. Pierce will be associated with Dr. Conrad, having under his particular supervision the work in the South End which will be known as the Shawmut Branch of Park Street Church.

When Sunday Comes

By John Andrew Holmes

The minister who can read a long and detailed bazaar announcement without detracting from the worship can almost serve God and Mammon.

For Acquaintance and Attendance

Two churches in the Norfolk Union of the Pilgrim Association of Massachusetts have this fall undertaken a definite campaign to increase acquaintance and secure attendance. Old First Church, Weymouth Heights, set aside Sunday afternoon, Oct. 4, for calls upon all families, with what the pastor, Rev. Stanley Marple, describes as "an overwhelming success." Pledges were taken in which the signers indicated they would attend church regularly (36 times or more); frequently (24 at least); occasionally (eight or more); seldom (at least twice). The workers sought signatures to no legal document, the announcement stated, but in the interest of a moral obligation, to be kept except under unusual circumstances.

First Parish Church, Brockton, on Sept. 20, conducted its house-to-house visitation. A "fleet" of 50 automobiles carried over 80 leaders of the church, who in three and a half hours called upon about 500 families. These visits were not confined to the city limits but were made in five other towns. Rev. E. H. Gibson, the pastor, is enthusiastic in his appreciation of results. Social contacts were established. The purpose was not financial but in the interest of Christian fellowship. The visitation was fittingly prefaced by the morning sermon upon "Friendship and the Christian Way." Lunch was served the visitors before the "campaign" opened. W. P. L.

Rev. Douglas Horton Installed

The installation of Rev. Douglas Horton as pastor of Leyden Church, Brookline, Mass., was notable from many angles. The personnel of the council was unusual. Besides the Suffolk West Association of Congregational Churches all the Protestant churches of Brookline were invited to be represented by pastor and delegate, with voting rights. Rev. B. T. Tyler, rector of All Saints, gave the right hand of fellowship, Rev. S. M. Macaulay, Baptist, read the Scriptures, and Rev. W. R. Leslie, Methodist Episcopal, made the invocation. The council while being Congregational was also thoroughly and completely interdenominational, and no one raised a voice against it. The paper of the candidate on "The Church, the Home of the Creative Spirit," was also notable, original, and scholarly. The father of the new pastor, Byron Horton, is a deacon in Dr. Cadman's church in Brooklyn, so it was eminently fitting that Rev. S. Parkes Cadman should preach the sermon of installation. His text was 2 Tim. 1:7, "God gave us not a spirit of fearfulness, but of power and love and discipline." His sermon was a masterpiece. It was textual rather than topical. His introduction was a masterly tribute to Paul, the colossus who joined East and West together. The great need of today, as shown at the great conference at Stockholm, is another Paul. Dr. Cadman, while pointing out the crying need of discipline in the life of today, was not pessimistic.

The world is in a state of convalescence [he declared] and it must be made well through faith. Think of that noble picture! It can be made indestructible through faith, with the help of love, which, with the aid of the church herself, can be everlasting. What is needed today is the mobilization and the moralization of public opinion.

The summary of his advice to the new pastor was:

We have to face the present day with courage. In this we want discipline, and above all we must not be afraid of power; but let it be the power of love, which makes better use of it than the state.

Dr. Ashley D. Leavitt, Mr. Horton's neighbor at Harvard Church, Brookline, made the impressive installation prayer. Dr. J. Edgar Park gave the inimitable charge to the pastor. Dr. Harris G. Hale, the beloved pastor emeritus, gave the affectionate and uplifting charge to the people, the Episcopal rector the right hand of fellowship, and the new pastor the benediction. And all this array of talent with some soul stirring music by choir and congregation, consumed only an hour and a quarter in this very impressive, dignified, and satisfying service of the evening. T. C. B.

Installation of Rev. Ervine Inglis

The installation of Rev. Ervine Inglis as pastor of the Vine Church, Lincoln, Neb., took place Sept. 24. The out-of-state men present were Dr. E. B. Allen of Oak Park, Ill., who preached a challenging sermon from the theme, "The Changing Church and the Changeless Christ," and Rev. A. F. Newell of Garner, Ia., who was second pastor of Vine Church. His charge to the people was especially appropriate and came near to the hearts of all as he paid tribute to some of the older members.

REV. ERVINE INGLIS

Dr. J. A. Holmes was moderator and Rev. V. F. Clark scribe, other parts in the service being taken by Rev. Harold Cooper, A. G. Heyhoe, Pres. E. B. Dean, and Rev. F. W. Leavitt.

Dr. Harmon Bross, formerly for 16 years superintendent of Nebraska state work, and a charter member of Vine Church, presided as toastmaster at the dinner served the council in the basement of the church. He has just passed his 90th birthday.

In the candidate's statement, he paid a beautiful tribute to his parents, Mr. and Mrs. William Inglis, who were present and who are members of the church he is serving. In speaking of the influence of Chicago Seminary upon his life he said:

The three years which I spent there were for me great years. They gave a new vitality to my faith. To Chicago I took a dogmatic religion. Coming away I brought with me a personal experience and the beginnings of an understanding of Jesus. This was for me a conversion.

He was an active participant in the World War and spoke feelingly of its influence upon his life.

Mr. Inglis has been at Vine Church eight months, coming from a three and one-half year pastorate at Aurora. During those eight months 82 members have been received, and a forward impulse given to young people's work, as is by the doubling of the attendance at school and the organization of an or-and a Christian Endeavor for young of high school age as well as the one iversity students. His own large class

2. Expressing the desire to co-operate with the Fort Berthold Indian Mission in the celebration of its 50th anniversary next summer;

3. Approving the Fargo College campaign by the alumni and appointing a committee to co-operate;

4. As favoring a gradual simplifying of the gearing up of the denominational machinery represented by our missionary societies;

5. As unfavorable to the merger of the denominational magazines;

6. Urging renewed efforts in evangelism, religious education, and support of our benevolences;

7. Recommending the settlement of race problems and the prevention of war by the application of the principles of Christianity to our everyday life.

Tablet Dedicated at Newington

On Sept. 7, a memorial tablet was unveiled at the church and cemetery at Newington, to Rev. Joseph Adams, A.M. (1688-1783), who was the first pastor of the Newington Town Church, 1715-1783, and died there in 1783. The subscribers to the memorial tablet were descendants of Pastor Adams, and citizens of the town and other friends.

Deacon Jackson M. Hoyt presided at the dedicatory service, and there was organ music by the church organist, Mrs. Laura E. Frink. Prayer was offered by Rev. S. N. Adams, Chester, a descendant, and greetings were brought from North Church, Portsmouth, by Judge Edward H. Adams, another descendant. Addresses were given by Charles H. Adams, Melrose, Mass., and by Rev. J. W. Bixler of Exeter, N. H., who spoke on "The Puritan Spirit in the New Day." Rev. Albert Donnell, present pastor at Newington, read a memorial poem, and the tablet was unveiled by two young descendants of Mr. Adams, Miss Ruth J. Hoyt and Master Shaw G. Knox. Mrs. Catherine Badger, of Portsmouth, formerly of Newington, sang the memorial hymn, written by John F. Hoyt, a member of the community.

Following is the inscription on the tablet:

In Memory of the Rev. Joseph Adams, A.M. Born in Braintree, Mass., Jan. 4, 1688. Graduated Harvard 1710, A.M. 1713. Died in Newington, N. H., May 20, 1783. First Pastor of the Newington Town Church, 1715-1783. Descendants and Towns-People erected this Memorial 1925.

MASSACHUSETTS

Melrose Highlands' Golden Jubilee

Forty-nine years ago John G. Taylor, a student at Andover Seminary, came to the new and struggling church at Melrose Highlands. For 18 years he was its pastor, put it on its feet and on the map. On Sept. 30, he helped to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the church with a rich and rare recital of the city, school, and church of a half century ago. The mayor of the city, Rev. R. H. Bennett of the First Church, Rev. T. H. Secrist, the Unitarian pastor, for the churches of the city, Rev. Austin Rice for the Woburn Association of Churches, all brought greetings and good wishes. More than 400 people were present and participated in the social time which followed the addresses. To the three living charter members, Miss Emily Singer, Miss Abbie Snow, and Mrs. Annie F. Carleton, an address and flowers were given by Mrs. Eva Burke Johnson, president of the Women's League.

On Sunday, Oct. 4, the celebration was continued by a joint rally of the church and Sunday school. A brief sketch of the founding, progress, and present standard of the church school was given by Superintendent Cattanach. The anniversary address was delivered by Dr. W. E. Gilroy of The Congregationalist, on "Christ in Church and School." In the afternoon the anniversary sermon was preached by Dr. A. D. Leavitt of Brookline, himself a son of the church, his father, Rev. B. F. Leavitt having been pastor of the church for 12 years. The theme of the sermon was, "Christianity no an Escape, but a Victory."

The charter members numbered 39 in 1873, while today the membership is 634. The church has taken a position of leadership in the city and in the Woburn Association. Much credit for its present power and place in the community is due to the untiring service of the present pastor, Rev. J. O. Paisley, who has served the church since 1906, making him the senior pastor in point of service in the Woburn Association, with the exception of Rev. J. H. Dale, who has served the church at Billerica since 1903. T. C. E.

Fire Damages Waltham Church

The house of worship of First Church, Waltham, was damaged by fire to the extent of $50,000, on the afternoon of Oct. 8. About $30,000 had recently been spent for renovations on the building. The church parlors had just been decorated for the annual reception to the pastor, scheduled for that evening, an event which was to have been of unusual significance, as Dr. F. H. Page, the minister, recently resigned from the pastorate to become president of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society. The chapel was not damaged and so will house the meetings of the church until the burned building is repaired. Insurance does not quite cover the loss.

Abington Calls a Pastor

First Church, Abington, has called Rev. J. J. Black of Boston University Graduate School to succeed Rev. J. C. Millian, who went to Foundry Methodist Episcopal Church, Washington, last June. Mr. Black is an alumnus of Wheaton College, Ill., and of Hartford Seminary. During the war he was a member of the marine corps and later saw service as army chaplain. He has had pastoral experience in Colorado.

Installed Pastor of Maverick, East Boston

Ten months ago Maverick Church, East Boston, called a council to ordain Kenneth Lawrence Danskin to the ministry, he having been for two years and a half connected with the church as assistant pastor. With the going of Rev. W. W. Sleeper to Rutland at Easter time the church called Mr. Danskin to its pastorate and voted to install him. This is a notable event, for there has not been an installed pastor there in a generation. The council, on Oct. 4, was formed by the churches of Suffolk East Association and invited individuals. The examination following so recently on the ordination was devoted largely to the place and work of Maverick Church and its minister in East Boston. A thoroughgoing community program is in operation. Plans are being made for meeting the needs of 200 Protestant Italians in the community. Rev. William McNair was chosen moderator, and Rev. C. E. Dunn scribe. A feature of the evening service of installation was the presence and assistance of the Wellesley Church's pastor and full choir. A rare atmosphere of worship and dignity characterized their singing. The sermon on "Him declare I unto You," by Rev. S. K. Tompkins of Central Church, Boston, was direct and impressive. The prayer of installation was given by Rev. Sidney Lovett, a former pastor of the church, the charge

HYMNS for the LIVING AGE

Edited by H. AUGUSTINE SMITH

Director of Fine Arts in Religion, Boston University
Director of Music, Chautauqua, N. Y.

Important features of this book:

All words are between the staffs, making it possible to read and sing with ease.

The reinforced binding protects the book against the hard, if devout usage of over-zealous members of the choir.

The responsive readings, which mark a new epoch in Biblical literature for public worship are in the front pages where they can be used without throwing the book out of balance.

The index, which is so rarely used, is in the back of the book.

The musical settings constitute a rich and varied feast throughout and are fitted to the text with great care.

The music is within the range of the average voice and creates no unwilling sopranos and bassos.

No section of the book is over-populated; there are a number of social service hymns, but not at the expense of hymns of devotion.

The price of HYMNS FOR THE LIVING AGE is $1.75. The introductory rate is $1.35 with transportation additional, from New York or Chicago.

Essex North Ministers Gather at Home of Poet Whittier

A visit to Whittier's home in Amesbury was made by the ministers of the Essex North Association, Sept. 22. It was "ladies' day," and 12 of the 16 ministers present were accompanied by their wives. After spending a little time going about the house to look at many interesting objects connected with the life of the poet, the company gathered in the large living room, made exceptionally attractive by a cheery fire in the fireplace, and seated about small tables partook of a basket lunch, with hot coffee and fruit provided by the caretakers of the home. After the lunch a short business meeting was held, and then Rev. S. K. Skinner, of Haverhill, gave an informal address on "My Impressions of Whittier." He spoke from the standpoint of his intimate acquaintance with Whittier's poems in relation to their influence upon his own religious experience and development of Christian character. The effect upon his hearers was profoundly impressive. Gathered, as they were, in the quaint old house that for 50 years was the poet's

Our National Journal

CONGREGATIONALISTS have one national journal for their homes and their churches. It is The Congregationalist. It keeps us informed; unites our fellowship; helps in real religion. It represents our churches and all our mutual interests. It reports the progress of the Christian world; it interprets current events and moral issues from the Christian point of view. It publishes what Christian leaders are doing and saying. It maintains an open forum for the free discussion of the subjects which interest its readers. It reports the news of the churches, missions, education and social service. It gives comfort and inspiration. It is a force for righteousness.

The Congregationalist helps its readers to carry the Pilgrim spirit into the life of today. While it is the organ of the Congregational churches, it is broadly Christian rather than sectarian. It shows life as it is and helps us to make it what it should be. It stimulates enthusiasm in the work and opportunities of the church. In these confusing days its light and leading bring constant comfort and cheer. It is the best of pastors' assistants. It is the layman's guide and friend. It is the comrade of the young people. It is the mother's and home-maker's helper. It is attractive, interesting, up-to-date, and abundantly worth while.

Jubilee Celebration at Farragut

The completion of 50 years of history was the occasion of a successful jubilee celebration at Farragut, Oct. 4. Former members and pastors of the church responded to the invitation either in person or by letter. Rev. B. R. Bauman, recently called from Lincoln, Neb., opened his pastorate on this date by preaching an inspiring sermon on "Building the Church." Communion services followed, presided over by Rev. T. F. Galt of Shenandoah, who was assisted by deacons and by Adolph Chapin of Bonesteel, S. D. Mr. Galt and Mr. Chapin are sons of the two original deacons, Mr. M. H. Galt and Zerah Chapin.

The afternoon session was given to a review of the church's history. Greetings were extended by Rev. L. A. Lippitt of Shenandoah, and by Rev. C. W. Proctor of the Farragut Methodist Church. The historical sketch was presented by Mr. Galt, and all the living former pastors responded with congratulations and good wishes. Letters were read from

Ten Short Stories from the Bible

By CHARLES R. BROWN

Dean, Divinity School, Yale University

This is what The Bookman thinks of them:

"With soft music coming out of the night from some symphonic orchestra, a loungy chair, a light, the scene is set for brooding over the pages of a book of short stories. Is it Kipling, Sir Conan Doyle, O. Henry? No, not this time. Charles R. Brown is talking, and the book, which has held through the evening, is Ten Short Stories from the Bible. They are great short stories in themselves, and Dean Brown proves himself a master of this type of story."

From Pulpit to Professorship

The Eddyville Church has relinquished its popular minister, Rev. A. S. Kilbourn, that he may exercise his gifts as professor of sociology at Talladega College. Unwilling to give up their pastor permanently, the church has granted Mr. Kilbourn a nine months' leave of absence in the hope that he may return to the pastorate, and to the Eddyville Church next June.

The eight years of service to the church and community have been characterized by strong and devoted leadership. While others have preferred the city pastorate, Mr. Kilbourn has chosen the semi-rural church, and has put such energy, intelligence, and consecration into the service as to win both the admiration and support of the community. In a community over-supplied with churches and under-supplied with effective leadership, the Congregational Church and its pastor have stood for a high-level type of ministry. The church has grown in material possessions, in membership, and in the things of the spirit.

Memorial Tablets Unveiled

The Bradford Church, commonly known as "The Little Brown Church in the Vale," unveiled two bronze memorial tablets, Oct. 4, one in memory of Dr. William S. Pitts, physician and author of the famous song, "The Church in the Wildwood"; and the other in memory of Rev. John K. Nutting, the first pastor of the church, who served from 1859-1868. The ceremony included a brief historical sketch by Mrs. I. M. Fisher of Cedar Falls, who donated the first tablet. Mrs. Fisher was a student in the old Bradford Academy and was personally acquainted with Dr. Pitts. She was present when the above mentioned song w first sung in public by the author. The se ond tablet, in addition to bearing the nan of the first beloved pastor, contains the nam of 140 members who have united with t church since the organization was formed 1855.

BREED—Rev. Dwight P. Breed, pastor emeritus of Summerdale Church, Chicago, Ill., died Oct. 7, at his home near the church. Extended notice later.

REV. HENRY A. STEVENS

There are deaths that come upon us with the sense of a completed memory,—deaths that end life as the sunset ends the day. Such was that of Rev. Henry Augustus Stevens, who died at his home in Brighton, Mass., on Sept. 28.

Mr. Stevens was born in Salisbury, N. H., Dec. 29, 1835, and thus if he had tarried three months longer would have reached the age of 90 years. Early in life he decided to enter upon the work of the Gospel ministry, and accordingly was graduated from Amherst in 1857 and Andover Seminary in 1860. With his ordination in Melrose in 1861 he began a highly successful ministry of 52 years in the Congregational churches of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, viz.: Melrose, 1861-68; Brockton, 1869-74; Brighton, 1874-81; and Bristol, R. I., 1881-96. Thereafter he served for brief periods at Providence, R. I., and Georgetown, Mass., and then, as stated supply every Sunday for 11 years, 1902-1913, at Rochester, Mass., retiring from the active ministry in the fall of 1913.

In 1861 Mr. Stevens married Sarah Northend

Why Burn Money?

Every year, especially at house-cleaning time, thousands of dollars worth of old postage stamps are destroyed.

Miss Ida Mack, Erie, Pa., wrote me: "For three months my sister and I had been burning our old letters, when we saw your advertisement for old stamps." I paid Miss Mack $65.61 for the stamps still unburned.

Miss Elizabeth L. Foote, Syracuse, N. Y., wrote me last November: "I have destroyed most of the old letters, burning many in packages which I did not take apart." I paid Miss Foote $316.05 for those she had left.

Miss Katharine S. Haskell, 109 Dorchester St., Boston 27, Mass., sold me her old stamps in January, having seen my advertisement in The Congregationalist. I paid Miss Haskell $300.61 for them. On February 7 she wrote: "Now that our business connected with the sale of old stamps is completed, I would like to say that I have appreciated the courteous manner in which you have conducted same, the frank, clear way in which you have listed values, and the prompt reply, with check enclosed for each package sent you. The transaction has been entirely satisfactory, and I shall take pleasure in giving your name to any of my friends who have old stamps to dispose of."

Miss Mabel Connor, 16 Elm St., Augusta, Me., a daughter of General Selden Connor, a former Governor of Maine, also saw my advertisement in The Congregationalist. She writes: "It was a fortunate day when I saw your advertisement in The Congregationalist, for our attic has yielded many dollars worth of stamps. I am so well pleased with the sales made you that I have given your name and address to several friends."

I invite all who have old correspondence with stamps used before 1890, accumulations of loose stamps, old collections, large or small, to correspond with me.

Ladies' Aid Societies

I have assisted in the raising of money for various purposes by disposing of stamps gathered by Ladies' Aid Societies at Stoneham, Mass., Kirkland, Ill., Newnan, Ga., etc. If you will write me I will send you full particulars as to how to proceed. I know a little about the many ways our ladies go about raising funds for their work, as my wife is President of a large Society (Church of the Savior, M.E.).

FRANK G. WARD, Dean 5757 University Avenue, Chicago

Tenney of Georgetown, Mass., who preceded him to the yonderland about seven years ago,—a wonderful woman, fit companion for this nobleman of God. Her death also was a transfiguration. They are survived by their five children with whom he made his home, and a niece who lived with them since childhood, who has been a helpful companion in the latter years. Mr. Stevens continued active until within a few months of the end. During his brief illness he was surrounded by those he loved and who counted it a privilege to do everything that would contribute to his comfort.

The funeral service was held in the Brighton Church, where numerous friends gathered not to mourn but to rejoice at the thought of his coronation and to thank God they had enjoyed him so long.

A striking figure was Mr. Stevens with his erect bearing, and his noble face surmounted by a great shock of white hair. He was a minister and gentleman of the old school type, kind, courteous, evangelical; an earnest preacher and faithful pastor, who preached and lived in the compassionate spirit of Christ, and was most thoughtful of others in every hour of trial and sorrow. He left a host of friends wherever he served as minister and his benedictions rest in many hearts. He was especially honored and beloved in Brighton by all, irrespective of creed or color. He is gone but his memory and inspiration remain a lasting influence; and any pain at parting has become a sacrament, for it is made radiant with the assurance that this life is robed with glory, but "to die is gain." OUR READERS' FORUM

To the Editor of The Congregationalist:

The conviction burning in the mind of many candid people is growing upon me, that the building up of the denominational and religious life of the morrow lies not in devising new programs to make function the principles and measures of our Fathers, wise though they were, but in breaking from them, and substituting others better adapted to present and future needs, which understanding, born of enlarged experience and vision, enables our great leaders to devise.

With a view to this end I suggest a motto for the National Council: Break the Hold of the Dead.

Beloit, Wis. (Rev.) W. P. Clancy.

Negro Educational Leadership

To the Editor of The Congregationalist:

Secretary Fred Leslie Brownlee has made a good answer to the questions which I raised in an editorial last March, regarding the problem of Negro education. I have not a word of dissent from his position to offer. I agree with him, that one mark of success of the earlier program of the American Missionary Association when, necessarily, schools for Negroes in the South were headed and taught largely by white teachers, would be the development, within the colored race, of men and women capable of teaching and leading in the field of Negro education. I agree with him that the very success of a genuine educational policy would involve the possibilities of white teachers serving under Negro principals and presidents.

What I have in mind, however, is the growth of a policy, as evidenced by utterances of some Negro writers, of objecting to an indefinite continuance of white leadership or teaching for Negro schools. This policy, I admit, is in part due to the foolish and mistaken notion of racial superiority which the white race so unconsciously and mischievously entertains. If there are whites who cannot be made to see that, in many instances, a particular Negro is intellectually qualified to do the best work in a particular school, there are increasing numbers of our colored friends who believe that a white teacher for a colored school is objectionable. My point is, that such a policy at present is foolish, vicious, and mistaken. It was to utter a word of warning against t idea that I wrote that editorial.

Dr. Warner's Services

To the Editor of The Congregationalist:

It appears to me that important omissio were made in the appreciative reference to I Lucien C. Warner which recently appeared your paper.

I was associated with him in some of work from 1880 on, and some reference to t period should be made, for while all the p sibilities were surely in him, those experien gave him a broader outlook and enabled h to become the all-round man he was.

During that time he was chairman of t Harlem Branch of the Young Men's Christi Association, which grew rapidly under his w leadership and secured its building on 12 Street, to which he gave large financial a From his Christian home in that section New York came many efforts for the betterm of our city, the Harlem Branch of the Y. W. C. being one of them.

Dr. Warner was an early member of t Congregational Club of New York City a Vicinity, and was its president for several yea during which the meetings were of a high ch acter and well supported. He was also a tr tee and president of the Congregational Chu Building Society. The writer knows from p sonal experience of Dr. Warner's devotion duty and to the work of these societies.

Has any man come nearer the injunction the Prophet Micah than Dr. Warner? I th not. "What doth Jehovah require of thee; to do justly and to love kindness and to w humbly with thy God."

When the call comes to us, may we be ready to respond as was Dr. Warner.

Change Council Date

To the Editor of The Congregationalist:

Is it in order to urge the consideration a change of date for the meeting of the N tional Council? I am writing out of the poi ancy of my disappointment at finding that cannot get away from my church at this ti

Men from the Pacific Coast must be aw for at least three weeks, and most of th will feel that they should take not less than month for such a trip. This means that t will be unable to get their church progr under way before the middle of November the earliest.

When the National Council met on the P cific Coast it was held during the summ The men from the East could not come so in October. Now, it is no farther from the A lantic to the Pacific than from the Pacific the Atlantic. In fact it is not so far, for t tide is coming this way!

When most of our churches were in N England or thereabouts it made not so mu difference when the Council met.

But the Council is going to be meeting on t Pacific Coast about every third or fourth ti from now on!

And our New England brethren will real how we feel about being obliged to leave churches for the most critical month in t year.

Unless the vacation period is less demora ing in other sections of the country, most October is used in gathering forces and organizing them for the year's work.

Nearly all the other large religious bod are meeting in the spring or summer. W you not bring this question prominently bef Congregationalists?

Larger Enrollment at Union

on Theological Seminary opened its 90th ic year on Sept. 23, with an enrollment already promises to be considerably than usual. Harrison Sackett Elliott, as called to be Associate Professor of us Education, upon the resignation of George A. Coe, was inaugurated at the opening services as Skinner and McAlpin Professor of Practical Theology. The subject of his inauguration address was "The Significance of Process in the Progress of Christianity." Professor Elliott is director of the Department of Religious Education and Psychology. He has long been identified with the Y. M. C. A. and is the author of several publications of the Association Press.

The seminary is attracting an increasing number of women students, 21 being candidates this year for a degree. One of these is a Japanese woman, a graduate of Ohio Wesleyan University, who is preparing to return to her own country to teach. For the first time the seminary has been able to provide a scholarship for a German student, although for several years scholarships have been available for students from Scotland, England, France, and Switzerland. Prof. A. Bruce Curry, of the Biblical Seminary, New York, is offering a special course of lectures on the "Study and Teaching of the Bible," and Prof. A. W. Vernon, of Dartmouth College, is giving a course on "Christian Biography."

Pacific School of Religion

On the new site, recently acquired, three units of the projected group of buildings at the Pacific School of Religion are now in process of erection,—library, classrooms and offices, and men's dormitory. Removal of the school to the new buildings will take place the first of January.

The fall term has opened auspiciously. A student body of about 100 is assured for the year, an advance over last year. At a regular meeting of the Bay Association, Sept. 15, the afternoon and evening programs were furnished by the Pacific School of Religion. Nine students described their varieties of work among the churches. Prof. F. M. Hodgdon spoke on the fellowship of faculty and students, and President Swartz gave an illustrated talk on the school and its future.

The Department of Religious Education is conducting an interesting work in the week-day church school. Prof. H. F. Evans and a dozen of his students have taken charge of one center where they have in hand every Monday in a two-hour program more than 200 public school children of grades one to six.

At the last commencement the school bestowed the degree of D.D. on three of its graduates: Rev. L. L. Wirt, Western Secretary of the National Council for the Prevention of War; Rev. T. T. Giffen, pastor of First Church, Fresno, Cal.; and Rev. G. T. Tolson, Professor of History in Pacific School of Religion.

Another interesting experiment is being undertaken by the students. Four of them, supervised by Professor Hodgdon, have taken full charge of one of the Berkeley churches. The preaching is done by two of them, the educational work by a third, and the boys' work by a fourth, while all co-operate in the pastoral care and community work of the church.

Rev. T. D. Preston, a student in the school, has been carrying the pastorate of the Benicia Church. Under his leadership the church has spent $3,000 in repairs and improvements, aided by a small loan from the Building Society.

Boston to Greet Missionaries

The Interdenominational Committee on Home and Foreign Missions for Eastern Massachusetts will hold a recognition service Friday, Oct. 30, at 2.15 P.M., in the Crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral. Missionaries on furlough, representing both domestic and overseas service, will be introduced by Miss Eva D. Corey, president of the Woman's Auxiliary for Massachusetts of the Protestant Episcopal Church. These missionaries are supported by seven great communions and will bring greetings from all parts of the mission field and from every branch of uplift work at home. Preceding the introduction of the missionaries, the pageant, "America's Opportunity," will be given by members of the Fine Arts Department of the School of Religious Education of Boston University, assisted by nationals of 15 different countries.

In a certain suburb there is a cottage the door of which must be raised a little to be opened, and for this purpose a hatchet is generally used. One night a knock came at the door and a youngster was sent to see who was there.

"Who is it?" inquired the boy.

"It's me," said a voice outside.

The youngster, recognizing the voice, shouted back: "It's Mrs. Murphy; get the hatchet." Mrs. Murphy didn't wait.—Pittsburgh Chronicle Telegraph.

"And you, sir?" queried the waiter of another of the enemy.

"Red, raw meat for me," bellowed the huge tackle.

"How about you, sir?" said the waiter to the man at our hero's left.

"Bloody, red, raw meat," roared the third, and scowled at the guest of honor.

There was silence as the question was put to the great Harvard "back."

"Aw, blazes," he thundered, "drive in your cow and I'll cut off my own slice."—Lampoon.

She was very pretty, he was very ardent. And they both were young.

"Ethel," he murmured, and the very intonation of his voice was a caress, "you've your father's fine, frank blue eyes."

"Go on," she laughed. "Don't be silly!" She was a modern maid.

"But you have, dear," he insisted. "And you have your mother's beautiful golden hair."

She glanced about her in fear as she laid her fair little hand upon his lips.

"S-sh!" she whispered. "Don't speak so loud, Jack; she doesn't know I'm wearing it!"—Iowa Frivol.

FRANK J. HARWOOD

New Moderator of the National Council of Congregational Churches

NEXT WEEK: REPORTS OF THE NATIONAL COUNCIL

Our National Journal

CONGREGATIONALISTS have one national journal for their homes and their churches. It is The Congregationalist. It keeps us informed; unites our fellowship; helps in real religion. It represents our churches and all our mutual interests. It reports the progress of the Christian world; it interprets current events and moral issues from the Christian point of view. It publishes what Christian leaders are doing and saying. It maintains an open forum for the free discussion of the subjects which interest its readers. It reports the news of the churches, missions, education and social service. It gives comfort and inspiration. It is a force for righteousness.

The Congregationalist helps its readers to carry the Pilgrim spirit into the life of today. While it is the organ of the Congregational churches, it is broadly Christian rather than sectarian. It shows life as it is and helps us to make it what it should be. It stimulates enthusiasm in the work and opportunities of the church. In these confusing days its light and leading bring constant comfort and cheer. It is the best of pastors' assistants. It is the layman's guide and friend. It is the comrade of the young people. It is the mother's and home-maker's helper. It is attractive, interesting, up-to-date, and abundantly worth while.

The Editorial Outlook

Concerning National Council Reports

READERS will realize that this issue of The Congregationalist has been prepared for the press while the Congregational National Council is still in session, and even before the great gathering has attained its full momentum. Advance releases have made possible the presentation of important features of the program, but formal reports of the business and general happenings of the Council will not be possible until next week's issue.

Taking Christianity Seriously

THE pre-National Council conference arranged by the Social Service Commission for the afternoon and evening of Monday, and the morning of Tuesday brought together a fairly large and representative group of earnest socially-minded Christians. The discussion and action at the conference centered around the terms of the Proposed Social Creed. As was anticipated considerable divergence of view developed upon some points but the discussion plainly revealed that groping after facts and a Christian conception of life as applied to the details of social and industrial relationships, which, after all, is more important than categorical formulation of doctrines, theological or social. The development in men of the longing to see and do the right is the underlying social duty of the church. Discussions such as this, well planned and excellently carried out under the Social Service Commission, serve a useful purpose. They promote a new and stronger sense of fellowship among the socially minded, and they help to provide that criticism of life and conduct out of which alone better and sounder conditions can arise. The conscience of the church at large may still be unaroused and unenlightened; there may be those who make deep profession of religion but who care more for Mammon than for God; but the conference held under the auspices of the Social Service Commission made it evident how strong, deep, and intense are the forces in modern religious fellowship that are pledged to the outworking in life, individual and social, of the prayer, Thy Kingdom come, Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven.

Poison and Profits

IT seems incredible, but it is actually true that the New York Journal of Commerce recently bore upon its front page the following dispatch from Washington:

The chemical clans are marshalling for a drive in the Senate to prevent ratification of the Geneva anti-poison gas protocol at the next session of Congress.

Aid of allied industries, notably the dye producers, is to be asked in an effort to line up sufficient opposition in the Senate to avoid American participation in international agreements outlawing chemical warfare which might result injuriously to the commercial production of chemicals.

According to the view of quarters here closely associated with the domestic chemical industry, the fight on the Geneva protocol will vie in importance with the forthcoming battle over the entry of the United States into the World Court. Industry, it is contended, is directly interested in the former proposal to a much greater extent than in the latter.

The Toronto Globe, commenting upon this, remarked that it would be read "by citizens of all classes in all civilized countries with amazement and a shiver of repulsion." "Seldom," continues this paper, "has anything more cold-bloodedly selfish—more frankly ready to profiteer at the hazard of disease and death—been put forward." It is a sad commentary upon America that our public press is usually so busy denouncing pacifists as dangerous "reds" and enemies of the state that they have no time or space left to set forth in its true light the cynical and damnably murderous nature of that selfishness in commerce and industry that cares nothing what happens to humanity as long as profits are secure. A Canadian soldier—it may be recalled that the Canadians were in the first battle in which gas was used in the great war, and were later the first troops to be attacked with the more virulent mustard gas—expresses the pardonable wish that these ghouls of commerce concerned only about profiteering in deadly gases could be placed in the front line in some such gas attacks as he himself has endured.

The Greatest Thing in the Council

THE greatest thing in a National Council gathering quickly comes into evidence as the delegates convene. In fact it begins before they arrive at their destination, as men and women from various centers meet on the train hurrying Council-ward.

It is fellowship, and it has a peculiar significance and quality in the life of our free churches. It is something more than a denominational bond; it is something more than a sameness of disposition, a similarity of thought and outlook—in fact it does not arise from any similarity at all. Its special quality and delight are found in the note of variety with an underlying consciousness of unity in humanity and in Christ. The joy of fellowship is in the discovery of a larger world. One comes from his tasks—some of them narrow tasks in a narrow sphere—in parish and office, somewhat discouraged, it may be, feeling the smallness of his own world and his own achievement. The note of discouragement, or the sense of narrowness and futility of one's sphere has possibly occasioned an inertia under the influence of which one might have been disposed to stay at home—for it is notoriously true that the men who most need fellowship are often least concerned about seeking it. But, in whatever mood one has come from home, how quickly the atmosphere changes under the warmth of friendly greeting, the frank clasping of hands, and the intimacies of conversation. Loneliness and aloofness disappear; one's narrow world enlarges in a new consciousness; and the thrill of communion enriches the mind and makes the heart glow with a new enthusiasm. The discovery that great ideals are shared in common, and that others are intense and clear-visioned regarding matters in relation to which one's own vision may have been growing dim and one's enthusiasms cold, restores the vividness of faith and quickens the impulse of devotion to the Kingdom. Neither individuals nor churches can see clearly, experience adequate and sound emotions, or work effectually, in isolation. Fellowship is not merely a privilege, a possible source of individual emotions; it is an essential of Christian life and work. The spirit and service of a great church depend entirely upon the nature and quality of its fellowship.

As one comes into the full swing of Council organization and activity, it is still this note of fellowship that is dominant. The lack of any dominating authority, the lack of any official voice or official attitude, makes strongly for the consciousness of a spirit and task of fellowship in seeking sound vision and wise action. The greatest thing about a National Council gathering is that it is not a planned and personally-conducted tour, but an adventure and a quest. May it never cease to be that! For only in quest and adventure can the full joy and spirit of fellowship be revealed. The inspiration of a Council gathering is pre-eminently that that comes from the realization that a great company of free-minded Christians are met together in mutual respect, mutual aid, and mutual devotion in determining the Christian outlook upon life and the Christian way as it runs through the highways and byways of the modern world. Together—that is the strength of our faith, hope, and effort. It is only as mutual respect, mutual aid, and mutual devotion become lifted into mutual love that the Christian Church attains its full glory and witness. If we are to make Christ's way of love desirable and powerful among men it will be only as the world is led to exclaim regarding Christians in mutual life and conference, as it was said of Christians in the ancient day: See how these Christians love one another.

In the note of fellowship—significant in Washington as it has been in other great Council gatherings—the Congregational churches of America come nearest that witness before the world of the purity and beauty of the religion they profess. The greatest thing in the Council is the fellowship that it provides, expresses, and symbolizes. The greatest truth for the Christian Church is still the word of Jesus, Where two or three are gathered in my name there am I in the midst.

Locarno—A New Word of Hope

ONE may easily become carried away by optimism over the news from Locarno, but considering the fact that newspaper headlines have for years been unduly loaded with the pessimism of war and militarism, it is a significant thing that the front page has been glorified by the report that European nations have gotten together for the preservation of peace and the establishment of security. The spirit and atmosphere of Locarno have been very different from that of Versailles. Understanding and conciliation have taken the place of suspicion, distrust, and irreconcilability. France and Germany have dealt with each other in a new temper, and the measure of new confidence is already bearing fruit in the promise of better relationships. If the fear of war and attack could once be thoroughly broken it is impossible to estimate the forces that would draw nations and peoples into manifold friendly contacts.

Under the terms of the treaties determined upon at Locarno, France and Germany agree that neither will incite war against the other or violate the present Rhine boundaries without submitting their differences to arbitration. England and Italy guarantee this pact through greement to come to the help of either country against ne aggressor in case of the violation of the pact.

Four pacts in all have been signed by the seven forgn ministers who were in session. At the moment of riting the full terms of the pacts have not been made ıblic, but the fact that the European nations have really ɔtten together on a basis of peace and mutual security ıtweighs the mere letter of the agreements. Foreign inister Aristide Briand, of France, in the glow of enusiasm over the successful issue of the Locarno Conrence, has hailed the possibility of establishing "The nited States of Europe." Who knows? Men and naɔns may travel far and fast when they get thinking ıd acting on a basis of peace and co-operation.

In Brief

Good things are as contagious as evil things when ey have adequate contacts. The trouble is that evil often gregarious where goodness is touched with inviduality and aloofness.

No builder would mistake the blueprints and specifications for the structure that he is supposed to build. The plans and specifications may be necessary but building is the business. Too often in the church we imagine that we are building when we are merely considering plans and specifications, and we mistake our interest in these for the superstructure itself.

It was said concerning a famous billiard player that he seemed most brilliant when in reality he had been careless and was pulling himself out of the hole. He seemed least spectacular when his playing was accurate in each successive stroke and he had no need of brilliant rallying. Is not this true of the church in its life and warfare? Her most spectacular periods of revival and awakening, when she is roused to warfare upon evil, often indicate her slackness in allowing evil to become established. The church is often most effective in her quiet, persistent, non-spectacular righteousness and truth.

The Federal Council and Prohibition

THE bulletin on The Prohibition Situation, issued by the Department of Research and Education of the deral Council of Churches, a pamphlet of 83 pages ɔr sale by that department, 105 E. 22d St., New York, the nominal price of 25 cents), deserves the most care- study and consideration. It is unfortunate that its de exploitation in the daily press, and the fact that et" newspapers have seized upon some of its statents in such a way as to misrepresent its general purse and purport, have tended to create a question conning it, if not a bias against it, in the minds of some ɔhibitionists, but this is all the more reason that the lletin should be studied closely at first hand, and not lged by hearsay.

With the general purpose and spirit of the inquiry ich has resulted in this bulletin, The Congregationalist in full sympathy. We entirely agree with the statent that "it seems reasonable to assume that we can ɔe much more successfully with a situation if we know cisely what it is." The supreme interest of every honand enlightened man in relation to every social probı, and every effort to deal with that problem, is in ɔwing the facts. If, in the particular matter of proition as an effort to deal effectively with the liquor ffic, the facts undeniably demonstrate the value of s measure, prohibitionists cannot be too greatly inested in bringing the facts to light; if, on the other ıd, prohibition has not been a success—an assumption t we do not admit—prohibitionists cannot too quickly cover the fact or too determinedly set about investiing the causes of any seeming failure. It is impor- t to know whether any partial or seeming failure of ɔhibition is due to inherent weakness in that measure, to the incompetency or inactivity, intentional or unentional, of those whose business it is to make prohiion effective by upholding the law and constitution. ɔm every point of view prohibitionists ought to have most intense and foremost interest in knowing the ts.

We appreciate, also, the honesty of this Federal Council inquiry as a step toward the acquisition, study, and understanding of the facts. We refer to it as a "Federal Council inquiry," for, though we are aware of the distinction that has been made in emphasizing the fact that the study has been made by the Research Department of the Federal Council, it is our judgment that that body cannot in any way avoid responsibility for the work of one of its own departments. Nor should there be any effort to avoid such responsibility. As an honest piece of work, undertaken with open mind and sound purpose, this investigation ought by the Council, and by all that the Council represents, to be accepted for what it is worth. That is, it ought not to be regarded as in any sense an authoritative or official statement—the report itself is very modest in its claims—but it ought to become a basis for such criticism and inquiry as shall lead to further evidence and understanding of the facts. If in any respect the bulletin as issued has understated, overstated, or misstated, the facts, the purpose of those responsible for the bulletin demands and justifies the frankest and fullest reaction.

It is in this spirit, though approving of the general purpose and nature of the Research Department's inquiry, that we offer some friendly criticism.

The chief defect of this bulletin consists, in our judgment, in its essential inadequacy. This inadequacy is fully recognized and acknowledged in the document itself. Not only is it stated most specifically that "many of the more important social and political effects of so great an experiment in social control cannot be known for some time to come," but the specific data, which are offered as a basis of judgment and conclusion, are as definitely acknowledged to be very limited in nature and extent. We should go beyond this in estimating the paucity of the statistical and social evidence presented in relation to the whole range of material upon which scientific and ultimate conclusions should be based. The inadequacy of the bulletin, both in its inherent limitations and in this specific respect, seems to us so marked that we should have questioned the advisability of issuing it at this particular stage except as an encouragement toward fuller investigation, and except, also, for one important conclusion, which we shall later specify, and which seems to us the bulletin's most essential contribution.

A "Defensive Complex"

It is important in inquiries of this kind that the mind of the investigator should be free from bias, but in the commendable effort to attain and preserve an unbiased attitude there is a tendency in the bulletin to lean over backwards. One gets the impression of what the psychologist might call a "defensive complex." It is an error in the right direction, especially at the present hour when prohibitionists cannot afford to take too much for granted. None the less the great, evident, commanding facts concerning prohibition, in its abolition of the saloon, its breaking of the power of the liquor traffic, and its driving of the whole booze business beyond the pale of respect and decency, while they are suggested, seem to us quite inadequately stated for the purpose of such a report. Whatever the facts beneath the surface may be, the facts that lie upon the surface should not be in any way underestimated or understated. John Haynes Holmes has recently stated them quite excellently in a letter to the Nation. The anti-prohibitionist should never be permitted to forget them.

Nor should we admit, as the bulletin seems to suggest, that either the prohibitory law or the Volstead Act represents anything new and unprecedented in legislation, and in the effort of the state to regulate the life of the individual for the common good. It ought to be always remembered that the much criticized "one-half per cent" of the Volstead Act was not originated by the prohibitionists but was simply a writing into the new law of what the liquor dealers themselves had established as the standard for judging illicit liquor while the traffic was under license. Nor should it be forgotten that sweeping prohibitions of minor things—and even of major things—as drastic as are involved in the eighteenth amendment (which is in itself a new phase) have long been established by law. Tariff laws, often virtually prohibitive, to the free trader appear as unjust and intolerable as does the Eighteenth Amendment to an anti-prohibitionist; and governments in their enforcement of military service have again and again "on a country-wide scale changed the personal habits of a large part of the population" in the most fundamental respects. There is need of insisting upon the fact that prohibition, whether it be justified or not in its results, involves nothing more drastic or exceptional in principle or practice than is involved in a large part of the activity of the state.

The present investigation seems to us to have unduly a city aspect, and to have been made too much with reference to "wet" areas. Possibly there is an advantage in this. We ought to know and to face the worst of the facts, but we question whether the facts as stated are sufficiently representative of the country at large, and particularly of the great rural sections. We should also be disposed to question the ultimate value of "the case method" in discovering the actual results of the prol bition régime. The chief weakness of this investigatic lies, in our judgment, in undue confidence in this metho It puts the whole matter too much in the realm of soci pathology. The real facts regarding prohibition are be found largely in social spheres and activities th never become represented in "cases." If we may dra an analogy we should say that while the failure of t church might be studied profitably among the unchurche and non-church-going, the church's success must l studied largely among those whom it has reached. is not unimportant that prohibition should be considere in relation to the submerged, abnormal, and lawless el ments in the community, but it is more important th it should be studied in relation to the normal, wholesor elements and to society as a whole.

A Sound Conclusion

Having made these criticisms—which will be reco nized as minor rather than fundamental—we want to pu ourselves entirely back of the conclusion expressed in th bulletin, and its appeal. Profoundly, thoroughly, w agree with the statement that "the religious and mor forces which take upon themselves responsibility for i stituting new measures of social control cannot co sistently stop short of taking responsibility for chara ter rehabilitation in those lives which they have forcibl changed," though we should say that the failure effect such rehabilitation does not necessarily discred social measures that are otherwise justified.

We support the bulletin further in its contention th the churches must rouse themselves to a bettter perforn ance of that underlying work of moral education upo which laws depend for their effect and enforcement, an which law in itself can never create. In the whole bus ness of social reform we have unduly allowed the r generative purposes and processes of religion to be dom nated by the protective and regulative functions of law and in doing that we have sacrificed the essential founda tion of good laws and their enforcement. In this whol business of prohibition, and other protective and regu lative legislation, we have conceived of the matter to much as a forcing of men into doing, or refraining fro doing, certain things, and too little as a winning of me to certain social ideals and individual habits and prac tices in accordance with these ideals. We thoroughl endorse the suggestion that there is a profound dut resting upon the churches for the performance of an edu cational—and we should say, also, a spiritual—task "fo which no amount of social legislation can ever be satisfactory substitute."

We believe, however, that the defects and weaknesse that have appeared in connection with prohibition an its enforcement are not in any way isolated factors i relation to present-day American society and goverr ment. They are both crucial and typical, and in solvin the problems incident to the making of prohibition ef fective—as effective in every sphere of society as it general results demand—we shall have taken a grea step toward overcoming all the obstacles to good govern ment through intelligent and honest administration, an to sound social life through the elimination of positivel anti-social factors and forces.

From Our Western Editor

The report on prohibition by F. Ernest nson of the Federal Council of the urches of Christ in America made about same impression upon both the Wets l the Drys in the Middle and Far West, that made upon the rest of the country. Clarence True Wilson, secretary of the ard of Temperance, Prohibition, and Pub- Morals of the Methodist Episcopal urch, has, I imagine, described very well reception that this report had every- ere in America. He says, Nothing else in many a day has caused Dry forces of the nation greater dismay the Wet forces greater glee than the just olished report of the Federal Council of urches on the social consequences of pro- ition. Mr. Stayton, president of the As- iation Against the Prohibition Amend- nt, says, "The report is frank and truth- ." The Minute Man, an anti-prohibition an, finds the reading of the report "a el and refreshing experience." The icago Tribune, one of the wettest news- pers in America, warmly endorsed it; so the other influential wet papers. A toon in the Washington Post pictures the pical prohibitionist reading a document ded 'Church Report on Prohibition; ng People Drinking More Liquor; Alco- ic Deaths Increase,'" etc. News heads ling with the report say, "Present Dry ve Forecast as Last," "Safe to Predict ssening of Pressure if it Fails, Says urch Council Report," "Dry Regime Hit Church Council," "Church Men Find Rise Drinking," "Death Rate from Alcoholism gher Since 1920," "Even Kansas Back- les," "Prohibition Fails to Reduce Crime," ore Drinking Among Boys and Girls," w is Flouted in Schools," "More Drinking Colleges."

s this excerpt indicates, the Wets were nimous in their approval of the report. y interpreted it as the beginning of the of prohibition. The chief organ of the ts in the Middle West, the Chicago Trib- , had a long editorial making this point. Tribune is always ranting (I used the d advisedly) about the intolerance of reformers and bigots who believe whole- rtedly in prohibition. To have such a ef classifies any one as a bigot in the d of the Tribune.

awrence Abbott of the Outlook, New k, was in Chicago a while ago and went ee the Tribune Tower. In writing about trip he said some complimentary things ut the Tribune Building and some very mplimentary things about the editorial cy of the Tribune. So far as I remem- he did not mention prohibition. The une, in replying to the Outlook, initi- ed that the reason Mr. Abbott was criti- was because the Tribune was against hibition. The fact is the editors of some ur great daily papers, like those of the une, have an obsession on prohibition. se editors think that the world will get ided immediately or that some other ter- thing will happen unless the Volstead is repealed or liberalized. They are pos- ly funny.

he report of Mr. Johnson, under the nices of the Federal Council, is an exceedingly serious matter. It came at a critical moment in the prohibition movement. Dr. Wilson, quoted above, speaking at the Rock River Methodist Conference, is reported to have said, "We would only remark, he reveals a very slender information, a biased mind, a prejudiced and exceedingly ill-timed statement, a warping of the facts and a series of partisan inferences that will be detrimental to our cause; but to infer that these lopsided, personal vaporings are the work of a council of churches is to saddle upon that organization a burden of responsibility that it will not be able to bear."

I imagine that this criticism is more drastic than most of our ministers and leading church members would make of the report. So far as I can discover, however, there is a general feeling that the work of Mr. Johnson shows signs of failure to get a representative set of facts, a lack of perspective in the handling of the facts and a disposition to make arbitrary conclusions, which in the present complex situation are not at all warranted. The Federal Council of Churches might well have given representatives of the whole constituency an opportunity to see this report and to bring to bear upon it a wider knowledge than judging by the report Mr. Johnson had at his command.

MRS. MABEL W. WILLEBRANDT
Assistant Attorney-General in Charge of Prohibition Enforcement

My own knowledge of the Middle and Far West would lead me to believe that Mr. Johnson has not gotten a representative set of facts, and that he has failed to use words with discrimination in his report. If the report had been more mature and more completely considered before it was issued it would probably have served the purpose of stirring up the churches without at the same time giving aid to the enemy.

The one thing above all others in the report that our leaders seem to resent is the fact that Mr. Johnson was not content with stating the facts, but proceeded to draw conclusions from the facts, which leaders who think they are just as capable of drawing conclusions as Mr. Johnson believe the facts do not warrant. They hold that he probably has better opportunities to get at the facts in the case than they have, but is no more capable of forming a judgment. They look to the Federal Council for the facts, but not for judgment upon the facts.

The "defeatist" attitude of Mr. Johnson was also resented. Western leaders do not believe in giving the least quarter to the Wet movement, and however bad the facts may be concerning enforcement, they do not expect to be defeated finally regarding enforcement. They have no objection to Mr. Johnson stating the facts as badly as the circumstances warrant, but they do object to talk of "peace without victory."

Parables of Safed the Sage

Parable of the Sign That Could Be Read

There was a man who spake unto me, saying, Come thou to our Town, and make us a Speech. And I will come for thee in a Motor Car, and send thee home again.

And I went with him over roads that he knew not very well, and I knew not at all. And we came unto a place where the Ways Crossed, and we knew not the way to go.

And I said, Yonder is a Guide-post, and it hath arms that Point Both Ways. Let us turn the Car Lights upon it.

And he did so, but we could not read the sign. For it had been there for many years, and the Letters were Obliterated.

And I said, I will get out and go nearer. But I could not read it.

And he left the car and stood beside me, and he also tried to read it, and Could Not.

And we saw another sign, a stone's cast down the road in one Direction, and he said, Let us go thither and read.

And we did even so.

And the sign was a New One, with a Finger that pointed. And this was the superscription:

ANTIQUES.

Thus the only up to date sign at that crossing of the Highways was one that led to the place of Antiques.

And I said, This surely is what many folk do at the Crossroads of Life. For the Great Destinations are Blurred and Dimmed, and the only thing that is Clear is the direction to some Thing which they probably think Very Modern, but which is Old as Sin.

And he said, It certainly is interesting that such a sign should be the Only One that is Legible at this Crossing.

And I said, I will be a Sign Painter. And I will go to the Places where the Ways Cross, and I will mark plainly the paths that lead to Duty and those that Lead Astray: for such is my business on the Highway of the Great King.

And he said, It is no small job to keep the distinctions clear in an Age when things change so swiftly.

And I said, At least I will make the Moral Distinctions as plain as the sign of the Antique Shop.

The National Council in Washington

The Opening Sessions

The National Council opened on Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 20, in the Washington Auditorium, and immediately proceeded to the first business to be transacted—the election of the Moderator and the First and Second Assistant Moderators. Frank J. Harwood of Appleton, Wis., was elected Moderator on the first ballot, the vote being 194 for Mr. Harwood, 131 for Rev. Dan F. Bradley, D.D., of Cleveland, O., and 123 for Rev. Charles S. Mills, D.D., of New York City. On the motion of Dr. Bradley, seconded by Dr. Mills, the vote for Mr. Harwood was made unanimous. Dr. Bradley was chosen First Assistant Moderator and Rev. William L. Cash, of New Orleans, Second Assistant Moderator. President Coolidge, on the nomination of Senator George H. Chamberlain of Springfield, Mass., was re-elected Honorary Moderator.

At the evening session a large audience was present to hear the address by President Coolidge. Mrs. Coolidge and former Moderators were with the President on the platform.

The New Moderator

Frank J. Harwood, the new Moderator of the National Council, has been prominent in Congregational circles for many years, having served on the Executive Committee of the Council and on committees and commissions of that organization. In his home state—Wisconsin—he has also been identified with religious organizations, notably the Y. M. C. A. as a member of the State Board for 30 years and for ten years as president of the Y. M. C. A. of Appleton. For 40 years he was superintendent of the Sunday School of First Church, Appleton.

Mr. Harwood was born in Crown Point, N. Y., Dec. 25, 1855, and was educated at Hudson River Institute and Claverack (N. Y.) College, moving to Ripon, Wis., in 1874 and to Appleton in 1876, where he entered the woolen manufacturing business. In 1881 he became general manager of the Appleton Woolen Mills, and since 1910 has been president and general manager of the company. He has served on the Common Council and the School Board of Appleton and has been a trustee of Ripon College. He is the first layman to be elected Moderator in ten years.

The Merger Proposals

The subject which is commanding perhaps more interest than any other before the National Council in Washington is that of proposed mergers. The Committee of Twel of which Dr. William Horace Day is cha man, made its report to the Commission Missions the day before the Council me ing opened. The report contained some i portant changes from the previous repor but retained the principle of merger to large degree. Details of the plan we changed further by the Committee to me suggestions made in discussions before t Commission on Missions. Hearings on t report will be held during the early days the Council.

The plan of organization for the mi sionary societies as recommended in the r port provides for two boards—one for t home agencies and one for the foreign, to known as the Congregational Home Boa and the American Board. The Americ Board would include the Women's Boar unified with the present American Boa and with women represented in the Prude tial Committee and in the administrati work.

The Home Board would be an organizatio under which the present homeland soci ties would co-operate and into which the would be expected to merge as soon as the decided to do so and could work out leg and practical details.

Unified representative and co-ordinat promotion is recommended, to be continue under the Commission on Missions, an through a Joint Promotion Cabinet.

The Committee recommended a "unifie denominational organ," which would co tinue The Congregationalist, with its regula weekly issues, and enlarged monthly mi sionary numbers covering all fields, hom and foreign, of our Congregational missio

y work. The Congregationalist, as en-rged, would cover all Congregational inter-ts. Its staff would include associate edi-rs on home and foreign missions. "The issionary Herald and the American Mis-onary, could, if desired, be retained as ouse organs for free circulation."

There is strong sentiment in the Council vorable to the merger principle. On the her hand, there is considerable opposition the proposals presented. Hearings are eing arranged, as this is written the first ay of the Council meeting, and spirited ebate and discussion is expected before tion is taken.

The Commission on Social Service

The Pre-Council Meeting

Reported by Rev. Edwin P. Ryland

Doubtless no session of the National Coun-l will be more significant of the temper, ie heart and mind attitude of the church an was this pre-Council meeting called by ie Commission on Social Service. The umber present was not large, not exceed-g two hundred. The purpose of their oming together was to consider and advise garding the report drafted by the com-ission.

This report was an attempt to translate ie Christian ideal into

1. Education means;
2. Industry and economic relationships eans;
3. Agriculture means;
4. Racial relations means;
5. International relations means.

These different sections of the report were resented in their order, for consideration nd advice. The discussions that were pro-oked were incisive and as complete as ould be desired. The matters included in ie report have to do with the real things f human life and the commission revealed ue courage and the forward look in the way in which they dealt with such questions as "the unearned income," "the right of labor to organize," "the enforcement of constitutional rights and duties, including freedom of speech, of the press, and of peaceable assemblage," "the conservation of health, including careful instruction in sex-hygiene," "the same protection and rights for other races in America that we ourselves enjoy," "that military armaments should be abolished by all nations except for a small police force," "that the church as an institution should no longer support war in any form," "that all nations should associate themselves permanently for world peace and good will," "that war should be legally outlawed, and that differences between nations should be settled by an international court."

The questions that aroused greatest debate were those that dealt with "unearned incomes" and the relation of the church to war. It seemed to be assumed by the conference that the church must favor all progressive plans for religious education and better inter-racial relations and also for the solution of industrial problems in a manner that will conserve the rights and interests of the workers as well as of the employers in industry. The constantly recurring measure of the values involved was this: "The Jesus way of life, what should be the answer to any of these questions in the light of the teachings of our Lord." Under such a standard, those present came easily to a common conclusion regarding most of the findings of the commission. There seemed to be, however, marked difference of opinion as to the questions of the attitude of the church to war and unearned increments. The resultant discussions, however, brought out the fact that after all, the mind of Jesus would lead to the conclusion that his followers should abandon all efforts to secure unearned income and his church should no longer support war in any form; and the vote approving these particular findings of the commission proved to be practically unanimous.

What the Council may do to the report one hesitates to try to foretell. The presenting of the report and the almost inevitable discussions that will be aroused must result in great good, whatever the fate of the report itself. It is a matter of evident fact that the secretary of the commission, Dr. Herring, is doing a service to the church of high value in bringing, through the commission, these vital matters to the fore. An added service was rendered by him in securing the presence of Dr. Athearn of Boston University and Dr. Harry F. Ward of Union Seminary to speak on questions of religious education and industrial and international relations respectively.

If this National Council shall adopt the substance of the report of its Commission on Social Service it will have placed itself in the forefront of the churches in their effort to bring the mind of Jesus into the conduct of the affairs of men.

The Gospel in the Present Age

The National Council Sermon Delivered at Washington, October 25

By Carl S. Patton, D.D.
Pastor of First Church, Los Angeles, California

Finally, brethren, pray for us, that the Gospel may have free course and be glorified. —I Thess. 3: 1.

IN its essence the Gospel of Jesus Christ is a simple thing; just the great message of Jesus that God is Love, and that he will have his children live a life of love and service in the world. But in its application, the Gospel is as complex as life itself. It is never the same old thing. It is always new, forever changing, always growing to meet the new need of the new age.

There are, pre-eminently, three fields in which the Gospel, in our day, is called upon to adjust itself to new conditions, and to speak a clear word of guidance to a world in great perplexity. They are, the Intellectual Field, the Social Field, the International Field.

The Intellectual Field

In the Intellectual Field the great task of the Gospel in our time is to adjust itself to what men now know concerning our world. Such intellectual adjustments are nothing new in the history of Christianity. The Gospel has made them, many times. For the Gospel came into a world that was regarded as flat, with a solid firmament spread out above it. Around the edges of it were the oceans. Jerusalem was its center; and around it, as if to do it honor, moved the sun, moon, and stars. Then came the suspicion that the sun did not go around the earth, that it might be round instead of flat, that there might be people on the other side of it; that, in fact, it might not be the center of the universe at all, but only a little back star in a little back alley of one little system,—just a little speck in an unfathomable universe. So the Gospel had to adjust itself to the Copernican astronomy.

Many such adjustments the Gospel has made for itself. But one such adjustment as far-reaching in its consequences and as difficult in its making as any the Gospel has ever gone through, it has been making in our time. The Gospel came into a world regarded as static, made once for all as God intended it to remain. From the days of the great Greek thinkers, glimpses had indeed been caught of the truth that God works by processes which his children can trace. As time went on, evidence accumulated that the world was vastly older than we had supposed, and that it had not always been as we now see it. Men began to suspect that the human family was not so young as we had assumed, and that even man, with all the wonder of his intelligence and the unfathomed reaches of his spirit, was not unrelated to the world in which he lived, but was part and parcel of all the life that is. Finally, all this burst upon the world with a sudden and confusing brilliancy, in the doctrine of evolution elaborated by Charles Darwin and his co-workers and successors in the latter part of the last century.

When one considers the vastness of the step from a static to a living universe, and the haste with which we have been pushed to take that step, he will not wonder that there has been some confusion about it, nor that we have not yet altogether accomplished it. It took the Hebrew people five hundred, perhaps a thousand years, to pass from a God who walked in the garden in the cool of a day, and shut the door of the ark after Noah, and came down to verify the report he had heard concerning Sodom, to the God who inhabiteth eternity and dwelleth also in the humble and the contrite heart. From a God who once upon a time made the world and all things and creatures in it, and closed his week's work and called it good, and rested, to a God who creates now as he has always created and who lives some part of the ceaseless life of his infinite and eternal activity right here and now before our eyes, is quite as long a step. But we have been asked to take it, not in five hundred or a thousand years, but within the lifetime of one or two generations.

The doctrine of evolution, like any other doctrine, scientific or religious, is easy to accept upon authority. But to understand it, to clear it from misstatements and false interferences, to see its larger meanings, to find a place for it in a spiritual universe, and to draw from it its contribution to religious thought, is not an easy matter. It is a long, involved, and difficult task. The old story of how God had made the world was so simple: the new story is so complex, so long, so blurred in spots, so hard to make out; piety has so long been tied up with the older conception, that it is the most natural thing in the world for good people to be confused, perplexed, or even scandalized, by the new light that has broken over us.

Some fun has been made of America, and some not very kindly comparisons have been drawn between our culture and that some parts of the world, because of our r cent spectacular attempts to settle a gre scientific doctrine in an unscientific way. have read the statement that such a thing recently happened in Tennessee could n happen in Great Britain. But it is precise the sort of thing that did happen in Gre Britain sixty years ago. That it happene in England then instead of now is due the simple historical fact that the great pr genitors of the evolutionary doctrine live in England and not in America. The batt of which they were the heralds naturall came to issue quicker at home than abroa There are undoubtedly many sections Great Britain which, if they were self-go erning states, making their own laws an conducting their own courts as Tennesse does, might just as easily be stirred to actio against the evolutionary view. There is n country, in Christendom yet, in which th great body of the population understand ingly accepts the doctrine of evolution. Sc entists everywhere accept it. Most peopl who have time to understand it accept i But it would be a great mistake to assum that it is only in America, and only in on or two states in America, that Christia people fail to understand or refuse to accep it. That is true, yet, of the great body o the Christian population everywhere. An it is not to be wondered at.

But the doctrine of evolution seems to b true. If it were not for that, we should no need to bother about it, either to adjust ourselves to it or to refute it. We coul just forget it. But it seems to be true. However it may be modified in one particular or another, it seems to be the best account we can give of how God has brought us thus far. There is not the slightest prospect that the thinking world will abandon it for any other and competing theory.

That being the case, the first thing we have to do is to get our Gospel adjusted to it. We cannot, successfully, continue to deny what the whole trend of modern knowledge makes every day more certain. We cannot successfully appear to our people to forget on Sunday what they know the rest of the week. To shut our eyes to the greatest, most far-reaching, most fruitful scientific idea of modern times, and to keep our mouths shut about it, as if it were a thing with which God had nothing to do and which somehow throws Jesus Christ into the shadow, is no way to get our Gospel home to the heart of this present time. We must, at the least, have a Gospel that is not threatened with destruction every time something new is discovered about the world in which we live.

That is the least. That is the minimum, without which we cannot, before long, get a hearing for our Gospel among educated people. But this minimum is far from enough. If we can merely keep our Gospel, in the face of advancing knowledge, we shall nerely holding our own. And that is enough. And never necessary. If the el of Jesus Christ is true; if the great tual principles that lie at the bottom of e the same that God had woven back forth into the structure of the universe arge, then every discovery that man make about himself or his world will merely leave the Gospel where it was, will put it that much ahead. So it will ere. As we lay down the weapons of controversy, we shall not merely find the Gospel still in our hands, but it and all is transfigured by the more immediate ence of the God who, as upon the first ning of creation, still works his daily k in the world.

The Social Field

ore significant than any intellectual ges that are coming to the Gospel in time, is the well-known shifting of its hasis from the personal to the social. I w all that can be said here by way of ion and demurrer. The Gospel is still ersonal thing. Like the voice of your st friend, like the face of your mother your child, like the life blood in your s, like your own soul to yourself, so mate and personal is the Gospel of Jesus ist. I know that. I know also that the acher is not a political economist. The Testament is not a treatise on sociology. is was no social reformer. Good will is enough. If all the preachers in all the ld should declare every Sunday that must have the Spirit of Christ in our ustries and in our commerce, all that ating, no matter how sincere and earnest, ld offer no short cut to the Kingdom of in the earth. All this is obvious. Let it admitted.

ut it does not touch the point. Nor is matter of isolated instances or partic- questions alone,—child labor, wages, le-unionism, the right or wrong of this icular strike or the other. One cannot eve or preach the Social Gospel who has opinion, or who is afraid to utter it, on icular social issues like these. But re is something back of and beneath all e particular questions. There is an atti- that should pervade the Christian mind, a point-of-view from which the Chris-, in this present time, should approach e and all other such questions. That nomic laws are also human. That they be changed as men change, and they be turned to human welfare and not to an destruction. That the organization he world is not now and never has been l or in any deep sense Christian. That e is nothing sacred about the present us. It bears no evidence of having been ted by divine wisdom to remain forever t now is. That a better, fairer, juster, e Christian arrangement of the affairs fe is always possible, and it is the busi- of the Christian man to push hard for That a Gospel that makes no appeal he weak and the dispossessed of the h is a stranger to the Gospel that Jesus ched. That there is no spiritual life un- enced by the house a man lives in, the he works at, the wages he draws, and no Gospel worth the name that does not push its saving way into all these common matters. That all industrial and economic questions have a moral and spiritual side to them, and no stable civilization can be built upon any other principle than that of justice. That no nation need fear anything within itself except injustice. And even justice itself is a flying goal, not to be found forever in any one arrangement—all these convictions, I take it, are part of the enlightened, the Christian consciousness, of the present time.

And no calamity could be greater than that, because we have much else to say, or because we have said this so often and nobody has heeded, or because some people have felt hurt at our saying it, or for any other reason, we should lapse from the high level of this Social Gospel to any smaller and less significant message. It is better for the Gospel, and for its reputation among serious men, that one preacher in every ten should go off on some tangent in his desire for human improvement, than that we should all keep our mouths closed about it. If congregations have to be held together by turning their backs and shutting their eyes to what is wrong with human society, what are they good for after they are held together? It is not to the point that we should be told that we do not know the way out of the industrial labyrinth. Some things we know. And these things we know are the clues to every way out. We know it is absurd that a nation should not have the power to protect its own children. We know it is not ideal that industry should be organized for the production of goods, with hardly an incidental squint at the production or the maintenance of humanity from whom the goods are made.

We know that the next great step ahead is the curtailment of autocracy and the advancement of democracy in industry. We know that when the church bids men be content with the injustices of this world and hope for their reward in heaven, we have given them stones instead of bread. We know that there is no "Simple Gospel" for a complex world like this one. All these things and others like them we do most surely know. So long as we hold our commission from Jesus Christ we cannot forget them if we would. And it would be better, a thousand times better, for the salvation of preachers and people and the whole round world, that no fine churches be built, no big endowments be raised, no fine choirs send up their praise to God, no preachers ride in automobiles, that the church be poor and despised again as she was in the days of Paul, than for the world to know, or even to suspect, that Christian men have no mind about these matters or are afraid to speak it out. But we have a Gospel for this time because we have passed from the merely personal to the social. The word of that Gospel we must speak in patience, with no assumption of divine authority for our individual opinions, in a good nature that no difference of opinion can ever disturb, in a love like that of Jesus Christ himself. But we must speak it. Haltingly if we have to, clearly as we can, boldly as God will give us courage, we must speak it. The Kingdom of God waits for it. It is the Gospel of this present time, and of the years to come.

The International Field

But the one great question of this present time, absorbing, bewildering, insistent, from which we cannot take our eyes, is the question of race and international relations. And there is no other question, not any question raised by the advance of knowledge, nor about the human relations that lie at our own door, not any question in all the world that has a more immediate and pressing interest for the Christian Church than this question of international relations. The progress of the Gospel, now and in the years to come, is bound hand and foot with it.

Many wonderful things Christendom has done in the world. Schools and hospitals we have established. Languages we have reduced to writing. Heathen customs we have abolished. Much darkness we have driven out. And not the Christian Church alone, but the governments and the nations of Christendom. And the world has blessed us for it.

But the Gospel of Jesus Christ is up against a new question, in our day,—a question that is upon the lips of every non-Christian nation in the world, a question asked not in scorn nor in self-righteousness, but with a hidden fear as to what the answer is;—that is the question—Has Christendom any higher ethical standard than the rest of the world? And can you prove this higher ethical standard by the way the Christian nations and peoples behave toward all the rest? How long can we go with our Gospel

Significant Sentences

In the intellectual field the great task of the Gospel in our time is to adjust itself to what men now know concerning our world.

When one considers the vastness of the step from a static to a living universe, and the haste with which we have been pushed to take that step, he will not wonder that there has been some confusion about it, nor that we have not yet altogether accomplished it.

We cannot successfully appear to our people to forget on Sunday what they know the rest of the week.

We shall not merely find the old Gospel still in our hands, but it and all of us transfigured by the more immediate presence of God, who, as upon the first morning of creation, still works his daily work in the world.

Has Christianity any higher ethical standard than the rest of the world?

There is a spiritual preparedness that underlies all others.

The one great question of this present time, absorbing, bewildering, insistent, is the question of race and international relations.

to a proud people like the Japanese, if we cannot convince them that we do not regard them as our inferiors? And how much will it help for our Christian missionaries to say, "We don't consider you so," while our Christian statesmen say "We do"? What headway can the Gospel make in China against the impression recently expressed by the Student's Anti-Religious Movement of Peking, that "Christianity is the forerunner of imperialism and foreign exploitation"? Is it a good omen for the Gospel that the Chinese National Federation of Educational Associations recently declared, "The educational work done by foreigners in China looks like charity, but its purpose is either religious propaganda or political aggression"?

The question of inter-territoriality may be a complicated one. But the statement of the Chinese university professors is perfectly simple, and nobody can doubt its truth—"The tragedy which has taken place in the international settlement of Shanghai has filled the Chinese nation with horror and indignation." Is it true, as a newspaper dispatch says, that Gen. Feng himself and 99 per cent of his officers and 50 per cent of his regiment Christians, suffered disillusionment, also a change of mind? His soldiers still march to the tune of "Onward Christian Soldiers," but the words they sing to it are ominous. Christendom suffered grievously in the eyes of the non-Christian nations from the great war. She has suffered almost as much from a long series of smaller and less spectacular happenings. Can anyone maintain that Christendom has been generally kind, courteous, considerate, or even just, beyond other nations, in her treatment of the rest of the world? Or that it was someone else than Christendom that divided up Africa, parceled out its spheres of influence in China and put its stamp of inferiority upon the Hindus and the Japanese? Or is it any secret that India and China and Japan and Africa are right now in a deep and growing revolt at the way Christendom has handled herself toward them? Or does it surprise anybody that it is so? How will it fare with the Gospel if the impression goes round the world that the Christian nations, when they face other nations, are no better than the others not really Christian, or if Christian, still no better, no fairer, no juster, no more intent upon peace and friendship than the rest?

It is no answer to these things to say that the Christian nations are not really Christian. For other nations will only ask, "Why not?" Or to say that Christianity has not failed because it has never yet been tried. Not much can be said for a religion that can be in the world two thousand years and not even get itself tried. The truth is, rather, that these things, though easy to talk about and in principle easy to state, are in their working-out the most delicate, complicated, and difficult things in all the world. The application of the Gospel is never easy. Even in your own home or your own church it is not always easy. In your city or your nation it is harder. In a world where nations are separated by languages, traditions, national ideals, religions, and selfish interests, it is incalculably more difficult. The Gospel in this present time has not fallen upon easy days.

SPIRITUAL PREPAREDNESS

But the Gospel has fallen upon days of opportunity such as never came before. And it is finding its way, and (though not to an extent or with a swiftness of which anyone can be proud) it is getting its way, among the great issues of the present time. Our intellectual reconstruction is well under way. The world of industry is fuller than it ever was of men who want peace and good will, and who are trying their best to find a way to it. Beneath all the pessimism that covers the surface of the international field are the seeds of altruism and idealism, sown broadcast during the world's greatest conflict, and striking deep root in the hearts of a generation that has sinned and suffered greatly. But in all these fields there is no salvation apart from the thought, the prayer, the consecrated struggle of the people. Scholars, captains of industry, statesmen, rise out of the community. They reflect what the people want and what the people believe to be possible. In a democracy, whether of church or state or school, the leaders lead only where the people will follow. learning of the scholars leave the comm wealth poor, if a great gulf yawns betw them and the people. Pioneers of good in the world of affairs rest back upon understanding and the appreciation of people. Christian statesmen cannot fo a laggard public opinion.

There is a spiritual preparedness t underlies all others, for war or for pea for the order that relies upon force or the order that rests upon justice and g will. Back of all treaties, all naval and m itary programs, all associations of men a of nations, is the steady set of the popu will. People who trust each other, who spect each other, who believe in each oth who wish each other well, will find a w to keep the peace and to build the structu of a world civilization. But all the wo of scholars, philanthropists, statesmen, tc ples to the ground in the first storm th blows, unless the foundations are laid de in the minds of the people. There let help to lay them, till the Gospel of our ti shall merge itself into a larger, fuller Gosp of the better time to come.

OUR CAMINO REAL

Friendly Relations with Mexico

In common with the other three of our states which are contiguous to Mexico, California has every reason to cultivate friendly relations with that country. For a century this commonwealth was included in the Government of Mexico, and the impress of her institutions are upon us everywhere. Streets and estates are named after her leaders. The feet of her padres beat out a broad path beyond San Francisco, and a warmth of sentiment attaches to their missions which constitutes a wealth of charm to all who visit us. Some of our wealthy men have great holdings in Mexico, of land and oil and minerals, whose prosperity depends upon peace. A huge wave of migration has swept upon us from the South amounting in various estimates to from one-fifteenth to one-tenth of our population. Were these Japanese or Hindu, there had been a terrific outcry. Or even the south-of-Europe people are mostly debarred. But there has been among us little movement to bar out the Mexicans, occupying the most undesired position in labor, not offensive with ambition nor achievement, ever looking to return to their native land. The fact of a borderland, too, is a matter of constant concern, for the towns across the line—Mexicali from Calexico and Tia Juana from San Diego—exist for the simple purpose of catering to our baser sporting element, and are deadly plague spots.

In the promotion of friendly relations between the two countries, Mexico Week, celebrated in Los Angeles and adjacent cities in late September, was a significant factor. The occasion was the visit of four young men who had won prizes in the oratorical contest held in Mexico City. Their theme had been the Constitution, an educational movement similar to that winning so much attention in the United States in the past few years.

These choice men—Antonio Martinez Raez, Ramon Betata, Vincent Gonzales, and J. J. Castorena—were accompanied by several representatives of the government, besides General Alvaro Obregon, until recently successful President for several years, and Dr. G. L. Swiggett of the United States, who had managed the oratorical contest. Numerous dinners and other public affairs were arranged for them, where speeches were made by them, and addressed to them. The Los Angeles Times was particularly active in the enterprise. The splendid expressions of patriotism, and the elucidation of the principles of their Constitution were a real contribution to us. On the other hand, the hearty attitude of friendship accorded them and their country must be influential through the years in promoting international good will. It was the first celebration of the kind held under such auspices. It will undoubtedly lead to other expressions. There have been occasions when certain yellow agencies in Los Angeles have fomented an evil spirit toward Mexico, counseling invasion or even subjugation. Such a view can obtain little support in California.

In this welcome, Pomona College sought and obtained a part. The visitors were invited to the college, and were cordially entertained. We would expect this from President Blaisdell, ever so alert to such opportunities. Each year a Conference on Friendly Relations with Mexico is sponsored by the college. At this time four of Pomona's graduates are in the faculties of the missions of the American Board in Mexico.

Of much greater than economic importance is the work being done to connect by rail Tepic and Guadalajara. This twelve miles is the last gap which connects the great Southern Pacific System with the Mexican System. So short, yet it requires 33 tunnels and 29 viaducts, to cost 20 millions. Its completion in June will bind by rail Canada to Mexico City. Not only so, our missions are in that region. Along the West Coast stretch the schools and churches of the American Board. How the road will facilitate movement, with the diffusion of all our agencies for good!

Of late the immense industrial values of this West Coast have become better appreciated. Not only the Southern Pacific, but also other great corporations, and General Obregon have been bending energies to open up the vast section agriculturally and in its mines. It is claimed that all the possibilities of California are there. There are men, too, who determine that the economic development shall be paralled by the educative and the spiritual. Thus, early last summer, the Southern Pacific gave free transportation to a committee from our State Conference and others, who visited that section. Our representatives, Rev. Herbert Ide and Rev. Lawrence Wilson, have reported to the directors in glowing terms. With the opening of the lands, there will be the inflow of a great population. Their educative and spiritual care must come largely from the United States. What an opportunity for schools, etc.! The direction of our interest in the conference has been particularly toward a school of higher functions. For a project of such magnitude, the committee in the board has been enlarged to include nine names, among them President J. A. Blaisdell of Pomona, and Superintendent George F. Kenngott.

A glance at the map shows that long peninsula to our South—"Lower California." It is an extension in mountain range, coast plains, and possibilities, of California, U. S. A. Two governments are we, but one imperial country, with interests joined. Let us promote friendly relations with Mexico.

With the Schools and Colleges

Hartford Seminary Foundation

The opening exercises of the Hartford Seminary Foundation for the academic year were held in the chapel at Hosmer Hall, Sept. 24. President W. D. Mackenzie, back from his summer home at the Muskoka Lakes, Canada, in full vigor for the year's work, introduced as the speaker of the occasion Dr. William Horace Day of Bridgeport, a member of the board of trustees of the Foundation.

The seminary has added to its teaching force Prof. Plato Ernest Shaw. Prof. A. L. Gillett is spending a sabbatic year at Berkeley, Cal., and suitable provision is being made for his classes as well as for the work which Dr. Potter must give up on account of his leaving for India after the Council.

The Hartford School of Religious Education, which is the new name for the Hartford School of Religious Pedagogy, has added to its faculty Miss Eleanor H. Johnson, who received the degree of Ph.D. at the last commencement and becomes associate professor in psychology; and Mrs. Jean Moore Cavell, Ph.D., who becomes associate professor in pedagogy.

The attendance in all three schools is about the same as last year, when the total enrollment was 181. Good progress is being made on the new buildings. Knight Hall, the building of the School of Education, is practically completed and ready for occupancy. Avery Hall, the new Library Building, is enclosed and roofed in and will be completed during the winter. The walls of the men's dormitory, not yet named, are rapidly rising and plans are completed for the classroom building of the seminary. The residence for the dean of the Kennedy School of Missions, given by the present dean of the school, Dr. E. W. Capen, and Mrs. Capen, is also under construction just south of Mackenzie Hall. It is expected that the whole institution will be housed in its new home by the fall of 1926.

Atlanta's New President

Rev. Lewis H. Keller, D.D., the retiring superintendent of the Florida State Conference and of the Congregational Churches of the

REV. LEWIS H. KELLER

Southeast, has accepted the presidency of Atlanta Theological Seminary. He will be succeeded in the superintendency of Florida by Rev. E. C. Gillette, pastor of the Union Congregational Church of Jacksonville.

Dr. Keller has held the position of general superintendent of the Southeast for the past six years and until a year ago made his headquarters in Atlanta. He has traveled extensively over the states of Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, Kentucky, the Carolinas, and Florida. During these years he has made many friends and he will carry over into his new work a rich experience. Happily he will be living in the same environment as during the past six years.

Dr. Keller was born in Upper Sandusky, Ohio, and lived on a farm until he was 21 years of age. This is one reason, no doubt, why he has such a fine physique and is so well and forceful, able enough to carry the great work of a theological seminary. Like many other able men he began his career by teaching school. He attended Valparaiso University and Adrian College and finished his special training at Yale Divinity School. He has been superintendent of Home Mission Work in Wisconsin and Minnesota.

One of the marked characteristics of this leader of men and affairs is his unbounded energy, enthusiastic optimism, and general good cheer. He is a friendly man who has won and kept many friends. He has been an indefatigable worker also.

The Southern Congregationalist is the work of his brain and hands. It has been splendidly edited in the midst of an exceedingly busy life.

As a superintendent Dr. Keller has kept young in spirit and has caught the enthusiasm of a new day for Florida. He feels keenly that we are on the verge of great things in Florida, and he has been eager to push forward into new and promising fields. The leadership of the seminary will give him a chance to train future leaders for the religious work of the South, which, in some respects, is a more responsible and vital service than continuance in the field itself.

Hosts of good friends wish him well, and hope Atlanta Seminary will prosper in his hands.

The President's Address to the National Counci

Mr. Moderator, Members of the Council:

IT is my understanding that the purpose of this Council is to enlarge and improve the moral and spiritual life of the Nation. While I appreciate that its purpose is religious rather than political, I have felt a propriety in coming here because of my belief in the necessity for a growing reliance of the political success of our Government upon the religious convictions of our people.

Everyone recognizes that our modern life has become more and more complex. It has become more and more independent. This is true in our economic life; it is true in our political life. With the extension of knowledge and science, with the new powers that these have conferred, there are a multitude of ways and opportunities for committing crime, for doing wrongs which result in personal and property injury to others, and for perverting that which ought to minister to our well-being to the service of evil ends which in former days did not exist.

New occasions have been opened for the turning of the instrumentalities of government, which ought to be used for public welfare, into the service of selfish and misguided interests. Temptations have been both multiplied and intensified. The perils both to the individual and to society have in numerous ways been increased manifold.

Dissolution of All Restraints

It is notorious that crime and violence always follow in the wake of war. It appears to be the rule that there is a dissolution of the old restraints, brought about by the reaction which follows from the severe discipline and nervous tension of an era of conflict. These may be, and probably are, a temporary state which will tend to disappear with the mere passage of time.

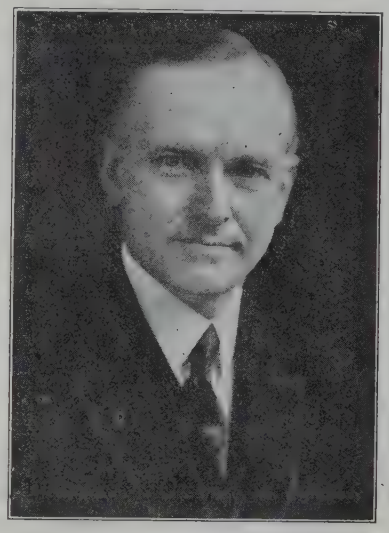
But too many of our people have found oftentimes to their sorrow that the privileges of liberty instead of being easy to enjoy are in reality highly difficult responsibilities, requiring the utmost of effort for success. Nor can it be denied that on the part of some there is a tendency to disregard too many of the former standards of society and too much of the former influence of authority.

Another characteristic of our present state of civilization, which has already been noted and commented upon, is the disposition of those who are less well equipped to receive the benefits of the modern state of society through bearing its burdens to attempt to resist all efforts to subject them to the necessary restraints and discipline, and to try to tear down and destroy the results which others have secured by generations of constant effort. What others have accumulated through industry and self-denial they propose to seize and to dissipate and destroy through indolence and self-indulgence without compensation to its rightful owners. Lawlessness is altogether too prevalent and a lack of respect for government and the conventions of enlightened society is altogether too apparent.

It is because I do not know of any political method of adequately dealing with these difficulties that I have ventured to bring them to the attention of this Council.

Beyond Government's Reach

It is natural to attempt to shift the blame from ourselves to others when evil conditions arise. It is always easy to criticize the Government for failure to reform all morals, to prevent all crime and generally to abolish all evil. I have great faith in the local and national Governments of the United States, but much of this field is beyond their reach.



President Calvin Coolidge

They were not established to discharge this duty; they are utterly unable to accomplish it. The chief function of organized government is to maintain order, provide security for persons and property, and set up the instrumentalities for the administration of justice.

This means the making, interpretation and the execution of the law through the legislature, the judiciary, the executive, and all the various machinery of administration which these imply. But it ought always to be remembered that our institutions have undertaken to recognize that the human mind is and must be free. This is one of the reasons why it is neither practical nor justifiable to impose upon the Government the responsibility for the ultimate provision of the instrumentalities which minister to the spiritual life.

It is true that the Government can aid, and is aiding, in the solution of some of the problems to which I have already referred. Without doubt the law acts as a deterrent to wrongdoing and will usually go a long way in the repression of crime. But this reaches its highest application only when there is a very healthy and determined public sentiment in favor of the observance of the law.

The utmost ingenuity on the part of th police powers will be substantially all waste in an effort to enforce the law, if there doe not exist a strong and vigorous determina tion on the part of the people to observe th law. Such a determination cannot be pro duced by the Government. My own opinio is that it is furnished by religion.

Education's Power Limited

Another contribution of great benefit which is carried on so successfully by th local public authorities, is that of education It is well known that ignorance and vic and crime all flourish together. Our loca schools which are sanctioned by the State and cherished by the national Governmen are institutions of enormous value not only in providing learning for our youth but in removing the prejudices which naturally would exist among various racial groups and bringing the rising generation of our people to a common understanding. A more thorough comprehension of our political and social institutions has rarely failed to produce a more loyal citizen.

With few exceptions those who come to us as enemies of society are so because they have always found society enemies to them Education in the elements and fundamentals of the American principles of human relationship has seldom failed to secure their allegiance. But the mere sharpening of the wits, the bare training of the intellect, the naked acquisition of science, while they would greatly increase the power for good, likewise increase the power for evil. An intellectual growth will only add to our confusion unless it is accompanied by a moral growth. I do not know of any source of moral power other than that which comes from religion.

But there is another and more basic reason why the Government cannot supply the source and motive for the complete reformation of society. In the progress of the human race religious beliefs were developed before the formation of governments. It is my understanding that government rests on religion.

While in our own country we have wisely separated the Church and the State in order to emancipate faith from all political interference, nevertheless the forms and theories of our Government were laid in accordance with the prevailing religious convictions of the people. The great revival of the middle of the eighteenth century had a marked influence upon our Revolutionary period.

The claim to the right of equality, with the resultant right to self-government—the rule of the people—have no foundation other than the common brotherhood of man derived from the common fatherhood of God.

Law Looks to Divine Sanction

The righteous authority of the law depends for its sanction upon its harmony with the righteous authority of the Almighty. If

A Message from the Moderator

Frank J. Harwood

THERE is one thing in the back of my mind as I think of the privileges and responsibilities of the next two years. It is the thought of stressing the work of laymen, the hope of inducing them to take a more active part in the life of the churches. I wish that our laymen could be led to see the value and necessity of attending conventions and representative church gatherings as a means of getting acquainted with the greater church.

As an employer closely allied with my employees in the relationships of a small industry which are those of a family, I am interested in promoting something of this same spirit of fellowship and Christian brotherhood throughout the whole field of industry.

Through my mother's intense zeal, enthusiasm for the missionary enterprises of the church was born in my blood. I accept the responsibilities of the Moderatorship with a sense of Christian privilege, with an interest in all that deeply and truly concerns the Congregational Churches in the ministry of the Gospel and with an earnest hope and prayer that I may not fail in the high purposes that the call of the Congregational National Council has laid upon me.

s faith is set aside, the foundations of our titutions fall, the citizen is deposed from high estate which he holds as amenable a universal conscience, society reverts to ystem of class and caste, and the governnt, instead of being imposed by reason m within, is imposed by force from with-. Freedom and democracy would give y to despotism and slavery.

do not know of any adequate support for form of government except that which nes from religion.

Our history has been marked by the conbutions which have been made by clergyn to the cause of education and governnt. I need only to remind you that the v. Thomas Shepherd was the leading inence in the establishment of the first col-e in the United States, chartered in ssachusetts in 1636. Two years later at rtford the Rev. Thomas Hooker was deing the fundamental principles upon ich the American Republic was to rest, ich was supplemented early in the next ctury at Ipswich by the writings and serns of the Rev. John Wise.

t is my understanding that these emit divines were preaching good Congregaional doctrine, though, of course, many er denominations have just as vigorously pported the same principles. These conributions were not made in any narrow or sense, but resulted from the broad general eelings of the necessity for an enlightened d consecrated people and from the conlusions drawn from their theology as to hi relations of men to each other and to hir God. The teaching of religion necesrily taught education and government.

is on this theory that our institutions of vernment rest. We do not look upon the thority of the State as something imposed a selected few upon the masses of the ple through the special dispensation of ine right or by the force of military wer, but we rather recognize the universal ine right including all the people to govr themselves in accordance with the dicats of a common conscience.

the people are the Government it cannot is above them; it cannot furnish them with something they do not have; it will be what they are. This is true representation. The Government will be able to get out of the people only such virtue as religion has placed there.

Enlightened Conscience Needed

If society resists wrongdoing by punishment, as it must do unless it is willing to approve it through failure to resist it, for there is no middle ground, it may protect itself as it is justified in doing by restraining a criminal, but that in and of itself does not reform him. It is only a treatment of a symptom. It does not eradicate the disease. It does not make the community virtuous. No amount of restraint, no amount of law can do that. If our political and social standards are the result of an enlightened conscience, then their perfection depends upon securing a more enlightened conscience.

Thomas Shepherd was not a great moral leader because he believed in promoting education. He believed in promoting education because he was a great moral leader. Thomas Hooker and John Wise were not great spiritual lights because they declared the principles of sound Government. They declared the principles of sound Government because they were great spiritual lights.

It is necessary to do something more than to have Government treat symptoms. If we are to preserve what we already have and provide for further reformation we must become a nation of partakers of the spirit of Shepherd and Hooker and Wise, or, as the clergy tell us, we must become partakers of the spirit of the Great Master. This way is outside the Government. It is the realm of religion.

It is this absolute necessity for support of the Government outside itself, through religion, that I wish to impress upon this assembly. Without that support political effort would be practically fruitless. It is not in any denominational or any narrow and technical sense that I refer to religion. I mean to include all that can be brought within that broad general definition.

While I regard the clergy as the greatest power for religious teaching that we have, I do not refer to them alone. I am conscious that the example of devoted men and women, the result of the inevitable social relations, and, above all, the influence of piety in the home, are all forces of enormous significance. While certain formalities of the past may have lost the hold they once had, I do not see any diminution of the steadfastness of the religious convictions of the people. If these were broken down society might go on for a time under its own momentum, but it would be headed for destruction.

We do not possess any other enlightening force. We do not have any other hope for the reform and perfection of society. There is no other method by which we can "have life and have it more abundantly."

While I have pointed out some of the difficulties and perils with which we are threatened at the present time, and while I believe we may well heed them and be warned by them, it is by no means my desire to sound any note of discouragement.

Says Religious Faith Increases

The very fact that amid all the complexities and distractions of our present life we are still maintaining unimpaired the foundations of our institutions, constantly increasing the rectitude with which the great business affairs of our country are conducted, all the while improving our educational facilities, answering more and more generally to the calls of public and private charity, continually enlarging the field of art, giving more and more attention to humanities and becoming more and more responsive to spiritual things, appears to me to be incontrovertible evidence that though it may be practiced in a somewhat different manner than formerly the deep and abiding faith of our people in religion has not diminished but has increased.

I have tried to indicate what I think the country needs in the way of help under present conditions. It needs more religion. If there are any general failures in the enforcement of the law it is because there have first been general failures in the disposition to observe the law. I can conceive of no adequate remedy for the evils which beset society except through the influences of religion.

There is no form of education which will not fail, there is no form of government which will not fail, there is no form of reward which will not fail. Redemption must come through sacrifice, and sacrifice is the essence of religion. It will be of untold benefit if there is a broader comprehension of this principle by the public and a continued preaching of this crusade by the clergy.

It is only through these avenues, by a constant renewal and extension of our faith, that we can expect to enlarge and improve the moral and spiritual life of the nation. Without that faith all that we have of an enlightened civilization cannot endure.

If young men had music and pictures to interest them, to engage them and satisfy many of their impulses and to enliven their days, they would not go to the low pleasures of the streets; they would have an alternative and would be too fastidious to do so.—Bernard Shaw.

The Late Victor F. Lawson

As Seen in His Own Church

By His Pastor, Rev. John R. Heyworth
New England Church, Chicago, Illinois

IT is difficult to put into words just what the passing of Mr. Lawson means to New England Church. Possibly it is too soon fully to estimate the loss. For one who had been for nearly forty-seven years a member, who had passed from one important office to another until he had become the mainstay of the church, to be suddenly taken out, leaves a sense of desolation. In a downtown church, depleted by death and removal of its strongest members, and facing changing conditions, such a loss is almost irreparable.

Mr. Lawson's remarkable will and his generous bequests to Congregationalism have evoked a good many articles, and I have read them with a great deal of interest; but they all seem to lack that revelation of the man as we knew him in New England Church. And this is no criticism, for he was by nature so modest and retiring and unassuming that only those knew him intimately who lived and worked with him. It was my privilege to be his pastor for only a few months, yet it was not difficult to love him, for in spite of his power and place, he was such a gentleman, considerate and kind, and so ready to listen to and see the other point of view. I had gone to New England with some hesitation, fully conscious of the situation, and knowing the position he occupied in its councils. Like every self-respecting man, I have been anxious to preserve the essential freedom of the minister, and in going I wondered if it were possible to preserve it in a church where such a powerful personality held the key to the situation.

I need not have worried. He was a strong man with a powerful and farseeing mind and rare judgment, but dominance was far from his nature. Quiet, restrained, gentle, he would sit in the council and listen carefully to the ideas of the younger men, seemingly anxious to draw them out and develop them. If it were necessary to give his judgment, it would be given in a quiet, even voice; but it was not final or arbitrary. No man seemed more open to conviction. It was necessary in these last months to discuss new policies. Some were new ventures involving departures from old ways; but one soon discovered that his mind was open. In those private conferences he gave the impression that New England Church was of vital concern to him. He would take my program up, point by point, and render a decision, and it was not difficult to agree. In nothing was there the imperious note, and always the open mind.

How he loved the old church! Few men were busier than he, yet he always had time for church affairs. Anxious for a conference with him, I asked one of his friends if it would be possible to secure it. He answered, "Mr. Lawson is never too busy where New England Church is concerned." And he wasn't. Though he worked from early till late at his business, he would make time for church affairs. He was always present at the Sunday morning worship. I can see him coming down the center aisle and entering his seat. The hymn, an old one, with real body to it and an evangelical flavor, he sings with real fervor and his face is alight. He sits very still in church and with thoughtful air. Or it is prayer meeting night, and one so busy as he might have excused himself. At his age he might have pleaded that he was tired. Soon he comes in and takes the front seat to the preacher's left. You can hear him sing. He joins in the discussion, and soon comes the time to pray. There is a pause. You hear some one rise and then that reverent, gentle, cultured voice breaks upon your ears. It wasn't Mr. Lawson praying that made you listen and brought such a stillness to the room. It was the chaste and beautiful language he used, the brevity and simplicity of the prayer, the simple faith in Christ he expressed, and the feeling that God was coming close. We were listening to a simple reverent mind and an earnest Christian soul lead us into the presence of the Father. It was all so simple and so natural like everything else he did. No man was more free from pose. Quietly he moved in and out among us exerting a great influence.

The men of New England loved him and speak of him today with reverence and real affection. And the sense of loss is great.

The last time I saw Mr. Lawson was at the end of a warm day in July and just before going away on vacation. He was tired then and hoping to get a rest soon. We were standing in the office before beginning that last council meeting. We had a Scotchman present and the men were telling Scotch stories. Then Mr. Lawson came in and joined the circle. He mixed freely with us, was genial, kind, and laughed heartily at some of the jokes. Then he capped the rest with one of his own, and we went into the meeting. There final steps were taken looking toward more aggressive policies for New England Church, and which are now in operation. It was a good meeting,—one of that affable, genial kind, full of hope and confidence in the future, and where good humor abounds. It meant going deeper into his own pocket, but he cheerfully acquiesced to all that was done, for he was full of hope for the future. It was a wise, gentle, kindly man who bade me good-by, and it would have been a privilege to be his pastor. God in his wise providence translated him, and we in New England Church take up the burden and carry on but with a sense of grief and loss.

"The real duty of the churches is to win men to Christ. Every effort and every method that is good must be used. There must be a revival of evangelism. By evangelism I mean all those methods and activities by means of which Christ is brought to men, and men are brought to him.—Bishop William F. McDowell.

Paul's Farewell at Miletus

Comment on the International Uniform Sunday School Lesson for November 8
Acts 20: 25-38

Miletus was the seaport of Ephesus, a fe miles away. Paul was hurrying to Jerusalem anxious to be there in time for the Feast o Pentecost; hence instead of going to Ephesu he sent to the elders of the church to come an meet him at Miletus as he passed through, voy aging from Europe. Paul was going up t Jerusalem with two strong convictions: first that he ought to go, and second, that he had un certain and probably very trying experience before him. He felt the leading of the Hol Spirit, and yet he said that the "Holy Ghos witnesseth in every city, saying that bonds an afflictions await me." He felt certain that i was his last farewell to these in the churc at Ephesus, whose lives he had touched ver deeply and who had meant so much to his lif and ministry.

It was an affecting scene as he bade thes Ephesian Christians farewell, and the patho of the occasion has been well preserved i Luke's narrative. We have an intimate pictur of Paul himself. He reveals the innermos springs of his impulses and ideals, and h stands forth in this farewell address in simpl and pure nobility. Humility, earnestness courage, candor, persistence, and patience,— these he summarizes as the qualities of hi ministry. He lays strong emphasis likewis upon the universality of his appeal and th depth of his purpose. He has testified bot to "Jews, and also to the Greeks, repentanc toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesu Christ." The spirit of this ministry in his lif he reminds these Ephesians is the spirit whic supports him and encourages him as he face the unknown future, with the certainty of suf fering and probable loss of his life. "But non of these things move me," he says, "neithe count I my life dear unto myself, so that might finish my course with joy, and the min istry, which I have received of the Lord Jesus to testify the gospel of the grace of God."

That is one of the noblest statements on re cord anywhere in history and literature. It i the statement of a man whole-souled and thor oughly consecrated, who had found the suprem satisfaction in life and the joy of the Christia way in the fullness of his surrender to God Hence, as he goes forth on the uncertai course, his thought is not of himself but o those whom he leaves behind. He reminds then that responsibility rests upon them; that he i pure from the blood of all men. He urges then to establish sound spiritual discipline and guid ance in the church, and commending them t God, he recalls the purity of his motives an the entire absence of self-interest from hi ministry. In enforcing this example as on that they themselves should follow, he record a saying of Jesus that we do not find elsewhere "It is more blessed to give than to receive." Paul could say this with conviction, for h had found it so in his experience.

Thus sorrowing and weeping they said thei mutual farewells and Paul went on to hi destiny.

Does not the Epistle to the Ephesians, in th depth and power of its appeal, indicate tha these who returned to Ephesus went to thei destiny also in the upbuilding of a churc spiritually well established and supremely de voted to Christ?

Our Canadian Outlook

By Principal D. L. Ritchie

ANADA is in the midst of a federal elec- tion. The day for polling is Oct. 29, but far it cannot be said that there is much en- siasm one way or another. The whole tical situation is somewhat drab, for so far re is no vital issue disturbing the mind of people. There is not a little drum-beating the political organizations and the respective lers are on speech-making perambulations t and West, but there is no evidence that mind of the country is stirred. Canada in eagerness to advance as a nation has her problems to solve, but somehow her poli- ans seem unable to get to close grips with n and successfully settle them. The tariff, railways, and immigration are perennially h us, and they are being rethreshed again h the familiar rancor but with no new light freshness of argument or suggestion of esmanship.

Mr. Mackenzie King, the Prime Minister head of the Liberal Party, is seeking re- tion on the past four years' record—it must confessed a somewhat gray one. He is also ing the question of the Senate and its mis- ds in mangling or rejecting federal legis- on, but he is grasping that nettle with a ewhat feeble hand. Mr. Meighen, the Con- vative leader and a speaker with a clever if itter tongue, is preaching "blue ruin" be- se of the Liberal policy and with a view to h tariffs. He is answered by being called a mer of his country, and Mr. Mackenzie g, losing temper, has gone so far as to ac- e him of "lack of truth and honor." In- d, the virulent rancor of the party leaders lisgusting thoughtful citizens, dragging poli- into still deeper disrepute, and driving se who ought to be the leaders of the coun- into the seclusion of private life. Of course h things cannot justify their culpable failure public spirit, but somehow to say "politics" Canada is to be answered with a shrug of shoulders. Yet on every hand one hears demand for less personal rancor, for more ut Canada, and, above all, for a more ca- le statesmanship to ease her burdens.

n the West Mr. Forke, leader of the Pro- ssive Party, largely the farmers' party, bans h the old parties and calls for lower tariffs l fair treatment for the farming West. ily it becomes clearer that the struggle is ween urban and rural Canada, between nufacturing Ontario and Quebec, and the mers and others East and West. And that an issue as old as civilization. How slowly problem of living together progresses!

n the Province of Quebec, that returns a d "bloc" of 65 so-called Liberals, high fi- ce is evidently trying to form a fourth ty. Mr. Patenaude, its nominee, is talking dly of independence and of his resolve to ver the country from the pass to which declares the old parties, and especially Mr. ckenzie King, have brought it. It might be l for Canada to have that "bloc" broken up, it is not Liberal principle but nationalism h religion that unites it; but the smoke en behind which Mr. Patenaude fights is too thin to hide his true politics. He is nominee of grasping private interests that like even Mr. Meighen for nationalizing rail- ys. In spite of much boasted independence, lected with any followers, he will be found ind the Conservative Party, for his prin- les are its principles, its program his pro- m. It is a move to try to do what Mr. ighen, hated by French Quebec for his Con- iption Act, can never do—split the "bloc," but it is the same old wedge and the same old driving power behind it. The move is too jejune to deceive the wary, but it may dis- place the votes of the simple and jeopardize certain Liberal seats. And all the more so be- cause of the heavy purses behind it.

For the moment he would be a rash prophet who would predict results. If no stampeding cry is raised as in 1911, things look as if Mr. Mackenzie King would be returned but de- pendent on the Progressives for anything like an effective majority, and that would be a renewal of the unsatisfactory position in which he has been during the past four years. The best thing that could happen to Canada politi- cally would be a complete re-shuffling of parties, a new alignment of forces with the appearance of new leaders to swing her out of sorely worn grooves of personal rancors and hollow party squabbles. Canada has seen little high states- manship since the passing of Laurier.

Meanwhile, even as partisan voices clamor about "ruin," Canada has had the third best harvest in her history, with winter wheat and barley crops that have broken all records. For- eign trade has made a big advance, while home trade steadily if slowly revives. Her railway situation yearly improves. Population is still a problem, but Canada, and especially her Anglo Saxondom, must learn that that must be solved by the unrestricted fertility of her own loins and not merely by pining for immi- grants from afar. Cheaper living would do much to keep her own children within her bor- ders and strangers within her gates, and add by natural increase to her population. Such as cry "ruin" are only foolish or worse—they have miserable schemes to serve that end with self. In spite of politicians the hope of Canada brightens and her strength waxes with the pass- ing years.

Church Union

Since the consummation of Union on June 10, things have been moving apace with the United Church. Presbyteries have been formed and conferences have been meeting all over the land. These, under her biennial council, are her two chief instruments of government. By the end of October her working organiza- tion will be set up from the Atlantic to the Pacific. From Oct. 4 to 18 the United Church betook herself to prayer, communion, and re- newed consecration. She has issued a budget for four millions of dollars to cover missions, colleges, extension and central working ex- penses, and is setting herself hopefully to get it. The glow of the great days of June is still with her, and the wonder of that achievement still makes her say, "The Lord hath done great things for us whereof we are glad." The shin- ing thing about it all is the spirit that is abroad, making achievement easy. Not only have men set themselves to escape snags and to get through snags that cannot be avoided; they positively refuse to make any, where many an invitation to do it holds out a beckoning hand. The United Church is certainly a proof of what a little good will can do to overcome difficulties and make rough places plain. In some localities it is hard to keep churches from hastening too fast. Local churches are eager to unite, colleges are coming together, central organizations are working as one. If only she were through with the legal troubles caused by the Presbyterian split and its bitterness, what will she not be ready to accomplish for Canada and the Kingdom of God in the world? But she waits not even for the clearing up of these. In spite of them, and some of them are grievous enough, she is putting her hand to great tasks. The first fruits will be seen in her own far- flung West where there are hundreds of school sections without Christian ministries and whence comes the cry, "Come over and help us lay the foundations of a Christian civili- zation." That challenge is laying hold of the heart of the United Church. Nor will she be heedless to the other voices that come from afar. The United Church is to be a missionary church. Nor will she be blind to the fact that the cleansing of the slums and pulling down of the rookeries in her cities at home will do as much for the Christianizing of India as the de- spatch of a score of missionaries to Madras or Calcutta. Her leaders know that the mission- ary problem at home and abroad is one and the same. In time she will regenerate and rejuven- ate Canadian politics not by becoming politi- cal, but by the creation of public ideals and by educating a new breed of men and women for public life. She must grow a great citizenship and inspire battalions of selfless public leaders. That is plainly the duty of a church in a demo- cratic and professedly Christian land. Democ- racy can survive only on character. Clear it is that in spite of oppositions, cavils, and hin- drances, the United Church of Canada is out to sea with all sail set, seaworthy and ready for all weathers, a great achievement and a lovely spectacle, with abundance of quiet faith that the voyage will be prosperous because of her conviction and many signs that the com- pelling breath of the Lord blows upon her.

Slumber Thoughts

"I don't know how my sister will get along if we room together," said my friend the other day, "for when I can't sleep I light up and read." My friend confessed that she has the habit of going to bed with her mind seething with office problems. It amounts to this: after a day of business excitement, after an evening filled perhaps with the further excitement of a concert or a play, she lies down with her brain all in a whirl of excitement, and adds, as one more thing, the excitation of thought over business problems.

If you want to cultivate the habit of lying awake, do such things. If you wish to learn the art of sleeping, deliberately relax everything the moment you go to bed. When days are so filled with nervous excitement as ours commonly are, it is necessary to still the quivering nerves if sleep is to be had. Relax the body first of all, beginning at the feet and going up to the neck. Then relax the mind. It is possible, by practice, to banish thought, to tuck up for the night all the busy-ness of life. When the body is in repose, when the nerves are quieted, when the restless mind is made calm, then sleep is likely to come.

Some time ago this column suggested a formula that is used successfully by one person in the effort to still the body and to banish agitating thought. A few days ago an acquaintance handed me a Slumber Song, by Louis Ledoux, which is intended for the same purpose. It goes something like this:

Drowsily come the sheep
From the place where the pastures be,
By a dusty lane
To the fold again,
First one, then two, and three—
First one, then two, by the paths of sleep,
Drowsily come the sheep.

Drowsily come the sheep,
And the shepherd is singing low;
After eight comes nine,
In a dusty line
They come, and then in they go—
First eight, then nine, by the paths of sleep,
Drowsily come the sheep.

Drowsily come the sheep,
And they pass through the sheep-fold door;
After one comes two,
After one comes two,
After two comes three and four.
First one, then two, by the paths of sleep,
Drowsily come the sheep.

The lines must be said slowly, drowsily, while the mind tries to see the sheep coming down the dusty road and making their way to the fold, while the shepherd sings low.

If this does not succeed in bringing sleep, it frequently helps if one turns from his side and lies on his back for a bit. While lying thus the mind can "practice the presence of God." Give yourself to the thought that the infinite and eternal Spirit, the Spirit of the living God, is with you, round about you, enfolding you, resting you, strengthening you. Open yourself to that Spirit. Give yourself utterly to God, to be in perfect partnership with him. Open yourself to the peace of God that passeth all understanding, and as you lie there invite to yourself the wonderful, profound living joy of the Lord Jesus.

Then, after you have done this for a while, turn over on your side again, and once more put thought out of your mind. Relax everything. If sleep does not come, you will at least rest. But sleep will be likely to find you.

SEAFARERS

The sea is his, and he made it.—Ps. 95: 5.

What a wonderful ship is faith. She discovers worlds beyond anything found by Columbus. What a freight she carries. Riches beyond the treasures of Solomon's ships of gold. To what a glorious realm she transports.—W. L. Watkinson.

The unskillful, inexperienced Christian shrieks out whenever his vessel shakes, thinking it always a danger that the watery pavement is not stable and resident like a rock, and yet all his danger is in himself, none at all from without . . . if we do not leave the ship and leap into the sea; quit the interests of religion, and run to the securities of the world; cut our cables and dissolve our hopes; grow impatient and hug a wave, and die in its embrace, we are as safe at sea—safer in the storm which God sends us, than in a calm when we are befriended with the world.—Jeremy Taylor.

God has a safe harbor for his troubled people and while the waves toss we travel. —W. R. Nichol.

I sail! I sail! And cry "All hail
To the Infinite Love for his favoring gale!"
I sail from the dark toward the beckoning morn,
From errors old toward truth new-born.
I sail from the cold toward a southern clime,
From hate toward love's sweet triumph-time.
I sail from the storm toward the harbor's peace,
From defeat and pain toward heaven's release.
I sail from grief, from sin, from strife,
Toward joy, and rest, and home, and life.
I sail—but why prolong the tale?
From death toward God I sail! I sail!
H. A. J.

The voyage of human life under any other head than Christ, and under any other wind than the wind of his Spirit, is sorrowful beyond all expression. Whatever port is reached, the port of peace, the joyful, eternal home cannot be reached. The vessel in which we are passing over the sea of mortal life is always driven by contrary winds till the Lord embarks. All voyagers who know the pleasantness of having Christ on board, and the certainty of getting safe to land under him pray him with all their hearts to abide with them.—J. Pulsford.

How is it with your ship? Is it much tossed about? That is an inferior question as compared with the inquiry—"Is Christ on board?"—Joseph Parker.

O Lord our God, teach us, we beseech thee, to ask thee aright for the right blessings. Steer thou the vessel of our life toward thyself, thou tranquil haven of all storm-tossed souls. Show us the course wherein we should go. Renew a willing spirit within us. Let thy Spirit curb our wayward senses, and guide and enable us unto that which is our true good, to keep thy laws, and in all our works evermore to rejoice in thy glorious and gladdening presence. For thine is the glory and praise from all thy saints for ever and ever. Amen.

St. Basil.

Leads for Leaders

Think through the distinctions in: toleran between nations, goodwill between them, a friendship among them. Which is the mo constructive, the more personal, the more vit the more Christian, and why?

Can we be patriotic and international mind at the same time? What is patriotism Was Stephen Decatur right in saying: M country, may she always be right. But rig of wrong, my country? Think of it in term of our own family and other families.

Can the welfare of the world be advance without friendship between nations? Can a ne world be built on suspicion, hatred, commerci or diplomatic warfare? The alternative?

Can we be Christian and not internationall minded? Can Christ be narrowed to one natio and still be Christ? He thought in terms of a peoples. To be like him we must. His friend l ness embraced all nations. To be like hi ours must.

Thoughts for Members

In Christ there is no East nor West,
In him no South nor North;
But one great fellowship of love
Throughout the whole wide earth.

In him shall true hearts everywhere
Their high communion find;
His service is the golden cord
Close binding all mankind.

Join hands then, brothers of the faith,
Whate'er your race may be.
Who serves my Father as a son
Is surely kin to me.

In Christ now meet both East and West,
In him meet South and North;
All Christly souls are one in him
Throughout the whole wide earth.

A Moment of Prayer

God of our fathers, we thank thee for our land, its greatness and its peace. Keep us ever true to its highest interests. But keep us also we pray from that narrowness of heart that forgets that thou art the God of all the nations that seek thee. For their sake and for thy sake we would pray and seek for the well-being of all thy people, until one in heart they all shall acknowledge thee. Amen.

DWEEK MESSAGES, by ROBERT ELMER H (Abingdon Press. $1.00). One of the ter's hardest jobs it to make the present midweek service both vital and attractive. Here is a preacher who has done so by dealing with the indispensable and fundamental rather than with the ephemeral or frivolous. These are really five-minute talks on such themes as A Live Church, A Fascinating Fight, The Outstanding Man, The World's Greatest Symbol, and Christ's World Program.

Sinclair Books

MAMMONART, by UPTON SINCLAIR (Upton Sinclair, Pasadena, Cal. $2.00).

SONNETS, by M. C. S., with a preface by Upton Sinclair (Upton Sinclair, Pasadena, Cal.). These two books—one a substantial volume of about 400 pages and the other a slender pamphlet of forty—naturally come under review together. "M. C. S." is Mrs. Upton Sinclair, and her husband has contributed a whimsical, but very beautiful, introduction to her sonnets in which he mentions that he overcame her modesty about having them published by suggesting that it might help to sell Mammonart if he included Sonnets as a premium. This is, of course, a bit of by-play, but the sonnets are in reality brilliant enough to give additional inducement towards acquaintance with a volume interesting enough in itself. Mammonart is indeed a very remarkable book. It is dominated by Mr. Sinclair's class-conscious, or as he describes it, "scientific," socialism. It has, in parts, all that sweeping dogmatism of biased judgment which characterized The Brass Check, Sinclair's study of American journalism, and The Goose Step, his study of American education, but it is a much greater book than either of these. As a criticism of arts and letters from the standpoint of an intense and uncompromising moralist, who sees in modern life as in most of history a colossal conspiracy of the strong against the weak, of "capital" against "labor," Mr. Sinclair's wide survey of "genius" and of the "classics" is a masterpiece. But it has all the faults that one would expect in a book from such a standpoint as well as most of the merits, and in addition it displays the strength and weakness of Mr. Sinclair himself. The high respect that one has for Mr. Sinclair's sincerity, the completeness of his championship of social under-dogs, and his fearlessness and absolute disregard of self-interest, cannot blind one to his essential unfairness in questioning the motives of men as honorable and high-minded as himself. A writer who puts in a book of serious criticism such a ridiculous chapter as that entitled The Christian Bull-Dog (dealing with Yale and William Lyon Phelps), not to mention other passages of a like nature, must not complain if many people refuse to regard him seriously. On the whole America does not take Mr. Sinclair seriously; it regards him rather as a sort of brilliant literary crank who turned his back upon a promising career to exploit his particular theories. To this the socialist-author might well reply in the language of a greater than himself, that "a prophet is not without honor save in his own country," for Mr. Sinclair's books have had high recognition in other countries. As a matter of fact, despite the vagaries, the unfairness, and the intolerance of much of his criticism, he has many of the marks of a real prophet, and he will yet be recognized as such. Mammonart has enough of real truth and spiritual significance to make it a great book.

Fiction

OLD YOUTH, by CONINGSBY DAWSON (Cosmopolitan. $2.00). "The silly season in a woman's mid-career, when she reverses all the values for which she has been respected,—the phase of henna, reducing, and rouge." This is the way in which Eve Greensleeve, the heroine of this novel, who herself is passing through the phase, speaks of "old youth." The author, however, treats of it in a more sympathetic manner. "Youth is really a port of the imagination in which no bark of the truly young ever dropped anchor." While describing two love affairs, one of a man and woman of forty, and the other of the man's daughter and a modern youth, it is about the former that he has woven all the glamor and romance. The book is an intriguing study of a woman past her first youth. It abounds in clever and epigrammatic comments on life.

LOST HOPE RANCH, by CHARLES ALDEN SELTZER (Century. $2.00). Another of those stories where life on a Western ranch or the desert seems just one shooting adventure after another.

CARAVAN, by JOHN GALSWORTHY (Scribners. $2.50). The origin of the title is glimpsed from the author's foreword to the book. "Like some long caravan bearing merchandise of sorts, the tales of a writer wind through the desert of indifference towards the oasis of public favor." Collected in this book are all the short stories written by Mr. Galsworthy between 1900 and 1923. That real contribution to modern literature, The Forsythe Saga, has made the work of the author so well known that little need be said of the present volume but to express admiration for the perfection of achievement which the stories display.

THE SECRET OF BOGEY HOUSE, by HERBERT ADAMS (Lippincott. $2.00). The disappearance of David Gregson is the reason for an investigation of Bogey House, where he was known to have been a guest. As the investigation proceeds there is a succession of thrilling incidents, unexpected enough to interest the most confirmed reader of mystery tales.

THE MISTY FLATS, by HELEN WOODBURY (Little, Brown. $2.00). A New England village serves as the background to this unfolding of the life of Linda Bradley from her early childhood to the middle twenties. Her constant struggle to please a mother wholly lacking in imagination and completely selfish are vividly drawn by an author who has great power of imagination and the ability to make her reader see the pictures she paints. If Linda had "boiled over" occasionally her indignation would have been justified in the face of the trying situations in which her mother's selfishness places her; but she keeps her poise and sacrifices her life to a mother who is able-bodied enough to care for herself. Linda feels the barrier of sex. As she expresses it: "Custom and—and things have made it so easy for boys. Mothers expect them to grow up, and go out into the world, and develop their capabilities, and do the things they want to do. Live their own lives without interference. But with a girl they expect — something so different. Mothers interfere with girls." The characters of Linda and the mother are excellently drawn, and incidental characters also are finely presented. This is a first novel.

WITH THE CHILDREN

Prickly Polly Porcupine

By Carrie Belle Boyden

Polly Porcupine arose early one bright morning because she could not sleep. She had been thinking about her troubles, which is a bad habit. Everything around her little house in Hoppywood was beautiful, but Polly did not think so. The sun was too bright, the grass was too wet, the weeds were too high, and the birds sang too loud. She decided that she would leave home for the day and call on her friends; perhaps that would cheer her up a bit.

She arrived at Minnie Mink's house and found Minnie stirring up a wild raspberry cake and singing as she stirred. Polly had no more than seated herself when she said: "Yesterday, Mary Muskrat went right by our house with all her children. She had a covered basket, and I know she was going on a picnic. I think she was real mean not to ask me to go along." Minnie Mink looked surprised and changed the subject quickly, so Polly Porcupine did not stay very long.

She next called on Carrie Chipmunk. Before she had been there long, she said: "I just called on Minnie Mink. She was stirring up a lovely raspberry cake, but she didn't ask me to stay and try a piece of it. I think she is rather stingy." Carrie Chipmunk did not reply to this, so Polly finally went away.

Her next call was on Sally Squirrel. "I see you are sewing this morning," Polly remarked. "I just came from Carrie Chipmunk's. She was making the most beautiful gray silk dress I ever saw. I think she is extravagant to get so many new clothes this spring." Now, Carrie Chipmunk and Sally Squirrel were very good friends, so of course, Sally stood up for Carrie Chipmunk.

Polly soon left and called on Rena Rabbit. While there she remarked that Sally Squirrel was very inhospitable and she would never call there again.

There was to be a meeting that evening to make plans for building a Hoppywood Town Hall. It was to be held at Old Mother Woodchuck's house, so Polly went there next and arrived just at suppertime. Of course, Mother Woodchuck asked Polly to stay and of course Polly accepted, but she talked and talked about her neighbors all during the meal. After supper, she said she was too tired to stay to the meeting, so she went right home.

She went to bed early with a bad toothache. But it really was her jaw that ached, because she had been jawing all day long about her neighbors.

All the animals except Polly attended the meeting at Mother Woodchuck's. There, of course, it all came out that Polly Porcupine had said that Mary Muskrat was mean; Minnie Mink was stingy; Carrie Chipmunk was extravagant; Sally Squirrel was inhospitable, and Rena Rabbit was unpleasant. All the animals in Hoppywood were quite indignant. They discussed it at length and finally decided that Polly must be punished.

The next day, Polly felt a little better and started out early to get some provisions. She met Minnie Mink, but Minnie passed by without speaking. As she passed Mary Muskrat's house, she saw Mary out sweeping the porch and called a pleasant greeting to her, but Mary hurried in and slammed the door. Polly was mystified. She went on through Hoppywood, meeting in turn Carrie Chipmunk, Sally Squirrel, and Rena Rabbit, but they passed by quickly without speaking. Polly kept right on to Mother Woodchuck's and told how strangely all her friends had treated her. "Can you wonder at it?" asked Mother Woodchuck, sadly, "when you talked about all of them behind their backs?"

"But it was true," persisted Polly Porcupine.

"Well, Polly Porcupine," said Mother Woodchuck, "Can't you find kind things to say about them? Don't you remember when you were sick last winter how all of your neighbors brought you broth and took care of you?" Polly remembered and hung her head. Finally she brightened: "I will give a party and invite them all," she said.

"But I am afraid they will not come," said Mother Woodchuck, "unless you visit each one of them and make the matter right. They have given you the name Prickly Polly Porcupine, and I am afraid that you deserve it."

Polly went home in deep thought. The next day she went berrying and made lots and lots of wild strawberry jam. Then she hunted choice vegetables, nuts, and roots and made a big kettle of soup; then she baked cakes and cakes and cakes.

The following day, she called on her neighbors again. She told Minnie Mink that she wanted to thank her for bringing over broth when she was sick. She told Mary Muskrat that she was grateful to her for running in so often last winter when she was ailing. She thanked Carrie Chipmunk, Sally Squirrel, and Rena Rabbit for their kindness to her and said she realized now how good all her neighbors were, and she invited them all to a party at her house. They understood that this was her way of apologizing for talking about them, and they all accepted the invitation.

It was a grand party with plenty of good things to eat, and when it was over, the guests went away saying: "How pleasant Polly Porcupine is!" And she never again was called Prickly Polly Porcupine.

When Star Eyes Was Brave

By Jane Ellis Joy

Standing at the door of her little clay-plastered home in the late twilight, Star Eyes could see the blaze of a bonfire through the trees. She smelled roasting chestnuts, and knew from the shouting and laughter she heard that the village boys and girls were having a merry evening at the grove. It was late in October.

Star Eyes was far from happy. Her trouble grew out of a nickname that had been given her by her playmates. To a little Indian girl it seemed the most dreadful nickname ever thought of. It was "Afraid-of-the-Dark." Star Eyes hated it all the more because—oh, the pity and the shame of it!—she was really afraid of the dark.

Loving fun and frolic as much as any one, the continued sounds of merriment from the grove made Star Eyes wish for a share of the pleasure. They were playing a game of "Big Braves." Any one who could leap over a large bowlder in the playground would be entitled to enter the lists of the Big Braves.

Star Eyes believed she could jump over the big stone. Perhaps her nickname would be forgotten if she succeeded. As it was, she was lonely. Her parents and nearly all the people of the village were away attending Great Corn Feast across the river. would not return until the next day. So ing courage, Star Eyes tripped across the joining the noisy group playing aroun bonfire.

Shawnee was standing beside a f torch noting the successful jumpers. Si Wind made the leap over the big stone John Hawkfeather's fall evoked loud lau But Shawnee allowed him a second c when he cleared the bowlder, which prove worthy of a place among the braves.

And now it was Star Eyes' turn. She getting ready to run when Betsy spied "Afraid-of-the-Dark is not brave!" sh Betsy. "Send her home, Shawnee! We want afraid-girls playing with us."

Shawnee was the chief's son, and he h sense of his own importance as well as ideas about fair play. Anyhow, he wa going to take orders from Betsy. Turni Star Eyes, he asked solemnly, "Are you of the dark?"

"Y-e-s," faltered the little girl with lo eyes.

Shawnee frowned.

Sad of heart and much ashamed, Star turned her back on her jeering playmate comforted her a little, however, when Si Wind, following her, whispered a kind in her ear and gave her a scoopful of ro chestnuts.

"I will give the chestnuts to Little Spar thought Star Eyes.

Little Sparrow, a bright little fellow of years, was a kind of baby brother to Eyes. When slighted by playmates o own age on account of her fear of the she often found amusement in the compa Little Sparrow. The little boy loved her. tonight she found baby brother too ill to

"He needs the medicine man,—the do said Netta, the child's mother. "But strong people, with the horses, are away a Corn Feast; and my back hurts so much I carry him."

Star Eyes said nothing. Her mind was with plans. "Shawnee is brave," she tho "Shawnee is not afraid of anything. I tell Shawnee about it. He has a good h He will go."

She hurried back to the grove. But Sha did not fall in with her plans. "My pony a bad foot," he objected, excusing himself. appeal to others brought only shakes of head.

Although Star Eyes could not have what the word "responsibility" meant, knew deep in her heart what the feeling If she didn't go for the doctor, Baby Br would suffer all night. There was no one to go,—no one to go along with her for pany. And the medicine man lived so away. The narrow path down the v would be dark, very dark. "Ah," she tho on, "perhaps the Good Spirit might help!

She looked up at the little new moon ing through the clouds. "Great Good Spi she prayed, "make me brave, because I Little Sparrow."

Directly her back was to the bonfire and was facing the darkness. Somehow the tho of the help she was going to bring the sick ght, hearing no sound except the rattle of y leaves. Tomorrow perhaps Little Sparrow ight be well and smiling. No, the sky was ot brightening, but brightness of another kind as coming into the little girl's heart. Love as making her forget her fear.

The medicine doctor was old. He had not one to the Feast of Corn. Yes, he would see ittle Sparrow. He threw a blanket on the ack of his pony, selected a bunch of dried erbs, and with Star Eyes safely seated at is back, he was soon on his way to Netta's ouse.

Star Eyes stayed with Netta until Little parrow was much better. Then, very happy, he ran home in the darkness. But she was ot afraid now.

The next morning there was a stir in the illage. Could it be true that "Afraid-in-the-ark" had braved the darkness and brought he medicine man to Netta? Boys and girls ho had refused to play with her the evening efore talked it all over seriously, regretfully.
s a result of the talk a troop of them came o see her and make their peace.

Shawnee was first to speak. "Star Eyes, ou are braver than any of us," he began.
When a person who is afraid overcomes the ear, that is being bravest of all. We want you o play with us always."

"I'm sorry I called you Afraid-of-the-Dark," dded Betsy, coming forward shyly. "Will you orgive my bad tongue, and be friendly again?"

"Yes, I feel friendly to you all," smiled Star
yes. "And I'm not afraid of the darkness ny more."

Woman's Board to Meet in Brooklyn

Historic Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, is to pen hospitable doors to delegates and friends attendance at the annual meeting of the Woman's Board of Missions, Nov. 11-13 inclu-ve. All sessions will be held there except the ternoon of the eleventh when Dr. S. Parkes adman is the outstanding speaker, and the oard will meet in Central Church, of which he pastor. It has been many years since the oard has met in New York City, and there reason to think that it will be a popular nd central rallying point. New York State ranch is looking forward to entertaining the oard as a part of its jubilee celebration. The urch is large and there will be ample room r many besides official delegates, so all works and friends will be made welcome. It is ldom that such an array of missionaries, oard officers, popular preachers, and mission-y experts can be brought before a woman's eeting. Opportunity to meet some of the speakers and to mingle with delegates from all over the Atlantic States will be given at the big reception on Wednesday evening. A supper and rally for girls is planned for that afternoon in Clinton Avenue Church.

As to the program, there will, of course, be missionaries from many fields and stations, also foreign students and student volunteers and board officers. The treasurer, Mrs. Frank Gaylord Cook, will bring impressions of her recent visitations in the Orient. Addresses are scheduled from eminent men such as Dr. Cadman and Dr. J. Percival Huget of Brooklyn, and Dr. James L. Barton of the American Board. At the public meeting, on Thursday evening, a treat is promised in the opportunity to hear a distinguished Chinese educator, author, and internationalist, Dr. Ping Wen Kuo of Nanking. Miss Ruth K. Y. Cheng, a professor in Yenching College, Peking, is scheduled for an afternoon session.

Among the missionaries whose names appear on the program are Miss Jean Gordon, Miss Isabella Nugent, India; Miss Olive Greene, Miss Clara Richmond, Miss Mary Riggs, Turkey; Miss Jean Dickinson, Miss Isabelle Phelps, Miss Rena Nutting, China; Miss Ivy Craig, Africa; Miss Florella Pedley, Japan.

Rev. Frederick H. Page, D.D.

By Daniel Evans

When The Congregationalist and the daily papers announced the appointment of Dr. Page to the new office of the presidency of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society, there was a widespread and spontaneous sense of satisfaction. It was felt that the men responsible for the choice had chosen well, and shown real wisdom, and that the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society was to be congratulated in securing such a leader, and his intimate coworkers in the office and in the field were to be felicitated. The only regret felt was for the Waltham Church. He has been the pastor of this church for 19 years, and never was the relation so intimate and strong as at present. The news that rejoiced our hearts saddened the hearts of all his parishioners, but they were magnanimous and were willing to endure this loss in the interests of his larger ministry and usefulness to our churches.

The new office created by the last state conference of our churches has many and large and difficult tasks. It requires all the time, strength, and ability of its holder. The new president is to do more than serve on the board and preside at the public annual meeting; in addition to these duties he will have much to do in the management of the affairs of the society, in correlating the state work and the work done by local societies in the greater cities, in continuing and developing the field work in the care and nurture of the country churches. It is a high office, with great possibilities and much influence.

The man chosen is fitted for the office by ability, training, varied experiences, and pastoral work and character. He was born in Haverhill on Dec. 18, 1860. He early experienced his spiritual awakening and joined the North Church. He attended the schools of the city and in his teens became a reporter, and later one of the editors of the Haverhill Gazette, and subsequently became a reporter and then the financial editor and managing editor of the Boston Commercial Bulletin, from which position after several years' service, he was called to be the leading editorial writer and general editor of the Boston Daily Advertiser. His sound and distinguished work on these papers, especially on financial and public matters, was opening new and large opportunities for his personal advancement and influence; but there came to him the great experience and high desire to give himself to the religious service of preaching the Gospel of his Lord and Master. Andover Hill with its Theological Seminary proved more alluring than State and Washington Streets of Boston. Dr. Tucker's insight and encouragement did much to confirm his determination and secured for him his opportunity to go to Andover. Dr. Page has said of this experience: "One with William Tucker is almost as good as a majority." With twelve years' newspaper work, he began his academic training, and its high quality has been recognized by Dartmouth College in honoring him with the degrees of A.M. and D.D. After finishing his course in the Andover Seminary he was ordained to the Christian ministry and to be the assistant pastor to Dr. Nehemiah Boynton in the Union Church, Boston. Two years later he was called to the Trinity Church in Lawrence which he served for ten years; and then he was called to the Waltham Church, which he has served for 19 years. Each pastoral charge made him richer in experience and more capable as a preacher and pastor, and in his last charge his ministerial friends and his church people observed with pleasure the ascending endeavor, the increasing usefulness and the deepening religious experience. In the Waltham Church, he came into his own. He has been at his very best and has been most effective, respected by all the townspeople and beloved by all his parishioners in whose affections both he and his good and helpful wife have a warm place. He has carried on an educational ministry, giving his people, especially the men's class and the young people's society the benefit of his arduous and constant studies. His preaching has been characterized by its simplicity, directness, warmth, substance and effectiveness. Back of all that he has done, and in and through all his work, there has been a rich and profound Christian experience.

These abilities and qualities have been recognized by and made available to our various denominational societies and institutions. He has served on the board of directors of the Education Society, the Sunday School and Publishing Society, and on various important committees, and as a trustee of Andover Seminary and Wheaton College. He comes to his new position with all this wealth of experience, and disciplined powers of mind and heart. He will be a joy to his associates, and a Godsend to the ministers and lay folk in our missionary churches in following in the apostolic, mystic, and evangelical succession of Dr. Emrich.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

Detroit Activities

Mindful of the rapidly developing spiritual needs of their fast growing city, Detroit Congregationalists are aggressively acquiring more adequate church plants and opening up new work in new residential districts. During the summer one new church was dedicated, the corner stone for two other buildings laid, two churches relocated, one completely redecorated, and a promising new church begun.

On Sunday afternoon, May 25, the Oakwood Church, located in the newly developing industrial region of the River Rouge, dedicated the first unit of its new plant. Built of red brick, light and attractive, with auditorium and dining room, it will be used for the present for church services and general purposes. At the dedication services Rev. Norman Jackson preached a vigorous sermon on "The Flaming Sword." Assisting ministers were Supt. J. W. Sutherland, City Supt. I. W. Stuart, Rev. Francis Ellis, Rev. A. E. MacKenzie, Rev. Percy Jesson, and Rev. R. T. Caldwell. Rev. Charles Wolf, under whose leadership the building was erected, is ably leading the people in their larger opportunity.

On Sunday afternoon, June 7, Boulevard Church laid the corner stone for her new church building. Among those taking part were Dr. G. G. Atkins of First Church, Dr. W. J. Jacobs and Rev. C. H. Lemmon, former pastor, Dr. E. J. Forsythe, moderator of the Detroit Association, and Rev. I. W. Stuart, superintendent of the Detroit Congregational Union. The address of the day was given by Rev. A. J. Mackenzie, who spoke on "Christ, the Corner Stone." It was inspiring and uplifting. The corner stone was laid by the pastor, Rev. F. C. Ellis, assisted by Mr. W. G. Clark of the building committee and Mr. William Monroe, trustee emeritus, who placed the copper box within the stone. The building, which is of brick trimmed with grey stone and of Gothic architecture, will cost $105,000. It will be ready for use about Jan. 1. Boulevard was organized in 1897 and has had but three ministers: Rev. S. F. Blomfield, Dr. W. J. Jacobs, and Rev. F. C. Ellis, who began his pastorate two years ago. The church is looking forward with enthusiasm to the consummation of this new project which, added to her present building, will provide an adequate plant for service in the neighborhood.

Pilgrim Church held its corner stone ceremonies Sunday afternoon, Sept. 6. The principal address was given by Dr. C. B. Emerson of North Church, on "The Ministry of the Church," which set forth forcibly the church as an institution of inspiration, instruction, consolation, redemption, and communion. Others assisting in the service were Dr. G. G. Atkins, Supt. J. W. Sutherland, and Rev. I. W. Stuart, founder of the church. Rev. Thomas Street, pastor, laid the corner stone. All the activities of the church were represented at the ceremony: Sunday School, Woman's Association, Boy Scouts, and Camp-Fire Girls. The edifice when finished will be one of the finest specimens of the colonial type west of New England. It will be of red brick trimmed with white stone, with four white stone pillars and will have a tower of the Sir Christopher Wren design. The congregation expect to dedicate the building early in the new year.

During the summer months the interior of the North Church building was artistically transformed under the direction of Mr. Arthur Jaeger, Detroit artist. The architecture, which is of early English Gothic in which the body of the auditorium is flanked by north and south naves containing large stained glass windows, has been improved by the new treatment of the walls and ceiling. The artist has cleverly suggested with his brush the effect of stone arches framing the windows, stippling the walls with brownish ivory and using for color, old blue and soft red with gold. The ceiling is finished in the same rich colors in panels of oak.

The chancel has been made more beautiful by the painting of the organ screen and the walls on either side. The artist backed the organ screen with red silk and then outlined the carving with blue, red, and gold, carrying the design and the colors to the walls on either side in the form of artistically painted hanging tapestries.

In the baptistry, the white marble font is placed against a background of deftly painted blue and silver mosaics. To the right of the baptistry over the door leading to the church house has been placed a mural design depicting Christ and the little children, suggestive of the educational work.

Brass lanterns, with softly glowing amber glass, suspended from the ceiling, and the rich red velour floor covering, produce unusual color, warmth, and light.

The organ, a gift of the Ferry family in memory of their parents, is being rebuilt and enlarged and will be ready for use Nov. 1.

The adjoining church house has been entirely redecorated and recarpeted. Thus North Church, which has progressed splendidly and steadily under the leadership of Dr. C. B. Emerson, now possesses one of the most beautiful and worshipful church edifices in the city.

After 37 years of service in a neighborhood that has changed to a non-Protestant population, Mt. Hope Church has located in the neighborhood of its present constituency by uniting forces with the recently organized People's Tabernacle Congregational Church in the growing northeast section of the city. The new alignment, strengthening the numbers and financial resources of Congregationalism in that section, will permit of a development of church plant and program that will adequately meet the needs of the community. The new enterprise will continue under the leadership of Rev. P. C. Jesson, the efficient pastor of Mt. Hope for the past five years.

One of the outstanding pieces of church work in the city has been recently accomplished by the Armenian Church. This group of 100 members, organized only three years ago under the leadership of Rev. Y. K. Rushdoony has just purchased a lot and church building for $40,000 in a good residential district. This small group alone subscribed $18,000 in a few days, of which $10,000 has already been paid. They have developed a most aggressive church life and are eagerly anticipating larger developments. The dedication will be Nov. 1.

Rosedale Park, a newly developing section of the city, has felt the quickening touch of Detroit Congregationalism. After three months of surveying and part time pastoral oversight under the direction of Supt. Stuart, 250 pro-he church at Sutton, Mass., heartily joined the pastor, Rev. Orren D. Fisher, on Oct. recognition of his completion of 50 years' sterial service. This church has not only useful pastors, including David Hall and und Mills, whose pastorates covered jointly years (1729-1825), but is the honored ier of two ministerial sons: Prof. F. A. bard, Japan, and Rev. H. E. Lombard, re- y of Webster. Delegations from North ington and South Windsor, Ct., former orates, were present, bearing gifts from ches and individuals, the latter church also mbering Mrs. Fisher. Letters were read Maverick, East Boston, Toledo, and other s of his well-remembered ministry. The cipal address was upon "The Pastor's Half ury," by Dr. Charles L. Morgan, of Bel- , a classmate at Yale Divinity, who has just rated his own 50 years in the ministry. Stanley Ross Fisher, of Wellesley, a son, esented the family in congratulatory and eciative vein. Mrs. S. R. Fisher contrib- appropriate songs. True to its reputation ospitality, the Sutton Church entertained ge number of friends and presented Mr. Mrs. Fisher with a substantial check.

Idaho Conference Session

The Idaho Conference of Congregational Churches and Ministers met at First Church, Boise, Sept. 30 to Oct. 1, Rev. W. T. Lockwood, pastor of First Church, serving as moderator. The conference was given over largely to the discussion of Idaho problems: benevolences, summer conferences, young people's work, and the work at large in the state. The optimistic note predominated in spite of the fact that the past few unprofitable years for agriculturists have brought on difficult days for a number of our churches.

The outstanding event of the conference was the ordination of Rev. Thomas McCommant, newly elected pastor of Wright Church. Mr. McCommant is a recent graduate of Union Seminary, and is a graduate of Princeton University as well. His examination and the ordination service which followed made a deep impression upon all.

An address by Supt. C. H. Harrison, preceded by a fellowship banquet, with Rev. George Fowler as toastmaster, closed the conference. Rev. A. S. Ford of McCall is the newly elected moderator. The happiest sign of progress in the Idaho Conference is found in the more aggressive type of leaders which is being developed. C. F. B.

Berkeley Church Enters New Building

First Church, Berkeley, entered its new building the last Sunday in August, and has carried out a four weeks' program of dedicatory and semi-centenary services. The church entered recently its 51st year, and now has a membership of 1,060. It ranks as the seventh of the Congregational churches on the Pacific Coast having memberships exceeding 1,000. In its contributions to the denominational benevolence apportionment it ranks as the fourth. The building just completed is the first unit of a structure which will cost not less than $275,000. An educational wing and a ch are yet to be built.

The first unit, an auditorium merely, wit seating capacity of 1,250, has required an penditure of $167,000. It plants and perp ates on the Pacific Coast the early New l land type of church architecture—with a necessary modifications.

The new building was dedicated Sept. the following evening there was one of most significant of the series of services, theme being, "Religion's Allies Toward New Day" (The kings of the earth do b their glory and honor into it). President bur of Stanford University spoke on "Edu tion"; President Campbell of the Univer of California, on "Science"; the Hon. C ter H. Rowell, one of the University gents, on "Democracy and Internationalis The first Sunday evening Chancellor Da Starr Jordan of Stanford spoke on "Lig and Shades of Fifty Years." The hist of the church has been written by Dr. W. Ferrier, a member for many years. P John Wright Buckham of the Pacific Sch of Religion wrote an anniversary hymn wh was sung at the dedication service. One S day in this four weeks' program was given "Childhood and Youth," Dr. McCall speak on "Youth's Demand for a New Earth" Dr. Fisher directing a pageant enti "Through the Ages." On the culminating S days in this program, the 20th and the 2 Dr. Raymond C. Brooks, a former pas preached one of the sermons. Dr. McC subjects on the 20th were "Jesus Christ Same Yesterday, Today, and Forever," "The Past is Carried with Us." On that S day the people were given an opportunity pass by the altar and lay on it the gifts, in c or in pledges, which they had it in their he to make—as they did two and a half years when more than $100,000 was contributed.

On the first Communion service in the building, 95 members were received, mak the day a memorable one, not only in the tory of the church but in the lives of those have identified themselves with its activit The pastor, Dr. O. W. S. McCall, has welco 446 persons into membership since he began pastorate in January, 1922. The coming Dr. Miles B. Fisher, in August, 1923, as a ciate pastor and director of religious educat gave the church the two leaders required the work it is called to do in this educatio center—on its commanding site only two blo from the campus of the University of Cali nia, which has had for several years the lar attendance of the universities in the Uni States.

First Church is sending its pastor, Dr. Call, to the National Council at Washing the church financing this trip.

During 1897-98 he was Latin lecturer in Knox College and graduated from Knox Theological Seminary in 1898, later studying for two years at Halle and Berlin, and graduating from the former in 1900. He was special lecturer in itoba College in Hebrew and Old Testa- literature for some years while serving in astorate, and was pastor of the Augustine byterian Church, Winnipeg, from 1900-15. ng this time the church grew from 125 bers to 1,450, and a $200,000 building was ed. From 1915-17 he was pastor of the Park Presbyterian Church, Toronto, which greatly under his leadership and rebuilt hurch edifice.

1917 Mr. Wilson came to New First ch, Chicago, and during his eight years' orate there the floating debt has been paid he church and chapel repaired at a cost of 00, and a $15,000 parsonage purchased. The church has also secured its summer camp at Bridgman, Mich., into which it has put about $32,000. The endowment funds have been increased by practically $100,000. The great work carried on by the church in music through its many choirs, and its ministry to the community through its institution have been kept at high tide. A residence for young women has been organized and developed. In this period the transition at New First from a family to a metropolitan church has steadily gone forward. The gospel preaching of Dr. Wilson and the conscientious pastoral work have made it possible for the church to pass through this difficult change without its work being injured.

The Park Manor Church has just dedicated a new parish house and will develop at once a community program under Dr. Wilson. The church is situated in a fast growing community and offers a great challenge to both church and pastor. The new pastorate has begun with enthusiasm and optimism on the part of people and minister.

On Oct. 14 the Ledyard Church celebrat its 200th birthday, with appropriate servic beginning at ten in the forenoon and contin ing until late in the afternoon. The wom furnished a delightful lunch at noon in t Grange Hall. An historical address by Deac B. T. Avery, one by the pastor, Rev. G. F. Goo enough, on the first century of struggle, a an address on the second century of pro ress by Rev. W. F. White, a former pastc occupied the morning.

In the afternoon were given an historic paper by Rev. Allen S. Bush, and a visi of the future by Judge B. F. Crandall. Gree ings from the mother church in New Londo and from the Congregational Church in Grote were presented by Rev. J. R. Danforth a Dr. Henry W. Hulbert; and the rector of t Episcopal Church in Poquetannuck, Re T. M. Ockford, added to the historical revie of colonial days.

The early history of this church is in clo connection with the first efforts of the for fathers. The first pastor was Samuel Seabur and his son, Bishop Samuel Seabury, born 1729, was the first bishop of the Episcop Church in America. Silas Deane, of Revoli tionary fame, was born in this parish, an from this town of Ledyard, under the infl ence of this church, 11 ministers have bee

Boston Ministers' Meetings

The Boston Monday Ministers' Meeting began its services Sept. 28. Dr. C. L. Morgan of Belmont is president this year, and Rev. Horace Holton of Brockton is chairman of the program committee. The first speaker was Secretary Burton, who spoke on the proposed merger. Dr. Burton by a blackboard diagram showed graphically the complications incurred in making contacts between the various societies on the one hand and the local church and the individual average layman on the other in performing the promotional work of the National Council. The object of the proposed merger is to seek a more direct approach.

On Oct. 5, Elbert A. Harvey, one of the Eastern members of the Committee of Twelve, a Boston business man, spoke of the history of the merger. It has been discussed and advocated in every National Council, he said. We have been gradually approaching it and planning for it many years. One board on the foreign field and one at home will greatly simplify the great work of the denomination. At the same session Secretary Cady, of the A. M. A., spoke of some considerations against the two board plan. He believes in simplicity, but five boards constitute the ultimate simplicity without destroying specialization. Simplicity ought to improve the missions, decrease the expenses of operation, and increase the income. We have reached the limit of pamphleteering but we have not reached the limit of personalization. To be desirable a plan should humanize and spiritualize our missionary work.

HYMNS for the LIVING AGE

Edited by H. AUGUSTINE SMITH
Director of Fine Arts in Religion, Boston University
Director of Music, Chautauqua, N. Y.

Important features of this book:

All words are between the staffs, making it possible to read and sing with ease.
The reinforced binding protects the book against the hard, if devout usage of over-zealous members of the choir.
The responsive readings, which mark a new epoch in Biblical literature for public worship are in the front pages where they can be used without throwing the book out of balance.
The index, which is so rarely used, is in the back of the book.
The musical settings constitute a rich and varied feast throughout and are fitted to the text with great care.
The music is within the range of the average voice and creates no unwilling sopranos and bassos.
No section of the book is over-populated; there are a number of social service hymns, but not at the expense of hymns of devotion.

The price of HYMNS FOR THE LIVING AGE is $1.75. The introductory rate is $1.35 with transportation additional, from New York or Chicago.

Haverhill's Colored Church

Zion Church, Haverhill, which ministers to colored people, has been making progress under the leadership of its new minister, Rev. S. J. Martin. The outside of the house of worship has been painted, and a new roof put on. A community center has been opened. It has five departments: domestic science, arts and crafts, dramatic art, music, religious education. Space in the church building has been fitted up for carrying on the work. It is well equipped, having club rooms, games, a loan library, radio, and other interesting features. A paid worker is in charge.

Ordain Director of Religious Education at Old South, Worcester

Hugh C. Leggat, after two years' successful work as director of religious education and young people's work at First (Old South), Worcester, was ordained at a special meeting of the advisory council of Worcester Central Association of Churches, Oct. 8. Mr. Leggat was born in 1880 at Barr Head, Renfrewshire, Scotland, of Presbyterian ancestry, and came to this country in 1893 to make his home in Pawtucket, R. I. In an interesting statement of experience he gave the date of his conversion as 1897 and the place as Weeden Street Congregational Church in Pawtucket, later joining the First Congregational Church of that city. From teaching in the church school and work among young people he went in 1901 to Y. M. C. A. work in Everett and Lynn, and since that time, until called to Old South, he has had wide experience in "Y" and Sunday school work in places covering a wide area, and including Worcester, Mass., Alabama, Alberta, Manitoba, Oklahoma, Milford, Mass., where he was a general secretary, Westchester County, N. Y., and later in Worcester as superintendent of Bethel Mission. At some of these places his special interest was in boys' work under the Y. M. C. A. He was called to his present work from an acting pastorate at Quinsigamond Baptist Church, Worcester. In addition to professionally directed private study he has had training at the Revere Bible College and the Springfield International College. Mr. Leggat is married and has four children.

VERMONT

Anniversary and Dedication at Bellows Falls

First Church, Bellows Falls, celebrated the 75th anniversary of its organization Oct. 11, with an interesting program during the day. In the evening a large audience gathered to attend the unveiling and dedication of a beautiful memorial window perpetuating the remembrance of Deacon Charles Wesley Osgood, for many years a deacon of the church, and for over 50 years a notably successful teacher of a Bible class connected with the church.

The morning program was a long and interesting one, interspersed with instrumental and vocal music, and the anniversary sermon was by Rev. Chauncey C. Adams, D.D., of Burlington, Vt., who as a boy and young man was a member of the church and looks back upon its influences as largely having molded his aspirations which have resulted in his becoming one of the leading and honored pastors of New England. He was one of a coterie of young men who under the influences of the pastorates of Rev. A. B. Dascomb, (1879-1890) and Rev. J. E. Fullerton (1891-1897), were led into the ministry. The others were Rev. Charles Ernest White, now an assistant secretary of the American Board; Rev. Rodney W. Roundy, formerly secretary of the American Missionary Association, now pastor at Laconia, N. H., and Rev. Harry N. Dascomb, who died about a year ago.

At the evening service a fitting acknowledgment of the services of Deacon Charles Wesley Osgood was unveiled, presented by former members of his Bible class and members of his family. Deacon Osgood in 1871 gathered a class of young men—later a mixed class—and devoted his energies to them, resulting in over 50 years of loving service with them. On member of the original class is still living, an is a deacon of the church. Two other mem bers are living but not residing in Bellow Falls.

At the dedication service Rev. B. E. Marsh the present pastor, reviewed the church's his tory from 1850 to the present time. The me morial window was presented to the churc by L. S. Hayes, for over 40 years a membe of the Bible class, and it was accepted in be half of the church by Judge W. A. Graham of the Superior Court of Vermont. An ad dress of dedication was delivered by Rev. Arthur Peabody Pratt, D.D., of Greenfield Mass., a former pastor. There have been 1 pastors since the organization of the church

DWIGHT PAYSON BREED

ight Payson Breed, son of Rev. Samuel for many years a pastor in Michigan,
Iowa, and Illinois, died at his home in Chicago, Oct. 7, 1925. Dr. Breed was born in Chelsea, Mich., June 10, 1851. He was educated in the public schools of his native state, and in Wesleyan University and Oberlin Seminary. He held pastorates in the following places: Utica, Oxford, Eaton Rapids, Portland, Reed City, and Wyandotte, Mich., Michigan City, Ind., Creston, Ia., and for four years was pastor of the Summerdale Church, Chicago. When his health failed four years ago he was elected pastor emeritus, which relationship he held until his death.

For seven years Dr. Breed was general missionary of the Iowa Home Missionary Society, and for nine years served Grinnell College as field secretary. His educational activities brought him the degree of Doctor of Philosophy and the honorary degree of D.D. He served the denomination as moderator of state conferences, as trustee of two Congregational colleges, and in many other relationships.

In 1873 he married Delina M. Briggs, who was his faithful, efficient, and beloved helper for more than 52 years. To them were born four children: Reuben L., who died in 1920; Dwight E., secretary of the Texas Public Health Association; Noel J., an instructor in the University of California, and a daughter Clara, who died many years ago.

Dr. Breed suffered in 1920 with several slight strokes of paralysis which greatly limited his freedom of movement, but he clung to such forms

ISAAC H. MORSE

No Congregational layman in the West has given more of his time and energy to the upbuilding of our work than Isaac H. Morse, who died on Sept. 15, in his 78th year.

Mr. Morse was engaged in active business until middle life and was one of the founders of the California Packing Association. A break in health made retirement from business essential and aside from various trips abroad, much of his thought during the remainder of his life was of Christian work and of our denomination in particular. He served as an officer of the Northern California Conference for many years and our leaders have always turned to him for counsel and advice. A member of the First Church of San Francisco since 1868 and a deacon since 1884, Mr. Morse served with seven pastors.

Following the fire of 1906 he was active in restoring the shattered building and led in the movement which resulted in the construction of the present edifice. Surely his leadership and advice will be sorely missed by all our people.

His decease follows that of his wife by only a few weeks. His will has provided in memory of her a property of $150,000 for Mills College. Among other bequests $10,000 was provided for First Church, San Francisco, $5,000 for the American Board, and $5,000 for the California Home Missionary Society. Recently a considerable sum was also given for the improvement of the First Church organ.

Funeral services were held Sept. 18 in the church he loved so well. Words of appreciation were spoken by several of our Congregational clergy. We may well quote from a tribute by Dr. Gordon: "The proportions of his personality were four-square and a spiritual crown of glory rested upon all."

M. D. TIBBETTS

Manly Day Tibbetts, son of Rev. and Mrs. D. D. Tibbetts, was born Oct. 10, 1896, at Miles, Jackson County, Iowa, and died at Maxwell, Ia., Sept. 20, 1925, at the age of 28 years, 11 months, and 10 days.

The deceased's father, being a minister, found it necessary to establish their home in different cities as follows: Miles, Central City, Lewis, Sawyer, Eldon, and Fairfield, all in the state of Iowa; Gilbert, Minn., and Shirland, Ill.

Mr. Tibbetts graduated from the high school at Gilbert, Minn., June, 1914, then entered Iowa State College at Ames and graduated in 1919. In August, 1919, he sailed to Asia Minor as agricultural teacher at Tarsus, Turkey, returning to the United States in June, 1920.

Since returning home he farmed for two years and the remainder of that time Mr. Tibbetts taught agriculture in the schools at Tipton, Ia., from 1920 to 1922, and at Maxwell, Ia., 1924 to 1925, when the whole community was greatly saddened by his untimely death.

On July 27, 1921, he was married to Miss Inez Jackson, of Stevens Point, Wis. To this happy union were born two children, Hazel Grace and Robert Lawrence. Mr. Tibbetts being a minister's son received his training in the parsonage and until the last exemplified that teaching and faith in word, deed, and action. He was a true Christian, a loyal member of the church, and a man among men, thus winning for himself the respect and love of the entire community.

Besides his companion and two children, he leaves to mourn his departure his mother, Mrs. Tibbetts, Shirland, Ill.; two brothers, Keim, superintendent of schools at Gilbert, Minn., and Dr. Mark, of Duluth, Minn.; one sister, Mrs. S. M. Savage, Shirland, Ill., and many other relatives and a host of friends.

Funeral services were held Tuesday at the Presbyterian Church, conducted by Rev. H. D. Robinson, assisted by Rev. H. K. Hawley, of Ames. The body was taken Tuesday evening to Stevens Point, Wis., where interment was held Wednesday.

Between Black and White

By REV. HENRY HUGH PROCTOR, D.D.

Pastor of the Nazarene Congregational Church, Brooklyn, New York

With an Introduction by Rev. Samuel Parkes Cadman, D.D.

President of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America

"'Between Black and White' is the remarkable story of a remarkable career. Henry Hugh Proctor is one of the outstanding leaders of the colored people who have risen from obscurity, making all obstacles the stepping stones to success. From a backwoods cabin in Tennessee he has followed the gleam which led through education and self-development to notable service for his people and the Kingdom of God. This autobiography is a stirring, dramatic narrative, which shows but does not stress the struggle involved in the advancement of the Negro, and it clearly and fairly interprets the race problem. The book reveals Dr. Proctor's irresistible good cheer, his resolute purpose and his constant faith."

This book throws much light on the migratory movement of the Negro people. Incidentally, some sidelights are reflected on the greater world problem of color. Price, $1.50

Books for Study and Discussion on World Race Problems

And Who Is My Neighbor?

An Outline for the Study of Race Relations in America

This study outline is the answer to a growing demand for aids to clearer vision; it is not an answer to the problem put in the title. It merely puts together stories of happenings, big and little, as told by observant men and women in different parts of the country, which to their minds contain problems for moral conduct; and with these stories a few suggestions, largely in the form of questions, of ways to get at the real problems they contain. The Bible and the religious literature of all times have to be studied anew before we can be sure that our attitudes to "neighbors" in the widest sense represent a really consistent moral philosophy and not merely spasmodic and even contradictory sentiments. Cloth, $1.00; Paper, 75 cents.

The Trend of the Races

GEORGE E. HAYNES

This book is a thoughtful attempt to show the relations between the White and Negro races and to indicate maladjustments and their remedies. The author is a Negro leader who has rendered distinguished service in interracial co-operation and who has the confidence of his colleagues in both races.

Cloth, 75 cents; Paper, 50 cents.

The Clash of Color

BASIL MATHEWS

Written in the interesting style which makes all of Mr. Mathews' books popular, this study of the world race problems is bound to prove very useful in church classes of all sorts. Undoubtedly the best presentation of the subject in popular style. Contains specific treatment of the race problems of the Pacific Basin, India and Africa.

Cloth, $1.25; Paper, 75 cents.

Of One Blood

A Short Study of the Race Problem

ROBERT E. SPEER

This is a basic study of the world-wide problems of race and a treatment of American race issues against the background of world movements. Few people know the races of the world as well as Dr. Speer, who, although Secretary of a Foreign Mission Board, was selected to write this home mission book because it was felt that only a man with exceptional vision and world knowledge could properly prepare such a volume. He has produced a scholarly treatise, full of authoritative material and challenging in its point of view. A book for those who want the best.

Cloth, 75 cents; Paper, 50 cents.

F. J. Harwood As Moderator

THE election of F. J. Harwood, of Appleton, Wis., brings to a place of official leadership during the next o years a layman of deep enthusiasms and of high ility, greatly honored in his community and in his n state. No man, minister or layman, has taken a re eager or active interest in the life and progress the Congregational churches in his environment, and . Harwood has also had active service and experience the affairs of nation-wide Congregationalism as rep- ented in the Council and in our various societies. His ticular interest has been manifest in the church school l in the winning and holding of the young for the urch. As a man among men he has done much in his n church and in the neighboring churches of Wis- sin to stimulate a more intelligent and active partici- ion of man in the whole work of the church. He has ved on teams willing to go out on call to quicken such erest in the churches. He has emphasized the im- tance of such visitation both in the group of churches l in the local church. He has urged, and by example phasized, the importance for pure fellowship and ristian social appeal of some such thing as an every mber canvass with no financial end in view—in addi- n to that in behalf of the budget—and he is, we be- e, the author of the slogan, expressive of the value such social appeal: A Call without a Haul. All things sidered, the Council has made a wise choice. Noth- ing but the strong feeling that this ought to be a lay- man's period in the moderatorship could have led the Council to pass over two such distinguished and able servants of the churches as Dr. Dan F. Bradley and Dr. Charles S. Mills, both of whom were nominated. The large vote polled by each was a striking tribute to worth, ability, and character, but it was a gracious moment, typ- ical of our fellowship, when, on the announcing of the result of the first ballot, Dr. Bradley moved, seconded by Dr. Mills, that the election of Mr. Harwood be made unanimous, Mr. Harwood having led on the ballot but not having secured a majority of the votes cast. The Council immediately concurred and Moderator Potter declared Mr. Harwood his successor.

Was It a Young Men's Council?

FEW comments have been more commonly heard in the closing days of the National Council at Washington than that to the effect that it was a "young men's Council." On the part of some this comment has been intended as an expression of satisfaction, hope, and commendation; on the part of others it has implied a criticism of the Council's action as immature, hasty, and impetuous, if not in some respects ill-considered and ill-advised. The whole matter is worth some rather careful reflection and analysis.

That youth was more evident in the personnel, discussions, and activities of the Council than in any such gathering in former years seems to us unquestionable. That youth supplied in an unwonted degree the impulse and motive power of the Council seemed equally true. But that the action of the Council was dominated and determined by its younger element seems to us a proposition that will not stand the light of investigation.

The Council's discussions and decisions were concerned with two essential and outstanding matters—the organizational merger and the proposed statement of social ideals. In relation to neither of these matters could it be said that young men, though conspicuous in the discussions, were pre-eminently in the leadership. Not only did the voting power of the Council, so far as we could observe, lie largely with men of middle age, but in the advocacy of policies that commended themselves to most of the younger group, men of ripe age and mature experience were as much in evidence in leadership as the young.

It is, perhaps, a delicate and dangerous business to suggest that anybody is "old" who is young in spirit and enthusiasm, but we venture the opinion that the Committee of Twelve, upon whose report the organizational merger was based, contained no member really young in years, and that the average age of its members would probably hover around a figure suggestive of, at least, late middle age. Similarly the report upon which the Statement of Social Ideals was based came from a Commission the list of whose names we have carefully examined and whose average age, without exact data as to birthdays, we should place on a conservative estimate at about fifty. The report was ably championed on the floor of the Council by the Chairman of the Commission, Mr. John Calder, whose thirty years of experience as an engineer, and in the management of large business enterprises and industrial relations, suggest not only maturity of outlook but maturity of years. Moreover, no more impassioned plea was addressed to the Council to adopt the Statement of Social Ideals than that of Mr. Roger W. Babson, the well-known statistician, who will hardly be accused of immaturity either in years or experience. The fact of the matter is that not only was the average age of those who discussed and voted upon the proposals before the Council fairly high—we should say middle age or beyond—but it is exceedingly doubtful whether any man took part in the discussion and voting who was younger than the Master was at the age when he gave to the world the teaching, the applications of which were under consideration.

Let us say, if we will, that the action of the Council, in any respect, was wise or unwise, justifiable or unjustifiable, but let us beware of suggesting anything that implies any imputation against either youth or age. It would be unfortunate if the National Council, which has known neither color line nor racial line, should develop any consciousness of an age line. Let the action of the Council in so far as it develops further discussion be considered on its merits. Whatever its virtues or faults, it represents the action of both old and young, and predominantly of men and women of middle age. If the younger men, and especially younger ministers, are becoming increasingly conspicuous in the Council let the churches realize that this situation, whatever its advantages or disadvantages, arises from the strong preference that many churches have shown for young men in the pastorate. If we are getting too much youth in our nominational councils—an assumption that we do accept—those who criticize youth must change the p alent attitude toward age in the ministry. Churches not, in calling pastors, go upon the assumption that isters are "too old at fifty"—as one church brutally formed a candidate—and then expect that age shall do nate in denominational councils. None the less we pudiate the idea that in the Washington Council yo had anything more than its just and desirable share the proceedings and decisions.

"Omaha is the flivver-center of Congregationalism the United States," said L. Wendell Fifield in second the claims of Omaha to the next Council. Archaeological Discoveries

THE saying of an eminent archaeologist, "We have up Homer, we shall yet dig up the Bible," see destined for fulfillment. Discoveries of the greatest port have been made in recent years and to these h now been added the deciphering by Prof. Grimme, of chair of Semitic Philology at the University of Munster a tablet celebrating Moses' rescue from the bulrush and incidentally revealing the alphabet of ancient brew as it was spoken fifteen hundred years before Chr The stone inscriptions now deciphered by Prof. Grim were excavated at Mount Sinai by an English archaeo gist twenty years ago, and it is now announced that view of Prof. Grimme's work the German Governme may combine with the British Government in sending scientific expedition to make further explorations Mount Sinai.

The message of gratitude deciphered by Prof. Grim reads as follows:

I, Manasse Mountain chief and head priest of t temple thank Pharoah Hiachepsut for having drawn out of the Nile and helped me to attain high digniti

Manasse, it is stated, is a synonym for Moses in t Hebrew of that epoch. This tablet of gratitude is o of various inscriptions which are assigned to a date abo 1479 B. C. Archaeological discoveries have been in ge eral rather wildly over-exploited and their significan exaggerated unduly in the public press, but it looks if Prof. Grimme has not only made an important d covery concerning the period of Moses, but has also stim lated further investigation that may produce mu more accurate knowledge regarding the great liberat and law-giver, and the times and conditions under whi he led his people.

One of the distinct hits of the Council was in Bish McConnell's remark that "the best balanced man son times shrieks." The Bishop had a pat illustration the picture of the "sane," "restrained," "well-balance man coming to inform his neighbor quietly and with cent propriety that the latter's house was on fire. is no sign of lack of balance that social conflagratio rouse a man to intensity in speech and action.

An Exhortation to Tolerance

THE concluding exhortation in the lectures on Tolerance, by Phillips Brooks, to which extensive editorial reference was recently made is so noteworthy that we take the liberty of reproducing it. While it was addressed primarily to divinity students, its application can readily be made by all. Bishop Brooks said (Tolerance, by Phillips Brooks, published by Dutton, page 10):

My friends, be more afraid of the littleness than of the largeness of life. Let that be your rule about your people when you come to be their minister.

Never let yourself think, and never allow them to think, that mere intolerance upon their part, mere bitterness against those who differ from them or from their church, is faith.

Never discourage them from thinking. If they are thinking wrong, do not try to stop their thinking, but teach them to think right.

Never doubt their capacity for the best faith, the profoundest experience, the largest liberty.

And for yourself, let the same rule be master. Be more afraid of the littleness than of the largeness of life. Seek with study and with prayer for the most clear and confident convictions; and when you have won them, hold them so largely and vitally that they shall be to you, not the walls which separate you from your brethren who have other convictions than yours, but the medium through which you enter into understanding of and sympathy with them, as the ocean, which once was the barrier between nations, is now the highway for their never-resting ships, and makes the whole world one.

This is true tolerance. Into a deeper and deeper abundance of that tolerance may our Master lead all of us whom he has called to be his minister!

Construction in Ideals and Organization

The Note of the Council at the Capital

THOUGH coming late into American Congregationalism the Editor of The Congregationalist has, by virtue of circumstances, been privileged to attend the entire sessions of most of the National Council gatherings during the last eighteen years. Of the five Councils comprised in this personal experience the Washington Council is by all means the most difficult to characterize and describe.

The Cleveland Council of 1907 was characterized by Independence. After threshing out from many angles the question of union with certain other bodies, and the issues between liberalism and conservatism theologically, the Council settled down into a willingness of Congregationalists to be themselves—a decision that at that time symbolized, for individual and fellowship, the sense of a distinctive call and purpose. After a lapse of twelve years renewed personal acquaintance with the Council revealed at Grand Rapids a very different situation. The plane and atmosphere of discussion and controversy had altered—and altered for the better. The dominant note of the Grand Rapids Council of 1919 was Expansiveness. It was a Council ready for anything, but somewhat impatient of too much consideration of ways or means. In 1921 the situation had changed again at Los Angeles. The spirit of that gathering was not of retrenchment, but that of getting down to facts and situations. Reality was its characteristic emphasis.

In Springfield, two years later, Unity and Spirituality marked the meeting. One felt throughout that Council the quest and expression of a unified spiritual consciousness of the Congregational fellowship in the presence of the problems of social life and personal faith.

The Washington Council does not fall so readily under the characterization of some apt word or phrase. In a sense it has proven the logical successor of the Springfield gathering. The sense of a unified Christian public and social consciousness developed in that Council had still to find direction and application. The Washington Council, if emphasizing the spiritual backgrounds, was more concerned with the bringing of these into relation to the foregrounds of life and action. Construction is perhaps the word that most adequately describes the present Council's activity and purpose, though it does not adequately describe its spirit.

Organizational Construction

It was inevitable that much of the life of this Council should be occupied by discussion of construction in the realm of organization. This is not the place to appraise either the nature or results of the proposals brought before the Council by the Committee of Twelve. Regarding both their report, and the action upon it, there will continue to be wide differences of opinion. Action that calls for extreme reconstruction of existing organization, despite the fairness of debate, will always be subject to the charge of hastiness and lack of consideration, but the settlement of the merger issues early in the Council was evidently due not to any lack of willingness to debate the issue, but to the fact that the majority of the Council were decided upon the value of greater simplification of organization. The decision implied no reflection upon the spirit and manner in which the various Boards and Societies have hitherto rendered their service. Whether the Council's action upon the merger question was wise or unwise, we believe that in the minds of the vast majority of voting delegates it was inspired by an impartial, unprejudiced belief in the value of merger and simplification, in the fact that the proposals of the Committee of Twelve made practically for the right goal, and that the time had come to take such a step somewhat decisively. We express this conviction in spite of a feeling that the ends sought might have been better served had Dr. Atkins' amendment to the Report of the Committee prevailed. But time only will tell. The action of the Council was after fair debate, and it seems to us the duty of all to accept it loyally and to unite in doing all that is possible to give it full effect.

Theological Construction Largely Quiescent

Construction in the theological realm assumed a very secondary place in this Council, and indicated that in the freedom and variety of its life the Congregational fellowship has attained a breadth and simplicity of religious life in which there is little place for controversy and conflict over critical questions and theological formulæ. As revealed, at least in the Congregational Council, the Congregational fellowship is Christo-centric as never before. Though we may not hear, heed, or understand the clear call of Christ, there is a recognition that that call is the supreme thing in the life of a Christian church, and that to hear it, to understand it, and to obey it, is the mark alike of spiritual achievement and of practical service.

Such theological construction as appeared in the Council was largely in the nature of a return to and emphasis upon the simple elemental verities of the Christian religion, and of the Pilgrim faith as our form of its interpretation. This appeared conspicuously in the strong opening note of Dr. Carter's address at the first session, in the retiring moderator's address, in the Council sermon, in Dean Brown's plain, practical plea for the vital as distinguished from the trivial, and in Dr. Lichliter's impassioned advocacy of a simple Gospel as adequate, and necessary, for every social and extended application. It was evident likewise in other addresses from the platform and in the debates upon the floor.

We had ourselves expressed the hope that the dominant note of the Council would be that of a clear, unequivocal witness of a simple faith. If there had been collusion between The Congregationalist and the principal speakers of the Council matters could hardly have been better arranged and adjusted toward that end. If the Council's proceedings have had at all adequate and faithful report in the public press we cannot see how the nation can have missed the pre-eminent fact that Congregationalists are banded together in the simplicity of free alliance to the elemental spiritual facts and principles that distinguish the life and teaching of Jesus of Nazareth from the elaborate systems of organization and theology that have sought to attach to themselves the sanction and sanctity of his Name.

Construction in Social Applications

Allied with this witness of a simple faith was the effort to express its implications and applications in the wide realm of practical life in all its personal, social, inter-racial, and international relationships. This appeared in the large place given in the Council to the discussion of the Statement of Social Ideals as presented by the Commission on Social Relations. While we cannot assume that our own comment upon the proposed Social Creed had influence in leading the commission to abandon that particular terminology in its report, we believe that the committee acted wisely in eliminating the word Creed and in substituting for it the word Ideals.

Though an elaborate statement of five sections with about forty sub-headings in all, this Statement of Social Ideals will be found to rest upon the basis of a very simple faith and witness. It is an effort to discover and state in relation to the varied and complex life of our modern world what it means to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with God. It is expressive of a Christian inquiry—not an effort to adapt the Christian spirit and message to the ways of the world, but an effort to discover the changes in man and in the ideals, systems, and environments of life that must be effecte if the world is to be brought under the dominating powe of the redemptive love of God, as expressed in the lif of Jesus, in his work of salvation, and in his teachin regarding brotherhood and service.

One cannot regard this Statement of Ideals as neces sarily final or authoritative, but its formulation an adoption witness to the world the fact that Congrega tionalists are not mere sectarians or theorists, followin a religion that is vague, ineffectual, and up in the air but that on the contrary they are aroused to the vita need of considering earnestly and conscientiously th meaning and application of the religion they profess If the life of love toward men and of loyalty to Chris means for any man more than is expressed in this State ment of Ideals the spirit of this Statement is itself a exhortation to express life in these higher meanings. I the phraseology in any way misinterprets or inade quately expresses the fullness of Christ there is no pur pose thereby to limit or restrain the exercise of Christia mind and conscience. It is futile to expect that the ma jority adoption of this Statement of Ideals will neces sarily alter the convictions of those who expressed upo certain matters a minority judgment. The significan thing is that in relation to nine-tenths, if not more, o the matters in this Statement the verdict of the Counci was unanimous, and that in relation to the rest th Statement goes forth as the expression of a strong ma jority.

An Invitation to Discussion

It is sent forth to the churches in the hope that i will stimulate in our fellowship at large the same sor of inquiry and discussion that it quickened in the Cour cil itself, and though we predict that ultimately th Church will come in the matter of social "creeds" an ideals back to the simple, all-inclusive principles that i the theological realm have indicated a step forward fro historical elaborations, it must be evident that this re turn can be of value only when we have traversed th whole ground of life and conduct. There is no discre ancy between this elaborate Statement, and the simplicit of faith in those who have earnestly sought to thin through the whole problem of divine purpose and huma destiny. It should be remembered that it is only th artist who has thoroughly mastered the materials an details of his craft who is privileged to achieve the nobl simplicity of a great work. If it be found ultimatel that the sure and true foundations of an ideal Christia society are simple, it is none the less true that such society can be achieved only through the mastery of th complexities of life, not only by Christian spirit but als by Christian skill in reconstruction.

To this great end and ideal the National Council o Congregational Churches has pledged itself as never be fore. No better, surer, truer note could have bee sounded in the national capital. The Washington Aud torium has been in these recent days a capital within capital—in this case the lesser including the greater. I our professions have meant just what they said, Chris has been really in our midst and the Auditorium ha been—for us at least—the temporary capital of th Kingdom of God.

Most of the colleges in the Middle and Far West have adopted a plan of "Freshman Week." The first year students in most of our colleges were assembled several days before the formal opening of the college year, in order that they might be properly introduced to the college work. Beloit is one of those reporting upon the use of this week. A program of lectures and activities designed to get the freshmen acquainted with each other and with the faculty was given. The students were given sound advice on how to study, how to take notes, budgeting of time and money, and were warned of the danger of missing the main purpose of college life because of the temptations to social and extra-curricular activities. The program was adapted especially to aid the youth to make the transition from the high school to the college with its methods of study and work. The interest manifested by the young people was encouraging. Beloit and other colleges using this plan believe that it will tend to stop the dropping of so many students at the end of the first year because of their inability to do the work. "Freshman Week" is a form of insurance against this sort of student mortality.

When Beloit announced the discontinuance of special vocational courses and the return to its original purpose of being a purely cultural college, fears were expressed that this change might curtail the enrollment. It is a pleasure, therefore, to report that the enrollment is the largest regular enrollment in the history of the college—247 young people—and the college hopes to keep them.

Early in August this year rumors were abroad that Tabor College, Tabor, Iowa, had passed into the hands of the Episcopalians. We now have an authoritative statement concerning the situation from the chairman of the board of trustees, Mr. Charles Howard, in an article in Congregational Iowa. Mr. Howard gives a brief statement of the Tabor situation during the past few months. From this it appears that the budget of the college years ago was $15,000; this has increased to about $30,000, so that each year of the last few was closed with a deficit ranging from $5,000 to $10,000.

During the first six months of 1925 there were several conferences with the representatives of Grinnell looking toward the federation of the two schools. Nothing came of this and a meeting was then arranged between the representatives of Tabor and several bishops of the Episcopal Church. These met July 24 and drew up four articles which they recommended for adoption concerning the management of the school.

1. Tabor College shall be known as a Christian Institution in the administration of which Episcopalians and Congregationalists shall be jointly interested.
2. The president of the institution shall be a communicant of the Episcopal Church, but the board of trustees shall be composed of those interested in Christian education, in which board there shall be at least five elected communicants of the Episcopal Church and five elected members of the Congregational Church.
3. The president of the college shall be the pastor of the college, and shall direct the services of the chapel, and shall be responsible for the religious teaching, but the Congregational Church shall have the right to conduct a course of religious instruction, the instructor to be appointed by the faculty committee.
4. The president of the institution shall be in conference with the board of trustees, direct the policy of the institution, and shall be ex-officio a member of the board of trustees.

The bishops presented to the local board Dr. Frederick W. Clayton for president. The local church voted almost unanimously to accept Dr. Clayton and Dr. Weeks as supplies from Sept. 1 to June 1, the church to pay into the college treasury the amount it had been paying a pastor for salary.

Who will control Tabor College in the future, the Western Editor would not want to predict. R. W. G.

The New Moderator
As His Pastor Sees Him

By H. E. Peabody, D.D.
Pastor of First Church, Appleton, Wisconsin

Few pastors have had the privilege of working in the intimacies of parish work with such eminent and noble laymen as I have had. Frank J. Harwood is a great Christian in a dozen of the cardinal relations of life—in the home, in the church, in citizenship, in the Sunday school, in the Y. M. C. A., city, state, and national, in the greater church, in world-wide Christian missions.

Leadership of the church is easy where a minister has such backing. Marion Lawrance was a great Congregational layman, but even he never had such a career in any one school as Mr. Harwood's forty-year superintendency in our Appleton church. Seeing his youthful appearance and vigor it is hard to believe it of him. May he multiply his spirit manyfold among the laymen of our churches during the next two years! Then scores of other pastors will be grateful for splendid Christian comradeship.

In the Lord Jesus Christ we not only see the glory of God, but also the glory of man, and henceforth must judge humanity in the light of the incarnation, the cross, and the heavenly universe of which Christ has taken possession in our name.—W. L. Watkinson.

The National Council Day by Day

The Story of the Great Meeting in Washington

The Opening Session

(Tuesday Afternoon, October 20)

Very promptly at 2 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon the Council got away to business. Not all the delegates had arrived, but the voting showed 450 present, with other members and visitors enough to make the attendance literally "thousands," filling about a quarter of the big hall. They were all with one accord in one place. The spirit of harmony above all differences of opinion was very much in evidence. After the devotional service led by the moderator, Dr. Rockwell H. Potter of Hartford, the choice of a new moderator and two assistants claimed attention for nearly two hours. Dr. Lewis T. Reed of Brooklyn, nominating Mr. Frank J. Harwood of Appleton, Wis., stressed the point that our custom of alternating the honor between minister and layman had been lately in abeyance, the last layman to be elected having been Henry M. Beardsley back in 1915. Dr. F. Q. Blanchard of Cleveland nominated his fellow pastor, Dr. Dan F. Bradley. Pres. Herman F. Swartz of Berkeley, Cal., declared for Dr. Charles S. Mills of New York, in the belief that impending changes in administration needed just such an expert at the head. Each nomination was eloquently seconded here and there in the house, and the ballot was on. The two ministers made a nearly even run, while the layman was about 50 per cent ahead of them. Mr. Harwood's election was immediately made unanimous without a further ballot by a gracious motion to that effect by Dr. Bradley, seconded by Dr. Mills.

Dr. Potter expedited the program of the afternoon by running off a lot of routine business while ballots were being counted. For first assistant moderator Dr. Dan F. Bradley and Dr. Carl S. Patton of Los Angeles were nominated. A standing vote indicated a majority for Dr. Bradley. Following recent custom which, however, has not been unbroken, Dr. Henry H. Proctor presented for the office of second assistant moderator the name of Rev. William L. Cash of New Orleans, representing the colored brethren of the denomination. Championing the choice of a woman in this new day of her privileges and responsibilities, Dr. Warren of South Dakota nominated Pres. Mary E. Woolley of Mt. Holyoke College; and when it was found that Dr. Woolley was not eligible, having resigned her membership as delegate, Dr. William E. Barton nominated Mrs. E. A. Osbornson of Chicago. The seconding speeches were colorful and numerous. Whether the voters were hesitant to elect a woman, or thought the present occasion inauspicious to break recent precedent, Mr. Cash won a decided victory. Then the three new officials were escorted to the platform and Mr. Harwood took the chair.

A Glimpse of the Capitol from the Botanical Gardens, Washington

Dr. Jason Noble Pierce had a new gavel for the new moderator, to be his souvenir of office, the mahogany head coming out of the Capitol and the walnut handle out of the First Church, with all the inferences one cares to draw from the connection. And then, on motion of Senator George D. Chamberlain of Massachusetts, the Council by rising vote gave Calvin Coolidge a second term as honorary moderator, with question of a third term being relegated to 1927.

The auditorium was well equipped with amplifiers for the speakers, but Dr. Charles F. Carter of Hartford, beginning his swan song as chairman of the executive committee, was not enthusiastic about standing still behind the speaker's desk, and people who remembered the famous Yale pitch Carter, of, well, several years ago, smil appreciatively at his comment that it w some time since he had been confined to box for his delivery. It was easy enou to connect with his delivery that day, f he pitched a straight swift ball right ov the plate, a message defining "Our Tas as a denomination and individual Christia in interpreting Christianity to the world.

In one of the periods of ballot counting t Council adopted the first of several recor mendations of the executive committe "that the Conference of the Evangelic Protestant Churches in North America recognized as on a parity with Congreg tional state conferences with representatio in the Council accordingly"; and later t committee on credentials offered as its fir resolution that the delegates from thes churches be seated as members of the Cou cil. In between these two votes, at the co clusion of Dr. Carter's address, there w opportunity to learn something about thes 10,000 new brethren in the regions of Pitt burgh and Cincinnati when Dr. C. A. Vos of Pittsburgh spoke on "Our Evangelic Protestant Heritage." Of course they di not pick their weakest speaker as thei representative, but if we may take Dr. Vos as a sample, Congregationalism is positivel richer for its accessions of these ne churches.

Dr. Voss pictured the independent, trul Congregational attitude of the Evangelic Protestants from Luther's time to this, want ing fellowship but not at the price of irk some conformity. Their churches later i America sought to maintain their mothe tongue but found it impracticable; and the found that independence without fellowshi is disintegrating. President olidge struck the note more than once. er recounting the lawlessness, which is prevalent, and the lack of respect for rernment, which is too apparent, he afned, "I have faith in government." He isted that we are becoming more and re responsive to spiritual things, "though [religion] may be practiced in a somenat different manner than formerly, the p and abiding faith of our people in reon has not diminished but increased."

t was a fine sight when the chief magiste of our country came on the platform l six thousand Congregationalists rose to e a genuine and heartfelt greeting. Clean cut looked in a simple dress suit, while Mrs. lidge, with an attractive blue gown and p, added a touch of color and exceptional rm.

The President and his Speech

ew England the President is of speech Yankee in face and feature. Serious he with a smile in his eyes only to indicate sense of humor as Dr. Potter drove e his message with anecdote and story. he Puritan incarnate in the twentieth ury he was as he uttered his message: e righteous authority of law depends for sanction upon its harmony with the righteous authority of the Almighty. . . . I do not know any adequate support for our form of government except that which comes from religion." He showed familiarity with Pilgrim history as he recalled the leadership of Thomas Shepherd, Thomas Hooker, and John Wise, and their contributions to education and government.

Underneath all of his address was a message to the church people, and especially to his fellow Congregationalists, that you cannot make men good by law, that righteousness is a task beyond legislation. There was an indirect but mighty appeal to the churches of America to make public opinion so that men would obey the law. It was a challenge to the Christians to do their part. The greatest need of our country at the present time, he said, is "more religion." "I can conceive of no adequate remedy for the evils which beset society, except through the influences of religion." It reminded one of President Harding's appeal to the Methodists' General Conference, "The churches must not fail us now."

The address made a deep impression on the vast audience, who again and again punctuated it with applause that was anything but perfunctory. The President remained through Dr. Potter's address and then with his suite retired.

Dr. Potter's Address

"Mr. President, Moderator-in-honor," was the recognition which the retiring Moderator gave as he rose to speak, this being the only opportunity given to recognize his official relation to the Council. Dr. Potter cut loose from notes, and again and again roused his audience with sallies like this: "Ask one hundred Congregationalists ten great questions, and if you get the same answers from them all you know then that they are not Congregationalists." "We cannot all think alike; that is manifest today, and will be increasingly manifest in these following days, but we can be and shall be brothers in seeking the truth."

"When any man from west of the Hudson comes into my church in Hartford and visits me at the close of the service it is not to comment on the sermon but to ask impulsively and insistently, 'Why are those doors on your pews?' It is no answer to him that they have been there since 1807 and in pews in churches on that site since 1640. Still he asks, 'Why?' Traditions and history are not sufficient to bind us together."

Dr. Potter's peroration on the Puritan spirit of fellowship as winning its way in the world was a masterpiece, as he sketched the Frenchman and the German, the Englishman, the Belgian, and the Italian coming together at Locarno and joining hands in an effort to bring a new world. It was a fitting climax to a great evening, and though his face remained immobile, the President's eyes glinted with a new light as Dr. Potter moved his audience to great enthusiasm with his final word.

Percy Foster of Christian Endeavor fame renewed his youth as he led the audience in the song service, and Rev. L. W. Fifield conducted the devotional services, reading I Corinthian's XIII and making a soul-lifting prayer.

The Merger Problem

(Wednesday Morning, October 21)

The morning of Oct. 21 was devoted to discussion of the report of the Committee of Twelve, on mergers and reorganization. The story is on another page of this issue. During later sessions the merger proposals were discussed and voted upon. Thursday afternoon, which had been set apart for a half-holiday, was also devoted to this important question.

At Home and Abroad

(Wednesday Afternoon, October 21)

The State Conference

The afternoon session of Wednesday was opened with an address by Dr. W. H. Rollins on "The State Conference—A Fellowship Service." In opening, Dr. Rollins showed the development and expression of fellowship in the Congregational churches through the missionary organizations and the National Council. The most intimate expression of that fellowship is the state conference. Fellowship and service is its object. It has no direct authority. It has no disciplinary power, nor responsibility for ministerial standing. There is no danger of the state superintendent becoming a Congregational bishop. The state conference is no external autocratic corporation to impose authority on the churches but is the churches themselves in council and fellowship. Every church, even the smallest, has a voice and a vote. This makes it the most democratic of institutions.

It can and should be of increasing aid and assistance to the national societies in handling and presenting the budget to the churches and should become more and more responsible for the collection of the same.

The state conference is growing not so much in power as it is in service. The conference is the result of the new denominational consciousness born in the National Council and is the link between it and the local churches and local conferences.

Our International Gospel

Prof. Laura H. Wild of Mount Holyoke College, who has recently spent a year as exchange professor in China, spoke on "Have We An International Gospel"? People outside are asking that question. The younger generation do not know whether there is or not. Rabindranath Tagore, speaking to a great student meeting in China, pictured a bird of prey, a vulture, pouncing and preying on the Orient, and this bird was Western civilization. And the people of the Orient are identifying Christianity with Western civilization.

Are the foreign students, so large in numbers in America, getting the right impression of our gospel? Our own students are not getting the training in their homes that meets their needs. Their sense of honor in the public schools says anything is right to get by. There is a vast and increasing ignorance of the Bible. Social service is much to the fore but it lacks the dynamic of the Bible and religion. The international gospel we need should teach us to live together in peace, should rid us of racial and sectarian antipathy, should emphasize cleanliness, should have the courage and heroic self-sacrifice which will greatly dare and stand by its cause at any cost. Above all it needs to get hold of the power from God to enable it not simply to preach but to put in practice its international gospel.

Buddhism takes time for meditation far beyond modern Christian practice. Confucianism has a high order of ethics. What distinctive features has the Christian gospel to offer such people? First, Jesus Christ alone of all leaders combines a high ethical standard and the spiritual and mystical power to give it dynamic. Second, the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah epitomizes and foreshadows the heroic self-sacrifice which Jesus made incarnate and real.

Are we teaching our young people these essentials? When the wonderful power of our youth has been harnessed to the wonderful power of God, then Christianity will go out into the non-Christian world with a mighty power.

The scheduled address by C. W. Lusk on "What a Congregational Church Means to a Southern City" was omitted, and the time given to the introduction of business by states. All this business was referred to the business or resolutions committee.

The A. M. A. Program

(Wednesday Afternoon and Evening, October 21)

The sessions of the American Missionary Association are reported elsewhere in this issue.

Good Causes and Commissions

(Thursday Morning, October 22)

Judge Perry's amendment to the motion providing for an associate moderator was adopted. It gave the layman equal honor and position with the clergy, allowing him in the words of the Judge "to carry on during the year, fifty-fifty with the clergy. It obviates trouble because it requires of the moderator certain duties which clergymen can do better." The alternation of layman and clergyman was voted.

Dr. Stephen A. Norton presented a resolution endorsing "Pilgrim Place" in Claremont, Cal., in its effort to provide homes for missionaries as they return through the "door to the Orient." He called upon Dr. J. L. Barton to say "Amen," which the latter did in deep chest tones.

The business committee put in a plea to the delegates to forego their intended trip to Mount Vernon in the afternoon, as the discussion of the "Merger" had been assigned to a special session at two o'clock. Dr. Palmer, the chairman, said, "The spirit of George Washington will rest upon you, if you stay and do business. America, as well as England, expects every man to do his duty."

Thirty minutes were then occupied by Dr. Ashley Day Leavitt of Brookline, Mass., in outlining the spiritual values of a great gathering like this. He did this in the devotional service, and he gripped the Council.

Dr. Byington of Massachusetts presented the report of the committee on commissions, which recommended that the Commission on Near East Relief be merged in the Commission on International Relations. This commission was entrusted with three special tasks, a study of whether the just rights of all are respected, a study of the methods to relieve injustice, and encouragement to the study of race relations in our colleges. It appealed to the churches to consider the civil right of aliens.

The committee also recommended that a broader name be given than "Social Service," namely Social Relation Commission. It also recommended that four commissions, International Relations, Interchurch, Social Relations, Evangelism, be made permanent, each having six active and 18 associate members with six-year terms arranged so that the terms of one-third of the membership would expire every two years.

Dr. George E. Haynes, secretary of the Federal Council's Interracial Commission, called for a "live" commission. "Either lynching or the church must go."

Continuing, Dr. Byington recommended that Law Enforcement Commission be not made permanent, and the Commission on Men's Work be divorced from the Education Society. Dr. Sheldon believed that men's work has been moving along right lines. "With a layman as Moderator of the National Council we should have a mighty layman's movement." This matter was referred back to the committee on commissions. All other recommendations were adopted. Also it was voted, on the recommendation of Dr Byington, that the chairman of commissions meet in conference with the executive committee of the National Council.

The last recommendation of Dr. Byington put the Council in a happy frame of mind. "We recommend to the nominating committee that they appoint men and women who have special knowledge, and not give the places on the commissions for distinction or to make up a mathematical balance of the sexes."

This statement was immediately followed by the announcement of Dr. Palmer of the business committee that the wives of delegates could exchange their tickets for the Tuesday excursion to Mount Vernon so that they could chaperon their husbands.

Lively Debate on Social Ideals

The Council then closely followed the report of the Commission on Social Service given by an "industrial engineer," Chairman John Calder of Lexington, Mass.

After a study of acute local situations and the keen unsatisfied interest among ministers, we believe in a spiritual faith that inquires. If ideals are to be expressed in action, then those who do the doing must do the thinking. Mr. Calder believed there were too many lazy-minded Christians. Many were not interested enough even to doubt, to say nothing about reaching the uth. He claimed that the commission did ot adopt any doctrinaire view, but only ought in terms of purpose and values. We try to study and interpret sayings of esus as far as they go, but they do not go ery far, so we try to work out in his spirit ur own salvation."

Dr. Herring followed and spoke of social xploration, keeping in touch with those ots where social strain actually or po-ntially exists. We must educate boys and rls to think in terms of co-operation, make em understand how other races feel, and ake farmers see the men in the sixteen-ory apartment. There must be a freer ay of all our spirits, which the bigness of stitutionalism imperils.

Prof. Jerome Davis of Yale referred to Pres-ent Coolidge's keynote at the opening of the ouncil, and showed how hard it was to eet in any spiritual way the modern echanizing world. "The real struggle to-y is not between Fundamentalism and odernism, but in making actual everyday, mmonplace life square with our Christian bels. There is small controversy in the alm of platitudes."

In touching upon war and international lations, Dr. Davis compared the churches the courts, the latter never taking sides, eeping free of all hatreds, so the church, though always supporting the nation in ar, should even in war, as an institu-on, be a symbol of peace, free from all opaganda. It is sickening to note that me churches were recruiting agencies. Con-egationalism itself ought to be a reconcili-ion, a demand that all of us should live to a social ideal and the call of our llowship. In closing, Dr. Davis defended e outspoken statements of the commission the unlimited exercise of the right of ivate ownership and invoked the spirit of ashington Gladden. "May we be as truly cially-minded as he was, may we forget nventional attitudes and ask how Jesus ould vote on this statement of a sacri-ial program." Here, at this point, Dr. avis stepped aside from the microphone, d recited the Lord's Prayer. This act ectrified the Council.

Industrial Issues

Roger Babson asked if the phrase, "frank andonment of all income which does not me from service," included "inheritances," lding that he approved the "Statement of cial Ideals" but—"I don't want to be called hypocrite, and I don't want the National uncil to look foolish."

Chairman Calder replied that the phrase d not aim at inheritances, but at all at-mpts at gambling on stock exchange opera-ns to get something for nothing.

The first section of the report was adopted. his referred to equal educational oppor-nity, conservation of health, freedom of e press, and peaceable assemblage.

The debate centered on the sections which uched industrial relations. Victor Bigelow Massachusetts said, "I'm glad we haven't l lost our judgment on subjects on which r Redeemer refused to say a word. If u undertake to serve the world without aking a profit, you are in a bad fix. We eak of 'service.' 'To serve whom?' The employer? Not a bit of it. To get something so that the kiddies will not starve. Your best service is the service for your family."

Mr. Calder disclaimed any reference in the resolution to "accidental increment."

Dr. Howard Chidley of Winchester, Mass., called the attention of the Council to the construction that would be put on some of the committee's statements, not by the language but by its implications. He thought the commission should have balanced its statements regarding income by specifying the responsibility of labor to society and presented an amendment which was adopted, "That labor should recognize society by giving a day's work for a day's wage."

The report of the Social Service Commission was referred back to be presented at some later time.

International Relations

Dr. Wilson spoke for the Commission on International Relations, mentioning three major events that had modified the report: The Conference at Stockholm which had made the press of Europe realize as never before that there is a Protestant as well as a Catholic church, and that statemen will have to deal with united Protestantism; the Institute of Pacific Relations in Honolulu; and the International Conference at Locarno. This revealed a more hopeful and friendly mood in Europe than for long years.

To these three events should be added the President's speech before the American Legion at Omaha, "the boldest and most advanced utterance of any modern statesman in modern times. There is no real separation of church and state when statesmen are also churchmen."

Mention was made in the report of one significant thing. Our denomination is the first to procure text-books to be used in Bible classes that teach international relations.

Dr. Wilson put some "kick" into his talk, even though there was little in the resolutions. He considered war as pathological, and as all the legislation on typhoid fever must be for the removal of "causes," so war cannot be abolished by clamor, and causes of war come more within the reach of the church than of the government. Causes of war are not indictable offenses, but sins to be dealt with in attempts to induce men to take Jesus in earnest.

Dr. G. W. Hinman of San Francisco had much to say about Nordic arrogance and thought we must dig deeper for causes of war than the balance of power. Racial suspicion exists. Inter-racial problems are fundamental, for no longer are there any homogeneous communities in the United States. The economic waste of racial prejudice was dwelt upon. The unification of men in one brotherhood was the major issue.

Dr. Emerson pictured the child in the Near East. With the background of a Godforsaken country, he found children clinging to flower-pots. In a miserable milieu was a bit of divinity. "The meanest flower that grows gives thoughts that lie too deep for tears." The appeal is not simply to keep alive the bodies of the children in the Near East, but to save that little bit of soul-life that clung to the flower.

With much force the speaker said, "Any enthusiast can start a charity, but it takes a devoted Christian to see a charity through."

Christian Unity

Dr. Frank Sanders thought that the experiment of association with the Presbyterian Church in Cleveland was certainly "Exhibit A" of his Commission on Interchurch Relations. The report was adopted.

Israel Ainsworth of Massachusetts feared that dissension rather than union would result from any organic relationship with the Presbyterians.

Dr. Sanders said the commission was studying the relations with all those denominations of reasonably Congregational type; informal proposals had been received, indirect approaches had been made by the Universalist Church. These called for delicate adjustment. The Northern California Congregational Conference had presented a petition to the National Council for the consideration of closer fellowship with the Universalists; and the Maine Universalist Convention had urged upon the Universalist General Convention "active efforts to secure co-operation, unity, and a fellowship of common service, that one great Leader's prayer may be realized, and all his followers be one." While not mentioning the Congregationalists by name, it is understood that they were in the mind of the Maine Convention.

The commission was truly responsive, and expressed hope that a way may soon eventuate for such fellowship. On recommendation of the commission through Dr. Sanders the Council voted as its approach to the Universalists that:

All churches which can find freedom and satisfaction in the Kansas City platform are welcomed by us, for this statement of 1913 is not a creed but an expressed basis of fellowship.

It was expected that a committee of Universalists would be chosen for conference on this subject.

Law Enforcement

(Thursday Evening, October 22)

The Howard University Chorus and Glee Club sang at the opening of the service in a way that reflected great credit on themselves and their institution. The devotional service was led by Rev. Ray A. Eusden of Kansas. Some years ago President Evans of Ripon College was professor of philosophy in Park College, Missouri, and he had a pupil who was one Mabel Walker. To him was accorded the privilege of introducing the Assistant Attorney General, Mrs. Mabel Walker Willebrandt, as she was to speak on "Law Enforcement."

Mrs. Willebrandt's Address

Mrs. Willebrandt paid a fine tribute to the Christian colleges and her former teacher. "You are the people who hold the real key to law enforcement," she said. Christian people are beginning to do some praying and thinking about it. Christianity needs to be translated into civic life. When it is not, then there is a breakdown in law enforcement. "I am not going to try to keep clear of prohibition enforcement as is the fashion when they talk about law enforcement today."

When the Eighteenth Amendment was passed and prohibition was written into the Constitution many thought they had abolished the traffic. They forgot the second part which places concurrent responsibility on the states. Uncle Sam never intended to do it all. In some of the large cities, where powerful and corrupt politicians control the situation and the local officials are powerless, the Federal Government steps in. Another place where Uncle Sam helps is in smuggling and importation. The President asked for an appropriation so that the Coast Guard could function and nobly it has done its work. Another place of responsibility for the Federal Government is the issuing of permits for industrial alcohol.

When there is a blind pig on your street you have no right to holler for Uncle Sam; get busy at home. Dodging responsibility at home is more dangerous to the country than the violation of the law. There is too much mental confusion on prohibition enforcement. Sleeping sickness is the result of the lack of public sentiment. Keeping up with the Jones's and serving liquor at social functions is to blame for much apathy in enforcement.

Then Mrs. Willebrandt told the story of a smuggler who has just finished his term in the penitentiary and had come to her office. Two things he said, "I never realized that it was lawless. I've been treated squarely by you. I am going straight. Best people knew my business and I was not ashamed for my family, but being a jailbird did disgrace them." The community was to blame for these conditions.

He used a safe deposit box as a "grease box" to get government agents in his pay. Through the income tax he was finally caught. An investigation proved that he owed the government $1,197,000 for income tax which had not been paid. When up for trial he put $10,000 into the hands of a government agent to bribe the jury and was caught.

This same man had bought a valuable piece of property on a river as a landing place for smuggled liquor. He had not used it because he was afraid of one local deputy sheriff in the backwoods. That deputy had no money and a mortgage on his home, but there was not money enough anywhere to buy him. He took the $200 a week which was offered him as a bribe to the Federal judge, and the Federal Government gave to this backwoods sheriff the honor of arresting the smuggler who had defied Uncle Sam so long.

The real terror to lawbreakers is a righteous officer. The church people need to pray, "Create in me a clean heart and renew a right spirit within me." The audience gave the speaker round after round of applause.

Dean Brown on "The Vital and Trivial in Religion"

Dean Charles R. Brown of Yale then spoke on "The Vital and Trivial in Religion."

Excess baggage is the bane of today, he said. Furniture in our attic and in our homes, and books on our shelves, have become a liability instead of an asset. We have too much intellectual and spiritual excess baggage. We have too many foolish questions, like Peter who when he "wist not what to say" opened his mouth and talked, "What shall this man do?"

Thirty years ago the questions were, "Where did Cain get his wife?" "Was Jonah not digested?" "How about the Gadarene swine?" They are buried. A new crop has arisen, Creation versus Evolution, the Virgin Birth, a Personal Devil, and the Second Coming of Christ. "What is that to thee? Follow thou me," says the Master as he did to Peter.

There is the dogmatism of Modernist and Fundamentalist about this first chapter of Genesis. They have decided that the creation took place B. C. 4004, Oct. 28 at 9 A.M. It was in the fall because apples were ripe. This is not a scientific dogma but a religious poem with the theme that behind all is God.

Dr. Brown suggested that he said the same thing about the Virgin Birth that Paul did —which was nothing. Jesus allowed men to call him the son of the carpenter and Joseph's son. His claims on our minds and hearts, his redemption and his moral government do not rest on the Virgin Birth. Too often men make "indecent intellectual exposure" of themselves like the writer in the Yale News, "We have reached the poi where we must declare any man intellect ally insincere who refuses to accept the do trine of the Immaculate Conception." Th Roman Catholic doctrine about the sinles ness of Mary was all Greek to him and y he was arrogating to himself such authorit

We need to plead for a serious treating religion, not relying on ignorance or hea say. Is prayer a farce or a force? Stud some book like Fosdick's Meaning of Praye Let us read the Bible and come to son sane and serious conclusion, and not s offhand that we believe every word fro cover to cover, including the devil and bs men's words.

"Are there few that be saved?" A ce tain treatise in the Yale College Libra answers that not one in a hundred thousar will be saved, and a footnote adds th probably the proportion will be one to million. Jesus answered, "Strive to ent in at the straight gate."

The Lord called me to take hold of t small end of the problem. Newton a proached gravitation through an appl Franklin electricity through a kite strin and Darwin science through earth worn and bumble bees. So you are to take ho of questions like prayer through the sma end, the end near you. We do not know t final issue any more than the man in t trenches knew Marshal Foch's purpose a plans, but he fought just the same.

The speaker closed with the story of Pet and Quo Vadis?, and urged us to follow t Master into the unknown and solve o problems as we go. Dr. Brown held h audience in his hands as they followed h keen wit, delicious humor, and searchi satire into the higher realms and the vit questions.

Wayne B. Wheeler

Wayne B. Wheeler, General Counsel of t Anti-Saloon League, was given a fine rece tion. He called Mrs. Willebrandt "the mode Joan of Arc" to the crowd's delight, an

Time and Place for Next Council Meeting

OMAHA IN 1927

After the nominating committee's report l been adopted, invitations for the next eting of the Council were received. Dr. ith of Nebraska pleaded for Omaha as geographical center of the country, re-tly in the forefront as a convention city ertaining the American Legion. "You sing 'I love thy kingdom Lord' looking church walls, rather than into a nest of chine guns as in this Auditorium."

Dr. Nichols then declared that Chicago s at the center of the universe. "It is ty years since the Council has met in our and there is a limit to our patience."

Then President Ozora Davis asked to be "let se," declaring that he was in temper combination of Massachusetts conserv-sm and Western imagination. "I emi-ted from Connecticut into the United tes." He promised that Chicago would e care of the Council financially and dged that there would be no deficit after ournment. Then he declared that the al urge" for the Council's coming to his ir was the strategy of its appearance there t at this particular time. "We are not senting our invitation in terms of speed comfort. We want you to come on a ritual mission."

Dr. Smith in rebuttal asserted that the ncil had not been in Omaha for 150 rs.

The vote was the closest of any in the sions of the Council, 104 for Chicago, 103 Omaha. This vote was reconsidered at end of the afternoon session and the al decision was to go to Omaha by a ris-vote of nearly three to one.

The Council passed quickly from this ex-sive gesture into the mood of devotion. Ashley Day Leavitt talked of people who allow two humped camels and strain at ats." He made pointed allusion to "Jesus' arkable power to cut through sickly ec-siastical red-tape." His whole address s a parable to illustrate the truth that the time when people are overscrupulous about method is always the time of decay.

Dr. Palmer read a cable greeting to the Council from Osaka, Japan, representing 25,000 members of the Kumiai Congregational Churches.

NEXT MEETING CHANGED TO SPRING

Dr. Van Horn then advocated a change in the time of the Council from autumn to spring. Transportation expense would be less because of excursion rates on railroads. At the present time we ought to be at home in our churches directly after a long vacation season. In the interest of orderly procedure the National Council gathering should come near the time of the spring state and association meetings. It was voted to change the time to spring.

The Piedmont Quartet hushed the Auditorium with the selection, "Deep river, I want to cross over into camp-grounds."

MEN'S WORK

Dr. Morris H. Turk of Portland, Me., wished to have some changes made in the personnel of the Commission on Men's Work.

Roger Babson urged the ministry not to play down so much to the laymen, but to play up to them spiritually. He was sure that the very success of business men was due to their emotions, faith, and imagination, all spiritual qualities which make men enjoy creating things. He had discovered that the majority of our millionaires were the sons of ministers, inheriting from their mothers industry and thrift, but from their fathers spirituality.

Then turning his thought around, the famous statistician said, "The church is not a haven for saints, but a hospital for sinners. The more successful a business man is, the bigger safety-valve he has to have to his boiler." Perhaps this was as finely sincere as any sentence uttered during the ten days' sessions of the National Council.

Dr. Byington then read the recommendation of the committee on commissions that the Men's Work Commission carry an equal number of ministers and laymen, that they encourage the organization in every church, that they co-operate with similar movements in other denominations, and that they make a special study of all laymen's movements.

After calling to order the Congregational Education and Publishing Societies, Dr. Day created a Moderators' Row on the platform by calling up all past incumbents of the office. Prayer was offered by Dr. W. E. Barton.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

Then Professor Weigle of Yale reviewed the public school system of the country, finding that it was completely secularized, stripped of every religious element, and yet having a greater hold on our children than at any previous time. It has become a place of drill for the whole range of human occupation, but it is headed straight toward religious indifference if not atheism. And yet the emphasis on religion was not taken out of the schools by the Jews, the atheists, or the Catholics, but by the squabbles of Protestants. Christmas is kept in the San Francisco schools because it was a pagan custom. The maintenance of an old-fashioned Sunday school without co-operation with the Education Society has little value. There must be sound educational methods.

Rev. Vaughan Dabney of Massachusetts did not accept the cynical estimate of the young man of today that he thinks only of a flivver and a flapper. He noted the large delegation of young people in front of the photo taken of the Council on the White House grounds, and also present at the session of the American Board. He thought many would catch the vision at this Council. He told of a most successful pageant in his church which the young people staged, bringing church history down to the present day.

Robert J. Locke of the University of Illinois felt that the student mind knew no tradition. Not the balloon trousers or the college yells represent the spirit of the four years, but the imagination of a pioneer. He had often found men in his department who touched the church's life and had seen the Christ, and mentioned a Hindu who did not understand the Christian life of America for a part of his course but at graduation showed such enthusiasm that he believed he would one day control the floods of India.

Dr. Wilfrid A. Rowell of Hinsdale, Ill., told of splendidly helpful service in non-Christian homes. He was sure the pastor's great opportunity came on such occasions as weddings and christenings. There is no substitute, however, for home training.

After the reading of the minutes of the meeting in Rockford, Ill., the annual election of officers of the Education and Publishing Societies took place. Dr. Charles S. Mills made a strong appeal for contributions to the building fund of the First Church in Washington. In a city of 500,000, with 60,000 government employees, 70,000 students, besides an army of tourists, there should be a structure which by its dignity would bear testimony to the fathers. Here on this site most of our leaders have appeared and the present structure is thronged. Dr. Mills said he had part in building three churches where the income of the subscribers was much greater, yet in no instance was the initial campaign so successful. The sum of $126,000 has been reached in two weeks. He announced the gift of a hundred dollars from a Jew, accompanied with these words, "Are we not all brethren?"

Rev. Edward Camp presented a resolution heartily endorsing the recommendations of the Committee of Twelve. It was voted to adopt the resolution.

Rev. Herbert W. Gates believed that all should "get the picture" of the hidden work of the service of the society which can never be given by pleas of state superintendents for money.

Record-Breaking Enrollment

The final report of the enrollment in the National Council at Washington showed the largest number on record at a Council meeting. It was as follows:

Delegates	610
Honorary Members	270

Camps, Campers and Permanent Influences

By Mrs. Dallas Pollard
Burlington, Vermont

[EDITORS' NOTE: In sending the accompanying article, Mrs. Pollard says:

For six years I have been a teacher in summer schools, part of the time at our own State University here at Burlington, and four summers in schools of religious education, at Saxtons River, our own School of Religious Education and this year also in the Geneva Point School in New Hampshire. My contact for many years in our Congregational state missionary work with young people, of which I was superintendent, has led to many conclusions on my part toward a closer understanding by ministers and Sunday school superintendents of the work these young people are doing summers, and a wish to interpret the summer school into church life more closely.]

WITH the close of summer and the return to schools and colleges of thousands of our young people all over the land, comes the close of a chapter in many of these young people's lives, the thread of which should never be broken, but be woven into the next chapter—developed and intensified. More and more it has come to pass that these same young people are spending part or all of their vacations in summer camps or schools.

The summer camp idea has grown by leaps and bounds. In Vermont alone, around the Fairlee Lakes, between three and four thousand boys and girls have spent the summer. For the director of such a camp the job has become a twelve-months-in-the-year one, to prepare for two months of camp life, beginning with the first month of the year, when the special cars bearing the campers country-ward must be chartered for a certain day both for the coming and the return journey—such is the exodus at one particular date—going on through each month when many letters must be written, mothers must be interviewed, reunions during the winter held, and in fact a general oversight must be given former and prospective campers through personal contact.

The Spirit of Camp (always spelled in capital letters) is a very great thing—the loyalty and devotion to a camp, the indescribable comradery, the hero worship, bringing girls and boys back to the same camp year after year.

Last summer the mother of a certain girl, who had for seven summers returned to the same camp, herself paid a visit to this camp for the first time. Used to luxury and all the comforts of life her remark on her departure was, "I don't see how you stand it; I couldn't stay here two days," and yet this same daughter counted the days until another camp year opened. The mother simply could not understand.

In May of this year, meeting Morris after a lapse of some weeks, his first remark was—"Only fifty-one more days"—and I knew without further explanation that it was fifty-one days to camp.

But aside from the many and fine commercial camps scattered everywhere by lake, river, and mountain there are hundreds of girls and boys gathered now each year in camps and summer schools of religious education fostered and furthered by our churches. The period, unfortunately, is shorter than other camps, a meager two weeks at most, but into these two weeks are packed a whole summer of ideas, plans, and inspiration.

The Congregationalist has been reporting for a month or so our own Congregational State Young People's Conferences the country over, with their increase in numbers and efficiency, and their happy enthusiastic outlook, and it is with such camps and schools of religious education that we as churches have our chief concern. Just as that mother could not understand her daughter's joy in her camp, there are mothers and fathers and pastors and church people who cannot understand the wonderful inspiration and the hold these schools have on their campers, and it is of this fact we are thinking as the churches and Sunday schools open for their year ahead.

What place in your church activity are you going to make for these young people? They come to your churches full of memories of high moments, when from some vesper service maybe, at some glorious out-door tryst, after song and prayer and consecration, and a challenge for life service made by one with whom they had lived and gone in and out with for two weeks, and from whom they had grown to know Christ as never before—they wended their way up through the cathedral of tall trees, with no light but the stars overhead, with no sound in the air but the lapping of waves on the lake shore and one lone violin played in silent recessional—who can say what great and noble thoughts came to these young lives, what inward and devout consecration was made!

Youth is ever impatient; give them the task now, lest that enthusiasm, ebbing, be lost forever. Too many times they return to us and we greet their willing co-operation and eagerness with the teaching of a Sunday school class which a previous teacher could never manage, because the environment and condition of the whole school was all wrong, and maybe they, too, fail to make a success of it. Then comes discouragement and a falling away on their part.

It was the last night of summer school. I went into a room where two girls lay on a couch in the semi-darkness talking. I had known these girls for some years; they were old campers. This was their greeting:

"O, we hate to go back—people understand us here, it is one big family." First, give them an opportunity early to express their joy and happiness in their summer experience, through an informal meeting of those of their own ages. Speak to them each individually, church folk and make them see you do understand and want to help them carry out their ideas.

It may be some of their plans and ideas may not seem quite feasible to some of you older church leaders, but give them their chance—they may surprise you. Over night, so to speak, the quality of leadership has come to being in them, and a new self-confidence has manifested itself. Give them a chance in church dramatization or pageantry to assume the responsibility of production; then help them all you can. A mother said to me, "Marjorie has never been given any chance in church to do anything in dramatics. I guess they thought her too young." This same girl had successfully taken a leading part in a beautiful Christmas morality play at the summer camp and was thrilled with its message and possibilities.

Story-telling and pageantry are both courses in summer schools for which the International Sunday School Association gives credit towards a diploma. Many young people have taken these courses the last summer with joy and profit. Give them an opportunity to use these talents.

As I look again and again, each summer, into the faces of these young people, so anxious to do service to their Master through service to mankind, I am not nearly so concerned with the question, "What is this age coming to?" as I am about how we older folks are going to do our part.

Prayer is not only the opportunity of the Christian, but his obligation. He walks with God; and a silent companionship is hardly thinkable. We talk with God. We walk not only in his presence and in his fear but in his companionship. We walk into his heart by prayer, and we stay in his heart by prayer, and we make our life vast by prayer. "Holiness, without which no man can see God," is had, as all testimony shows, only by prayer. They pray without ceasing, who love without ceasing and serve without ceasing. Wherefore, my soul, pray.—William A. Quayle.

My Bridge of Dreams

By Will C. Chamberlain

I built a bridge of dreams across
From star to star,
Where all the constellations sing
And systems are.
I built of opal, amethyst, carnelian, blue,
But never any of my dreams
Came true.

I built a bridge of dreams across
From door to door,
Where neighbors toiled and babies romped,
And struggles were.
I built of courage, love, and hope,
My heart the crew,
And every dream I fashioned thus
Came true.

The Challenge of Foreign Missions

Stirring Meeting of the American Board in Washington

OREIGN missions had one whole day, Friday, for emphasis and challenge. he American Board faced three problems, sorption of the Women's Boards, possible ss of the Missionary Herald by merger with her periodicals, and the tremendous ques- on of crippled or amputated missions be- use of an inadequate treasury. As to the st, the Board accepted the mandate of the ational Council, expressing its willingness co-operate with the women in the creation a unified foreign board. The story of the bate over the Missionary Herald is told another page, the Council finally grant- g a two years' reprieve with quite possible tension indefinitely. The third problem is e old story of open doors, of challenging portunities, of increasing success, of mper crops from the gospel seed, and of ability to send laborers into the harvest ld.

Retiring President of the Board

FACING RETRENCHMENT

Dr. Shepherd Knapp of Worcester, speak- g for the Prudential Committee, presented is problem early in the day. Three alter- tives offer solution. The Board can re- ce its budget by giving away certain mis- ns to other denominations, increasing eir burdens to ease ours. It can maintain s work on the present inadequate basis of hand-to-mouth program with the hand not ll enough for sustenance; or with the eper consecration of all our people and e increased treasury accompanying it, it n plan for doing the things needful on far-flung line and push its campaign toriously. A list of imperative items on rious fields, calling for $65,000 outside of gular treasury demands, plus a deficit of 5,000 for the past year, calls for an extra 50,000 which the Board asks permission to licit through a special Easter offering. is is aside from providing for the pre- us indebtedness of $130,000.

As if this situation were not challenging ough, Secretary Riggs told the story of rtuguese East Africa where since 1880 e Board has been promising the native iefs to give them teachers, and attempting fulfill its promise by repeated but sporadic tempts tragic in their failure through the ness or death of our pioneers and the dis- appointment to the natives. Knowing the situation there, the Fairfield Association of Connecticut volunteered to raise $7,500 a year above its apportionment to help the Board begin work there again, and the offer is regretfully declined because there must be larger investment for permanency be- fore thinking of an annual budget. Discus- sion of this opportunity in particular and of the general financial problem filled the morning session. Mr. H. H. Walker of Chicago offered a promising recipe: "Success lies in tapping the untapped resources of the Congregational laity."

RAPID-FIRE MISSIONARIES

The feature of the afternoon was a suc- cession of rapid-fire speeches by a half dozen men from different fields. Rev. J. J. Banninga of Madura said India is ready for a forward evangelistic movement, due primarily to Gandhi's influence. When India comes to Christ it will help us to understand Jesus better than ever. Wynn Fairfield of China pictured the advance of the Chinese to leadership, with the mission- ary only pushing behind instead of leading. But there is still need of training the coming leaders. If this can be done adequately for a generation it might be that China could dispense with our help in 25 years. John S. Porter of Czechoslovakia told of opportuni- ties in the land of John Huss. President George E. White of Salonika explained the movement of great masses of people from Turkey to Greece, eager for American friend- ship, helped by Near East relief, and ready for spiritual assistance.

William W. Peet, a name to conjure with in Constantinople, spoke from an experience of 44 years there. Today Turkey is facing West not East. He referred especially to some two million people of ancient Christian stock in what used to be Turkey in Europe, who behind the religion of their conquerors still remember their lineage and are now accessible to Christian influence. Turkey was also set forth by the junior "Shepard of Aintab" who told of the new opportunities for reaching Turks themselves rather than Armenians of yore. The new government is strong for education. Dr. Shepard con- fessed to professional shame in admitting that he had treated 120 cases in a day be- tween eight and three o'clock, but it shows contact with the people.

Briefer addresses were made also by Rev. G. H. Hubbard of China and Rev. Kapriel Bedrosian of Worcester, Mass., president of the Armenian Evangelical Alliance of Amer- ica, who brought the greetings of his society.

THE NEW PRESIDENT

Election of officers in the afternoon brought Dr. Rockwell Harmon Potter for- ward as the successor of Dr. Moore who felt obliged to relinquish the presidency. There was a brief interchange of compli- ments at that time and a more formal rec- ognition at the beginning of the evening service. Dr. Moore has been president for eleven years, and before that he was fifteen years on the Prudential Committee, nine years its chairman. He has brought to his task a special predilection for religious problems arising on the foreign field. Dr. Potter brings an intimate knowledge of the home base of supplies. Dr. Maurer of New Haven offered a fine tribute to the retiring president and by a rising vote it was spread upon the minutes.

The feature of the evening was Secretary Barton's address on the mission of the American Board in Turkey. He sketched a dozen new situations there, the sultan de- posed, the caliph deposed, church and state separated, religious questions ruled out of civil courts, religious liberty, a free press, religion and education separated, dervish orders expelled, woman emancipated, Near East relief, a move to change the sacred day from Friday to Sunday, and the abolition of the fez. Our task and exclusive opportunity is to interpret the spirit of Christ to the Turk.

Rev. S. R. Modak of India, pastor of the Ahmednagar church, as his father was, and finely representing the third generation of Indian Christians, spoke for his country and what may become a national undenomina- tional church. He closed with an invitation to hold the next International Council in India, a proposition which, however daring, indicates that we are living in a new age.

The immediate departure of a deputation to India was announced by Secretary Strong, himself a member of it, headed by President Potter, with Mrs. H. M. Tenney of Cali- fornia, and presumably Dr. C. E. Jefferson of New York, who is now abroad and is exected to join the others en route. It is a remarkable coincidence that Dr. Potter's pastoral predecessor, Dr. C. M. Lamson, was also president of the Board, and that an earlier pastor of the same church, Dr. Joel Hawes, after 25 years in that position, like Dr. Potter who has just had a similar anni- versary, was sent on a deputation to India.

The Work and Ideals of the A. M. A.

Achievements in Interracial Service

(Wednesday Afternoon, October 21)

The autumn leaves had preceded us in the Auditorium, for the platform, which had been bare during the sessions of the Council, now was banked with the red, brown, and yellow foliage to greet the American Missionary Association. The Jubilee Singers rendered some of the melodies that Dvorak wove into his oratories. "He made me laugh and he made me cry," and, "Way down on the Swanee River." President William Horace Day called for the treasurer's report, which was then given by Irving C. Gaylord. The outstanding facts in it were a deficit of $40,000, and a manifest appreciation of the work of the Association by those helped, for their gifts were almost as much as the total from the churches, including the Woman's Society. The tuition receipts were much larger than last year. Nearly $700,000 was expended for general field work, schools, and hospitals. Chairman R. W. Gammon presented the report of the nominating committee, and the election resulted as follows: president, Rev. William Horace Day, Ct.; vice-presidents, Rev. John Gordon, Ill., Mr. Sol C. Johnson, Ga., Mr. E. Snell Hall, N. Y., Rev. Carl S. Patton, Cal., Mr. Frederick J. Lowrey, Hawaii; recording secretary, Rev. W. N. DeBerry, Mass.; corresponding secretaries, Rev. George L. Cady, Rev. Fred L. Brownlee; treasurer, Mr. Irving C. Gaylord; executive committee (until 1931), Mrs. Harry P. Willcox, N. Y., Mrs. L. R. Howard, Mass., Prof. George E. Haynes, N. Y., Rev. Alfred G. Walton, Ct., Mr. Wm. A. Little, N. J.

The executive committee was instructed to prepare a memorial on Dr. Asher Anderson, the late recording secretary. Chairman John R. Rogers of the executive committee then hushed the audience that packed the Auditorium by paraphrasing Lincoln's Gettysburg address: "It seems altogether proper that this A. M. A., so conceived and so dedicated after four score years of service, should meet under the shadow of the Lincoln Memorial, the patron saint of the Negro." Chairman Rogers claimed that the morale of the schools was never higher, and that the debt was already provided for in the budget of the coming year. He alluded to the death of Dr. Lucien C. Warner, who had served on the executive committee for 33 years, and his unparalleled record on financial problems. Out of his busy life he gave one and a half days in every month. In 79 years the A. M. A. has expended over $26,000,000, not including more than $9,000,000 in trust funds, with not a dollar ever lost. He applied the remark of an aged and thrifty Negro, "And now if any colored man done better than that, he done exceedingly well."

He alluded to the new and strong institutions that have become independent of the Association and asked, "What mother would have her children perpetual infants?" Sixty years ago, not one quarter of one per cent could read; today the illiterate Negroes are less than 30 per cent. Their taxes are over a billion dollars. There are more than 100,000 farms owned and cultivated. The pickaninny bare-foot boy is no longer the type of those being educated, for the great majority are securing secondary education. All Southern states now support public schools for Negroes. But race prejudice is not over. Here in the capital, the National Council cannot hold a banquet because it cannot invite all its members.

The Southern Highlands

Prof. Edgar H. Elam spoke on the highlanders, describing the section extending from Pennsylvania and Maryland to Georgia, which contains 2,000 square miles and 4,000,000 souls. Here are resources unsurpassed in the world. Ninety-five per cent of the population are native born Anglo-Saxon stock, but they are the result of their environment. "Here is an appeal moving enough to make one turn his pockets inside out," for the World War revealed their rugged character. Christian education is meeting this situation at Pleasant Hill Academy, the only mountain school of the Congregational Churches, "Our last stand in the Highlands." More than 90 per cent of the students here, all the way from five to 31 years of age, are working their own way. Of the $36,000 the A. M. A. provides $20,000; the rest must come from the people.

Missionary Dividends

Prof. W. H. Holloway told again the story of the Negroes' needs. Using imagery from high finance, he declared that "dealing in futures was nothing compared with what the A. M. A. did when it made the first plunge, but today you are clipping coupons."

United States will not be written until the drama, tragedy, and comedy that has touched so many sides of our national life through the work of the Association is recorded. Eighty thousand Negro soldiers sleep side by side with white soldiers on World War battlefields. All this bears the stamp of Congregationalism. The black folks understand all we have done for them.

Dr. Speer's Interracial Message

One of the highest points in the Counci was reached when Robert E. Speer gave hi expert message on the racial situation. H surprised all by showing how modern th race problem is: there is no article in th Encyclopedia Britannica upon it. Using a a foil the anti-Christian attempt at the solu tion, by Lothrop Stoddard, Dr. Speer stresse the real struggle of common Christian men and women to grapple with it. He admitte that the problems of war and race are intertwined, but asserted that "some day th war-mongers will strike those chords in th human heart and will find them dumb.' And yet the race problem will still be here The institution of race was intended to be a blessing and not a curse. It is a provision for the diverse education of humanity, enabling it to assail problems in specialized ways.

No one race can say that it holds pre-eminence. The Negro and the Chinese have won, by the ethics of Jesus, higher moral values than the Anglo-Saxon. All the formula we need for our international problem is the "family of races." "I cannot unbrother my brother." Only in terms of family life can we discover the economic impossibility of one race permanently exploiting another. We must try to pool these diversified values but believe in a genuine spiritual unity, binding men together in some way as a son is bound to his father. Dr. Speer closed by saying that he would eat with a man or woman of any other race.

Tribute to Professor Holloway

One of the remembered moments of the great meeting was when a delegate rose on the floor and asked that light be thrown on the face of Professor Holloway, as he stood behind the amplifiers, for "he is giving us one of the finest pieces of literature." Moderator Harwood happily alluded next day to Professor Holloway's paper: "There is evolution for you with a vengeance." And again as he introduced the next speaker, he

Rankin Memorial Chapel, Howard University, Washington

A ship came to New England, the crew mutinied and brought the ship into a port of freedom. Here is the symbolism of a race that could take control of its own destiny. Here was the black just out of Africa and here the finest and best in New England, and the latter built a long span in language, a bridge between economic need and power, between wisdom and ignorance. And best of all, as we see it now, the A. M. A. has been building a bridge between the Negro and his own self-respect.

Dr. Atkins had somehow made all feel the force of what he called "the imponderables," so that his closing illustration, from his walk about the Capital on the previous evening, contained as much realism as symbolism. He saw the stars above the Washington Monument shaft and compared that vision to the creation of the eighteenth century which offered the rights of the individual to the world, as its contribution. He saw the stars above the Capitol dome and this outlined to him the message of the nineteenth century, restless in administration and national pride, but when he reached the Lincoln Memorial, it was too dark to see the great sad face of the great sad figure, or his great words on the walls. Yet here was the prophecy of the future, here alone we learn how to live together as Lincoln taught us, and all lesser things are lost in darkness.

Plato Durham on Co-operation

The next speaker to be embarrassed by the fearful barrage of the amplifiers was Prof. Plato Durham, but his determined face above it overcame the artificial effect upon the voice. He described a meeting at Atlanta at the close of the world war, when a company of men sought to keep alive idealism and to bring about fair dealing among the races. "We came together, when other men had failed, and when politics had blundered. Our first step was a discovery of a world of things of which we didn't dream. We found that the two races were growing more and more apart, that deep suspicion was being engendered which boded ill for the church and state. White men did not know the cultured and aspiring Negro. There was a total lack of confidence between the two races. A distinguished Negro after much pressure to speak out declared that there was not a living Negro who had any confidence in a living white man. He did not believe, either, in our democracy or our religion. Our meeting resulted in the organization of an 'inter-racial commission' composed of leaders of both races. This central commission reproduced itself in each state and county. Selected white men and selected colored men met monthly. Any particular injustice to the Negro personality was treated in these conferences according to the spirit of Christ.

"One of the colored members of this conference said of it: 'You have acknowledged that we are men by letting us sit around this table.' The motto of this whole movement was 'Don't do it for me, let me help you do it.' It was a new experience for the Negro not to be told, but to be asked.

"One result of this process has been a different tone in Southern newspapers. Editors could formerly see only the criminal and dangerous Negroes as the output of the race. Today, when some Negro does a great task they fling it across headlines and recognition of Negro achievement has had much to do with the restoration of confidence in the white man. Much lynching has been prevented, schoolhouses have been built, tenements of the poor renovated.

"When a Negro was being hunted in a swamp, our inter-racial commission met. One member said, 'I will carry this thing to the Supreme Court of the United States, and I'll pay for it.' But finally we interested the governor of the state, and his own automobile was sent after the refugee. When he was found he was put in the bottom of the car and carried through the mob to safety."

Professor Durham, as well as Dr. Atkins, like many another delegate to the National Council, stood at dusk before the Lincoln Memorial. His deep feeling on the occasion he gave to us in his closing words: "America is at stake. That flag must come down unless we solve this race problem. You must get you another religion, too, as well as another flag, if you do not give the heart of Christ full way in his own religion."

Moving Toward Mergers

The National Council Approves Reorganizations

WHILE a National Council meeting means a glorious holiday to some hundreds of people who are free to go to meeting or sightseeing at will, it also means something of a strain to a real delegate; and if one chances also to have been drafted for special service, like the Committee of Twelve within the Commission on Missions, then a Council meeting is no picnic. Quite possibly the busiest dozen people in evidence were this group of eight men and four women who spent uncounted hours in Washington amending and polishing their report as to the best way in which to simplify our missionary machinery for more efficient and fruitful results. The last tentative draft of their report, submitted some months ago, appeared in revised typewritten form, and again in revised printed form, and with still other changes from the committee itself to meet valid criticisms from the house before the report was finally adopted. Far into one night they worked, so late that their revision could not be presented promptly in print; but always they were serene in the public eye and their individual utterances in debate were as suave and unhurried as if they were people of leisure in friendly conversation in their own homes.

The great debate began on Wednesday morning with the reading of the latest draft of the report by the chairman, Dr. William Horace Day of Bridgeport, Ct. Only 500 typed copies of the 34 page report were available when the reading began, so that it was necessary for Dr. Day to read the whole of the 55 minute report. A further hindrance was the silence of the amplifiers owing to the hope that the Council could economize on this heavy expense for the forenoon sessions. But the operator was eventually found and the later reading was audible to all when speakers could be made to stay put behind the desk.

When the long reading, interrupted occasionally by negative votes on motions to dispense with further reading, was finally over, Dr. Day called on Henry K. Hyde of Massachusetts, a banker and business man, to explain as simply as possible the points which the committee stressed as desirable changes in the administration of our missionary work. These points are three: unified promotion, consolidation of societies, and merging of periodicals. By common consent the early debate focussed upon the consolidation of societies, and especially upon the union of the home boards. Everybody seemed to take it for granted that the American Board and the three Women's Boards were already one happy family for whom corporate unity would be an easy and congenial step. So the real debate was on the merging of the home boards and chiefly on the legal merging of the separate corporations.

COMPROMISED PROPOSALS

Dr. J. P. Huget, president of the Extension Boards, declared his desire not to criticize or obstruct but to advocate, approve, and promote. Recognizing certain great values in the witness of our various societies, and certain legal aspects of the status of trust funds belonging to the separate societies, he was nevertheless willing to support the merger if the committee would only remove the obstacle of actual incorporation. From such a point of view he believed we could make history on the level of vision and spiritual power.

In harmony with this position, Dr. G. G. Atkins of Detroit offered an amendment proposing administrative union minus legal consolidation. To anticipate the fate of this amendment after considerable discussion, it may be said here that the vote revealed the temper of the Council, a rising vote showing at least 75 per cent of the delegates against modification.

Also to anticipate a harmonizing move by the committee, there was at a later session while the debate was still on, for it occupied parts of three days, a supplementary statement added to the committee report, as follows:

"This proposal deals with the affairs of what are in fact several distinct corporations which have separate properties and separate control over various trust funds. It is the purpose that all trust funds shall be faithfully conserved and administered according to the expressed wish of the donors and in all respects according to law and good conscience; therefore, notwithstanding anything elsewhere in this proposal written, it is to be understood to be the meaning of this proposal that as a condition precedent to the action of the several societies in taking the steps herein proposed, or any of them, each shall satisfy itself that the step proposed to be taken can be taken without violating any of the provisions of the trusts involved, and this shall include the prior submission of the matter to the courts, for their judgment, where that procedure shall seem wise and can be done."

In the general debate Dean Brown of Yale advocated a five-society program along the lines of natural cleavage and affiliation. It is not the need of new methods that troubles us but failure to work the machinery that we already have. To this Dr. H. J. Chidley of Winchester, Mass., replied that it is the machinery which is the matter at issue, and Roger W. Babson exhorted the societies to catch up with the twentieth century. He feels sure of greater support for the new plan.

The colored brethren were as divided in opinion as the rest of the Council. Dr. Haynes of New York feared that with the merging of the American Missionary Association the Negro would get less emphasis than ever in the general view; but Rev. C. W. Burton of Chicago, ex-assistant moderator, deprecated special emphasis upon his people and hoped that the consciousness of differences in color might fade away.

THE LOYALTY OF THE WOMEN

Miss Helen Calder of the Woman's Bo met the issue from the standpoint of women. They are ready to co-operate in a plan that seems wisest and best, but they fear the reaction, from their present indepe ent status, always free from debt, to that of corporation with societies that are chronica in debt. Further, they fear the loss of vol teer workers who now are enlisted in the lead ship of branches and auxiliaries, and who w be tempted to think that the merger will lease them from responsibility and put the b den upon masculine shoulders. The same fe was expressed by Mrs. Franklin Warner, pr ident of the Woman's Board. She said frank "We do not want to be merged, yet we wa to play the game and we have faith in C gregational gentlemen." She also said that a obstacle can be circumvented if the desire in our hearts. Mrs. H. C. Herring also shar in the debate, hoping that the merger would effective in getting the men into action.

Dr. Oscar Maurer of New Haven, speaki as trustee of the A. M. A., one of the corpo tions presumably to be merged, said that a v keen sense of trusteeship, not lightly surr dering trusts imposed, is not a detriment to denomination; and he suggested that if a per-corporation be necessary and inevita there should be but one covering all the boar home and foreign. Dr. E. B. Allen of Oak Pa Ill., pointed the distinction between merg and submerging, with the hope that distinct values might not be lost. Pres. E. C. Moore the American Board said that details wo need to be worked out very carefully by societies. At least a dozen other people had chance to say something pertinent and possi impertinent during the debate. They rep sented Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, O Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri, C orado, California, and Japan, witnessing to wide-spread concern felt on the subject, "fr sun-kist California to sin-kust New York," Hugh Elmer Brown summed it up.

Mrs. Warner, already quoted, was the fi speaker before the vote was taken, and gracious, forceful remarks elicited the great applause accorded any debater, and she spo only by request. She seemed to clear the w for a vote, which was moved on proposition of the committee's report, concerning "un cation and organization." The result was el tric. Surpassing the Kansas City vote Council reorganization in 1913, when one lo delegate stood up in opposition, there was one opposing vote after the mass of affirmat voters had resumed their seats. That ma it easy to pass sections II and III una mously and immediately, touching "relations state and national organizations" and "co- dination and promotion." The latter inclu a new alignment of the Commission on M sions, contemplating a membership compos of the Prudential Committee of the Forei Board, the directors of the Home Board, 36 ea in their new form, and nine members at lar 81 in all, of whom one-third in each class mu be women.

ABOUT MERGING PERIODICALS

The era of good feeling quickly yielded war-clouds when the subject of merging t missionary magazines and The Congregationalist came up under the final section of the port. Dr. A. E. Pierce of Boston moved resubmission to the committee to report 1927. An aye and no vote was indecisive; was an uncounted rising vote, and only vision of the house could it be ascertained much divided the house really was. The ion was 266 to 208 against postponement. ie delegates argued pro and con to the end ie session, had more to say next day in American Board meeting about sacrificing Missionary Herald; and finally, in the next ess session of the Council, after further uous debate enlivened by brilliant flashes umor, the Council voted to refer it back ie Committee of Twelve for two years' sideration.

the Psalmist's word about affliction being for one's soul be true, then The Congre-nalist received the mixed blessings of medi- and balm, for it felt the thorns before it smell the roses in the proffered bouquets. It may also be surmised that the Missionary Herald will be the gainer by the free and flattering advertising it received. The opinion was voiced more than once that if the denominational newspaper needs subsidizing, as most denominational organs do, it should be from the Council treasury and not, as at present, from a missionary society's treasury. The debate in the American Board meeting was practically unanimous in its fear of injuring the Herald. In the Council the opposite fear was voiced that The Congregationalist would be hurt in a combination. Quite possibly the desire not to run counter to the decision of the American Board was responsible for not forcing this final part of the whole merger proposition. Two years may alter the situation, or at least throw new light upon it.

In its final form, as adopted by the Congregational National Council, Washington, October 24, 1925

WE believe in making the social and spiritual ideals of Jesus our test for comity as well as for individual life; in gthening and deepening the inner personal ionship of the individual with God, and reczing his obligation and duty to society. is crystalized in the two commandments esus: "Love thy God and love thy neigh-' We believe this pattern ideal for a Chris- social order involves the recognition of sacredness of life, the supreme worth of single personality, and our common mem-hip in one another—the brotherhood of all. hort, it means creative activity in co-opera- with our fellow human beings, and with in the everyday life of society and in the lopment of a new and better world social r. Translating this ideal nto education means:

1) The building of a social order in which y child has the best opportunity for de-pment.

2) Adequate and equal educational opportunity for all, with the possibility of extended ning for those competent.

3) A thorough and scientific program of ious and secular education designed to stianize everyday life and conduct.

4) Conservation of health, including care-nstruction in sex hygiene and home build-abundant and wholesome recreation facili- and education for leisure, including a on-wide system of adult education.

5) Insistence on constitutional rights and es, including freedom of speech, of the s, and of peaceable assemblage.

6) Constructive education and Christian of dependents, defectives, and delinquents, rder to restore them to normal life when- possible, with kindly segregation for those are hopelessly feeble-minded. (This means such institutions as the jails, prisons, and an asylums should be so conducted as to be ine centers for education and health.)

7) A scientifically planned program of in-national education promoting peace and -will and exposing the evils of war, intox-s, illiteracy, and other social sins.

Into industry and economic relationships means:

1) A reciprocity of service—that group in-ts, whether of labor or capital, must al-s be integrated with the welfare of society whole, and that society in its turn must re justice to each group.

2) A frank abandonment of all efforts to re something for nothing, and recognition that all ownership is a social trust involving Christian administration for the good of all and that the unlimited exercise of the right of private ownership is socially undesirable.

3) Abolishing child labor and establishing standards for the employment of minors which will insure maximum physical, intellectual and moral development.

4) Freedom from employment one day in seven, the eight-hour day as the present maximum for all industrial workers.

5) Providing safe and sanitary industrial conditions especially protecting women; adequate accident, sickness, and unemployment insurance, together with suitable provision for old age.

6) An effective national system of public employment bureaus to make possible the proper distribution of the labor forces of America.

7) That the first charge upon industry should be a minimum comfort wage and that all labor should give an honest day's work for an honest day's pay.

8) Adequate provision for impartial investigation and publicity, conciliation, and arbitration in industrial disputes.

9) The right of labor to organize with representatives of its own choosing and where able to share in the management of industrial relations.

10) Encouragement of the organization of consumers' co-operatives for the more equitable distribution of the essentials of life.

11) The supremacy of the service, rather than the profit motive in the acquisition and use of property on the part of both labor and capital, and the most equitable division of the product of industry that can be devised.

III. Into agriculture means:

(1) That the farmer shall have access to the land he works, on such terms as will ensure him personal freedom and economic encouragement, while society is amply protected by efficient production and conservation of fertility.

(2) That the cost of market distribution from farmer to consumer shall be cut to the lowest possible terms, both farmers and consumers sharing in these economies.

(3) That there shall be every encouragement to the organization of farmers for economic ends, particularly for co-operative sales and purchases.

(4) That an efficient system of both vocational and general education of youths and adults living on farms shall be available.

(5) That special efforts shall be made to ensure the farmer adequate social institutions, including the church, the school, the library, means of recreation, good local government, and particularly the best possible farm home.

(6) That there shall be a widespread development of organized rural communities, thoroughly democratic, completely co-operative, and possessed with the spirit of the common welfare.

(7) That there shall be the fullest measure of friendly reciprocal co-operation between the rural and city workers.

IV. Into racial relations means:

(1) The practice of the American principle of the same protection and rights for all races who share our common life.

(2) The elimination of racial discrimination, and substitution of full brotherly treatment for all races in America.

(3) The fullest co-operation between the churches of various races, even though of different denominations.

(4) Educational and social equipment for the special needs of immigrants, with government information bureaus.

V. Into international relations means:

(1) The removal of every unjust barrier of trade, color, creed, and race, and the practice of equal justice for all nations.

(2) The administration of the property and privileges within each country so that they will be of the greatest benefit not only to that nation but to all the world.

(3) Discouragement of all propaganda tending to mislead peoples in their international relations or to create prejudice.

(4) The replacement of selfish imperialism by such disinterested treatment of backward nations as to contribute the maximum to the welfare of each nation and of all the world.

(5) The abolition of military armaments by all nations except for an internal police force.

(6) That the church of Christ as an institution should not be used as an instrument or an agency in the support of war.

(7) A permanent association of the nations for world peace and good-will, the outlawry of war, and the settling of all differences between nations by conference, arbitration, or by an international court.

We believe it is the duty of every church to investigate local moral and economic conditions as well as to know world needs. We believe that it is only as our churches themselves follow the example and spirit of Jesus in the fullest sense—translating these social ideals into the daily life of the church and the community—that we can ever hope to build the Kingdom of God on earth.

These affirmations we make as Christians and loyal citizens of our beloved country. We present them as an expression of our faith and patriotism. We urge upon all our citizens the support of our cherished institutions, faithfulness at the ballot, respect for law, and loyal support of its administrators. We believe that our country can and will make a great contribution to the realization of Christian ideals throughout the world.

The Young People's Washington Pilgrimage

A Notable Week-End with the National Council

"THE Junior Council," so the photographer dubbed them. "The Young People's Pilgrimage" was the official designation of the 325 youth and their program. They came from Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Iowa, and other states. They slept in the special Pullman trains which landed them in Washington on Friday morning. When they were not sleeping they were pilgrims to the shrines of the nation in and around the city.

They began naturally enough at the Capitol and were escorted through its length and breadth by professional guides. They learned many lessons in government and history as they wandered through those halls. Then Hon. Clyde Kelly, a Congressman from Pennsylvania and a United Presbyterian, bound patriotism and religion together as he talked to the young people of "the most democratic church in the world," as he expressed it. He likened the Capitol to Inspiration Point in the Yosemite and the Pilgrim monument of Faith. The only foundation for real patriotism and good citizenship is religion.

At George Washington University, an institution with 5,300 students, they were treated to an interesting and illuminating stereopticon lecture on the City of Washington both historically, artistically, and architecturally considered. At noon they were received at the White House by the President and Mrs. Coolidge in a very cordial manner, and placed in the forefront of the Council picture on the White House grounds.

The Episcopal Cathedral on Mt. Saint Albans was visited in the afternoon. There in Bethlehem Chapel, Canon Anson Phelps Stokes, for many years secretary of Yale University, explained what a cathedral is and why it is. He made plain the principal points in Gothic architecture and then took the pilgrims upstairs to see such parts of the noble structure as is finished, and made them feel the grandeur of the finished structure. It was a fine lesson in church architecture and some Congregational young folk will be more intelligent as to nave, choir, apse, transept, and even clerestories.

At Arlington Cemetery

Past Fort Meyer and the National University the young people rode to the great silent city of the dead at Arlington. From Lee's mansion they gazed across the Potomac at the City Beautiful. The crowning moment of the day was when the sun was sinking in the west, and its rays fell on the group gathered around the tomb of the Unknown Soldier, as Dorothy Allee of Ridgefield, Ct., and Paul Cullen of Waterbury, Ct., placed a wreath there as a tribute from the young people. There was breathless hush as Rev. Harry T. Stock lifted their hearts and thoughts to a high level in a rare prayer of dedication. The Piedmont College Male Quartet sang sympathetically two selections.

General Lejeune, the commandant of the marines, and commander of the second division in the world war, gave an address that was a real sermon. Patriotism and religion have this in common, self-sacrifice for the sake of others. Patriotism is and must be a thing of the spirit and not material. He urged them earnestly to serve their Christ and so to be worthy of their country. The general is a vestry-man and a loyal member of the Episcopal Church of the Epiphany.

Rev. Robert J. Locke of Champaign, Ill., and also pastor of a thousand students at the university, emphasized in a fervent, impressive address, first, liberty—what it is, what it cost, and what are we going to do with it; secondly, the "unknown" in all walks of life, who have sacrificed and served humanity and their country. He closed with an appeal for dedication and self-sacrifice. And as one felt the atmosphere and looked into the faces of those young people, one believed that they would be worthy of the past and the future.

In the evening the young people attended in a body the session of the Council in charge of the American Board and "turned into" their sleepers tired but happy.

In the Council

How it rained and poured on Saturday morning! "We cannot control the weather, but we can control ourselves," Secretary Andrews said to them laconically and they did right well. No grouch nor growl did we hear, but everybody was making the best of it.

Secretary W. S. Beard introduced them to the exhibit with this story. At a certain country fair the charge for admission was fifty cents for one, seventy-five cents for two, and a dollar for a whole family. A man applied with his dollar and a family reaching in a single line to the road. "Are all these your family?" asked the ticket-taker. "Yes, boss!" was the reply. "Then come in free, all of you. You'll be the best exhibit we've got." The young people were the best "exhibit" of the Council.

Then the young people were informed that they came to the Council to see what their church was doing in the state, in the nation, in the world, in school, in college, in race relations, and in education. "You know what your church is doing in your own community, but this is to make real to you the work of your church in its wider reach."

"They are the best crowd we have received and shown around," was the verdict at the National Academy of Science. Dr. F. E. A. Thone of "Science Service"—the national news bureau of the scientific societies—explained the building and the societies it houses. Further he assured them that there was no conflict between science and religion. His chief, Dr. E. E. Slosson, who was absent in Kansas, is a deacon in Mount Pleasant Church, Washington, and sometimes occupies the pulpit. The scientific instruments, the photographs, and the various methods of popular science were of great interest to the crowd, who eagerly examined and investigated.

Pilgrims in the Rain

The rains still descended and the floods came, but the enthusiasts kept on to the magnificent Lincoln Memorial and were deeply impressed by it. The speeches which were to have been delivered here and at the Washington Monument were given at the Pan American Building, which in itself, as interpreted by the guides, was a great object lesson in peace and how to overcome race hatreds.

Dr. William E. Barton explained in an interesting and informing fashion the Lincoln Memorial—its significance, its meaning, and its purpose. Then he spoke briefly of Lincoln, the young people's hero and Lincoln the man of God. "I have promised my Maker to do this," was his word to the Cabinet which was hostile to the Emancipation Proclamation, and no protest was made against such an ultimatum and his signature.

"The Washington Monument stands no only for the great leader, but for the grea group with slender resources but great prin ciples that founded this Republic. It re minds us of the place of personality in th making of a government like ours. It is no made by fourth-rate men. But Lincoln an Washington had, too, the great quality of co operation and working with others to attai their ends. These two things are necessary— making the most and best of ourselves and th ability to work with others for a common end. In this way was Washington Monument inter preted by Bishop McDowell of the Methodis Church.

In the afternoon the pilgrimage was mad to Mount Vernon by electric railway. A sto was made at Christ Church, Alexandria, an most of the party visited the church of Wash ington and of Lee. Mount Vernon was beauti ful in its autumn foliage in spite of the rain Because of the rain the address was not mad at the tomb of Washington but on the broa portico of the house. The speaker was Rev Oscar Maurer, who at the request of the Ro tary Club of New Haven has made a specia study of the human side of Washington. H drew him not as general or statesman, but i his human every-day life about Mount Vernon He brought him back to earth and to life an made us see the man and his heart.

There was mass singing and plenty of fun o the way down and great cheering for the leader of the party on the way back as the steame carried the party up the Potomac to Washing ton again—and to the Auditorium.

Rev. Robbins Barstow's Message

On Saturday the young people had specia seats in the Council reserved for them. Th vested choir of the Lincoln Memorial Churc sang with fervor and feeling some fine musi under the leadership of Miss Mary L. Europa Rev. Horace F. Holton of Brockton, Mass., le the devotional service. Rev. Robbins Barstow of Madison, Wis., took his text from Steven son's "Crabbed Age and Youth." He said h expected to be called by his seniors "a youn upstart" and by his juniors "an old fogy." Reading an indictment of a fashionable board ing school and its product which sounded very modern, he said it was written by Wesley in 1772. On a Babylonian brick written, accord ing to Usher's Chronology, where Adam an Eve were raising Cain was a melancholy pro test against their obstreperous offspring by th parents of that day.

Stevenson tells us that it is as natural fo the young to beat about in their cage to ge free as it is for mothers to love their children or old men to grow gray. The world owe an immeasurable debt to wild youth from Chris to Columbus, and from Paul to the Pilgrim Fathers with more than a score on the May flower under 21 and the leaders younger tha the speaker.

The trouble with this generation is that i has introduced new factors faster than it can assimilate them. We carry too much sai aloft, too little cargo below. The parents o today are to blame for the "undigested oppor tunities," as Coe calls them, of possession power, and freedom. They ought to be our servants and not our master.

If the fathers and mothers are "motor mad radio ragged, and jazz infected," can you blame their children for following after and traveling faster and farther on thin ice than their par ents? If they exalt the profit motive, can you expect anything but that the young people will grab for gain and exalt wealth? But really the vulgar minority of the young folk are get-too much advertisement for their speed and ir clothes.

Three great necessities present themselves as emedy for these conditions. First, on the t of the older generation there is need of ore thorough demonstration of sanity, as to values. We must throttle profit as the f motive in favor of sharing and serving.
me must be something more than a point of arture, a small collection of rooms, a hat k, coffee pot, and bed. We must quit spurnpeace with race hatreds of various kinds;
our great armaments.

econdly, the younger generation must indie responsiveness to the challenge of the best.
Adam and total depravity is all bunk even the light of these young folk. Young folks naturally friendly, not interested in inited hatreds. We want a new deal and a are deal. We are in earnest about brother-
d. Let us refuse the hand-me-downs of liocrity and as we come into power infuse rith our God-given dreams and enthusiasms.

Ministers are asked to give their pulpits to every cause. The early church was embarrassed by a multitude of saint's days. Safety First, Military Training, Pacifism, Better Homes, League of Nations, and a hundred less honorable demand a week and a pulpit. The advocates of this kind of propaganda assure us that it is "timely."

The chief concern of religion is not with the timely. "In the sanctuary one ought to be led into the presence of the timeless."

Nicodemus came to Jesus for a discussion but what he got was an ultimatum. He would have talked over the things of government and the day. You, a teacher, must know that by the things of the spirit alone you can be lifted.

Men are hungering for reality. They resent the secular in the house of God. They want elbow-room for the soul. In that modern novel, One Increasing Purpose, Hutchinson says, "The cry was that the church had lost hold on the people. The truth was the people had lost their hold on the church."

The Amphitheater at Arlington Cemetery

The third necessity is constructive and corative endeavor by youth and age for high al ideals. Age and youth can live together not in two hostile camps, but just as we mingled here, gray heads and black and d united now in a common loyalty and inst.

his does not imply that youth must submit the process of hydraulic pressing into an-it molds. Neither does it imply that we st vacate all the conference seats and clear boards for every vast experiment of youth.
ith can be counted on to suggest the changes age can serve by keeping them appropriate.
he dynamic of all this is a young man with right interpretation and teaching of possess-is, power, and freedom. The only prescripi for youth is not hypodermic injections of hteenth Century piety or century-old rchianity, but the contagion of the spirit
Jesus. We must take Jesus in earnest.

he young people were enthusiastic over this ress and felt that Mr. Barstow was both r ambassador and interpreter. At the close his address they made their final pilgrimage the day to the Union Station and bed.

Lichliter on Elbow-Room for the Soul

Mr. Barstow went to Stevenson for his text;
r. M. H. Lichliter, D.D., of Columbus, O., k his text from King John as reported by kespeare, "My soul hath elbow-room."

piritual hunger is the source of many cults is driving our youth in spiritual quests for roomy church. Mysticism is the protest inst dogma and revolt against ecclesiastins.

he church is in no danger of surrender.
st of the prophets of despair are not active tors. To the active pastor come folk seeking low-room for the soul, with problems of relia, sorrows, fears, doubts, and maladjust-nts.

The church did try in the past not to lose its hold. It furnished community centers, athletics, dramatics, and a seven-day program. The sanctuary became an audience room. Striking popular music and movies were used to meet the competition of theater and amusement hall. These demands were superficial. The result was the everlasting difference between gathering an audience and building a church.

Then the church began to forget the cry and turn to the fact. The church began to mind its own business so effectively that it is beginning to meet the spiritual hunger of our age. In the time of spiritual destitution, the measure of their own indifference is the measure of their need. Often has the Parable of the Prodigal been dramatized in the life of the nation.

The church is schooling itself in the strategy of Pentecost. We must:

1. Simplify our methods of approach and overhaul the conditions of church membership. We need to get back to the Salem and similar covenants and pattern after them.

2. We need to get back to preach the simple gospel and have faith in that gospel to reach and reform life. Reconciliation is its great word,—reconciliation to God and to each other. It proclaims personality and not program.

3. We need to open a new door to the layman. The Unitarian Laymen's League, and the Universalist Men's Movement, led by Arthur Nash, is a demonstration of what can be done. How can any one deny that such work and movement is evangelical? The day of the layman in earnest has come. The day has come for the church to issue its ultimatum, not in competition with other institutions but as the unencumbered bearer of the spiritual life.

Dr. Lichliter closed with an original hymn which together with his address we expect will appear in The Congregationalist.

Many felt that this was one of the very highest points reached in the Council. Dr. Lichliter spoke like a man aflame with a mighty passion and with a prophetic earnestness that stirred the great congregation to applause and cries of approval. He lifted men to that high spiritual plane which he had been proclaiming as the business of the minister and the church.

The Pilgrimage on Sunday

Most of the young folks were on hand at nine o'clock Sunday morning at the First Congregational Church in spite of the torrents of rain. The pastor, Dr. J. N. Pierce, conducted the service. Dr. M. H. Lichliter preached the sermon on "The Mystic Among the Realists"—from the theme from Peter's question, "How many times shall I forgive him?" and Jesus answered, "Seventy times seven." Four hundred and ninety and then I am done. Turn the other cheek and when mine enemy strikes the second time, I smite him between the eyes.

That is realism, expert in arithmetic, especially in addition and multiplication. The mystic knows higher mathematics, the nth power and such. The mystic is the engineer bridging chasms and harnessing the ocean, his feet on the earth, his head in the clouds. Peter is the eternal realist. Jesus is the eternal mystic, telling us there is no terminus nor frontier to love. Men are forever interpreting his sayings into a realistic spirit. "I and the Father are one" meant to him unity of spirit and consecration; the realist turns it into theological dogma.

The idealist, the prophets have had harsh treatment from the crowd. Emerson, Whitman, Theodore Parker, Roger Williams, Wesley, Carey, Duff—breakers of trails have been often broken on them. But the mystic rules eternities.

Do we honor Christ more by slavish adherence to his word—or by seeking to reproduce his spirit and attitude toward truth? This is the difference between realism and idealism.

Tolstoi was no idealist. He took the Sermon on the Mount literally and sacrificed all his estate to that interpretation.

It is a great thing to get youth to commit itself to the Jesus way of life, but when one insists that it means "a pledge never to engage in war," or that "no Christian can belong to a college Greek letter fraternity"—that's Peter.

Some types of people must have programs, social creeds, formulæ. They cannot be trusted with Christ alone. The idealists revolt against external authority whether it be of the church or the Bible. He believes in them. needs them, but he rests his case on his own inner consciousness.

The students, the young people protest against shutting Christ in formulæ and definition. They want to feel that the Christian life is an adventure not a rule, but that it is possible for them to contribute something to Christianity in the making. Dare we trust Jesus to man? Mabel Shaw in Rhodesia met a problem in training the African girls on account of sexual precocity. Shocking habits were a part of their life. Should she show them how horrible they were? Should she practice repression? No! she would make real Jesus' life to these girls. As she did and his life and teaching gripped them, on their own initiative they gave up their shocking practices. The heart of young people can be trusted to apply Jesus.

The preacher closed with the legend of Christ walking with Gabriel. Gabriel was discouraged but the cause of Christ was making so little progress. "Haven't you thought of some other way of reaching men and bringing in thy kingdom?" "I have no other way," said the Lord Christ.

Discussion

From the church the next step was to the young people's assembly and round table at the Auditorium under the direction of Secretary Harry T. Stock. "Are we going to be talked to again?" the young folks asked. "No, this is a chance for you to get anything off your chest, or off your mind if there is anything on it." Mr. Stock then conducted one of the services of worship for young people as outlined in the Well- spring. The young people were then divided into groups according to age and sex, each group with a trained leader. All the groups discussed the same question, "What kind of a church do the young people want?" All these findings are to be gathered together by the central office and published.

Some of the reactions of the young people were as follows: From a group of young women, "We want the church to be the center of our social life. We want more simple and direct sermons. We want better trained teachers in our church school. We don't want to teach until we are better prepared. We wish the older folks would take their church job more seriously."

From a class of young men came these suggestions: "We want the men to get into the game. They don't put enough time into church work. We need their leadership. We do not want simply instruction on sermons, we want inspiration. We want more official recognition and more things to do. We don't want to be singled out and talked to as young people. This conflict between youth and age, which they talk about, doesn't bother us."

Christian Endeavor and Dr. Clark

From 5.30 to 7.30 the group were the guests of the young people of Washington. For an hour there was a social time with light refreshments. Then followed a service in charge of Washington Christian Endeavor. Chaplain Evan Scott made the prayer, the young people conducting the remainder of the worship. Rev. F. E. Clark, D.D., and Mrs. Clark were the week-end guests of the Washington Endeavorers who entertained them at the Powhatan. "Let us reassure Dr. Clark that we are standing by the real things of religion," said the leader. There "Faith of our Fathers" rang out and rang true as the young people greeted Father Endeavor Clark. Dr. Clark's address was on "Fidelity and Fellowship." He illustrated the first by the careers of Dan Poling, the new president of Christian Endeavor, and Calvin Coolidge. Fellowship meant brotherhood, interdenominational and interracial fellowship. The speaker illustrated how the Christian Endeavor young people of Germany and America came together at Coblenz during the American occupation and how the Dutch and English Christian Endeavorers paved the way to reconciliation in South Africa.

At the close of his address the young people paid their final visit to the Council session to hear Dr. James Gordon Gilkey on "The Challenge of the Church to the Youth of Today." There is no question about the success of this attempt to bring the young people to the National Council. The credit for the success should go to Chaplain Evan Scott, the chairman of the local committee, who worked tirelessly and ceaselessly in making arrangements in Washington and personally conducted every pilgrimage; to Dr. George R. Andrews of New York, who had charge of the publicity, and Secretary Harry T. Stock, who headed up the movement for the Education Society. Connecticut had the banner delegation of nearly 150 with a special train, and there's a reason. The reason is Dr. Oscar Maurer of New Haven and the state young people's summer conference at Storrs, of which he has been dean for two years. Connecticut had 275 young people there last summer and easily is the van of young people's work. Ask them how they do it!

There is no question that the young people received a denominational consciousness from this trip, and that they know more about what Congregationalism is and what it is doing than ever before. Lessons in patriotism, history, and government were imbibed in a way that will make a lasting impression. They also received a spiritual uplift, and religion looms bigger in their lives. The church is doing business they know and the church has a large place in its work for young folks.

Dr. Gilkey's Address

Dr. Gilkey's address will probably be printed in full in a later issue of The Congregationalist, but we must note these points:

When the juvenile mind makes the church a complete failure, what would it say of modern business if judged by a wretched corner stone, or of modern medicine if judged by the charlatans who disgrace the medical profession. Young people should not judge the church by its worst products but by its best.

Today sectarianism and prejudice are rapidly passing away. Comity and amity are the rule between denominations. Theological controversy of yesterday was illustrated by Toplady's attack on Wesley in "An Old Fox Tarred and Feathered." The church has gotten away from that. The opportunities today among young people for the Christian message were illustrated by incidents from a Pennsylvania college and from Amherst. The young woman wrote, "Our college is a place where we have perfectly respectable ideals and believe heartily in social service, but Christ is almost unknown and a definite personal religion does not exist. . . . The fact of the matter is, we all want to believe something, but we don't know what it is and nobody seems able to help us." These young people want to know whether in the light of our new knowledge we can still believe that God actually helps us in our struggle of life.

The second problem confronting our civilization is to create a new spirit of tolerance and good will between different groups and races, the task of pulling our modern community together.

The third problem is organizing our new world for peace. Everywhere about us are the reminders of a student generation swept away to sudden death. If the parade began tomorrow morning of these dead marching twenty abreas from sunrise to sunset it would take four months for the dead of Europe to march by. Our children must not pay that price again.

There is no quick and easy solution of this problem. Let us put the church's influence behind every project great or small that strengthens friendship and weakens hate. And in our own hearts and in the hearts of our children let us put the spirit of Christ. Friendship forgiveness, tolerance, unfaltering good will—here are the essentials of Jesus' own religion. They are the hope of the world.

Dr. Gilkey was especially impressive and dramatic as he pictured the ghosts of the former youth passing in review, and was appealing in the poem with which he closed, "The Lord Said: 'Say We.'"

The second address of the evening by Rev. T. C. Edwards of Pennsylvania was on "Way side Opportunities"—really a sermon on the healing of the lame man upon the text, "In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth," with applications of the theme to modern life.

What One Dad Thinks of Scouting

By Dr. L. L. Wirt

Happy the day when the Boy Scout Movement became an American institution! The idle time of the adolescent boy is dynamic—either for good or evil. When his restless hours are organized for the pursuit of healthful recreation by experts who understand his needs—when he adventures forth under guidance into the boy world of chivalry, romance, nature-lore, mechanics, physical prowess, and clan loyalty, something momentous has happened in the social order of our day.

Scouting is the ounce of prevention which is destined to prevent untold human wreckage by the simple expedient of directed energy at the turbulent point where the mountain torrents of boyhood meet and mingle with the quieter waters of manhood.

For three years I have watched the influence of Scouting upon my two sons. At first I thought it was only a passing spasm, like hair mucilage, or rabbits. But I was wrong. It stuck! A "Tenderfoot" was some punkins in the neighborhood. His achievement set him apart. It presented only a little hill, but it was a hill overcome. And then, there were other foothills beyond in the steadily ascending range, where one could always look down upon the "mavericks" of the plain and wave a Bill Hart Sombrero.

The devil still finds something for idle hands and idle minds to do, but the Boy Scouts have the devil on the run. They have no time to bother with him. They are busy—busy from school time to bed time. O, the messes I have had to swallow, to see if the "camp cooking" would pass muster; the blackened corkscrew "bread" I have sampled, taking it reverently from grimy hands, while anxious eyes watched the solemn tasting. I say "reverently," for the laughing "Fine, son, fine"! did not make it less a sacrament—an oath of love and understanding between my boy and me.

The "little fellow" topped the second hill in Scouting first, but there was no jealousy. The "big fellow" was as pleased as Punch, and struck out after his younger brother with grim determination. The mother and I wistfully watched them while the "little fellow" spurred on his slower brother.

When both became First Class Scouts neither was tired of the game. What is it, in Scouting that sustains the boys' interest? A lot of things probably, but the Scout Master is the chief conspirator. He is the devoted, efficient, lovable center of the Boy Scout world. I take off my hat to him!

Happy the father of two active boys who, knowing his city, its temptations, and slippery places, comes home night after night to meet a domestic situation like this: "Hello, dear! Dinner ready? Where are the boys?" "Over at the Scout Master's"; or, "Passing a test in Scouting"; or "Down in the basement working on some contraption required for a merit badge." Here they come, two young tornadoes, with oil on hands, faces, and clothes—clear-eyed, human, affectionate young bears. No time in those busy brains, thanks to Scouting, for evil thoughts; no street corners for them. "Say, dad, will you come with us Saturday, we gotta measure a quarter-section of land and plot it to scale for our merit badge in surveying?" Or, "Will you take us to the baths so we can do our last test in swimming?" Or, "Pop, are you good for a fourteen-mile hike? We've got to have your O.K." Or, "Look here, Pop, can you make twenty sailor knots?" Later, from Dad—"Mother, what is that awful noise?" Only the boys practising for their fife and drum meeting." Dear lads! They are in dreamland now out there on their sleeping porch, breathing air as pure as their souls. Their mother is sewing another merit badge on the sleeve of each Scout shirt. There's hardly room for another from wrist to shoulder.

Each badge represents a little hill which has been overcome. They have been topping a lot of hurdles lately, and climbing a lot of mountains, but they are not tired of Scouting. There is a snowy peak ahead, and occasionally I hear the "big fellow" whisper to the "little fellow," "Do you think I'll ever make it, kid?" "Sure you'll make it; we'll both make it; we gotta." "Gee, it will be great to be an Eagle Scout!"

Along the Council Trail

Snap-Shots from the Great Washington Meeting

By Herbert A. Jump

THE National Council was a symphony in sevens: seven flaring horns of the loud peaker; seven chairs on the stage at the open- g session; seven red stripes in the American ag that dangled from the ceiling; seven boxes ill of state superintendents at the left under e organ for the evening session Tuesday; ven moderators of assorted sizes and grades flank Calvin Coolidge; and to crown all, e "riz and fell" (as old Father Taylor of eamen's Bethel would say) seven times at e invitation of various persons in authority, usical directors and others, before that same ssion was properly started.

There were no signs of any reception committee when the dazed and timid mid-Western legation disembarked from their special in e Union Station. The Pessimist asserted, lason doesn't think we have any money out re; so we are not received." The Optimist plied, "No, but this is 7.30 A.M., too early an ur for the city of government employees." he Meliorist compromised by opining that ey had been there but had gone away for a hile for breakfast. "You have heard, haven't u?" he said, "of the preacher who was giv- g his funeral address over the body of a prom- ent citizen. Evidently moderatorial humor is to be en- yed with the hearing of the ear, not with the eing of the eye. For Dr. Potter carefully xpurgated from the printed report of his ad- ress the delicious witticism based on a re- ark by Professor Bacon of Yale. Said Dr. acon. "If we discover some day that twenty en in a class at the Divinity School have an- wered ten questions all absolutely alike, we now that something is wrong." So, contin- ed Dr. Potter, whenever you find twenty per- ons who answer questions about any of the igh subjects of our faith in absolutely the ame way, you know that those twenty are not eal Congregationalists.

"Phillips Brooks may have been ble to do it," he said. "He may have been able to have a string of pipe holders all round his study so that a pipe would always be accessible at hand as he strode round his room dictating sermons to his secretary. But you, gentlemen, are not Phillips Brooks's." The only result of his plea was the organization after his lecture of an impromptu and energetic Phillips Brooks Club.

Two young Congregationalists were brought to the Council by their parents from Vermont. "What are those four funny little watches hanging up there in front of the talking man?" asked Billy. The parents knew that these were the microphones connected with the loud-speaking apparatus. But Sally didn't know it. "They're to keep the man from talking too long," she replied. "One watch isn't enough to stop a preacher when he gets going."

Rev. C. A. Voss of Pittsburgh, spokesman for the newly-welcomed addition to our fellowship of churchmen from the Protestant Evangelical denomination, brought forth a roar of laughter by his story of the affectionate swain who had for the long evening been holding his beloved on his willing lap. "Am I heavy, Tom?" she asked at length. "Aren't you tired?" "Tired, darling?" he replied, "I'm numb."

Anent the welcoming of these Protestant Evangelicals who come mostly from Pittsburgh and Cincinnati, one enthusiastic delegate piped up, "If this denomination comes to us with any of the heroism of the Pittsburgh baseball team, we shall receive them with open arms." He was declared out of order.

Speaking of the recurring expression of desire to have the women take a larger part in the life of the denomination, a California pastor told the story of the rival haberdashers in Oxford, England. When one put a brass rail in front of his show window, the other did the same and also built a porte-cochère for his customers. And so the competition raged until finally one conceived the notion of securing a learned motto for his establishment. He consulted a don and a few days later the motto blossomed forth on a conspicuous sign: "Mens conscia recti." But, nothing daunted, his rival also put up a motto, a longer one and a more comprehensive and tactful one: "Men's and women's conscia recti."

A group of miscellaneous parsons were whiling away the hours of the evening in the lobby of the Mayflower Hotel. They fell to talking about Dr. Cadman's answers to questions which they had been following on the radio. One day he was asked, "Why did the angels at Bethel need to have a ladder?" His swift reply was, "I suppose they were molting just about that time." On another day he was asked, "Where is the abiding place of the dead?" His answer was, "Drop round to my church any Sunday morning and I can show you some of them in my congregation."

The Wednesday morning session brought the piece de resistance of the Council program, the report of the Committee of Twelve on reorganization. Seldom does Dean Brown lead a forlorn hope, but he did so on this occasion when he attempted to put a closure on the reading of the twenty-eight-page report by William Horace Day, the chairman. Evidently many of the fathers in Israel wanted time to prepare their little speeches on the subject, so the whole document was vocalized word by word, page numbers, section titles, and all. Then the Jubilee singers appropriately piped up:

Talk together, chillun, don' you get weary;
There's a great camp-meetin' in the promised lan'.

In connection with the voluminous document presented by Dr. Day some delegate revived the legend of old Dr. Day, formerly professor of missions in Yale Divinity School. He was a dear old man but he sometimes lacked terminal facilities. Accordingly of him it was remarked on one occasion,

And when to talk Day has begun,
The day is gone ere Day is done.

As the hearings on the reorganization plan continued, one was reminded of the yarn of the unfortunate chap who was found late one night considerably the worse for wear wandering round the Grand Central Station in New York City. "What's the matter with you?" asked a curious policeman. "I'sh lost my watch," replied the half-inebriated stroller. "Where did you have it last?" "Down round Madison Square, I guess." "Well, then, why are you looking for it round here?" and the officer of the law began to lose patience. "I'm lookin' for it round here, shir, because there's more light here."

At the close of his ritual he announced, "Will the persons desiring to be joined in wedlock come to the altar after the benediction?" They came. There were eighteen young women and one man.

Parables of Safed the Sage

The Parable of Ascent and Descent

The daughter of the daughter of Keturah climbed a Tree.

And how she managed to get up the nearly-bare Trunk to where the Branches began, I know not, for I was not there. But the lowest Branches were higher than my head. And when I passed that way, she was as high as she could climb, and the little Branches were swaying under her.

And I called to her, and said, Little Girl, dost thou require any help?

And she said, I got up alone and I can get down alone.

And as I passed not very far away, I looked again, and she had gotten as far down as the Large Branches, and below her was a Yawning Chasm.

And I called again, and said, Shall I help thee, my dear?

And again she said, but I thought less confidently, I can get down alone.

But I thought it just as well that I should go by that way, and when she saw me coming she waited.

Now I had rightly judged that while she did not want to ask for help she counted help most welcome when it came. And there are other folk like that, also.

And I reached up, and I said, Hold to the limb and slip down, and let Grandpa catch thee below.

And she did so. And very soon she was in my arms, and her little Red-gold head was on my shoulder, and she was clinging round my neck and sobbing.

And I said, Thou didst not cry when thou wert in danger, yet thou dost weep when the danger is past.

And she did in this even as her mother might have done, if she had wept at all.

And she said, O Grandpa, the Sky looks so near when one is climbing up, and the Earth so far away when one is coming down!

Now I considered how easy it was for the little girl to climb up, and the peril she encountered when she had to climb down. And I thought of some men who by accident or cleverness ascend to High Places which they are not able to maintain, where their Elevation is their Peril, and where it is harder to climb back with dignity to where they belong than it ever was for them to climb up.

And I, albeit I have not climbed high, and my place among the sons of men is that of an humble Philosopher and Prophet, I am the more willing to keep at least one foot on the ground the greater part of the time by reason of what I have witnessed of the Perils of those who climb beyond their Limit of Safety.

For the Sky looketh unto them so nigh while they are ascending, and the Earth is a long way distant when they have to climb down, if so be they climb down and do not fall.

Paul's Arrest in Jerusalem

Comment on the International Uniform Sunday School Lesson for November 15

Acts 21: 27-39

Paul's premonition that bonds and afflictions were awaiting him in Jerusalem was speedily fulfilled after his arrival there, though it became fulfilled under somewhat strange circumstances.

Paul had a cordial welcome from James and his associates in the church at Jerusalem, but almost in the very act of welcoming him they expressed their anxiety concerning certain r ports that had come regarding Paul's anti-J daistic tendencies. Paul had become a mi sionary to the Gentiles. He had very strong opposed the tendency of Peter and others place the Gentile Christian converts under tl obligations of the Jewish law. Apparent Paul, as a devout Jew, still observed the ritu of the law himself, but it had been report in Jerusalem that Paul had spoken again the law of Moses and had declared it to be r longer binding. James and his associates we deeply concerned about thousands of Jews w had accepted Christianity. They feared the i fluence of Paul's attitude upon them if Paul position were actually as it had been repr sented. Hence, they urged Paul that it wou be a wise thing for him to do something th would indicate his personal observance of tl Mosaic ritual, and they suggested that h should join four men who had a vow, in unde going the ritual of purification. Paul accepte this proposal, and entered into the temple fo this purpose with his four companions.

One cannot help but feel, in the light o Paul's experiences and in the light of muc that he wrote later in his epistles concernin the supremacy of Christ, that this was an el ment of weakness and compromise on Paul part hardly worthy of the full strength an vigor of the apostle. It had the results tha weak compromise usually has.

Paul was seen in the temple by certain Jew of Asia who had opposed his teaching there and these men raised a great outcry denoun ing Paul as a destroyer of the Jewish religio and as one who had polluted the temple throug bringing certain Greeks into the sacred en closure. As a matter of fact Paul does no seem to have been guilty of this which was a offense from the Jewish standpoint, but it wa assumed that certain Greeks, who were in th temple and in whose company Paul had bee seen in the city, had been brought there b him. The result was that the mob seized Paul dragged him out of the temple, and were abou to kill him when the Roman captain came u with his soldiers and quelled the riot, rescuin Paul by putting him under arrest. Here, then began the course of events that was to tak Paul to Rome as a prisoner, and that was t enrich the church and the philosophy and liter ature of the Christian life through the noble epistles of the imprisonment period.

In connection with this immediate lesson one cannot fail to dwell upon the tragic as pects of institutionalism and of dogma and system as these have been elaborated over against the simple matters of love and right eousness as these had the predominant place in the religion of Jesus. The concern of these Jews about orthodoxy, their fear of polluting the temple, their outcry against a man like Paul as the destroyer of religion when he was really one of its most profound builders, is all very much like what has been happening in the Christian Church throughout the ages. Does not this lesson enforce upon us the supreme need of giving to the high, holy, simple elements of religion the dominant place? If these Jews had been men of love and kindliness, they could not have acted against Paul as they did. If we, in turn, have enshrined the love of God in our hearts and the love of our fellow men, which is akin to the love of God, as the deep and commanding things, we shall be saved from the sad exhibitions of narrowness and bigotry that have darkened the way of the development of historic Christianity.

A lesson like this is of little value unless we apply its clear teaching to the modern scene in the church and profit from its plain implications.

LITTLE KINDNESSES

Be kindly affectionate one to another with brotherly love.—Rom. 12: 10.

The causes of great happiness and great misery rarely occur; little circumstances and events that appear trifling, singly considered, make up the sum of human enjoyment or misery. The retrospect of our past lives will show us that the greatest misfortune we have suffered is the sum total of useless vexation inflicted on ourselves and others from the want of this Christian restraint upon temper and Christian incitement to benevolence.—Sidney Smith.

That best portion of a good man's life, his little, nameless, unremembered acts of kindness and of love.—William Wordsworth.

Have you ever noticed how much of Christ's life was spent in doing kind things —in merely doing kind things? Run over it with that in view and you will find that he spent a great proportion of his time simply in making people happy—in doing good turns to people. There is only one thing greater than happiness in the world, and that is holiness; and that is not in our keeping—God reserves that to himself; but what he has put in our power is the happiness of our fellow-creatures, and that is to be secured by our being kind.—Henry Drummond.

She doeth little kindnesses,
Which most leave undone, or despise;
For naught that sets one heart at ease,
And giveth happiness or peace,
Is low-esteemed in her eyes.

She hath no scorn of common things,
And, though she seems of other birth,
Round us her heart entwines and clings
And patiently she folds her wings
To tread the humble paths of earth.

Blessing she is; God made her so,
And deeds of week-day holiness
Fall from her noiseless as the snow,
Nor hath she ever chanced to know
That aught were easier than to bless.

James Russell Lowell.

It becomes the disciples of Jesus to be kind one to another as those who have learned, and would teach, the art of obliging.—Matthew Henry.

Christ's commendations are all on the same line, all directed to the same point, all rich with the same quality; and his commendation runs upon a line on which all men may stand. It is not a tribute to gigantic stature, to phenomenal genius, to occasional brilliance, to eccentric gift; it is a benediction pronounced upon actions which children can commit, which the common people can execute.—Joseph Parker.

We thank thee for all the great things of life that do not seem to be great—for the love that seeketh not its own, love despised, misunderstood, seemingly ineffective; for the good that asks no reward except to go on serving. We thank thee for having warmed our hearts with lowly joys, that the most precious things in life are just those which no money can buy and no misfortune forfeit.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

Are We Partners in Crime?

Comment on the Prayer Meeting Topic for November 15-21

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: How Can We Overcome the Spirit of Lawlessness? Romans 13: 1-8.

Light from the Bible Passage

One of the great foundations of law and order is obedience. We may scrutinize laws, but while they are laws we must obey them. No organization can exist without someone in authority. Final authority rests, however, not with men who give it but with God who grants it. Opposition to such authority thus becomes opposition to God. The law-abiding citizen has nothing to fear as punishment from authorities. But freedom from fear is not a high enough motive. Doing right because it is right should be the guiding principle. Honor and respect should be given to whom it is due. Law is designed to establish the welfare of the majority. True love for our fellows drives out lawlessness which affects the well-being of all men.

Leads for Leaders

From President Coolidge down all great leaders in our land today are emphasizing the fact that lawlessness is our greatest national peril today. Just what is lawlessness? Are there degrees in it? What is anarchy? Who are the real Bolsheviks in America today?

List some of the more conspicuous examples of lawlessness: in automobiling, in business, in respect for the property of others, in violating the Eighteenth Amendment.

Can we overcome the spirit of lawlessness by laughing at it, winking at it, keeping silent about it? Do we secretly admire those who "get away with it?"

Can we not help by more scrupulous observance of the laws ourselves? We never know who follows our cue.

Can we not show our disgust with the lawless by ostracizing them? How much are we to blame also by our association with them?

Can we not help the authorities by giving them "tips" of illegal sales, stills, rum-running, etc.? Are we not co-partners in a sense by keeping such knowledge to ourselves?

Can we not as Endeavorers back up our pastors in their efforts along the lines of living up to the law?

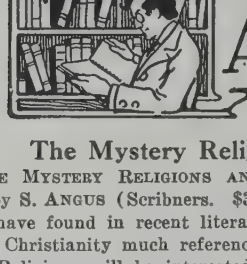
Thoughts for Members

Too many of our people have found oftentimes to their sorrow that the privileges of liberty instead of being easy to enjoy are in reality highly difficult responsibilities requiring the utmost of effort for success.—President Calvin Coolidge.

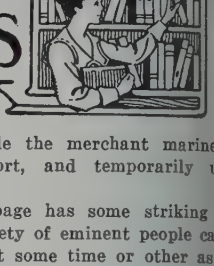
Only two men out of the twelve (spies)—Caleb and Joshua, men of wisdom and purpose —stood ready to commit themselves to resolute and hopeful action. "It is an exceedingly good land," these men said, "and if the Lord delight in us, He will give us the land." Then, as now, it was to the saving realm of idealists that Society had to look for genuine progress. —Charles R. Brown.

A Moment of Prayer

Arouse us, O Lord, to a renewed sense of obligation to thee, the great Head of our nation, to our fellows who with us are the makers of our national life, to those who are in authority, and above all to those deep principles of righteousness which thou hast planted in our hearts. Amen.



AMONG THE NEW BOOKS



The Mystery Religions

THE MYSTERY RELIGIONS AND CHRISTIANITY, by S. ANGUS (Scribners. $3.50). Readers who have found in recent literature regarding early Christianity much reference to the Mystery Religions will be interested in this elaborate study of the Mysteries. The author is Professor of New Testament and Historical Theology in St. Andrew's College, Sydney, but much of the material of this volume was delivered in lectures at various seminaries during visits to the United States and Canada. The importance of the subject cannot well be overestimated. It concerns the question whether the rites and doctrines of Christianity as they have been developed in the historic church have been derived as a direct expression of a new religious experience and fellowship, or have been influenced by religious practices prevalent throughout the Mediterranean world for approximately half a millennium before the Christian era and half a millennium after the coming of Jesus and the early beginnings of the church. The field is manifestly controversial. Some will see in Christianity a pure stream from one original source, while others will see that pure stream of primitive Christianity quickly polluted and corrupted by influences that were largely pagan. Evidently there may have been influences and associations where there was no actual corruption, the Christian ideal ennobling a pagan conception or practice in some such a way as at a later period the Christian festival of Easter supplanted, though it derived its name from the Anglo-Saxon rites associated with Oestre, the goddess of Spring.

Manifestly, the first essential for such a study in the background of early Christianity is some knowledge of the nature of the Mystery Religions in the environment of which Christianity had its growth. Paul must have had intimate knowledge of the Mysteries. That he assailed their abuses is evident, but did he likewise appreciate their elements of truth and find these things fulfilled in Christianity? If Paul's interpretation of Jesus and his expression of Christian doctrine were unaffected by the Mysteries, what effect did these highly symbolical and ritualistic religions have upon the development of symbolism and ritualism in the church? Dr. Angus gives an extensive account of the Mysteries, and deals with these questions and relationships with candor, yet with good judgment and in nondogmatic spirit. The most important Mysteries he enumerates as "the Greek Eleusinia, the cults of Cappadocian Men, the Phrygian Sabazios, and the Great Mother, the Egyptian Isis and Serapis, and the Samothracian Cabiri, the Dea Syria and her satellites, the Persian Mithra." By way of approach he accepts the principle that "no religion persists by its falsehood but by its truth," and in the age-long continuance of the Mysteries he finds the evidences of truths as well as error. In comparison with the elaborate work of Churchward, The Origin and Evolution of Religion, noticed in The Congregationalist of Sept. 24, 1925, one appreciates Dr. Angus' thorough documentation of his study. The references are full and exact, and the bibliography and list of chief ancient sources are very extensive. This is a field where mere opinion is of little value; the arraying of the facts and the evidence is the primary thing, and their cautious interpretation is the next step. Such studies as this by Dr. Angus will help to forestall hasty generalization.

JESUS AND THE GREEKS, by WILLIAM FAIRWEATHER (Scribners. $3.50). Much the same blending of sympathetic insight and cautious judgment as one finds in Dr. Angus' volume, reviewed above, characterizes this study which covers to some extent the same ground. Dr. Fairweather does not confine himself so directly or in detail to the Mystery Religions, but in general he attaches to Hellenistic influences a less important part in the development of Christianity than Dr. Angus seems to suggest. He thinks that while "the fact of Hellenistic influence upon primitive Christianity cannot be disputed, that influence is much more limited in extent than is frequently alleged." He considers that certain alleged doctrinal resemblances are nothing more than "similarity in point of intellectual structure." The work is in three parts: Part I dealing in eleven chapters with The Diffusion of Hellenism; Part II, in six chapters, with The Jewish Hellenist Philo of Alexandria; and Part III, in seven chapters, with Hellenism and Christianity. In addition are extensive appendices and very valuable notes. In the concluding chapter Dr. Fairweather strongly upholds the essential independence of Christianity in relation to surrounding religions and philosophies.

A Sea Captain's Story

HULL DOWN: REMINISCENCES OF WINDJAMMERS, TROOPS, AND TRAVELERS, by SIR BERTRAM HAYES (Macmillan. $4.50). Sir Bertram Hayes recently retired as commander of the Majestic and commodore of the White Star Fleet after forty-five years at sea. Added to all the varied incidents of long and conspicuous service in the mercantile marine were the experiences in the transport of troops during two wars—the South African and the Great War. The reminiscences of these years at sea make a volume that reads like a glorified seaman's yarn—breezy, candid, entertaining. Sir Bertram commanded the Olympic during the war, and when America came in was responsible for transporting large numbers of American troops across. He thinks that the American authorities in their anxiety to get large numbers of troops across rapidly overcrowded their ships with the result that they did not disembark their troops in as fit condition as those disembarked from the Olympic, in which Sir Bertram managed to prevent overcrowding. Strange to say he found the American troops very quiet and serious, in comparison with the English soldiers, and especially with the Canadian troops who, he says, were more like our own men, full of fun and devilment." He says of the Americans: "You hardly heard a sound from them, and it seemed to us they were more like what one would imagine the old Crusaders were, grim and determined." The quietude, at least, we have hardly associated with the "doughboy."

America and the Americans are very kindly treated in these memories but Sir Bertram has some keen criticism for the British naval officers who were his superiors in the transport service. He expresses admiration for the naval commanders when confined to their own sphere, but cites many instances of their incapacity to handle the merchant marine gaged in transport, and temporarily un naval control.

Almost every page has some striking in dent, and the variety of eminent people carr by Sir Bertram at some time or other as p sengers adds interest to many anecdotes. I instance there is the story told by Lord Re ing, when Hayes was bringing him to duties as Ambassador at Washington, of h Lloyd George during the war, upon so holiday had invited a number of people breakfast with him at Downing Street so t they might have a quiet conference. Ll George asked his butler to prepare for the "You can't do it, sir," he replied, "ther nothing in the house to eat." "Go out a buy a ham, or something," urged the Pri Minister, but the butler could find nothi and Lord Reading declared that it had be "a very scratch breakfast" and Lloyd Geo had asked him apprehensively if he had h enough to eat. The anecdote came out connection with Lord Reading's protest t the Olympic passengers were being too w fed. "No one at home can live as they d he said, "not even the Prime Minister." T Olympic's stores as a matter of fact w bought at Halifax or New York and not pound could be landed or transferred England.

THE PERSONAL EQUATION, by LOUIS BE MAN, M.D. (Century. $2.50). A decidedly i teresting, but rather depressing book. If a that it stated were true, and the whole trut both religion and psychology would have litt to do with determining life and character. Th scientist would be our only hope and benefa tor, for according to this book everything d pends upon glands. "Man is primarily dete mined in his behavior by his glands." "The e docrine glands are indeed the mediators b tween the organism and the environment." is a sensational sort of book; so much so tha the layman in medical science wonders whethe its scientific claims are careful, exact, and full established. It should be recognized that suc a book does, however, emphasize a wide rang of important and neglected truth. Emphasi upon other factors besides glands in the highe life of man need not imply any disparagemen of all that makes for a normal, well-functior ing organism.

A Five-Dollar Bill

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Now, I'd advise you," said Kathleen, "to that money away before you lose it!"

lph thrust the five-dollar bill rather de- ly into his inside coat pocket. "I can care of it!" he answered; and catching is cap from the floor, where he had char- istically flung it, he started off for school.

thleen hastily put away the lunch things the pantry shelf, where they had eaten, straightened up the kitchen a bit before ng.

ie sister and brother were keeping house hemselves for a couple of weeks, while parents were away. Four days had ed with no untoward occurrence, and a degree of harmony between the two had maintained. This noon, Mr. Gray, an out- wn farmer, had called to pay Mr. Sanford, hildren's father, a bill long due, and Ralph taken the five dollars, writing a receipt.

rrying on her way to school, Kathleen ook her chum, Elsie Young. "I've had a noon," laughed Elsie, "trying to convince er he ought to get me some snowshoes so n join the new club!"

id you succeed?" asked Kathleen.

'm rather hopeful," replied Elsie. "At he didn't refuse, exactly. If you're going e at home this evening, Kathleen, Nellie may be over for a while."

o come," said Kathleen, "and we'll make !"

thleen and Ralph reached home at the time that afternoon, both going there di- y after a meeting held to discuss the new shoe club. Plainly, not to have one's on its membership list meant being left f the jolly winter school sports, and losing l prestige.

eling somewhat indignant and a bit self- eous, Kathleen disposed of the money, for ime being, in the quickest possible way, ing it in a corner of her handkerchief.

st then a knock sounded at the back door, in rushed Elsie and Nellie. "We came ," they announced, "so as to have longer ay!"

e saucepan containing the fudge mixture already on the stove by the time Ralph was to join the girls. He sat down by the en table with his schoolbooks, half-heart- glancing over his lessons for the next day. "our frivolity upsets my mental processes!" he announced loftily. "How can I do geometry in all this chatter?"

"You might run upstairs to your own room, Sonny!" suggested Elsie laughingly, while Kathleen rumpled his hair with sisterly freedom.

"Oh, dear!" exclaimed Kathleen, after her guests had gone, and she was starting upstairs for bed. "This is the night I ought to have picked up the washing!"

"Too late now! I'll help you with it in the morning," answered Ralph. "Scoot to bed!"

"I want to speak to you about Ralph, Grandma Keith!"

Kathleen had run upstairs to the room occupied by "Grandma Keith," as they called her, though in reality the old lady was not related to them. "He's staying away from home just about all the time these last two or three days; and with Mother gone, I feel sort of responsible, being older than he. I'm waiting supper for him now!"

"He's a good boy!" was Grandma's comment. "I don't believe he's up to any harm. And—I wouldn't question him too closely, Honey. He might resent it if he thought you were trying to 'manage' him. You know, he's only a year younger than you!"

"There he comes now!" cried Kathleen, springing up as she heard the door below slam.

They ate their belated supper almost in silence. Then "Got any cold cream, or—salve, or anything?" asked Ralph.

"Yes, up there in the medicine cabinet. Why?"

"Nothing, much!"

Kathleen, watching as he rubbed the ointment on his palms, saw a blister. "How did you do that?" she asked.

"Dishwater was too hot!" answered Ralph promptly, grinning mischievously.

"Dishwater!" exclaimed his sister forcibly. "I've done all the dishwashing!"

Next day, after school, going around by the grocery store after butter, forgotten when she gave her order, Kathleen heard the sound of a wood-saw in the yard of a house she was passing. Glancing up casually, she saw a boy dodge hurriedly in through the open door of the woodshed.

"That looked like Ralph!" she puzzled. "If it was, he didn't want me to see him. O-o-oh!" and she went on slowly. "I begin to see—blistered hands, hm! so that's what he's doing nights and mornings. Earning money for snowshoes! He needn't have been so secret about it, trying to get ahead of me!"

She felt a little resentful as she hurried home, and racked her brain to think how she, too, might earn some money. She hardly emerged from her "brown study" until she was in bed that night. Then she said to herself, with a sigh of relief, "Just the thing! That crocheted yoke I didn't have time—didn't take time to finish! I'll see if I can't sell it in the Woman's Club Exchange. I can do others, too."

She got out of bed, turned on the light, and counted the money in her purse. "Two thirty-nine, and the snowshoes cost seven. Well, maybe Father'll lend me some, when he knows I'm trying to earn it. I don't have much time for anything now, with Mother gone! I'm so rushed, I don't do half I mean to, and I can't half think straight, either!"

The next day was Saturday. Kathleen flew about the house in the morning, doing what housework seemed most necessary, then hurried down town to the Woman's Club exchange. The nearly-finished yoke was much admired, and a price suggested for it far in excess of what she had expected.

In the afternoon she took her crochet-work and went to call on Elsie. She was eager to tell her plans, and, if possible, enthuse Elsie into earning money for snowshoes, too.

But Elsie, meeting her at the door, was already enthused. "Father has capitulated, Kathleen!" she cried. "He sees that my life's happiness is bound up in the thongs and red tassels of a pair of snowshoes, and we're going shopping tonight for them!"

The short winter afternoon passed quickly. The street lights were already shining overhead when Kathleen started for home.

"Ralph's there first!" she exclaimed, as she came in sight of home. "But I don't see why he has the whole house lighted!"

A joyful surprise awaited her. Three days before she expected them, her parents had returned, and her mother was standing in the doorway to greet her.

"Oh, Mother, You!" cried Kathleen, and dashed recklessly up the icy steps to clasp her mother in a strangling hug.

"Well, this looks like a real meal!" Ralph exclaimed with satisfaction, when the little family of four was seated around the table. "I've been saving up an awful appetite."

After supper, Kathleen, clearing away the dishes, overheard her brother's voice in the living room. She could not help hearing his words. He had evidently been confessing his carelessness in regard to the five-dollar bill to his father, and was producing what money he had already earned toward making up the loss.

A sudden light dawned upon her. That was why he had sawed wood so secretly! She rushed into the living room.

"Oh, Ralph!" she cried contritely. "I ought to have told you, but I've had so much to think of, I forgot all about it. The money fell out of your coat pocket, and I swept it up. I put it away in Father's desk drawer!"

But even as she started toward the desk, misgivings assailed her. Half-heartedly she pulled open the drawer and looked inside.

"I thought"—she began. "I meant to put it in there! What could I have done with it?"

A wave of shame sent the color to her face as she recalled her scorn for Ralph when picking up the bill.

"If I don't find it, I'll pay it back. I'm earning some money, too."

"No, you won't!" Ralph told her firmly. "This is my debt."

Ralph went to answer a rap at the kitchen door, and found there the laundress's boy.

"I've brought home the basket of clothes," said the boy, "and here's a note from Mother!"

Ralph tore open the envelope, gave a whoop of joy, and dashed back into the living room.

"Listen, will you?" he cried, and read aloud the note, which ran: "Tied in the corner of a handkerchief in the wash I found the enclosed, which I return."

"'The enclosed,'" explained Ralph excitedly, "being this!" And he flourished in the air the lost five-dollar bill.

"I'm afraid you won't think us a very trustworthy pair, Father!" said Kathleen.

"Well, said Ralph, with a shrug and grin, I'll be glad to keep my wood money toward buying some snowshoes, anyway!"

"Use it to pay your dues in the club!" put in his mother. "We bought two pairs of snowshoes while we were in the city, and they are out in the front hall now! You and Kathleen run out and see how you like them!"

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

Called to Florida Superintendency

Rev. E. C. Gillette, pastor of Union Church, Jacksonville, Fla., for the last five years, has been elected superintendent of the Florida Conference to succeed Dr. Lewis H. Keller, and will enter upon his work Dec. 1. The call extended to Mr. Gillette was unanimous and very hearty. Mr. Gillette has had wide experience in pastorates in the East and in Jacksonville. He has established large contacts with the civic, fraternal, and religious life of Jacksonville and has shown a power of leadership in things of large significance. He is a man of state-wide and nation-wide sympathies; he has been actively identified with the work in Florida and is now moderator of the Florida Conference. He has the confidence and esteem of all his ministerial brethren and there is much enthusiasm over his call to this important work. He will retain his residence in Jacksonville and work through the office already established and well equipped.

Rev. E. C. Gillette

Sesqui-Centennial at Fryeburg, Me.

The people of the Fryeburg Church are jubilant over the completion of extensive repairs on their property almost identically with the advent of the 150th anniversary of their organization, which took place on Aug. 21, 1775. The present building, the third in the history of the church, was erected about 75 years ago, and is a fine type of later Colonial architecture, with dignified facade, flanked with Doric columns, and a spacious and beautiful auditorium, capable of seating with the gallery about 500 people. Its extensive renovation, begun about two years ago, and costing upwards of $3,000, has included a new metal roof, a new chimney, a re-enforced and practically made-over clock-room and steeple, some interior re-decoration, and the installation of an electric motor-pump for its sweet-toned organ. These improvements, with considerable repairing of the nearby chapel, have put the plant in far better condition than for many years. Choice frescoing and a large solid mahogany pulpit and furnishings enhance the beauty and dignity of the interior of the church building. Rev. William Fessenden, its first pastor, was also the founder and first principal of Fryeburg Academy, which has sent out in the world many men and women of usefu ness and prominence, and the closest affiliatic has always existed between the old academy ar the yet older church. The church is especial fortunate in its skilled and devoted organis also a member of the academy faculty, Mr. I A. D. Hurd, a native of the town and a produ of its historic school. Despite many serio losses by removal and death, the present pasto Rev. E. W. Wild, has received 35 persons in membership in less than five years, and a fi spirit has been shown by the people in respon to calls for missionary giving, the apportio ment having been twice exceeded in that perio

Important Milestone at West Medwa

The old church in West Medway, Mass., wi an historic background in the heart of the 18 century, has just recognized its 175 years wi a noteworthy service and the unveiling of tablet in memory of the founders. On Oc 3, there was a large attendance of parishione and friends. Behind the present minister, Re David Crockett, who came to the church a ye ago, there is a memorable list including amo the living Rev. Messrs. G. E. Brown, Leomi ster; H. F. Burdon, Gilbertville; G. R. Hev itt, Boston; and Augustus Fuller, Ballardval The outstanding figure in Second Church hi tory was Dr. Jacob Ide, who married a daug ter of Dr. Nathaniel Emmons of nearby Fran lin and who was installed in 1814. For f years he was sole pastor and curer of souls. H died in 1880 at the age of 94. He was notable preacher and theologian and was amon the early advocates of total abstinence. Hi mind and character dominated the countrysid and upwards of 40 candidates prepared wit him for the ministry.

The historical exercises included a welcom by Mr. Crockett and two addresses: one on th beginnings of the precinct and parish, by O. T Mason; and the other on the formation an history of the church, by H. N. Hixon. Devo tional services were participated in by Rev Messrs. S. G. Wood, E. F. Bell, and G. F Hewitt. The tablet erected upon the churc green, or Common, was unveiled by Mario Ollendorf, Aaron Hobart, and H. R. Metcalf direct descendants of John Metcalf, first cler of West Precinct. The address was by Rev David Crockett. Rev. G. R. Hewitt offere prayer.

A banquet was served in the church at si o'clock. J. G. Anderson was toastmaster. Th following responded: W. E. Ollendorff, Ou Church; Sumner Robbins, Senior Deacon at 87 Reminiscences; H. E. Bent, The Young People is the accredited agency of the CONGREGATIONAL CHURCHES

for NATION-wide and WORLD-wide Bible work.

The churches look to this Bible Society for service along four important lines; namely,

1. Translation of the Scriptures into the spoken languages and dialects of the peoples;
2. Revision of these Scriptures from time to time as the need arises;
3. Publication of the Scriptures without note or comment in forms convenient for the people's use and at lowest cost;
4. Distribution of the Scriptures both at home and abroad without profit.

The American Bible Society looks to the churches for support and cooperation in meeting the expenses connected with this basic missionary enterprise both in our own nation and throughout the world.

The American Bible Society needs this year's contribution. Why not forward it NOW?

Of the 196 members of the church whose names were recorded at the time the corner stone of the old building was laid in 1898 about 70 survive, of whom 40 are still members of the church.

A notable feature of the financial canvass for the new building appears in the extent to which people outside of the church membership have voluntarily contributed to the building fund. Three gifts of $1,000 each have been received from outside friends and a number of smaller gifts have been recorded.

Should Be Saved or Were Saved

Many devout Christians could never quite grasp that passage in Acts 2:47 which in former versions of Scripture reads:
"And the Lord added to the Church daily such as should be saved."
How understandable then this passage becomes when it is more accurately translated, as in the American Standard Bible—"And the Lord added to them day by day those that were saved." Through this clearer rendering—which is typical of thousands of passages—the earnest Bible student realizes the need of the more faithful, accurate, marvelously beautiful translations which are found only in the

The Congregationalist
Sunday

NOVEMBER 15th

THIS date has been set apart in the religious and educational program of our churches as "The Congregationalist Sunday" with the hope that our ministers will speak from the pulpit on the value of good reading in our homes and offer a special plea for a wider reading of The Congregationalist in the homes of the congregation. We suggest that they emphasize the merits of the paper, the valuable editorial and contributed features, the staff of able contributors, and the benefits each person interested in the church will derive from its columns.

The suggestion of November 15th and the week days following, as The Congregationalist Sunday and Week, is simply a suggestion, and we shall be glad to have them take up the matter at any other time or in any way that may be most convenient or seem best. We have found that many pastors and churches prefer to join in a united effort at a specified time when they may feel that they are working together with many others for a good cause in which they are all interested. Be assured that we will gladly co-operate in any reasonable plan which you may prefer.

HYMNS for the LIVING AGE

Edited by H. AUGUSTINE SMITH
Director of Fine Arts in Religion, Boston University
Director of Music, Chautauqua, N. Y.

Important features of this book:

All words are between the staffs, making it possible to read and sing with ease.

The reinforced binding protects the book against the hard, if devout usage of over-zealous members of the choir.

The responsive readings, which mark a new epoch in Biblical literature for public worship are in the front pages where they can be used without throwing the book out of balance.

The index, which is so rarely used, is in the back of the book.

The musical settings constitute a rich and varied feast throughout and are fitted to the text with great care.

The music is within the range of the average voice and creates no unwilling sopranos and bassos.

No section of the book is over-populated; there are a number of social service hymns, but not at the expense of hymns of devotion.

The price of HYMNS FOR THE LIVING AGE is $1.75. The introductory rate is $1.35 with transportation additional, from New York or Chicago.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

A Year's Progress at Gorham

On a recent Sunday morning the members and attendants at the church in Gorham met in large numbers for a special observance of the first anniversary of the coming of Rev. William Sinclair as pastor. The year just passed has been a successful one, with every organization of the church in a most prosperous condition, much of this progress resulting from the fine atmosphere created by the pastor and by the industry of the people.

Among the evidences of material prosperity are these: the church building reshingled, a new carpet laid, an electric lighting system installed, and the auditorium and rooms adjoining painted and decorated. The church is now one of the most beautiful places of worship in the north country. The funds for these improvements have been raised and the current expenses have also been met regularly.

New Armenian Worker

A new worker among the Armenian people, Rev. Ephraim Jernazian, has come to the state, succeeding Rev. V. K. Tamzariam, who carried on the work for nearly five years. The work centers at Ararat Church, Salem, and from there is carried to other parts of New Hampshire where Armenian people are resident.

MASSACHUSETTS

Rev. E. J. Johanson at Brookfield

Rev. E. J. Johanson, who began the pastorate of the Brookfield Church the first of September, is a graduate of Carthage College, Carthage, Ill., in the class of 1922, and of Hartford Seminary, where he received his B.D. in May of this year, the next month receiving an M.A. in philosophy from the University of Wisconsin. At Hartford last May he received the Hartranft Prize in evangelistic theology, and the William Thompson Fellowship. He is also the winner of a recently conducted sermon contest for theological students conducted by the Homiletic Review, receiving the first prize for a sermon on the subject, "The Hiding of God."

Mr. Johanson has recently married Miss Laura Carson Lane, daughter of Prof. Charles Stoddard Lane of the Hartford Seminary Foundation and sister of Rev. Stoddard Lane of First Church, Manchester, N. H., and Rev. G. H. Lane of Milford, N. H.

Organ Dedicated at Faneuil, Brighton

Faneuil Church in Brighton is rejoicing over the successful efforts for a new organ, initiated over a year ago, when the church started out for $5,200 for an organ fund. Subscriptions for $6,800 have been received, of which more than $4,200 has already been paid in.

The organ was dedicated on Oct. 1, the services of dedication including an organ recital by Mr. Kenneth S. Usher, organist and choirmaster at Mt. Vernon Church, Boston, assisted by Miss Marjorie Warren Leadbetter and the Weber Male Quartet. Rev. Andrew Mulnix is minister of Faneuil Church.

Shrewsbury Young People at College

First Church, Shrewsbury, of which Rev. F. D. Thayer is pastor, has 28 of its young people away at school or college. Smith, Wellesley, Mt. Holyoke, Simmons, Massachusetts Agricultural College, and the University of Pennsylvania are represented on the list. Two young women are training to be nurses. The minister has a daughter at Smith College and a son at the State College at Amherst.

Emphasizing Changes in Religious Thinking

Rev. H. E. Hurd, pastor of Center Church, Haverhill, is stressing religious education, not only in the church school but also in his preaching. A recent church calendar contained this notice: "Next Sunday morning (Oct. 25) we shall begin a series of studies intended to help Mr. Average Citizen to understand just what has happened in religious think during the last fifty years. Any person he ing these sermon-lectures will have covered orderly form the entire field of the modern of the Bible." The topics of the series are follows: The Authority of the Bible, The spiration of the Bible, The Making of Bible, The Study of the Bible, The Bible a vated House of Worship at Byfield

e church of South Byfield Parish suffered s loss in July, when fire and water did damage to its house of worship. The and part of the roof were destroyed, blackened water completely ruined the in- except the fine old organ, which was in ltered location at the rear of the audi- m. The estimated loss was $2,500, in- g a $900 bell, partly covered by $1,000 ance.

e next day the present pastor, Rev. J. F. , preached as a candidate, holding ser- in the parish house, and finding a cour- s people ready to go forward with the lding at once. At the morning service an year-old girl, a member of the Sunday l, voluntarily started the building fund eight cents she had earned for her own cracker fund." Such unselfishness and inspired others. The sum of $2,500 was pledged, and the work of rebuilding was at once.

Sunday, Sept. 20, the people of the church parish met for the morning service in the rebuilt and newly decorated building. one was much pleased with the skillful manship of carpenters and painters, dis- d by close adherence to the old model of teeple and the harmony of colors in the iful interior decoration. Nearly all the h and the entire student body of Dummer my were present, and the choir splendidly in the helpful service.

RHODE ISLAND

Smithfield Ave., Pawtucket, Advancing

Smithfield Ave., Pawtucket, Rev. I. D. Wildey, pastor, is enjoying well deserved prosperity. Since the first of this year 95 members have been received, 74 by confession and 21 by letter. The Sunday services are largely attended. The balance on the new $5,000 organ has been raised. The church is free from debt, and repairs and improvements will increase the efficiency of the church as a community center.

Layman in Charge of Work at Tiverton

Since the death of Miss Ross the church at Bliss Four Corners, Tiverton, has been served by Mr. G. A. Gray, a layman from Fall River, who was born near the church. Twenty new members were added to the church July 19. A half dozen more are pledged for the next Communion.

Assistant Minister at Central, Providence

Central Church, Providence, Rev. A. H. Bradford, pastor, has chosen Rev. Rudolph W. Roth to direct the educational activities of the church school and to occupy the position long and ably filled by Rev. F. E. Butler. Mr. Roth was born in Michigan and educated at Benzonia Academy and Oberlin and Olivet Colleges. Graduating from Olivet with honors, he was awarded a scholarship at the Theological School in Harvard University. His course of study was interspersed with six months' ambulance service in France, and by service as home missionary pastor at Atlanta and Big Rock, Mich., Galesburg, Ill., and Maybelle, Col. His studies at Cambridge were interrupted by a call to the Central Church. With a broad experience and eminent fitness he enters upon this important task.

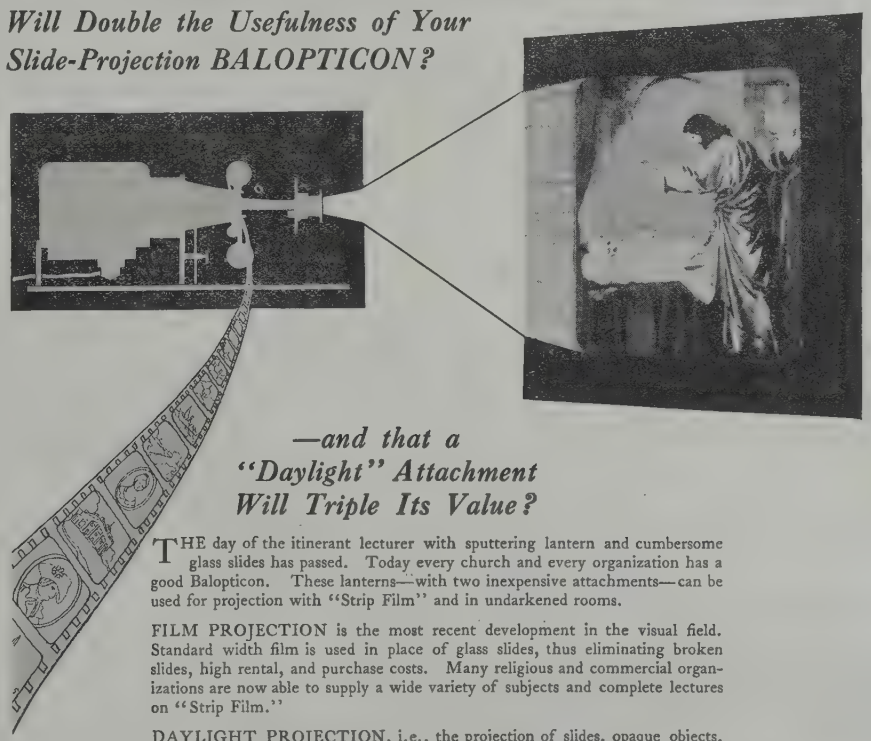
Do You Know That a FILM ATTACHMENT

Will Double the Usefulness of Your Slide-Projection BALOPTICON?



—and that a "Daylight" Attachment Will Triple Its Value?

THE day of the itinerant lecturer with sputtering lantern and cumbersome glass slides has passed. Today every church and every organization has a good Balopticon. These lanterns—with two inexpensive attachments—can be used for projection with "Strip Film" and in undarkened rooms.

FILM PROJECTION is the most recent development in the visual field. Standard width film is used in place of glass slides, thus eliminating broken slides, high rental, and purchase costs. Many religious and commercial organizations are now able to supply a wide variety of subjects and complete lectures on "Strip Film."

DAYLIGHT PROJECTION, i.e., the projection of slides, opaque objects, and films in undarkened rooms,—has unlimited possibilities for church work. There is no need to completely darken the classroom or auditorium. Our new booklet on Daylight Projection gives full information. Send for it today.

May we send you these two folders on Daylight and on Film Projection?

Rev. David Jack Resigns from Simsbury

Rev. David Jack preached his last sermon as pastor of First Church, Simsbury, Oct. 25. During his five years of service, Mr. Jack has received by baptism or confession of faith 69 new members, making just over 33⅓ per cent increase to the resident membership of the church. The annual income of the church, both for local expenses and for benevolences, has grown each year; and a $20,000 parish house has been erected. The church passed a unanimous resolution commending the pastor for his service at the meeting that voted acceptance of his resignation.

Host to Council of Religious Education

Fourth Church, Hartford, Dr. J. J. Dunlop, pastor, welcomed the annual gathering of the Hartford County Council of Religious Education on Sept. 28. Dr. J. P. Berkeley, professor of religious education at Newton Theological Institution, gave three addresses on "Teaching the Geography of the Holy Land," "Making Lesson Plans," and "Deepening Young People's Decisions." Rev. W. B. Denny, formerly professor of Biblical literature at Olivet College, and now a candidate for a Ph.D. at Yale, spoke on "The Four Gospels and the One Original," "The Jesus of History and the Christ of Faith," and "The Greatness of Jesus Christ." The discussion was led by Mrs. Ida T. Francis, on "Children and the Church." J. M. Mason of the Central Baptist Church and a student in the Hartford School of Religious Education, led the group on "The Church Serving the Adolescent," and Rev. W. W. Malcolm, pastor of the Hebron and Gilead Churches, and candidate for a degree at the Hartford School of Religious Education, took up with pastors and superintendents the matter of "Managing the School."

A Church Above the Mountains

The interesting and fruitful church organization at Big Bear Lake, Cal., is located at an elevation of 6,800 feet, well above Mt. Washington or any peak east of the Rockies. Yet encircled by a series of towering summits, there is no feeling of being "above the world," except in the exhilarating buoyancy and clarity of the atmosphere.

The Big Bear Lake resulted from impounding the waters of the creek behind a dam, which has been given the dimensions and uses of a modern highway: a sizable body of water used to irrigate large areas in the valleys below. This lake, bordered by noble pines, has become the mecca of sportsmen and tourists. One of the most famous and beautiful drives in Southern California is this Rim of the World —101 miles—which, issuing from San Bernardino, ascends through Waterman Canyon up around the scenic ridges with their outlooks of bewildering fascination, back through Redlands. THE CHURCH ABOVE THE MOUNTAINS aps and resorts, with a summer population something like 20,000.

Here people hunt and fish, or find stimulus the mountain climate. The summer finds all fledged city, with all the provisions for fort. The highest broadcasting station in world operates here; there is a famous course; a "Theater of the Stars" in a antic canyon amphitheater. Nor in the ter is the place neglected, for there is provision for sports in the snow and on ice.

However, this article is written to describe unusual work carried on by the Congregalists. In 1922 a rather precarious work the Adventists was taken over and their perty purchased. There is a parsonage, a church building which this year was enged. Each summer the conference sends a ister and guarantees his support. This r. as the first season, it has been Rev. n Austin, pastor at Burbank. It is disctly community service. There is even no rch organization, as it is believed in this nner any further religious undertakings l best be avoided. There are provided morn- and evening services, sometimes the latter ut the camp-fire with community sings; a rch school; and some form of midweek ial gathering. Further, the minister and e have given themselves unsparingly to pasal and community service. In the winter, h the population much diminished, there is resident minister, though the church school maintained by resident workers.

This is a fascinating work, much appreciated large numbers of people. It is the saving ng to a summer population. It comes into sport and relaxation of an idle folk with l gift of rest. Amid the jazz and confusion the holiday thousands it calls to meditan, interpretation, and worship. It is a d of fellowship among strangers and mov- visitors. It sanctifies the toil of those o maintain the Valley. The God of the untains, the Christ of the human heart, are en an enthronement approved by the best is. There is a peculiar testing of the rcefulness of the minister in this changing, reation-seeking crowd; and Mr. and Mrs. stin have met the need rarely well.

t is a labor of love by the conference. There no accounting of it in the statistics. What ns may come to the denomination are inect. Yet it is the kind of an investment churches ought to make, and is the outstanding labor of the kind in Southern California.

ALONG OUR STREAM OF FREEDOM (Ps. 126)

The A. M. A.'s New Associate Secretary

One of the satisfying rewards of a long pastorate is that of seeing its youth make good. When I first went to Atlanta thirty-odd years ago in my maiden ministry, I found in my Sunday school a bright lad by the name of George, who sometimes preferred to go with me on my pastoral rounds than to play. It was a joy to see him climb on up through our Storr's School until he claimed his degree at Atlanta University. Addressing himself to work under our American Missionary Association, he has been for more than a score of years the successful principal of our school at Florence, Ala.

I recall that when I supplied the little Congregational church there one summer during my vacation at Yale, there was a little A. M. A. school in the care of Northern white teachers. Under the leadership of Principal George White the work took on new life, and today Burrell Normal School is the most effective educational agency for the colored people in all that vicinity. The principal drew about him a corps of colored teachers who made a real social uplift to all that community round-about. Their impress was made in home and church and school.

In doing this they held the favor of the white community. Professor White, though loyal to his own race, had the full respect and confidence of the white people. At one time Dixon wanted to put on his "Birth of the Nation," but through Mr. White's influence this was prevented by executive action by the Mayor. Not only did Mr. White's leadership prevent such things as these; he also secured the financial co-operation of the city in the work of the school. On my visit to Florence a year ago

PROF. GEORGE N. WHITE

I was delighted to behold in what respect he was held by white and black throughout the city and community.

The call of Mr. White to the associate secretaryship of the A. M. A. is not only a deserved promotion, but a gratifying thing to colored Congregationalists. Although the Congregational people are leaders in the ideal treatment of the colored race as a whole, yet Congregational boards are far behind those of other denominations in placing Negro leaders in places of official responsibility. This matter has been on the heart of the National Convention of Congregational Workers among the Colored People for some time, and they rejoice in this step forward by one who is so worthy of consideration.

Professor White comes from fine stock. His father is a veteran employee in the Atlanta Post Office, and during his service of more than a generation was not late a single time. His mother has reared a family whose size would satisfy Roosevelt and whose quality is typical of Congregationalists. For a quarter of a century they were my parishioners, and I am delighted to see one come into the service of the A. M. A. who was to the manner born.

The coming of Mr. White to the official service of the A. M. A. is not only historic in that he is the first man of his race to occupy such a position, but it also indicates a new step in the broadening of the base of support for this historic association. It will be the chief work of the new associate secretary to ap to the colored constituency. Our schools churches have sent their products throug all the denominations, and in these recent of the Northern migratory movement they scattered throughout the land. This ins that they shall become a part of the well-t people of the land. In proportion as this is case they may be expected to share with t foster mother. But in order that they sh do this some one must bring the matter h to them. No one can do it like one of t own. Therefore, it may be expected that White's service will be of special value to A. M. "He Died and Went to Heave

By Fred W. Morrison

How often we hear the phrase, "he died went to heaven," used in an amusing st I have probably told such stories myself church dinners or social affairs, but if I h in the past I will never do it again.

About a year ago we were called upon walk through the "valley of shadows" our little six-year-old daughter left us denly for the great unknown. We called all the reserves of our spiritual energies hold us fast in that devastating experie Then I went to a church dinner and some told a "funny" story about a person "who and went to heaven." I cannot describe feeling that came over me as I listened to t story, but others who have had the same perience can bear witness to the suffering wittingly caused by a well-intentioned speal

Very recently in our church we had a ner attended by delegations from four neighb ing churches to prepare for our every mem canvass. A preacher of national reputation man of rare sweetness of spirit and stren of personality was the principal speaker. address, otherwise of the finest order, marred by the use of that unfortunate phra "he died and went to heaven." He was spe ing of churches that whine when confron with their budget and decline their full resp sibility because some good deacon or trus now dead, had in previous years, by his g erous giving, helped them over their he pulls. The point was well taken and all wo have been well had not there been sitting j across the table from him the wife of a m who recently died after having served church for thirty years as a trustee. watched the expression of pain that crept i her face and I saw the glances of sympat sent in her direction. Was the illustrati worth the price? What a pity that such fine address should be spoiled by a levity t hurt a heart still sore with grief.

I for one will never take the chance aga on telling such stories or using such illust tions. A year's time has gone by since first-mentioned incident, but just now I can foresee the time when such a reference w not cut to the quick. Jokes about the de funny remarks about funerals, or anythi else that can possibly add to the sting of s row in another's heart ought never to esca our lips.

Oberlin's Notable Accessions

in classrooms. To follow such a distinguished leader of modern thinking is the rare privilege which falls to a brilliant young man nearly 30 years Dr. King's junior. Prof. Walter M. Horton began his work last month as associate professor of systematic theology and has already won the intellectual respect both of his theological students and the college seniors whom he meets twice a week.

This modest young scholar brings to Oberlin a notable record of summa cum laude work at Harvard, Union, and Columbia, attested by five academic degrees, and supplemented by foreign study at Paris, Strasbourg, and Marburg. His teaching apprenticeship has been served with uniform acceptability at Columbia, Union, and at Hartford where he substituted for a term for President Mackenzie. He is an ordained Baptist minister of the progressive school and has had several summer pastorates. He is a constructive thinker of unusual clarity and maturity for his years, and a teacher of rare skill in the use of the Socratic method. His old home is in Arlington, Mass.

Prof. Frederic W. Buckler of England was called to the chair of church history to succeed Dr. Ian Campbell Hannah who has returned to his native land after eight years of eminently successful service at Oberlin, to inherit a title and an ancient castle near Edinburgh and to resume his former lectureship on the Cambridge faculty. Professor Buckler, like his predecessor, is a graduate of Cambridge University, who has distinguished himself as a teacher and director of research both there and at the University of Leicester, following a broadening teaching experience of three years in India and four years' service as a cavalry officer in India, Egypt, and Palestine under Allenby. He thus has had unusual opportunity to study life and religion in both the near and far East, and has become a recognized authority on Mohammedanism as well as in French and mediæval church history. He was chosen as the biographer of his distinguished teacher, the late Professor Gwatkin, long the leading church historian at Cambridge. Professor Buckler is a Fellow of the Royal Historical Society of London, and a member of the Royal Asiatic Society and of the Society of History of the French Colonies. He is a vigorous type of young Englishman with nothing of the pedant about him, but whose intellectual vitality is a challenge to his pupils and whose broad training and wide human interests make him a person of unusual resources, a real addition to American scholarship.

The frequent coming of leaders of European and oriental thought thus keeps Oberlin's world outlook fresh and her world sympathy keen. Conspicuous among the 38 new teachers on the faculty list this fall is the great Hungarian democrat. Dr. Oscar Jaszi (pronounced "Yassy"), a political scientist of international fame. He has studied in Germany, France, England, and Italy, and has taught, lectured, and published in many languages for two decades with notable success. He speaks English fluently and discriminatingly. He comes to Oberlin on a one-year appointment as professorial lecturer in political science. Contrary to rumor, he is not a radical, not even a moderate socialist; but he has for several years suffered as a political exile from his native land, because he served as a member of Count Karolyi's cabinet, as minister of racial minorities.

Friends of Oberlin will rejoice in the completion of the splendid new Allen Hospital and the inauguration of the new college health service under Dr. R. W. Bradshaw, our first college physician. The hospital and dispensary is the latest word in modern hospital construction and equipment. It is a memorial to Oberlin's distinguished surgeon-alumnus, Dr. Dudley P. Allen of Cleveland, and the generously complete furnishings and equipment are a memorial to Miss Myrtle Grace Vial, '08, of Chicago, by her family. Fitting dedicatory services will be held on Oct. 30. G. W. F.

Massachusetts with 166 students, New York with 95, Connecticut with 85, and New Jersey with 49 lead in the 20 states represented in the enrollment for the autumn term at Northfield Seminary. Of the 560 students, 214 entered the seminary this year, and about 40 applications are on file for admission at the first opportunity. The daughters of missionaries number eight; daughters of American parents, not missionaries, living in foreign countries, six; and 42 are daughters of former students. Sixteen different countries are represented by the 33 young women who are either foreign-born or children of foreign-born parents. The average age of the students in this seminary is 16½ years, and 66 girls are receiving scholarship aid during the present term.

Pacific University Advances

To speak of progress by leaps and bounds is to use a rather overworked expression, and yet in no less forceful language can one accurately describe the startling forward movement this fall at Pacific University, Forest Grove, Oregon.

coming of Dr. John Francis Dobbs from lden, Mass. It is no exaggeration to say t the new president's strong personality has roughly vitalized the whole institution. th the faculty and the student body have ome filled with a dynamic spirit of over-flowing enthusiasm. Some students who last spring announced their decision to finish their studies in the big universities have suddenly decided to return and graduate from Pacific. Instead of a freshman class of about 40, the new students this year number over 120.

The progress at Pacific is noticeable not only in the increased enrollment but also in the quality of the school's educational program. There has been a complete reorganization of the courses that the college offers and three new departments under strong leadership have been added. To take care of these enlarged needs, Dr. Dobbs has surrounded himself with a group of new and highly efficient instructors.

Robert J. Miner of Boston, a graduate of the Tuck School of Business Administration at Dartmouth and an experienced business man, heads the new department of business administration. A well-known newspaper man, Earl C. Brownlee, formerly on the staff of the Oregon Journal and now editor of the Forest Grove News-Tribune, directs the new department of journalism. Prof. H. S. Tuttle, a prominent member of the faculty, has organized the department of religious education.

Alva P. Patten, a high school principal who has been director of young people's work in First Church, Portland, is the new dean of men. Other new faculty members include J. W. Thompson, supervisor of practice teaching; Miss Annie Porter, dean of women; Miss Marion Affhauser, of the conservatory of music; Leslie L. Hoar, assistant coach and graduate manager; and Miss Doris Parker, women's physical instructor.

All the newness is not confined to the personnel, for the whole campus is smiling with a fresh spic-and-span appearance. Dr. Dobbs is spending many thousands of dollars in much needed physical improvements and a large number of students are helping to earn their way through college by doing this work.

Family Paper—"If not convenient to move household furniture outdoors to clean, place a damp cloth over the piece of furniture and then beat it."

We tried this and the wife made us come back.—Boston Transcript.

I went to look at an apartment in a spiffy new building. "There is no built-in bookcase," said I, "nor do I see where my own bookcases would fit in." "Books!" said the sleek young agent, "why madam, no one needs books these days, with the radio!"—Chicago Tribune.

"Your daughter," said Mrs. Oldcastle, after being conducted through the newly furnished wing of the mansion occupied by the Bullingtons, "has such a splendid vocabulary."

"Do you think so?" her hostess replied. "Josiah wanted to get her one of them escritoires, but I made up my mind that a vocabulary would look better in a room furnished like hers, even if it didn't cost quite so much."

The picnickers were obliged to cross a railroad track in reaching the place where they were to have lunch, and little Bobby, going ahead, saw a train approaching. Eagerly he shouted to his father, who was still on the track: "Hurry, Daddy, or else give me the lunch."—Progressive Grocer.

A dear old Methodist, obliged to remain in a certain town over Sunday, started out to attend service in one of the churches of his own faith; but losing his way, and seeing an open church-door just across the street, he entered, not knowing to what creed the congregation held. As the service progressed, his religious emotions waxed warmer and warmer, until finally he gave vent to them by shouting out, "Praise God!" Immediately one of the ushers tapped him on the shoulder and said, "You can't do that in this church, sir."

A salesman asked a Scotch farmer to buy a bicycle. "They are cheap now and I can let you have a good one for seven pounds."

"I would rather put the money in another cow," said the farmer, reflecting.

"You would look mighty foolish riding around your farm on a cow, now wouldn't you?" said the salesman.

Said the Scot: "No more foolish than I would milking a bicycle."—Common Sense.

"When we were married," remarked the job printer, "we lived back of the shop. Frequently my wife would call out for me to drop whatever I was doing and come and kiss her."

"And you didn't mind that?"

"Not at first. Sometimes I'd smear my inky paws over her fresh cheeks, too."

"And she didn't mind that?"

"Not at first."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

New Books for Church-School Workers

Teachers—Superintendents—Directors of Religious Education

FOR BEGINNERS' AND PRIMARY WORKERS

SONG AND PLAY FOR CHILDREN

Frances Weld Danielson and Grace Wilbur Conant

For Sunday and Weekday Use. Miss Danielson is a successful worker with Beginners. Miss Conant is famous for her adaptations of well-known classical melodies, hymns, and folk songs, as well as for her original compositions. This book carries a collection of songs and games and music to suggest desirable moods which is bound to receive the enthusiastic approval of all those who appreciate the importance and value of good music and wholesome play in the character development of children. $1.25

FOR PRIMARY WORKERS

A YEAR OF PRIMARY PROGRAMS

Lucy Stock Chapin

This book is planned for the use of Primary superintendents or other leaders of children's worship and instruction in the church school where graded lessons are taught, and is also intended to help in the conduct of the Sunday sessions. It furnishes monthly programs which can be arranged and adapted for use throughout the year. In addition this volume features stories, handwork suggestions, songs, programs for special days, and helpful book lists. $2.00

FOR JUNIOR WORKERS

A CURRICULUM OF WORSHIP FOR THE JUNIOR CHURCH SCHOOL

Edna M. Crandall

With an introduction by Luther Allan Weigle

Aims to give Junior girls and boys a more systematic training in worship. It offers programs for a year's service of worship, carefully prepared from the standpoint of the psychological and educational aspects of worship. It also contains a correlated curriculum of worship materials for memorization. It is the product of actual experience and has stood the test of repeated use. $2.00

Elizabeth Colson

A year of worship programs built around the stories of twelve hymns—for the junior department of the church. The purpose is to create fresh and lasting interest and feeling in the hymn singing of youth. As the book is arranged, there is material for a short period of hymn study every week in the year, and at certain seasons like Christmas and Easter, programs or services are planned for the school as a whole, often including the congregation. $1.25

FOR WORKERS WITH ADOLESCENTS

The ORGANIZATION and ADMINISTRATION of the INTERMEDIATE DEPARTMENT

H. H. Harris

One of the intermediate units in the Standard Teacher Training Course. This volume furnishes well-thought-out guidance in the specific problems involved in the Intermediate Department. Workers who are alive to the potentialities of the Intermediate age in the gradual unfolding of Christian character and are eager to inaugurate an effective program of religious education that will be dynamic in the lives of Intermediates will rejoice in the helpfulness of this text. 60 cents

Maurice J. Neuberg

A discussion course for boys and girls. Dr. Neuberg's chief purpose has been to secure ethical reactions from the study of concrete ethical problems. This course of lessons, therefore, is not so much concerned with inculcating any set of clearly defined facts, as it is with developing in boys and girls a basis of judgment and action which will serve them as they grow older.

Pupil's Edition, $1.25. Teacher's Manual, 75 cents

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF MIDDLE ADOLESCENCE

Mary E. Moxcey

One of the senior units of the Standard Teacher Training Course. A specialized study of the senior pupil. The period of middle adolescence, from about 15 to about 17, coincides with the period of the Senior Department in the church school and with the high-school period in the organization of the public school. The writer has attempted to set the chief distinguishing marks of middle adolescence by themselves, to study the problems involved in understanding this most perplexing and likewise most promising age, and to give some suggestions for practical pedagogy as well as for further study. 60 cents

TEACHING THE YOUTH OF THE CHURCH

Cynthia Pearl Maus

A vivid, authoritative analysis of the teaching process specifically applied to methods of lesson development in teaching the youth of the church. A book rich in pedagogic principle, in concrete method, and in stimulating suggestion. $1.75

THE CHURCH'S PROGRAM FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Herbert Carleton Mayer

A practical guide to intelligent work with adolescents. It presents a sound educational program for the church's work with young people. An invaluable guide to leaders of young people in the church.

Professor G. Walter Fiske of Oberlin College in writing to the author says the following: "You have made a distinct contribution which cannot fail to be recognized and valued. Needless to say I am using the book with my pupils, for it fills a unique place as the first real textbook on its subject. It not only gathers together a vast amount of valuable material, but its fearless discussion of outworn methods and its fine interpretation of the needs of young people and the best means of serving them make the book invaluable for critical and constructive purposes. Your educational policy is thoroughly sound. It is difficult to find a flaw in it. I congratulate you on producing such a book." $2.00

Recommended as a Text for Teacher Training Classes and also for Individual Reading and Study

YOU CAN LEARN TO TEACH

Margaret Slattery

Author of Talks to the Training Class, The Charm of the Impossible, The American Girl and Her Religion

The rich experience of twenty years actively engaged in the furtherance of religious education, together with a thorough knowledge of the most recent advances in the fields of psychology and pedagogy, has gone into the making of this lucid and inspiring handbook. While retaining all the simplicity and charm of style which characterized her deservedly popular "Talks to the Training Class," this more comprehensive work will bring fresh inspiration to the experienced teacher, and prove an unfailing source of wisdom and guidance to the beginner. $1.35

WASHINGTON NUMBER

THE CHOIR OF FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, AKRON, OHIO

This group of singers excellently rendered the musical part of the devotional service preceding the National Council Sermon, in the Washington Auditorium, on Sunday afternoon, October 25. The choir was under the direction of Burton Garlinghouse, who presided at the organ, and the musical service was interwoven into a very rich and ritualistic order of service, in which choir and congregation were led by Dr. Lloyd Douglas, minister of First Church, Akron. The key to the picture is found on page 666

eing Red—A Symptom of Spiritual Blindness

T is a common claim on the part of Canadians and Englishmen that under a limited monarchy they ssess in the social and political spheres freedom in eech and action much greater than we have in these nited States under the constitution and institutions a pure democracy. This claim we should be disposed challenge at most essential points, but it is unfornate that a fairly large number of people in this untry seem determined to give to it a semblance of uth.

The latest instance is in the ridiculous interference the part of the National Security League with argements for two addresses which the Hon. Arthur enderson, an eminent British statesman, was to have livered in Hartford, Ct. English and Canadian pers have been scathing and contemptuous in their mment upon this incident. Evidently, however, they ve not known all the facts. Inquiries which The Congegationalist has made indicate that Mr. Henderson, o was visiting Hartford as the guest of an old friend, fellow-Methodist, was invited to address the Joint Civic ub, but the invitation was rescinded. An invitation address the Y. M. C. A. was also rescinded, then rewed, but declined by Mr. Henderson. We are proud record the fact that a large meeting was then held Center Church House, at which Mr. Henderson spoke, d over which President Mackenzie, of the Hartford minary Foundation, presided.

Though we are ourselves hard-boiled and impenitent lievers in free speech, regarding all such matters as e exclusion of Countess Karolyi as evidences of weak d timid policy, it should be recognized that no exeme or questionable matter was involved in Mr. Henrson's being accorded any platform in this country. e has been connected with the Labor Party in Great itain, but he has never been even remotely associated th the extreme left, and he has been one of His ajesty's constitutional advisers. His association with e Christian Church has been always a notable factor his career. People must surely be under the halluination of a waking nightmare who could see in such man any possible menace to American institutions, who could find any reason why his fair comment upon e should not be heard.

We hope that English and Canadian papers will not ss the fact, or mistake the significance, of the meetg presided over by Dr. Mackenzie in Center Church ouse. Possibly also, in judging reports of interferences th, and suppressions of, free speech in America, they ght find a sympathetic viewpoint and understanding remembering that "Pussyfoot" Johnson lost an eye the exercise of free speech in England, and that it not long since a mob of wets and Chauvinists howled down William Jennings Bryan, and refused to allow him to speak in the Massey Hall, Toronto.

The Status of The Congregationalist

THE CONGREGATIONALIST is owned and published by the Congregational Publishing Society as the national organ of our Congregational Churches. The question of changing the character and policies of the denomination's periodicals, which are the Missionary Herald, the American Missionary, and The Congregationalist, was brought before the National Council at Washington, in the report of the Committee of Twelve, but it was voted to recommit the subject of the periodicals to the Committee for further study and report at the next meeting of the Council in Omaha in 1927.

The Committee of Twelve, after recommending the merger of missionary societies and the unification of promotion, stated:

The matter of publications must be considered in relation with what we are proposing in the matter of organization and not with the present situation. We are proposing two Boards, the directors of which, meeting jointly, will constitute the Commission on Missions; and which will have the Joint Promotional Council as their organized arm of promotion. To make such unification effective, we must set up the conditions of success. Joint promotion requires joint action in all the functions of promotion, including the publishing of missionary information.

But we conceive of the denominational organ as very much more than a promotional organ. It should deal with significant news and developments and carry general articles of commanding interest. It should come into our homes as a real contribution to life and thought.

RECOMMENDATION. We therefore recommend that there shall be a unified denominational organ to be published as a weekly under the name The Congregationalist, with a monthly missionary issue to be known as The Congregationalist, World Work Number. This should be developed into the best possible magazine, with general articles by writers who command world-wide attention, with expert reporting and analysis of all significant religious and denominational developments, and with adequate presentation of our missionary work, both foreign and home. To this end there should be missionary material in each number, and one enlarged number should be each month devoted largely to the work of the two boards and should be issued as the World Work Number.

The Missionary Herald and the American Missionary could be retained if desired, as house organs for circulation on a non-competitive basis.

The Congregationalist should be furnished at not more than $3.00 with club and multiple rates. It is hoped that a large subscription list will make possible a really low price. We recommend that the subscription cards used in the Every Member Canvass, or those for church support, contain a line for subscribing to The Congregationalist.

We recommend that the management of The Congregationalist be placed in a committee of nine, at least three of whom should be women, to be elected by the two Boards sitting jointly as the Commission on Missions, with ratification separately by each Board; that this Committee should appoint an editor-in-chief, who should be given general direction of The Congregationalist, choosing his own staff, including an Associate Editor on Foreign Missions nominated by the American Board and an Associate Editor on Home Missions nominated by the Home Board.

Largely because of opposition from friends of the Missionary Herald and the American Board, who feared that the proposed plan would reduce the income of the Board which the Missionary Herald serves effectively, the vote to recommit was finally carried.

All three periodicals require substantial subsidies. The missionary magazines are supported by the missionary societies as a regular part of their publicity expenses. The Congregationalist subsidy was provided by the Publishing Society, in accordance with the policy of the denomination, until war conditions caused a period of financial embarrassment for the society. When the National Council directed the Publishing Society to purchase the Advance at a price higher than that approved by the society's directors, the Council pledged itself to stand back of the society if losses followed. Losses did follow, and the Council undertook to reimburse the Publishing Society through the Apportionment. As the society was not under the Apportionment Plan, the allied Education Society was designated, practically as agent, to receive an added percentage to its apportionment for The Congregationalist, and reimburse the Publishing Society. The Education Society never received enough to meet its regular budget and cover this added obligation. The result has been embarrassment for that society and a continued burden for the Publishing Society. This financial problem was one of the reasons for seeking a new plan of support for The Congregationalist. The Committee of Twelve sought to meet it by recommending that the "necessary budget of The Congregationalist" should be included in the budget of the Commission on Missions. That recommendation was adopted by the National Council in Washington.

The National Council also voted that the Commission on Missions should appoint a committee of five the Midwinter Meeting in Chicago next January will provide for The Congregationalist's budget as directed by the National Council.

The value of The Congregationalist was recognized and emphasized in many ways during the Washington meeting.

In Brief

It is when men have little love in their hearts that they doubt the efficacy of love.

The addresses delivered by Dr. Ashley Day Leavitt, pastor of Harvard Church, Brookline, Mass., at the devotional sessions of the National Council, will quicken interest in a little book by Dr. Leavitt, Jesus and the Jury, recently issued by the Pilgrim Press. In this little volume, Dr. Leavitt, seizing upon the parallel between the number of disciples and the traditional jury and emphasizing the challenge of Jesus to the average man, makes a strong plea for the competence of the average man in moral and spiritual judgments. Dr. Leavitt stands upon high ground in his characterization of faith in Jesus as "first of all an answer to life." "It takes," he says, "the whole of life, aroused to make the most of itself, to recognize the beauty and truth of that answer."

Proposals for a Wider Congregational Fellowship

A New Development in Universalist-Congregational Overtures

IN response to a memorial from the Congregational Conference of Northern California, and with reference also to resolutions of the Maine Universalist Convention, the Congregational National Council at its recent session dealt with the matter of a proposed union between Universalists and Congregationalists, and suggested the terms upon which such a union might be desirable and feasible. The Council likewise referred the matter to its Commission on Interchurch Relations, inviting the General Convention of Universalists to appoint a corresponding Commission "to consider with ours what is practicable."

Reference has been made to this action in the news columns, but the Council's resolution, which was adopted without a dissenting voice, may here be specifically stated, as follows:

The Council receives with interest the resolutions of the Northern California Conference expressing its hope that the way may soon open for a union of the Universalist churches with our own. It is truly responsive to the spirit of the resolution recently adopted by the Universalist State Convention at Bangor, Me. It directs its Commission on Interchurch Relations to express to the General Convention its sincere desire to welcome into its fellowship all churches which can find freedom and satisfaction on the general basis of the Kansas City declaration of 1913, and it invites the General Convention to appoint a corresponding Commission to consider with ours what is practicable.

How essentially and fully the Council's action has been understood and interpreted by our Universalist brethren is evident in the editorial comment of the Universalist Leader. The Leader says:

The longest, hardest step toward church unity is taken when Christian men of insight, tolerance, and burning zeal for service sit about one table to plan and work that the Kingdom may come.

Self-respecting Universalists, loyal to the noblest traditions of the Universalist Church, may well feel proud and happy that these overtures have been made. The one thing we Universalists ought to be and generally are more interested in than anything else, is to make men everywhere realize the limitless Power and Love of the Good God and the fundamental oneness of the human race. For these great truths Christ lived and died. In our better moments we know that nothing in existence is worth as much as serving them. Closer union with those who hold the same precious faith will multiply our resources, deepen our spiritual life, strengthen our hearts and hands.

We do not know what can come or will come from these overtures. Among the possibilities on the lower evels is a working agreement with either the Congre-ational or the Unitarian Church, or with both. Among he possibilities on the higher levels is a new United 'ree Church, whether it is called that or not.

This is certain, as Richard Roberts said at Syracuse, There is a drawing together." As Dr. Hall put it, There is a new spirit in the air."

We cannot conceive of any man in our fellowship so gnoble that he will purposely misrepresent this thing. Ve cannot conceive of any service more necessary at his juncture than the making of acts and motives clear s noon day.

Our contemporary then quotes in full the memorial f the Northern California Conference, the resolutions f the Universalist Convention at Bangor, and the Kan-as City declaration of the Congregational churches, and ontinues:

In our opinion the vast majority of Universalists ill accept the Kansas City statement. Our leaders re-oiced when it was adopted. It marked the victory of ie liberals of the church. Being Congregational, how-ver, it binds nobody. Each Congregational church is s free to adopt its own creed as it is to ordain its wn ministers. Among Congregationalists statements of his kind are put forth to explain to the world the ings generally believed among Congregationalist people. ur own declarations of faith are not unlike this great eclaration of the free churches of the Congregational rder.

Quoting further from the Moderator's address of r. William E. Barton, at the Springfield National ouncil, an extensive passage showing how impossible would be, merely on the basis of a creedal statement, unite all Congregational churches together, or to go to a new church union, the Leader editorial concludes:

It would be a mistake, therefore, for any one to in-rpret this cordial overture of the Congregationalists erely as an invitation to give up our organization nd join them on their own terms. They are saying r our guidance: This practically is where we stand. 'e want to get together with all who cherish these eals. To put it in their own words: "The mission of ie Church of Christ is to proclaim the gospel to all ankind, exalt the worship of the one true God, labor r the progress of knowledge, the promotion of jus-ce, the reign of peace, and the realization of human otherhood."

And the word "fellowship" in the resolutions must e read in the light of the noble closing passage of the ansas City declaration entitled, "The Wider Fellow-ip."

Wherever we go as Universalists, we will go together. 'ith whatever comrades we go, we will go for the one rpose of saving the whole human race. And until e go our preparation for the going will consist in in-easing our resources, adding to our membership, train-g our children, deepening our spiritual life, and serv-g all mankind as we are able. When it comes, it won't e a giving up of anything that really counts, or we on't let it come. It will be a Pentecostal accession of ith and power, the tramp, tramp, tramp of mighty lies, the snapping of a lot of old chains of suspicion nd misunderstanding, and a swift rush forward together take objectives toward which we have been looking l through the one hundred and fifty years of Univer-list history.

This is all quite admirable, and its spirit will be ppreciated by the Congregational fellowship. As is dicated in one reference, however, a new and important ctor, not apparently contemplated in the mutual over-res of Universalists and Congregationalists, has arisen in connection with these union proposals. Either spontaneously, or under the stimulation of these overtures, the Unitarians approached the Universalist General Convention, meeting at Syracuse simultaneously with our National Council, inviting that body to appoint a commission to meet one appointed by Unitarians to organize "a council of representative liberal Christians for the purpose of promoting sympathy and co-operation among them, furthering their common aims and uniting them for the advancement of the Kingdom of God."

Regarding this overture from the Unitarians, the Universalist Leader says:

It can be said authoritatively that there was something larger than the union of Unitarians and Universalists in the minds of those responsible for these resolutions. This was made clear by the address of the Rev. Harold E. B. Speight, D.D., minister of King's Chapel, who presented the resolutions in connection with one of the most inspiring addresses of the Convention. To Mr. Speight it is tragic that our liberals sometimes fail to understand the heroic service of liberals in Orthodox churches. Dr. Eliot, president of the American Unitarian Association, Mr. Speight, and others responsible for the resolutions, propose that together we shall begin a work to draw all liberals closer together.

The Unitarian resolutions close with the sublime words of George Washington:

"Brethren, together let us raise a standard to which the wise and the honest can repair. The event is in the hand of God."

There was no dissenting voice when Judge Galer made his happy little speech of appreciation of the resolutions and moved that they be referred to the Committee on Comity to be appointed.

The possible effect of these circumstances should not in any way be misunderstood or minimized. It means that indirectly Congregationalists might be involved in negotiations contemplating either the healing of the historic breach among Congregationalists upwards of a century ago, or that we might be led to a higher plane of unity upon which old divisions and controversies might be relegated to the past in a new sense of fellowship and under new impulses of re-alignment for spiritual quests and practical tasks. The whole situation ought to be met without damning pre-suppositions and unreasonable prejudices, but it ought to be met, likewise, with no blinking of essential facts and difficulties. If among these three groups—all Congregational in temper and polity—dual or tripartite union is practicable, it ought to be upon the basis of good will, mutual recognitions, and good understandings, and not upon the basis of some vague and sentimental "liberalism"; if, on the other hand, either dual or tripartite union should be deemed impracticable, it ought to be upon the basis of a clear recognition of the things that make it so. Our unities, or our divisions, ought to be based upon a better knowledge of one another. Negotiations and contacts can at least lead us to a place where our enlargement, or our limitation, of organizational fellowship can have some intelligible and justifiable basis.

We are content in this issue to state the facts. We propose in a future issue to attempt a careful analysis of the situation, and an interpretation of what we deem to be the spirit and attitude in relation to these proposals of the fellowship which The Congregationalist represents.

Personal Observations of Thought Life Among European Students

By S. Ralph Harlow

THE youth of Europe are in revolt against the old social order. During the past summer I visited England, Holland, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, and France. I took a group of American students on this trip and attended conferences with student leaders in four countries. At Geneva, in August, I met the student leaders of thirty countries and nationalities, two hundred and eighty delegates being present at the conference. Without hesitation I reaffirm, the youth of Europe are in revolt against the old pre-war social order.

The student element is the most hopeful factor in the European situation today. Let me quote from the final statement of a recent conference of European students at which thirty nationalities were present. As to the student class they declared, "The war and the past few years have demonstrated that the intellectual classes of the different countries were no more masters of the situation than any other class or group. The result has been that they are in no position today to fulfill their highest function and responsibility, that of leadership in their respective nations. This state of affairs must be changed."

Here is their finding as to the ideal for a university. "We are resolved: That service to the community and the world and not personal gain should be the chief motive with which university study should be undertaken. That a more comprehensive international and supernational outlook should be fostered in our universities. That no education is complete which does not allow opportunity for the fullest development of artistic instinct and talent. That no education is complete which does not allow opportunity for the fullest development of man's spiritual nature and capacity. That more attention must be given than heretofore to the care and furthering of the physical health of students. That the present disadvantages and discrimination under which women students labor in many universities be removed, thus securing complete equality for all, irrespective of sex."

Keep in mind that at this conference were students from races which still cherish the most bitter feelings of revenge, of injustice, and of outraged sentiments. They came from many races and languages. They were Roman Catholics, German Lutherans, Greek Orthodox, Serbian Orthodox, and Protestants. They are living under conditions such as few American students have ever known, living often fifteen in a room, a pail their washtub, a candle their only light and a text-book shared like the overcoat with several fellow students.

The organization which draws these students together began in a world of weak, impotent Christian Student Movements thirty years ago. It has stimulated Christian thinking and living and co-operation in every part of the globe. It is known as the World's Student Christian Federation. It was the only international organization to stand through the World War and the first to convene after the struggle was over. Our American Student Movement might live without the federation but many student movements of Europe could not.

European Student Relief

The greatest factor in bringing about understanding between the students of the various countries has been through an organization known as the European Student Relief. All over Europe after the war were starving students. I mean that literally. Students were picked up starved to death every morning at the doors of some of the soup kitchens. Their misery was beyond words. Expatriated, without homes, with wornout uniforms their only clothes, their situation was desperate. Then was born the European Student Relief. It shone a beacon of light in great darkness. It sought to help get the students of these war-torn lands on their feet. The World's Student Christian Federation believed that it was essential to attempt to train a student class in these lands who would understand each other. Students of more favored lands gave gladly to help carry on this work. Secretaries were sent into the countries where the need was greatest. After the Smyrna tragedy the European Student Relief came to the relief of students driven over to Greece and has helped hundreds of them to find a little light to walk by in the awful darkness, something still to believe in when all faith and trust in any justice anywhere was tottering, some faith in God when many were driven to despair.

> "First and before all else comes Christ, in whom is universal salvation; the communion of the spirit in the Gospel stands over and above the difference of nation. But that does not destroy our sense of kinship with the nation in which God has placed us; rather it gives us a new love for our country, a new sense of being bound up with its destiny, and a desire to work towards its eternal salvation."
> —Statement from a German Student Conference.

The Working Student

At Geneva last summer I met Dr. Reinhold Schairer, who, as director of the German Students Co-operative Association, has worked heart and soul with the European Student Relief. From Dr. Schairer and other members of the German student group I caught a vision of a new Germany. When the German Republic was born in 1918 it was a nation physically scarred by war, mentally scarred by defeat. Poverty and despair stalked the highways and byways of the land. But at that time when it was difficult to exist, it was not forgotten that something more than existence was necessary.

In 1919 came the birth of a student or ganization for self-government now recog nized and given certain powers by law Each of the forty-eight university center in Germany established a student associa tion to which every student must belon There are over 90,000 student members o this association today. Four hundred thou sand dollars has been contributed to thi association through the European Studen Relief. Through this gift was establishe among the German students another assoc ation known as the German Students Co-op erative Association. It aims to help need students to go on with their education b finding opportunities for them to hel themselves.

The idea of the working student is a iconoclastic departure from the old trad tions of student life in Germany. Befor the war less than a dozen German student were to be found doing manual labor. I 1921 more than 20,000 students went t work; in 1922 more than 40,000 were worl ing, and in 1923 more than 63,000 out o 90,000 students were working with the hands, 10,000 of them in the mines of Ge many. Apart from the help and co-oper tion of the European Student Relief th tremendous and significant change woul have been impossible. Do you catch th magnitude of this change in student thoug and life in Germany? Before the war th student class was an aristocracy. Toda they form a more democratic group tha the students of the average American co lege and I found them far more liberal. I would be utterly impossible to put acros on the British and German students th militarism now rampant on many a cam pus in America and which the War Depart ment of this government is trying to fois on our educational system, namely, com pulsory military training. A nation-wid mobilization day is unthinkable in German today. Before the war the Kaiser's goverr ment reveled in such days. What did w not think of that method then?

A Memorial for the Ages

When I met Dr. Schairer in Geneva i August he was radiant. At its annual meet ing, from which he had just come, the Cer tral Federation of Students, representin the entire student body of Germany, too up the question of a war memorial to thei student dead. A monument had bee planned. Instead of a monument of ston they voted to send from sixty to eighty stu dents yearly to foreign lands to study an to encourage a better understanding betwee the students of Germany and the students o these lands. Has the hand of friendship ex tended by the students of America and Bri tain and other countries to the students o Germany been gripped with understanding I would with all my heart that I coul feel that the students of France and Italy yes, and of America were as eager an ready, at sacrifice, to come to understandin l friendship with other nations as these dents of Germany.

Let me quote from the findings of a con- ence of German students held in Ger- ny this year. Three great questions con- ning youth held the chief place in the dis- sion: Authority and Freedom, Vocation l Work, State and Nation. In this con- ence both Roman Catholics and Protes- ts took part. There were also Socialists o claimed no allegiance to any church. re is the concluding statement drawn up the Christian students of the conference. First and before all else comes Christ, in om is universal salvation; the communion the spirit in the Gospel stands over and ve the difference of nation. But that s not destroy our sense of kinship with nation in which God has placed us; her it gives us a new love for our coun- , a new sense of being bound up with destiny, and a desire to work towards its rnal salvation.

Pioneers in Human Brotherhood

n evening at Toynbee Hall in London h a group of British students, and a con- ence with that great leader of student ught both in Britain and America, J. ddert-Kennedy, left no uncertainties as where the Christian students of Britain nd. This was confirmed as I met their gates at Geneva. British students were ost a unit in condemnation of the Ver- les Treaty. They are franker than the lents of any country in Europe and far e willing to admit national sins than we America. Studdert-Kennedy sat back in azement as I told him something of our pulsory military training and our "na- al defense day." He declared that such gs would be impossible in Britain today, ugh he denounced Britain's sins in no ertain manner. He saw three terrible rs at the front as chaplain, known oughout the British army as "Woodbine lie." Today he is an outspoken pacifist ugh he remains a chaplain to the King. tain is facing a revolution in her field abor and no one knows what may come h. The debarring of a member of the ish Parliament by the Government of United States because he is too "rev- ionary" will be an amazing fact to the lents of Britain. How William Pitt t turn in his grave!

mong the Austrian students I find most eful signs. Recently thirty Austrian stu- ts undertook a pilgrimage of friendship ugh the Balkans. Dr. Nenaditch, the opean Student Relief representative in grade, secured free visas and reduced way fare through Jugoslavia, and ar- ged a reception of welcome in Belgrade. trast this with the Serajevo affair in 1914.

Youth's International Outlook

outh at heart is international. Its im- es and movements do not recognize na- al frontiers. I have written of the stu- t movements here. Let me remind you there are great movements among th outside the university circles. Take Wandervogel among the youth of Ger- y. I saw these German boys and girls their simple peasant costumes, their e heads and often bare feet, their songs upon their lips and the tan of outdoor life on their faces. They are breaking with old conventions and are part of the revolt against the old order. They number thou- sands.

In Czechoslovakia there is a most encour- aging movement among the students. In the Student Hostel in Prague, built as a gift by the students of an American university, I watched with enthusiasm the students pour in, and my conversations with some of them moved me deeply. In the rebirth of the na- tional life of the Bohemian people many of the student youth of the nation were brought to recognize the necessity of their own spiritual rebirth. A small group, with- out regard to creeds, have met for religious study. Jews, Catholics, and non-conformists have been in this group. One Czech student said, "We've lived quite close to eternal things these last few years. Religious in- terests have been and are today our greatest concern. It is through a revival of spiritual interest that we will find the way out of our present difficulties."

I have said little of the Russian students. There is a movement called the "Commu- nistic Youth International," which is a union of all the revolutionary proletarian youth organizations in the world. It has over 800,000 members in fifty-one organizations. Here is their own statement of purpose.

The final liberating of the working youth from the yoke of capitalistic exploitation, the attainment of the proletarian dictator- ship as a preliminary to the communistic state of society that shall put an end to our sufferings. In communism the youth will enjoy protection of all society, and all the resources of knowledge; the entire prod- ucts of civilization and life-cultivation will be supplied to making them a generation of productive, working, free, and equal human beings.

This movement in Russia is largely out- side the colleges. The university group has not gone with the communists. It is impossible here to make statements concern- ing this class. They are far more inter- ested in co-operation between the peoples than with the enforcing of communism on the world.

The Dawning

Three years ago I visited India, China, and Japan. In these countries of the Ori- ent there is perhaps a more definite and far- reaching movement toward a new day among the students than even in Europe. One thing is certain, the students of the world declare that we need to think in more universal terms than in the past. We need to go to the truth, to be pioneers of a life that goes farther than a basis of profit and loss expressed in dollar signs. We need more intelligent enthusiasms and less per- sonal motives. We may see some serious defeats along the line of our struggle toward the higher goal, but if the coming genera- tion gets its chance the day is dawning, not setting, the sun rising, not declining on human brotherhood and the establish- ment of Christ's Kingdom. One serious question still remains unanswered: Will America prove a force or a field in the strug- gle toward international good will and mu- tual understanding between the nations?

The Parable of the Crusts

The daughter of Keturah came to visit us, she and her husband, and their three children. And the daughter of the daughter of Keturah was there, and so was her brother who is younger, and who is named after me, and the little sister of the daughter of the daughter of Keturah, who hath the name of Elizabeth Ann, but who is called Sammy.

And the son of the daughter of Keturah, being a fine healthy boy, liketh bread the better when it hath butter and sugar, or it may be Preserves or Marmalade, as I did at his age and still do. And he liketh not Crusts.

And Keturah spake unto the daughter of Keturah, saying, Thy little son should eat his Crusts.

And the daughter of Keturah said, Grand- parents should enjoy their grandchildren, and not be troubled about their Morals, but leave them to their own parents. For didst thou not have trouble enough with me and with my four brothers, teaching us to eat Crusts? And even yet my hair doth not Curl as the hair of a good little girl should curl who hath been trained to eat Crusts. Nevertheless, if thou desire to discipline my son, and teach him to eat Crusts, behold, he is in thine hand.

So Keturah said, Little lad, I desire that thou eat thy Crusts. It is good for thy Health, and it is proper economy, and it is better Manners.

And he was attentive and obedient.

And Keturah had pride in the effects of her Discipline.

And one day thereafter, we overheard a Conversation. And the daughter of the daughter of Keturah said, Thou dost owe me Two Cents.

And her brother said, I paid thee Two Cents yesterday.

And she said, That was for yesterday, and I want pay for today. I will not eat thy Crusts except thou pay me.

And I and Keturah walked on together. And when we were at a safe distance, I remarked, Keturah, thou art a Great Dis- ciplinarian.

And Keturah said, I understand now why they wanted to sit on the same side of the table, that they might pass the Crusts unseen.

And I said, Keturah, thou hast had the management of me for a long time, and I am a Model.

And she said, Thou art no better than thy Grandson. It is from thee he getteth all his Depravity.

And I said, Thou hast well spoken. And I am utterly impenitent. Keturah, I have Two Cents. Wilt thou not eat my Crusts?

And she said, Nay. But I will give thee plenty of Preserves and other Good Things. For after all, thy grandson is a Dear Little Boy.

And I said, He is much as I was.

And she said, He is much as thou art. And with all thy faults I hope he may be as good a man.

The National Council Day by Day

(Saturday Afternoon, October 24)

The report of ex-President George W. Nash of the Foundation was heard. This will be printed in a later number of The Congregationalist, so that no outline of it need be given here. Dr. Ernest B. Allen of the Foundation set forth the principles under which the Foundation does its work. He called attention to the strategic importance of the Christian college for religious education, for the leadership of fine personalities, and for making Christianity really effective in college life. He reminded his hearers that there is no antagonism between tax-supported schools and privately endowed colleges. Congregationalists have given much leadership to state universities, and the presidents of these have in many cases been Congregational ministers. The state universities can no longer take care of all the young people that want to go to college and they do not undertake to give the same kind of training that the Christian college gives.

He also reminded his hearers that at present Congregationalism has no educational policy and that it has failed signally to rise to the leadership formerly offered by the Education Society and later by the Foundation. Our colleges are suffering for lack of our denominational fellowship with all its prestige and from lack of money for equipment and teachers. He indicated that our colleges for the most part had been free and had been enabled always to keep the peace between science and religion. He urged our fellowship to follow the lead of other great denominations who are financing their colleges and thus preparing to take care of the future.

Dr. E. C. Streeter gave the Council a vision of money interpreted in terms of personality and brought many examples of the vision that men and women have had for the education of youth.

Dr. Cadman

The remainder of the afternoon was given to four addresses by distinguished leaders. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman described in his inimitable way the Stockholm Conference and brought to bear the great principles underlying its work. His address was a real contribution to the spirit of church unity. Secretary of the Navy Curtis D. Wilbur, described in detail the working of this great organization and dwelt especially upon the dangers incident to its service. He showed by many examples that the Navy, which is made up entirely of young men, maintains a fine morale and a quality of living that is remarkable. He read a number of letters from governmental authorities of Australia who commended highly the conduct of our sailors when they visited Australia recently.

Commissioner Esch

Commissioner of Education John C. Esch, in an address delivered with great earnestness, showed that his office was conducted upon the idea that moral and religious education must undergird all other education. He does not see any hope for the future of America if we sharpen the intellect only. He contends that the educated rogue is more dangerous than the uneducated one and that the demand of the hour is for a teaching that will bring control and poise to life and lead us to use the great power given us now to construct rather than to tear down. He struck the same note which President Coolidge had sounded in his address a few nights before. It was very heartening to have our President, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Commissioner of Education unite upon the importance of morals and religion.

Bishop Francis J. McConnell of the Methodist Episcopal Church spoke on the topic, "The Minister as a Prophet." He held that we need some ministers in every age who have a vision which far outruns the present day living of the people and he believes that the men who have this vision ought to be free to speak it. The fact that they are not able to set up a program that will put their vision into action is not to be allowed to militate against their preaching their vision. He contends that only as we have these men who see the future in ideal terms and give them freedom to set forth this future clearly and fearlessly can we hope to make progress. He guarded his remarks by saying that the selfish idealist who had no character back of his own idealism should have no place in the ministry. His address was one of the clearest and most effective of the Council.

The World Court

(Saturday Evening, October 24)

At the close of the evening session the Moderator recognized Dr. H. A. Bridgman, chairman of the committee on resolutions, who said that former Governor Wm. E. Sweet of Colorado would present for the committee a resolution which was deemed imperative at this time.

Governor Sweet read from the daily press of Saturday statements about Senator Borah's efforts and determination to defeat the entrance of the United States into the World Court. In comparison he read press statements of last August in which President Coolidge was optimistic and insistent that this country should enter the World Court.

In substance he added: At hand in December is the most critical discussion and debate since the Treaty of Versailles. Senator Borah is resourceful and powerful and determined. He has allies like Mrs. Medill McCormick, the widow of the "irreconcilable" senator, who has just held a great meeting in Chicago to aid in defeating the World Court.

He will finally defeat President Coolidge unless we work. The President will not bring in a measure until he believes it ought to be presented and is satisfied the people want it done.

We would be derelict in our duty if we did not pass this resolution assuring the President how the Council stands. We can negotiate loans but we cannot negotiate peace. Let us start a bonfire on all the hills of America in this campaign.

The following resolutions were then passed enthusiastically and unanimously by the Council.

Whereas the question of the entrance of the United States into the Permanent Court of International Justice, otherwise known as the World Court, is to be considered by the United States Senate on December 17, 1925, and

Whereas this question is believed by us to be of crucial importance because it specifically relates to the attitude of the United States toward the maintenance of peace and justice by judicial determination rather than force, and

Whereas the World Court has been accepted by substantially all the sovereign nations of the world as a permanent tribunal to which may be submitted all questions likely to lea to war, and

Whereas Presidents Harding and Coolidg and Ex-Secretary Charles E. Hughes and man other leading statesmen of the nation, withou regard to party, have urged that the Unite States enter the World Court with proper re ervations.

Therefore Be It Resolved:

That the National Council of Congregationa Churches assembled at its twenty-fifth regula meeting at Washington, D. C., reaffirm the po sition taken by it in 1923 in regard to th World Court. We rejoice at the statemen made by the Honorary Moderator of this Coun cil, Calvin Coolidge, President of the Unite States, that "as peace means fundamentally reign of law we propose to become a membe of the Permanent Court for International Jus tice."

Be It Further Resolved:

That we make a determined effort as minis ters and laymen in our several localities t arouse public interest in this question, to th end that the United States shall co-operate t the utmost with other nations in bringing abou the substitution of judicial methods for war.

Sunday Service and Sermon

(Sunday Afternoon, October 25)

The long rain of Saturday and Sunday, con cluding with a small cloudburst just at churc time Sunday morning, stopped at noon an changed to set fair against the fears of th weather bureau for Monday and Tuesday Some thousands of worshipers gathered in th Auditorium for the afternoon service at 3.30 when the Council sermon was preached by Dr Carl S. Patton of Los Angeles, Cal. The ser vice began with an elaborate program of al ternate responsive readings by minister an congregation and choral responses or interlude by the choir. Dr. L. C. Douglas of Akron, O. was in charge, and his vested choir led th music. With a commendable desire for reveren worship unvexed by the entrance of late com ers, orders were given to close all doors at th beginning of the responsive service. Conse quently not five but five hundred foolish vir gins and others clamored vainly on the outside "Lord, lord, open to us," and for half an hou cooled their heels in the vestibule the while they grew warmer under the collar.

Following the ritualistic service, Dr. Dan F Bradley of Cleveland and Dr. Oscar E. Maurer of New Haven shared the Scripture reading and prayer before the sermon. Dr. Patton's sermon was a strong pronouncement upon the relation of the Gospel and the Gospel message to all the phases of the present age, progressive in thought and action. Comment is unneces sary save to note its very favorable reception by the audience, as it was printed in The Congregationalist last week.

Ministerial Relief

(Monday Morning, October 26)

Lay delegates as well as clerical seemed to welcome Monday as a day for ministerial relief Certain it is that most of them took a half day's respite in the morning. Possibly the lay men thought that they were absolved from the deliberations of the Board of Ministerial Re lief, but in reality most of the eloquence of fact and oratory released that morning was nt for absorption by the people of the pews. he points stressed by half a dozen officials speakers included first the need of building the Pilgrim Memorial Fund, not simply pleting the original subscriptions but adding several millions more in order to insure its e adequate functioning for annuitants in rs to come. Specifically the ministers were ed to enroll in the annuity plan, and Dr. S. Mills had graphic pictures flashed on the en to show the advantage accruing by enging in youth instead of age.

he laity received some emphatic advice upon duty of assuming half the pastor's expense his annuity. While his other insurance is own business, this church insurance is rch business which ought to be counted a lar feature of the budget of both minister church.

low relief is made possible for people outside annuity plan was told with photographs word pictures by Rev. H. R. Miles. Any of his stories of "cases" is sufficient argut for the board's existence.

eorge A. Huggins, actuary of the board, mented upon the business features of the d, its low overhead cost, and its practical ie as an asset to the clergy. Clarence S. et, a Chicago business man, expressed his ion emphatically upon church finance in tion to the ministers we now have, and Dr. H. Wilson of New Jersey closed the case an address on the maintenance of the dards of the ministry as a profession, look- to the influence of present policy upon boys in the pews. What will be the psyogical reaction upon a boy who hears an al from the pulpit for filling a missionary el? Enthusiasm to join the bread line or barrel line? Not as Dr. Wilson views it.

Home Missions

Monday, October 26, Morning, Afternoon, and Evening)

he biennial meeting of the Home Missionary ety was called to order by Pres. J. P. Huget. report of the General Secretary, Dr. E. M. liday, contrasted the expenditure of the year of the society's existence, $13,984, that of the centennial year, $1,600,000. featured the pioneer work among the imrant Negroes of the North. The report of asurer Charles H. Baker dwelt on the nkage of funds and called for sympathy, ence, and prayer as we undertake the task he "merger." The election of officers fol- d, continuing Dr. Huget as president, and nk E. Bogart was elected vice-president. esolution accepting the merger recommendas of the Committee of Twelve was adopted, it was voted to correlate the work of society with other promotional work. Be- doing so, however, the executive committ- was instructed to make intensive study of workings of such promotion, and report ie meeting in January, 1926. Several reso- ns were passed with instruction to the d of Directors, but all had in the clause easible." These resolutions included men- of possible charter changes, and also cour- to other societies included in the "merger." s. Moore, Heald, Fox, and Shoemaker fied to the value of a sanitarium in the hwest, and secured the approval of the cil for a tuberculosis hospital.

e corporate meetings of the other church sion societies—the Church Building So- and the Sunday School Extension Society re held, and similar action was taken, con- ng and ratifying the recommendations of Committee of Twelve. A plan was sug- d to correlate regional work with the work, but it was voted that the states themselves should decide whether these regional committees should be set up. The states are to take over local work, now done by the extension boards, when feasible, and all this is to be under the direction of the Home Board. The secretaries of the Foreign and Home Boards are to be in vital connection with the Promotional Council. The National Council requested the Commission on Missions to name, at once, the members of the Promotional Council. Resolutions were then passed urging the church to observe "Golden Rule Sunday" for the Near East Relief, and also urging sentiment for law enforcement.

Dr. Fox of El Paso, Tex., thought those who enforce professional ethics, forbidding a minister to bargain for his bread, are responsible for the implications of such a viewpoint and should lift the salaries.

Dr. Shoemaker outlined the work in the Southwest, and said that much of the political scandal is due to the manipulation of the three million Mexicans and eight million Indians by the dominant Protestant churches that have a belated theology.

Rev. Frank E. Henry touched on the "Flaming Frontier," and demonstrated the need of home missions has not ended. He sketched the work of the intermountain union of the section once known as the Great American Desert, in Montana and Idaho.

The Mormons

Rev. Clayton S. Rice of Utah, speaking of the Mormon situation, said: "Until the Mormon Church is willing to give up its attempt to control all who dwell in its territory, temporally, and to control its own people temporally and spiritually, it remains an un-American and dangerous institution." He found encouragement in recent changes in the Mormon Church, "almost approaching the revolutionary." He said that "an excellent public school system and the development of the higher state and church institutions of learning have accomplished wonders. Many theological crudities have been discarded."

Speaking of Negro work in the North, Dr. William N. DeBerry, pastor of St. John's Church, Springfield, Mass., described his institutional work, which conducts a Home for Women and Girls. It has a social center for them with recreation; also a similar center for men and boys. The church has a housing department, and has a summer camp for boys and girls in East Brookfield. Religious music is given special attention in St. John's Church. It is exemplifying the possibilities of an all-around ministry.

Opportunities in the South

Dr. D. Witherspoon Dodge of Central Church, Atlanta, Ga., spoke on "Congregational Churches as Centers of Christ-Consciousness in the South." He said in part:

No section of America is advancing more rapidly today than the South. It offers peculiar opportunities along agricultural and industrial lines; and these very facts stress its religious needs.

It has always been a section where the claims of religion received large attention. But this religion has been of a type that falls short of that which we find in the mind of Christ. It has been highly emotional, individualistic, theologically reactionary and dogmatic, and intensely denominational.

If the Congregational Church is to be simply another denomination stressing the same truths, doing the same work as the churches already there in larger number, it has no business in the South. But as creator—going forth in the spirit of Him who makes all things new—it has a unique mission which can be discharged by it better than by any other church.

This mission is to create, as an incipient public sentiment which shall grow with the progress of the years, the consciousness of Christ. Theologically this will result in the transformation of the prevailing seventeenth century doctrinal interpretations with all of their sternness, crudeness, and unreasonableness into something more in keeping with the Fatherhood of God. Psychologically, it will give a more critical handling to the traditional materials of our religion, and place larger emphasis on the human element in it. Sociologically, it will give to the idea of the Kingdom of God the importance which has been attached to the church, ethicize more highly the emotionalistic evangelism which has prevailed too largely up until the present, induce a larger trend toward unification among the churches, and promote a broader inter-racial view.

Aroostook Parish

As an exhibit of noteworthy rural church work, Mr. Malcolm B. Dana spoke of Aroostook Parish, Maine. He said:

In spite of general economic depression, religion is vital in Northern Aroostook territory. This fact is shown by the result of the Aroostook Larger Parish drive for funds. Some sixty men covered the four hundred square miles, and a "bankrupt" people pledged $3,100 for the support of the Parish program.

The Larger Parish consists of four co-operating churches and ten co-operating district schools, and the staff is putting over a tremendous program of a religious and social nature, with the following equipment: Ford truck, three Ford cars, movie projector, and stereopticon.

The program consists of preaching services and Sunday schools in each of the four churches, besides two other Sunday schools maintained by volunteer help. The social program includes the best of movies, home talent dramatics, set-ups, winter carnivals, field days, Scout work, etc.

The Larger Parish Council represents all churches and districts and forms all policies, programs, etc., the winter carnivals, pre-Easter evangelical services, daily vacation Bible schools with over 300 enrolled and an average attendance of 225, and the huge Field Day in August.

It's a big parish, a big state, and a big challenge to the rest of rural America to "Go thou and do likewise."

Glimpses of the fruitful summer work of students under the Sunday School Extension Society were given by Austin S. Phillips of Harvard, who served the young people of Cheyenne Valley, South Dakota, developing out-of-doors recreation, dramatics, and a daily vacation Bible school; also by Miss Helen Wilcox, worker in Georgia and Alabama, who told the story of "Mugala," the Ford coupé which does remarkable religious education service. It is equipped with lunch kit, camp cot, sliding book shelves, suitcase sections, a portable typewriter, and other baggage. It has helped Miss Wilcox to start and conduct Sunday schools, Christian Endeavor societies, and daily vacation Bible schools, with good success.

The Building Society

Speaking for the service of the Church Building Society, Rev. Arthur J. Folsom of Fort Wayne, Ind., said:

Since 1853, the Building Society has contributed mightily to the noble Christian character of many men and women who have made secure the fundamental principles of our American government by planting and building churches in thousands of communities. It has always held up before the churches the highest spiritual ideals that find expression not alone in personal life but in art, music, architecture, language, and the ritual of sacred worship. In all secular architecture there is strong and undeniable evidence that a new day has dawned in a new love of the beautiful and the artistic. May the grace, the peace, and the favor of Almighty God rest upon our good Mother of Churches as she reaches forth the helping hand to those in need, and as she inspires all to meet and greet this new Renaissance in ecclesiastical art and architecture, music, and language, which together appeal to the people to "Come and Worship."

Mrs. John J. Pearsall of the Woman's Home Missionary Federation presented the picture of "Women in Home Missions," showing how important their work is and how faithfully and well they are doing it.

The climax of the day came in the evening session, when Dr. Huget delivered the "Centennial Address," in recognition of the 100 years of service by the Home Missionary Society ending next May. His subject was "Triumphs of an Imperial Vision." He expressed with eloquence and power the spirit of home missions, showed how they have helped to build America, and he made an inspiring appeal for appreciation and support of all that is represented in the program of service for which Congregationalists, through the Church Extension Boards, are responsible. In closing he emphasized the vital importance of spiritual dynamic in our whole Congregational enterprise.

The Tuesday Program

Tuesday morning, Oct. 27, was devoted to Sectional Meetings, and the afternoon to sightseeing, with no sessions of the National Council until evening. A report of the Sectional Meetings will be published in the next issue of The Congregationalist.

International Responsibilities

(Tuesday Evening, October 27)

Those who held out to the last evening on the regular program were compensated by one of the best interpretations of the church and internationalism. The choir from the People's Church furnished the music. Rev. Stanley V. Norton led the devotional service. The address was to have been by Chief Justice Taft, but Nehemiah Boynton substituted, and no one knows how to lift his hat in better form to the only living ex-President. Dr. Boynton opened in his characteristic way: "Taft sometimes calls me by my first name, and he is the only man in America who knows how to spell it." Dr. Boynton has been called a "sublimely incurable optimist." He drew a picture, in his own way, of the interdependence of the world upon a common stock of necessities and luxuries. He put in the picture a million men, women, and children, working for each one of us, all the time, and in return the mite each one of us contributes to the world's comfort and pleasure. "Each is working for all, and all are working for each. The church and internationalism mean the same thing, the social state permeated by the spirit of Christ. The best definition for both is love finding its way in the world."

Fletcher Brockman brought the greetings of the International Y. M. C. A., then in session at Washington, and spoke chiefly of conditions in China, where he has been for many years in Christian service. He indicated how China has become unified through a great wave of nationalism and insistence upon its rights after long years of exploitation by foreign nations. He appealed for justice and friendly support for the reasonable aspirations of China by Christians in America.

Final Business Session

(Wednesday Morning, October 29)

The rapidity with which Council busine can be transacted—not railroaded—after d bate has cleared the air was demonstrated the last forenoon session. While many del gates had departed there were still some hu dreds left and they were on hand early. He is a résumé of the forenoon's work which i cluded a half hour of devotions as usual a three brief addresses.

Having already changed the rules so as elect the committees on business and crede tials for the next Council at this meeting, was voted to put the chairmen of this and t next business committee upon the progra committee as a standing rule.

The date of the Council meeting was chang from autumn to late spring or early summer.

Both new boards, home and foreign, we given authority to enlarge the number of co porate members outside the list of Coun delegates.

Rules were established concerning the e rollment and mileage privilege of substitu delegates.

The Year Book was ordered continued present form as concerns statistics of t churches, except as any changes caused by m sionary mergers may be needed, but with co densation of the necrology.

A committee was appointed to lay a wrea upon the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier at A lington that afternoon.

Under new rules the new office of Associa Moderator was filled by promoting Dr. Dan Bradley from first assistant moderator, and t ensuing vacancy was filled by electing Mrs. A. Osbornson of Chicago.

Illustrating our identity of interest in t various societies, let it be said that near t close of the morning session meetings of sev missionary societies were held in quick su cession within ten minutes. President Hug of the Extension Boards called the Home M sionary Society (Council delegates) to ord It was voted to ratify the action of the Coun touching a merger of the home societies, a voted to adjourn subject to the call of t president. Immediately Dr. Huget called t Church Building Society to order, and t same votes were passed. Immediately I Huget called the Sunday School Society to der and the same votes were passed. Vi President Patton called the American Missio ary Association to order and a minute su ficed for similar action. The Education S ciety followed, and the American Board, a last of all the Council itself as spokesman f the Ministerial Relief Boards took the sa action. The delegates were by this time i pressed as perhaps never before with th variety of responsibility in control of all o mission boards.

In response to the appeal of the Americ Board for emergency aid through an East appeal to the churches, permission was vot to the home and foreign boards to make a sp cial appeal up to Sept. 1, 1926, not to can deficits but to save imperiled and important i terests. The $200,000 appeal outside of a portionment quotas is not to be made to t churches as such but to individuals and grou all sums so given being pledged for support some definite piece of work.

The Pilgrim Memorial Fund issued a ci for co-operation by local churches in colle ing unpaid subscriptions and in revising lists subscribers in order that uncollectible su scriptions may be no longer counted as potenti assets.

Somewhere in the midst of the busy mor

; the Council listened to greetings from the deral Council of Churches voiced by its retary, Dr. C. S. Macfarland; to a statement Secretary Wright of the American Bible ciety concerning its fourfold work of trans- ing, revising, publishing, and distributing e Scriptures in 830 languages and dialects. ie Council declared its sympathy with such ork and voted to name members of the advis- y council of the society.

The Boy Scout program as applied to Protes- nt churches was presented by Mr. Matthews, e of its high officials. The Boy Scout move- ent furnishes half the magic necessary, but e church must furnish the other half for ptivating the boy's imagination concerning e deep things of life.

The Council's Closing Hours

(Wednesday Afternoon, October 28)

The nobleness of its closing theme, "Part- rship in a World Enterprise," and the power its closing speakers gave a worthy ending the Washington Council. Through great ises do our leaders look upon the world's ed, and we shall continue to do great tasks. Dr. Chester B. Emerson of Detroit gave a sion of "The United Program." "What a mag- ficent field for operations is our world to- y. The center of world interest is fast shift- g from Europe to Asia. As Science and ommerce are sweeping their way into Asia, ith our automobiles let us send our Bibles." What a spectacle," cried the speaker, "to see agonizing to raise five millions for all of r work when we pay thirty-five millions for single battleship!"

As our own country grows we must grow ith it. New alignments of our population ing new social problems, spring to meet the w and larger calls of tomorrow in the rength of the Lord Christ.

Dr. Russell H. Stafford, of St. Louis, in eaking to "The Larger Evangelism," showed at evangelism—good news—calls for en- usiasm. This is a time of widespread re- ljustment of emphasis upon the elements of hristian truth. In the coming evangelism we o not all need to think alike theologically. the larger evangelism our enthusiasm is all ntered upon a hero-worship of Jesus Christ. In the larger evangelism the church supports e state as long as the state acts upon Chris- an principles; but it is out to resist the state hen the state goes contrary to Christ. The w evangelism is coming to be increasingly terdenominational—and we are to be as ndly as Jesus was toward those outside of e church. Our evangelism must plant and ep our most powerful men as university pas- rs in our American seats of learning. And, nally, we must work for a day when all the rces of the nation will work together in ilding the Kingdom of God with an enthusi- m and unanimity like that with which Amer- a entered the World War.

Dr. Herman F. Swartz, of Berkeley, Cal., resident of Pacific School of Religion, gave ringing message, pointing to the fact that in time when 40 per cent of our city taxes go r education the Church of Christ must keep ace with the day school, high school, and niversity by preparing our youth for Christian ing and Christian citizenship—especially in any places of our land where the tax-sup- rted education is wholly inadequate to the ed.

In Salonika, in the Doshisha, in the Woman's ollege of Kobe, we are educating the leaders the Coming World Order in a process which ill so fill every soul that it will thrill with yalty until the Last Day.

The final message, by Dr. Albert W. Palmer of Oak Park, Ill., upon "Creating Brotherhood," was a splendid call upon the forces of Christ to attack the forces which prevent brotherhood, as provincialism, the ancient feud instinct which arrayed one valley against another, and which now appears in the spirit of militarism; of international suspicion, still a monster among mankind; of race hatred which almost gives the lie to our Christian protestations of good will toward men. We must meet the still rising tide of Race Hatred with a rising tide of real Brotherhood, until with Christ's aid we have achieved the grand goal of the motto of this Council of Washington:

A Free Church in a Free State, for a Friendly World

The Pageant—"Noonday"

With the close of the final afternoon's platform messages the stage was set for the pageant "Noonday," by Inez Funk Clinton. As Prolocutor appeared Dr. Jason Noble Pierce, opening with one of Isaiah's stately visions of a future when God shall have wrought all his plan in the redemption of man.

The curtain arose upon Ignorance, a lordly, gilded Mephistopheles, cracking his whip with triumphant laughter as men and women from all races were hurried in and forced to kneel before him, in the terror of slaves. He ascends his ancient throne—but, while he contemplates his slaves, Knowledge appears, proclaiming that the reign of Ignorance is passing. The people start up in hope, stretching out their hands, but one crack of the long whip of Ignorance and they instantly grovel again at his feet.

Then arises Truth, a strong and beautiful shape, with the sword of the Spirit. She advances upon the throne, stands fearlessly beside the long-time tyrant and proclaims a coming liberty to those who are bound in the chains of Ignorance and Sin.

Episode Two, in four scenes, showed the effect of Christ's presence in reclaiming a feuding community in the Tennessee mountains, in bringing a just recompense of relief to a faithful home missionary minister who has been disabled in the performance of his pastorate, and that Presence, by another wide change of scene, in a group of newly graduated students, as they discuss, on the eve of going to their life works, the place where life can be made to count the most. After scanning the wide field of opportunity they decide (as groups of devoted young men have repeatedly done) that life will hold the most for them in a united college band, going out to China, to build together there the Kingdom of God.

The scene, revolving again, shows many people still bowing before the throne of Ignorance, but Knowledge again fearlessly announces to Ignorance, "Thy time is near! Behold, the Dawn!" Truth lifts her sword, mounting to the throne, the liberated nations stand in joyful release as avenging hands tear Ignorance from his seat and drag him away.

How long the way, and rugged, before the release, of which these youthful players gave vision, can become reality! But it is good to have that vision upheld. And it will not be strange if pageants of the Dawn shall continue to be a part of the message of National Councils to come.

On the final Wednesday evening Dr. Cadman's Quartet Choir came over from Brooklyn and gave in the Auditorium, under the direction of its world-famous chorister, Harry Rowe Shelley, a concert such as music lovers travel to hear, with the assistance of Miss Jeanette Vreeland, soprano. The quartet, consisting of Rhea Massicote, soprano; Viola Laing, alto; William Sheehan, tenor, and Virgil Holmes, basso, filled all expectations, and gave to the throng of session-wearied delegates and their friends a night of music to be remembered—to mingle with visions of marble pillars, moonlit nights and a thousand happy homeward journeys.

The Music of the Council

By Henry J. Kilbourn, D.D.

A Council like that which met in Washington called for the best music the Congregational body could produce. The order was well filled. Mr. Norton Little of Washington, chairman of the music committee, and his colleagues, devised a series of events which ended the deliberations of each day in moments of exaltation.

Alternating by evenings, beginning at 7.15, Organists Charles T. Ferry of First Church, Washington, and Claude Robeson of Mt. Pleasant Church turned loose the glories of the great Moeller organ, filling the Auditorium now with crashing chords of triumph and again with such meditation as when, beside the deep, still waters a soul draws near its Maker. Following each evening's recital Mr. Percy Foster, one of America's best loved song leaders, a director in national Christian Endeavor conventions since the days of Sankey, led the assembled thousands in a half-hour praise service. Assisting in these services all through the day, and always called back as many times as the Moderator would permit, were the ever welcome Fisk Jubilee Singers. The old undying favorites, "Were you there when they Crucified my Lord," "I want to be a Christian in my heart," "Steal Away to Jesus," had lost none of their power, but at one moment, when the singers were called back they reached both the deeps and the heights of the Council's heart with "Go, Tell it on the Mountains, that Jesus Christ is Born!"

Perhaps more than ever before our national gathering was enriched by the presence of choirs from our representative churches. On the opening night sixty voices from the splendid chorus of Dr. Pierce's First Church appeared, and rendered the "Hallelujah Chorus." On the other evenings the choir of Mt. Pleasant and the Welch Singers rendered notable service. On A. M. A. night Howard University sent over 50 voices of the Chapel Choir, an organization which people travel to hear. These rendered again the "Hallelujah," with a precision and an organ-like quality in that battery of Negro bass voices which left one wondering if it could possibly be done better. It was here that one felt that the soul of Africa could and did mount to the skies. In music God has indeed given his ebony children the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven. The choirs of the colored Lincoln Temple and People's Congregational Church also rendered an inspiring service in these evening sessions.

When all is said, however, it must be doubted if any loftier moments came to the Council than at Sunday afternoon's worship.. The First Church of Akron, Ohio, had not only sent over its minister, Dr. Lloyd C. Douglas, but, at an expense of over $1,000, its male choir of 27 voices, under Director Burton Garlinghouse. The giant antiphony of 6,000 voices was led by Dr. Douglas—the sublimest responsive service we shall hear in many a day, given in sections of "Invocation," "Introspection," "Veneration of the Departed Great," "In Memory of Glorified Loved Ones," "Consecration to Christ and his Church," and "Consecration to Christian Patriotism"—these were interluded by the choir, in sixteen selections, from the opening Tschaikowsky's "O Come, let us Worship," and "Still, Still with Thee," with choral responses from Elgar and Gaul, and from the talented young director himself—to the ending in "O Master, let me walk with Thee." All was done from memory, even to the closing hymn, with an exquisiteness of harmony and modulation that made one feel when all was over, "If these young men can live as well as they can sing, the Kingdom of God is not so long in its coming, after all!"

May the National Council continue to assemble her singing hosts at each biennium, until the Music Ministry of the Church shall have its full representation with the other great battalions, of Missions, Education, and Social Service.

Song passes not away.
Captains and conquerors weave a little dust,
And kings a dubious legend of their reign,
The sword of Caesar is a little rust,— Song doth remain. Dead is Augustus,
David is alive!

Resolutions

Always the Committee on Resolutions is ed to voice the wishes of many aspirants endorsement of their special interests by e Council. The present committee of nine, ded by Dr. Howard A. Bridgman, seems not have been stampeded by any propagandist. e 15 resolutions offered appeared so safe d sane, and withal so pertinent, that each turn was adopted unanimously, those on re- ion and science, China, and President Cool- e being signalized by rising votes. The es- ce of the resolutions is as follows:

1. Hospitality. Thanks to all the Wash- ton groups and individuals who gave them- ves generously for the entertainment of dele- es and promotion of Council comfort, con- ience, and progress.

2. Dr. C. F. Carter. Appreciation of his e and brotherly leadership as chairman of executive committee for a dozen years.

3. Victor F. Lawson. Post-mortem appreci- on of his great bequests to many Congrega- nal interests, and commending his example other laymen.

4. Participation of Public Officials. Thanks Secretary Wilbur, Assistant Attorney Gen- l Willebrandt, and Commissioner Esch for ir able and generous platform addresses.

5. Committee of Twelve. Appreciation of th arduous volunteer service of the men and men who studied the merger problem and le the way to its solution.

6. Protestant Encyclopedia. Endorsing the pjected work which promises to fill a long- fe need.

7. American Tract Society. Congratula- tins upon the attainment of a centennial an- ersary, with approval of its work and best wshes for the future.

8. Filipino Children. Approval of the move- nt of the American Guardian Association at Manila to raise $2,000,000 for caring for chil- n of mixed parentage in the Philippines, sponsored by Governor General Wood.

9. Religion and Science. Reaffirming loy- l to the old but welcoming all new light, demand to preach a gospel consistent with dern scholarship.

10. Interracial Co-operation. Recognizing portunities in our own land as well as abroad exhibiting the spirit of Christ in practical herhood.

11. China and the United States. Full sym- hy with China's desire for absolute sover- ty, disclaiming special privileges for our missionaries, denouncing the principle of extraterritoriality. [The new Chinese minister cabled this vote to his Government and to the international congress then sitting in Shanghai.]

12. War and Peace. War is contrary to the mind of Christ. It is our duty to find a Christian way for settlement of controversies. Churches should pray and strive for universal peace and teach the rising generation the better way.

13. Prevailing Spirit. Congratulating Congregationalists on the splendid spirit of fellowship exhibited all through the Council, even when opinions were at diametrical variance.

14. President Coolidge. Thanks for a man of such Christian character at the head of the nation, and endorsing his utterance that we need not more law but more religion.

15. Akron Church. Appreciation of its generosity in sending free of cost its chorus choir and organist, pastor, and printed service programs for the Sunday afternoon worship.

The Council in Meditation and Prayer

The builders of our National Council made the approach of every day to lead through a quiet place of the Most High into an inner chamber of the Redeemer's presence.

The Council Chaplain, Dr. Ashley Day Leavitt of Harvard Church, Brookline, Mass., directed the devotional half hour of each morning to the general theme, "Our Congregational Heritage and the New Spiritual Leadership." In a clear, Christocentric series of meditations he opened the door on successive mornings to (a) "Spiritual leadership defined as making Christ live again in our day"; (b) "The character of Christ gives the terms on which great spiritual power will be given"; (c) "The characteristic Christian expression is redemptive service"; (d) "The spiritual genius of Jesus revealed in action"; (e) "It is not we who must discover Christ but Christ who must discover us"; (f) "Christ the Servant of Man."

Each period closed in moments of silent prayer guided by the chaplain's voice in quiet sentences suggesting the great interests, the persons, the groups, the nations for whom we should lift our hearts to him from whence cometh our help. In a Council of such greatly differing judgments of Christ's leaders upon the methods of the work, upon the disposition of money in millions, involving, withal, drastic changes which must remove whole groups of efficient and faithful workers from a service to which they have given their best years—these moments of laying hold upon God were needed, and were deeply helpful.

The great addresses of the evening sessions, also, were ushered in with the reading of the Word and prayer by representative leaders, including the following: Wednesday night, Rev. L. Wendell Fifield; Thursday night, Rev. Horace F. Holton; Saturday night, Rev. Ray A. Eusden; Sunday night, Rev. Frank J. Scribner; Tuesday night, Rev. Stanley U. North.

It is a satisfaction to recall that a concourse of hundreds appeared each morning for the vital work of communion with the Most High.

Evangelism

The shortest speech made in the National Council in presenting an important report was made by Dr. Frederick L. Fagley, secretary of the Commission on Evangelism, and it was a very effective one. He said:

All the work we do by our boards, commissions and other agencies, is in fact evangelistic. These all are working for the redemption of the souls of men. That which we designate by the name Commission on Evangelism is charged with the promotion of certain aspects of our work, but all is no more nor less spiritual in its aims and objects than the work of any other agency. All our agencies join in the essential work of promoting the spiritual life of our churches. It is this that gives them their validity and worth.

Your Will

Effect of Missionary Mergers

Some individuals have asked whether the proposed mergers of missionary societies would affect bequests. Not at all is the brief answer. A will written in the favor of any one of our missionary societies as at present organized will secure the carrying out of the purposes of the donor absolutely.

Suppose the Building Society, the Home Missionary Society, and the Sunday School Extension Society are merged into a single corporation and that your will includes a bequest to the Church Building Society. When the will is probated the amount will go directly to the work carried on now by the Church Building Society and to be carried on for church building purposes just as is now done by that Society by the united Board. It would not be diverted to Sunday School Extension work or to Home Missionary work. The same could be said with regard to Sunday School Extension work of a will made in favor of the present Society, as of course it could be said about the Home Missionary Society.

Or suppose ultimately there is a merger of all the Home Boards into a single Home Board. A bequest made to the American Missionary Association, the proceeds of which would go into the work for the present activities of the American Missionary Association, would in the event of such a merger go into the same work under the administration of the same kind of people for the same purposes.

Suppose a legacy is left to one of the Woman's Boards, which is to merge its interests with the American Board. In that case the available funds would go into the types of work now conducted by that Woman's Board.

If, however, a testator desires to give to one of the Societies money which in the case of merger should be available for a wider range of use, this provision could readily be made in the will. C. E. B.

Officers of the Education Society

At the annual meeting of the Congregational Education Society, which was held at Washington in connection with the National Council, Rev. Herbert W. Gates, D.D., who has been acting General Secretary since the retirement of Dr. Frank M. Sheldon over a year ago, was elected General Secretary. Dr. Gates has been serving effectively for a number of years as Missionary Education Secretary of the Education Society.

The society re-elected at Washington Dean Charles R. Brown, president; Dr. William Horace Day, vice-president; and Arthur J. Crockett, treasurer.

Medical Director of the American Board

The new officer of Medical Director of the American Board was established at the meeting of the Board in Washington, Oct. 23, and Dr. Mark H. Ward, who is the Board's Candidate Secretary, was elected to the office. This action was accorded hearty approval.

Woman's Home Missionary Federation

Annual Meeting at Washington, D. C., October 19-20

TWO hundred women from twenty-six states gathered in the Sunday school room of Mt. Pleasant Church, Washington, on Monday evening, Oct. 19, for the opening session of the annual meeting of the Congregational Woman's Home Missionary Federation. A goodly number of men were present. Mrs. Charles R. Wilson of Detroit, Mich., president of the federation, presided. Mrs. McIlyar H. Lichliter, of Columbus, O., led the devotions. With cordial words of greeting Mrs. Sidney R. Jacobs of Washington, D. C., Southern vice-president of the Middle Atlantic Conference, welcomed the federation to Washington. The president responded most happily.

An interesting event of the evening was the reception of the women of the Protestant Evangelical Churches into the fellowship of the federation. This splendid group of churches were officially represented by Mrs. R. O. Eisele, Mrs. Carl A. Voss of Pittsburgh, and Mrs. Paul Reikow of Newport, Ky. In felicitous words of greeting Mrs. Wilson extended a welcome to these representatives. Mrs. Eisele responded with earnestness, reminding us that these new friends brought as their contribution music, devotion, and faith. The audience sang Luther's great hymn, "A Mighty Fortress is Our God."

The reports of the general secretary, Mrs. J. J. Pearsall, the secretary of the Middle District, Mrs. D. D. Olmstead, and the secretary of the Colored Unions, Mrs. A. E. Lawless, showed progress in achieving federation goals and ideals through the work of the Standing Committees and secretarial promotion.

Mrs. F. P. Ensminger, secretary of the Southeastern district, represented her work by an electrically lighted chart indicating the location of auxiliaries and churches in her district, and showing that in five years unions under her care had gained 200 per cent in benevolence and membership.

Mrs. Wayne B. Wheeler, a well-known singer of Washington, rendered two solos, accompanied by Mrs. Donald Enfield, also of Washington.

The reports of the vice-presidents followed. Mrs. Charles E. Blake of Rhode Island, vice-president of the East, Mrs. J. J. Kolmos, vice-president of the Middle Western District, and Mrs. H. S. Gilbert, vice-president of the Western District, gave thoughtful presentations of the work of their respective districts, showing correspondence and activity in the promotion of the denominational program.

Mrs. Parker W. Fisher, of Southern Pines, N. C., reported for the Woman's Committee on Interracial Co-operation in the South. Mrs. Fisher held the intense interest of her hearers as she showed the progress that is being made toward the better understanding of brotherhood and interracial justice in the South. The session was closed with prayer by Mrs. Clarence H. Vincent of Florida.

During the first part of the session on Tuesday morning, Oct. 20, Mrs. Oscar E. Maurer presided. Devotions were led by Mrs. Rex W. Dodge, of Maine, who used a beautiful musical service of worship, assisted by Mrs. Wayne B. Wheeler. Mrs. D. Foster Updike read the Scripture selections, and the solo responses were sung by Mrs. Dodge. One feature of the service was the interpretive motion accompaniment given by Mrs. Dodge.

Mrs. J. J. Kolmos presented to the meeting the presidents of twenty-six state unions. Utah, Idaho, Texas, and the Carolinas were represented by telegrams of greetings, and letters were read from New Hampshire and from Mrs. Firman of California. The treasurer's report and the report of the finance committee were presented by Mrs. H. H. Hart of New York, treasurer of the federation.

"My Reaction and Yours to the Missionary Program of the Church" proved to be an interesting address by Miss Ruth H. Bennett of Washington, dealing in a naive and thoughtful way with the relation of the business woman to the missionary program of the church.

A careful review of the federation's activities through the committees on which it serves in the Council of Women for Home Missions, showing the wide range of our interdenominational contacts and service, was presented by Mrs. F. W. Wilcox, of New York, vice-president-at-large of the Council of Women for Home Missions. The many important contacts of the federation interracially and interdenominationally were dwelt upon in a most interesting way, revealing the extensive relationships of the federation.

The Committee on Schauffler Dormitory presented its report through its chairman, Mrs. H. H. Hart, showing that many of the unions had accepted their quota of the building fund, and were definitely at work raising the money. Massachusetts Union has voted one half of its jubilee fund and New York will hold a luncheon in New York City in January, 1926. Its chairman, Miss Laura Parsons of Syracuse, has visited Schauffler in order to become better acquainted with every detail of the project.

Mrs. T. A. Dungan of Wisconsin reported for the Committee on Chautauqua Congregational House, asking the moral support of the federation in the building plan for a new House at Chautauqua.

Mrs. Henry Francis Smith, chairman of the Interracial Committee in the North, reported for the committee and suggested a program for church groups which indicated the "exquisite possibilities" in the crusade for brotherhood. The report of the nominating committee, presented by its chairman, Mrs. Dan F. Bradley of Ohio, resulted in the election of the following officers:

President, Mrs. Chas. R. Wilson, Michigan; vice-presidents, Mrs. Oscar E. Maurer, Ct.; Mrs. L. C. Schnacke, Kansas; Mrs. H. F. Swartz, Colorado; treasurer, Mrs. H. H. Hart, New York; members-at-large, Mrs. C. G. Phillips, Mrs. A. K. Wing, and Dr. Mary E. George.

The prayer of consecration of these officers was offered by Rev. Helen Street Ranney, of San Francisco, and the benediction pronounced by Rev. Rhoda Jane Dickinson of Glasgow, Mont. The meeting was adjourned subject to call of the president. At the close of the meeting the women's guild of the Mt. Pleasant Church served a delightful luncheon.

An enjoyable program following the luncheon was opened by two solos, sung by Mrs. Wayne B. Wheeler, accompanied by Mrs. Chester Adair, of Chevy Chase, Md., who wrote the music of both songs, and the words of one of them; the words of the other being written by Mrs. E. E. Slosson, of Washington. Miss Helen Jenkins, principal of Thorsby Institute, Thorsby, Ala., spoke of the need of the school for support, and of its opportunity in education, and Rev. Bertha Harris, a graduate of Schauffler School, told in a graphic and delightful way of the splendid contribution to the Christian program of America that Schauffler can make and made an earnest plea for the new dormitory.

The First Church, Washingt

The New Building Project

When L'Enfant planned the City of Wa ington he chose for the national church the s at Ninth and G Streets, where the Pate Office is.

One block west of this site, at Tenth a G Streets, on the present site of the First Co gregational Church, the Congregationalists w erect a church building which will be nation in the best sense of that term. It will contin to be not only the church for all the peo of Washington, but it will afford the gre throng of visitors constantly coming to the ci a convenient downtown place of worship.

Different congregations attend morning a evening services and in these audiences on one in four is a member of this church. Ma Government officials and workers in the d partments, of whom there are 65,000 in t city, and students from every state, of who there are at least 25,000, help to make up t congregations.

If the church had followed the line of lea resistance it would have sold the property f a million dollars, and moved, with enou money to purchase a new site and build els where, but Christian statesmanship and servi demanded that they stay and adequately me a great need. The National Council gave th plan its endorsement.

The local church has done its part well a generously. Nearly $130,000 was raised at t time of the close of the Council. One gift $25,000 was made, two of $5,000, two $3,000, two of $1,600, and nine of $1,000, remainder being smaller gifts, about 800 peo having contributed. To show the good feeli towards it on all sides, a Jew sent $100.

On Monday, Oct. 26, Dr. Nehemiah Boy ton, chairman of the advisory committee, e tertained at luncheon at the Mayflower Hot Washington, a hundred prominent Congreg tionalists at the National Council and laid t opportunity before them. It was not a tim for suggesting subscriptions, but for unde standing the situation. Dr. Boynton said th the First Church stood not with her hat b her heart in her hand. She stood not as a be gar but as a partner in a great enterpris national in its scope. Hugh A. Thrift, chai man of the board of trustees, spoke for the co mittee of the church. William Knowles Coope Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., and a member the Cleveland Park Congregational Church the city, spoke of the great field and opport nity and also of how nobly the First Chur had done its part. Rev. Albert W. Palmer Oak Park, Ill., said that he was glad the n tional capital was to have a strong downtow church in the very heart of the city. Chica had lost her chance. She had strong church on the edges but not at the center.

Dr. Jason Noble Pierce assured the peop that the easiest thing for him to do was to ha the present structure painted, varnished, an frescoed, and leave this bigger job to his su cessor, but he knew that it was neither th right nor courageous thing to do. He ce tainly commended this cause by his words an attitude.

Council Meeting at the First Church

During the Council meetings daily afternoo services were held in First Church to afford th residents of Washington an opportunity t hear representative Congregationalists wh were attending the Council. Drs. Charles I Brown, O. S. Davis, and Carl S. Patton, an Mr. John Calder were among the speake heard. One afternoon the Fisk Jubilee Singers gave a fine concert, with the free will offering going entirely to their work.

On Sunday morning, at 9 o'clock, Dr. M. H. Lichliter, of Columbus, O., preached, and at 11 o'clock Dr. C. J. Hawkins, of Seattle, Wash., preached at the second service.

At the Sunday evening service four speakers were heard: Dr. T. R. Faville speaking on "What's Happening Up North"; Rev. E. A. King on "What's Happening Down South"; Rev. Vaughan Dabney on "What's Happening Way East"; and Dr. H. F. Swartz on "What's Happening Out West."

A sample of the work that the church is continually doing of bringing preachers of national reputation to the capital for a series of addresses is the one arranged for Dr. Charles F. Aked of Los Angeles, Cal., with two lectures a day for four days at 4.45 P.M. and 8.00 P.M. The themes are as follows:

The Picture of Jesus: Human or Divine; Man or God-Man; The Gospel according to Mark Twain: A Gospel of Reality; The Picture of Pilate, and the Pursuing Plague of the Past; The "St. Joan" of Bernard Shaw; The Picture of Judas, and the Deepest Depths of the Human Heart; La Samaritaine, by Rostand, and the "Chantecler" of Rostand and Maude Adams; Notice seen on an automobile trip: "Go slow! You may meet another fool"; A Twentieth Century Magnificat: The Glorification of all Good Women in England's new Cathedral.

The Colored Side of the Council

Progress and Encouragement at Washington

PROGRESS of Congregationalism among the colored people is indicated by the fact that when I attended my first National Council at Portland, Oregon, I was the only colored delegate present; at Washington there were fifty, and they came from as widely separated points as Massachusetts and Texas, showing the effective redistribution of the Negro American throughout the Union. As epoch-making as was this Council from many other points of view it was not more so from any than that of the colored side.

A Race Offers Cash

Since this was the first time the Council met on Southern soil some wondered at the advisability of following the time-honored custom of having a colored man as one of the Moderators. Others thought that if this custom was to be broken it should not be done the first time it met in the South. Besides, there seemed an especial appropriateness in having as a Moderator one of that race Mr. Lincoln gave himself to free right there in Washington. Accordingly Rev. William L. Cash was put up by his race, and polled the largest vote of any Moderator nominated, his vote being 322 and that of his opponent 129.

The story of the life of this man reads like fiction. When that little black baby was born at Cowpens, S. C., a half century ago none of his neighbors thought that some day he would stand beside the President of the United States in the esteem of his church. Many a father today writhes under the cost of the education of his child, but the cost to this man's father for his boy's education for ten years in seminary and college was the princely sum of eighteen and one half cents a year! At Fisk he milked cows and worked in gardens to help pay his way through to an A.B. When the people of Oberlin saw a young colored man white-washing fences to get his B.D. they had no thought that some time he would be honored in the shadow of the White House. And when he got through his education he helped his father educate the rest of his family in payment of the $1.85 he invested in his education. As pastor of three important churches he has worked his way to the top. His recognition will inspire every colored youth in the land. His name is Cash but he stands for Character.

Why the Colored Group Stands for Merger

No part of the Council was more interested in the merger than the colored constituency. Of course, it goes without saying that the colored people are deeply grateful for the work of the A. M. A., but many of the enlightened sentiment of the colored constituency feels that in the evolution of things the time has come for a forward movement in the denomination for economy, efficiency, and unity. Even though this should temporarily work against their interest, the colored side would be for it because they believe that what helps the whole cannot injure the part permanently. But they do not believe it will injure them even temporarily. On the other hand, it is their belief that it will standardize their schools, churches, and status. In the redistribution of the race a standard culture is required, and in the church work a similar standard is needed for a race that is no longer a ward of the denomination. In the new status they will be interested in the whole of the denomination, and the whole denomination will be interested in them. I would be in favor of a colored associate secretary to care for the interests of all the colored churches North and South. Under the leadership of the right man our numbers would be doubled in a decade. If my people only knew the spirit of Congregationalism they would rush into it and be saved.

The Adoption of the Social Creed

Nothing brought more cheer to the colored group than the adoption of that part of the Social Creed that referred to inter-racial relations. While some thought this might be referred to another commission without impropriety, they were so eager to pass it that they took no chances. It is the high-water mark of church councils in race ideals. It stands for (1) the same protection and rights for other races in America that we ourselves enjoy, especially legislation against lynching; (2) the elimination of racial discrimination, and the substitution of full brotherly treatment for all races in America; (3) the fullest co-operation between the churches of various races, even though of different denominations. The unanimity with which this was voted gladdened the heart of a race. Had Lincoln been in town I have a feeling that he would have walked in and joined the Congregational Church that day, as did Coolidge some time ago. For the people have been waiting for some church to say just that.

Inter-Racial Co-operation

No finer thing was said during the Council than this: "The church is the enlightened conscience of civilization." Next to this some one said in the conference of workers among the colored people that all effective inter-racial adjustment must center around the church. Under the leadership of Director Harold Kingsley the sectional meeting on this topic was most inspiring and effective. The original room in which the meeting was to have been held proved too small, and the larger room chosen was over-run. Next year it was suggested that it should be given a full hearing before the Council as a whole. The two outstanding addresses were those by Dr. H. Paul Douglass, formerly secretary of the A. M. A., and Prof. Isaac Fisher, formerly of Fisk University, Nashville, Tenn. Dr. Douglass spoke on the readjustment of the Negro in a Northern environment, as to his home, his work, and his status. Professor Fisher told of the work being done by him in carrying the message tactfully into the white colleges of the South. The general discussions following each presentation were illuminating and inspiring. The address by Mr. H. S. Chauncey, an attorney of Cleveland, O., on the importance of systematizing church finances should result in an organization of church treasurers to the end that our finances be put on a solid basis, so that the church might have the advantage of an equal opportunity in the financial world.

Social Reception of Colored Delegates

In view of the fact that the Council met in the South there was some apprehension as to the reception to be accorded the colored delegates. But as far as I could discover there was not a single complaint made by any of us. This was no doubt due to the care taken by Dr. Pierce and his able committee representing all the churches. For the first time colored delegates were received in the Willard Hotel, and colored members lunched at the Century Club and other exclusive places. Of course, they stood with the President on the White House grounds and were photographed with the rest. On Saturday morning, the colored delegation was received by the President, and to him they made the following address:

In behalf of the 15,000 colored Congregationalists we greet you as a fellow Congregationalist in whom we have full confidence, not only because of your traditional background but also because of your example as a Christian and your acts as a President. Particularly do we want to thank you for that great word on tolerance you spoke at Omaha, the bravest word spoken by any executive in three score years. It sounds like Lincoln. Our prayer is that God may use you to promote good will between the races of America and peace among all the nations of the earth.

The Music of a Race

The speaking parts taken by the colored delegates attracted special attention, and the address by Prof. William H. Holloway, associate principal of the Brick School, at Brick, N. C., was universally acclaimed a literary gem. So eager were the people to hear it that they called for it in broken sections. But the climax of our contribution was in those songs that no man can sing but the black man. It is said that in the Constitution we have the brain of America, but that in her Emancipation Proclamation we have her soul. Likewise, we have in these simple songs of faith and hope and trust the soul of a race. Ever tender and moving, they fell upon the ears of the stilled multitudes like balm in Gilead. The Jubilee Quintet, fresh from its triumphs abroad, is now on its annual mission in behalf of their Alma Mater, Fisk University, whose million dollar endowment is in the balance.

The Guests of the White House

"A kindly act done in a gracious manner." In that sentence did one sum up his experiences as the guest of the President and Mrs. Calvin Coolidge during the National Council meeting in Washington, and there is every evidence that he but speaks for all who had the privilege of staying at the White House.

The personnel of the group was representative of the various phases of Congregationalism and was also made up of personal friends of the President and Mrs. Coolidge. The following is the list of guests who stayed at the White House: Rev. Nehemiah Boynton, D.D., of New York City; Rev. Reuben A. Beard, D.D., of Fargo, N. D., one of our former secretaries and one time pastor of a church in Cambridge, Mass.; Rev. and Mrs. William H. Spence of Salem, Mass.; Rev. Kenneth B. Welles, pastor of Edwards Church, Northampton, Mass., the home church of the Coolidges; and Rev. Charles W. Legge, pastor of First Church, Swanton, Vt., and formerly pastor of Pilgrim Church, Merrimac, Mass. Rev. Irving Maurer, D.D., President of Beloit College, and Mrs. Maurer, and Rev. Willis H. Butler, D.D., of Hartford, Ct., were guests for the opening days of the Council.

Everything was done to make their stay at the White House a real pleasure and an experience never to be forgotten, and all speak of President and Mrs. Coolidge as being ideal in their thoughtful and kindly attention to the comfort and welfare of their guests.

The Council was deeply appreciative of the courtesy and the readiness of the President and Mrs. Coolidge to do their share as Congregationalists in making the Council a success.

Those who stayed at the White House speak of the goodly fellowship at the breakfast table and especially of the privilege of taking luncheon and dinner with the President and Mrs. Coolidge on Sunday. Their stay at the Presidential home was a rich privilege and honor and will ever be counted as among the great events of their lives.

Mount Pleasant Church Service

The Sunday morning service at Mount Pleasant Church, Washington, on Oct. 25, was crowded with National Council visitors. It will be a long time before this friendly church, of which Rev. Walter Morgan is pastor, will welcome to its pews so many clergymen who have rendered exceptional service to the denomination. Many of the central figures of the Council entered into this most worshipful Communion. The decorations of asparagus and chrysanthemums were pleasing. The Piedmont College quartet sang. Rev. Wyman C. Fairfield, the Foreign Pastor, spoke to the children. Rev. Rodney W. Roundy of Laconia, N. H., offered the pastoral prayer. Dr. Jay T. Stocking of Upper Montclair, N. J., preached from the text James 1: 21, "which is able to save your souls," making the inquiry, "Has the church any strong truths today?" He found three, the friendliness of the universe, the realization eventually of all our dreams of goodness, and the certainty that service is the path that leads to peace. Dr. Stocking, at his best, helps men to play the game, and he was at his best here.

The Congregationalist's Bible Class

Paul Before Felix

Acts 24: 10-16, 22-27

Paul, as a Roman citizen, having avoided examination by torture, and having been sent to Caesarea to save him from his Jewish enemies in Jerusalem pledged to take his life, now appears five days later before the Roman procurator, Felix, making his defense. Always courteous, Paul salutes Felix with one of the few favorable things that could be said concerning him, and incidently reminds the governor that his many years as a judge should assure a prisoner a fair hearing and consideration. Paul could express subtle and pointed truth with courtesy.

Paul's defense before Felix had no effect upon the just disposition of his case. Its immediate result was to make Felix tremble, and, like all trembling men, to make him talk about "a convenient season," but it left Felix so little moved in any vital way that two years later when he was succeeded by Festus he was willing, simply that he might please the Jews, to leave Paul bound.

The real value of Paul's address, therefore, is in what it has brought down to the madern world concerning Paul himself and his outlook upon religion and life. This is concentrated in the notable fourteenth verse and in the two verses which follow. These stand out with pre-eminent significance above the immediate purpose of Paul's address, which was the assertion of his innocency of the charges made against him. In repudiating these charges, he acknowledges what has been deemed throughout history by popular bigotry and prejudice the deepest sin that a man can commit. "This I confess," says Paul, "that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers." Nothing is so amazing as the persistent blindness of the world in relation to its saints and prophets. Men of the utmost holiness and consecration, if they deviate from what is deemed the way of orthodoxy, have been and continue to be the objects of bitter attack and persecution.

We study such lessons as these over and over again, yet on the very day following that upon which hundreds of thousands, if not millions of people, will study this lesson, many will go forth to attack, with the same bitterness that these ancient Jews displayed, men of good conscience whose religious outlook and experience could be expressed only in these words of Paul. The tragedy of it was that Paul was the man who was really devoted to the religion of his fathers; and that is the tragedy of most heresy accusations and trials. When will Christians learn to exercise a loving, patient, prayerful, understanding spirit in relation to these matters? Surely it is only in loving, liberal atmosphere, where all men in their own ways are persistently seeking and expressing truth, that truth can be brought fully to light and that we can all grow into the larger conceptions of the grace of God.

Along with Paul's confession that after the way that his enemies call heresy he has worshiped the God of his fathers should be placed his assertion of the nobility and purity of his motives. The unfortunate thing is that the highest integrity of character and purity of motives are insufficient to save a man from the brutality of accusation and persecution. The heresy-hunter has no eye for the finer values and the higher truths of life. "Herein do I exercise myself," says Paul, "to have always a conscience void of offence toward God and toward men." That, after all, is the refuge and satisfaction of the man falsely accused. He may suffer bitterly but nothing can destroy that inward peace of knowing that he has not blinked at truth, that he has not been false to his trust, and that he has in every way sought to live with a good conscience toward God and toward his fellow men. When Christians everywhere come to see that as the supreme thing in life and character, not only will there be less heresy hunting but there will be new safeguards against error and new possibilities in the attainment of truth.

An Interdenominational Movement in Rhode Island

An interdenominational movement of unusual interest has been taking place in Rhode Island recently. Rev. Hugh Penney of Plymouth Church, Providence, has given us the following account of its inception and growth:

Last spring at least five Congregational ministers from Providence and Pawtucket attended the great Washington Conference and caught the spirit of the convention. At the next Congregational Ministers' Meeting, a Methodist, Christian, and three Congregational ministers gave their impressions of the conference, all stressing the wonderful unity and the spirit of Christian fellowship that prevailed. This brought to our minds the question, "Why not try and carry out that spirit in our own state?"

A committee of three was appointed, Harold S. Capron, James D. Dingwell, and Hugh Penney, to see what plans could be made for deepening the spirit of closer fellowship among our different denominations. In due time the matter was presented to the different ministerial associations for action. And the Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Universalists, and Christians endorsed the movement wholeheartedly and in turn appointed a committee to work with the original three and perfect such plans as were deemed advisable.

First, it was decided to hold a Fellowship Sunday when all the ministers would be asked to exchange pulpits. The day set was Oct. 18 (deferred on account of associations, conferences, etc.), and about 200 ministers, representing some 13 denominations, took part in this Interdenominational Exchange Sunday.

Second, it was thought advisable to hold a union Ministers' Meeting prior to and preparatory for the exchange. This meeting was held on Monday, Sept. 28, over 200 ministers being present, and a wonderful spirit prevailing. It was voted at that time to hold another Ministers' Meeting within three months. Dr. Holyoke, Baptist, presided. Dr. Mason Brown, Presbyterian, led the devotions. The secretary, Hugh Penney, Congregational, and Harold Capron, Congregational, stated the purpose of the gathering and of its development. Dr. William E. Barton, formerly of Oak Park, Ill., gave the address on "The Preacher as a Prophet." The closing prayer was by Dr. Augustus Lord, Unitarian Church.

Carrying out the desire of the meeting and with the hope of fostering this splendid spirit of closer Christian fellowship, the committee has secured Dr. S. Parkes Cadman to speak on Wednesday, Dec. 2. Already a fine spirit of brotherliness prevails and this whole movement seems to be bearing good fruit.

Missionary Reorganization

The Merger Proposals of the Committee of Twelve as adopted by the National Council at Washington, D.C., October, 1925

[EDITORS' NOTE.—Because of the length of the Committee's report, we have omitted the preliminary Analysis and Preface, also the long statement of "Considerations which Led to the Report." In the latter emphasis is placed upon the purpose to "humanize and spiritualize the missionary appeal," to secure economy in the sense of "making every dollar go just as far as that dollar can be made to go," to secure efficiency, by "getting more work done and getting it better done for the same expenditure," also to gain "simpler and better relationships."]

Proposals of the Committee of Twelve

In the general plan of placing the missionary activities of the denomination under two boards, one for home and one for foreign work, we make the following recommendations:

I. Unification and Organization

1. THE FOREIGN WORK. We recommend a complete unification of the Woman's Boards with the American Board, including unification

(a) in the conduct of the foreign mission work of the denomination in the foreign field,

(b) in the administration of the work in the departments at home,

(c) in appeals to the denomination in behalf of foreign missions,

(d) in foreign missionary education and promotion throughout the denomination.

This would make necessary the reconstituting of the present organization along the following lines:

a. A Prudential Committee of thirty-six, including at least one-third women, should be elected by the American Board at its meeting in connection with the National Council, the total to be arranged so as to provide "Constituent State" and regional representation. The Secretary of the National Council should be a member ex-officio but without vote.

This Committee should hold regular meetings semi-annually, for attendance upon which the expenses of all members may be paid, if so desired. The Committee should also meet semi-monthly ad interim for transacting the business of the Board as at present. Expenses for attendance upon these ad interim meetings should be paid only for a nucleus of eighteen of its members, one-third of whom should be women, designated by the Board when electing the Prudential Committee. At the same time other members who can attend should enjoy the full privileges of membership. This is a plan which has been found by the commissions of the National Council to operate satisfactorily. The women members in each case should be co-ordinate with the men in every respect as an integral part of the management, in order that the values of the Boards may be conserved.

b. Departmental Secretaries, men and women.

c. A Cabinet composed of the Departmental Secretaries, substantially on the present basis.

d. Other organizations jointly with the Home Board, such as the Commission on Missions, Promotional Council, Laymen's Advisory Committee, and Regional Committees as described below.

2. THE HOME WORK. We recommend the unification of the Home Work by use of identical boards of directors, elected by the several home societies at their meetings with the National Council, this identical board to be known, while considering the whole program of the home societies, as The Congregational Home Board, with hope of ultimate corporate union under that name. The membership of such corporation, when organized, would be the members of The National Council plus 150 members at large and the life members of the several consolidating home boards.

Division of the work into departments would enable this board to retain, where advisable, the present administrative and executive forces. A plan embodying such a division of functions should be left flexible for future readjustments.

This plan would bring under identical management

The American Missionary Association
The Congregational Home Missionary Society
The Congregational Church Building Society
The Congregational Sunday School Extension Society
The Congregational Publishing Society
The Congregational Education Society
The Congregational Foundation for Education
The Congregational Board of Ministerial Relief

The Functions of the National Council in connection with the Annuity Fund for Congregational Ministers.

We recommend the assumption of the work of The Congregational Woman's Home Missionary Federation by the Promotional Council and the Regional Committees later recommended, as it is the judgment of this Committee that the maintenance of a national organization of women apart from the proposed Home Board would be contrary to the principle of unification and would stand in the way of the realization of the very objectives we are trying to reach through the unification of the present missionary agencies. At the same time we believe that the values developed by the Woman's Home Missionary organizations should not only be conserved but enlarged. To this end proposals follow looking to a still larger enlistment of women in the work of the church at home.

The consolidation of the existing societies into one corporation is in our judgment the ideal and practicable method of effecting this unification. We recognize, however, that before a corporate consolidation can be effected, serious problems, both legal and administrative, requiring perhaps special legislation, must be dealt with; and that the solution of these problems will necessarily require time and study on the part of the proposed Home Board. But we believe that the benefits of unification can be attained in large measure through identical boards without corporate consolidation at this time. We feel that it would be unfortunate if the enjoyment of these benefits were postponed during the period which would necessarily elapse before the policy of complete corporate consolidation could be carried into effect.

As a means of bringing about the earliest possible unification of the home work we make the following recommendations: (For convenience we use in these recommendations the term "Board of Directors" to describe the managing board of each society, this being the title now used by most of the societies, although in the case of The American Missionary Association, its board is known as "Executive Committee.")

a. That each of the home societies should provide that its Board of Directors consist of thirty-six members, at least one-third of whom should be women. This board should meet semi-annually. Provision should be made for an administrative committee of twelve to function with authority ad interim. Six of this committee should be members of the Board of Directors, and at least one-third of both groups should be women. The boards of directors and administrative committees should be so chosen as to insure rotation, the continuous service of any member being limited to a period not to exceed six years. The by-laws and, if in any cases necessary, the charters of the several societies should be amended by appropriate action to accomplish this result. So far as practicable these amendments should become effective not later than January 1, 1928.

b. That the Boards of Directors of the different societies be identical in membership.

c. That the three Extension Boards consolidate, as recommended by them in their action of May 20, 1925, which is as follows:

"That we request the Committee of Twelve to include in their report to the National Council the necessary recommendations leading to the final consolidation of the three Extension Societies in name, on the apportionment, for promotion and in administration; the legal incorporation of the three in one to be effected if the law permits it without prejudice to the holdings of the Societies."

d. That in order to effect this consolidation and to open the way for the consolidation of the other societies, as soon as they shall find this step practicable, the Executive Committee of the National Council, in co-operation with the Extension Boards, whenever the latter shall have approved the plan, cause to be organized under the Membership Corporation Law of New York (supplemented if necessary by special legislation), a corporation to be called "The Congregational Home Board" with a membership as indicated above and with corporate purposes sufficiently broad to enable it to do any of the various kinds of work within the powers of the several societies, and that the Extension Boards be consolidated with this new corporation in the manner prescribed by the Membership Corporation Law above mentioned.

1. The new corporation should have a board of thirty-six directors, at least one-third of whom should be women, this board to meet semi-annually, the Secretary of the National Council to be a member ex officio but without vote. These directors should be elected at the meeting of the Home Board held in conjunction with the National Council and should be so chosen as to provide adequate "Constituent State" and regional representation.

2. The by-laws of the corporation should provide for the establishment of four departmental committees. Each of these committees should consist of twelve members, at least one-third of whom should be women, and six of whom should be members of the Board of Directors, and of these six at least one should also be a member of one of the other departmental committees. These departmental committees should be chosen by the corporation at its biennial meeting.

3. The Board of Directors of the Home Board should be identical in membership with the Boards of Directors of the several societies. The arrangement of the departmental committees subject to later adjustment by the board should be as follows:

(a) Committee on Church Extension to dea with the work now done by the Extension Boards.

(b) Committee on Educational Interests to deal with work now done by the Education Society, the Foundation for Education and the Publishing Society.

(c) Committee on American Missionary Association Work.

(d) Committee on Ministerial Pensions to deal with the work now done by the Board of Ministerial Relief.

Such of these committees as have to do with the work of societies at any time consolidated into the Home Board shall be authoritative, and bear relation to the Board of Directors similar to that now subsisting between the executive committees of the Extension Boards and their Boards of Directors. Such committees as have to do with the work of societies not, at the time, consolidated with the Home Board should be composed of the same individuals who constitute the administrative committees of the societies in question, and their duty as committees of the Home Board should be to keep the directors of the Home Board informed as to the work in their respective fields; with regard to the actual work of administration, they should function as committees of the respective societies so long as these retain their corporate identity.

4. The Secretaries of the societies consolidated in the one Home Board should become Departmental Secretaries of the Board.

5. There should be a Cabinet composed of Departmental Secretaries and secretaries of societies not consolidated for conferences regarding united interests and for the preparation of agenda for the Board of Directors.

6. All appeals to the churches for home missionary purposes should hereafter be made under the supervision of the Promotional Council as set out below. So far as administrative work in the field is concerned the societies not consolidated with the Home Board should continue to be operated substantially as at present, the work being conducted in the name of the society concerned.

e. That the Congregational Home Missionary Society, The Congregational Church Building Society, and The Congregational Sunday School Extension Society, at their respective biennial meetings held in connection with the present meeting of the National Council, take such steps as may be necessary to inaugurate the process as involved in unification and consolidation in the manner indicated above; that the National Council make such recommendations to The Congregational Board of Ministerial Relief as shall provide for its inclusion in the Home Board, if possible.

f. That the Congregational Foundation for Education and the Congregational Education Society effect the consolidation of their work, irrespective of ultimate consolidation with the Home Board; and we recommend that appropriate action to this end be taken by the Education Society and by the National Council, at this session.

g. That the identical Board of Directors, as soon as established, consider the desirability of a unified treasury for all the societies, including the Home Board.

h. The Pilgrim Memorial Fund is a trust fund, the entire income of which accrues for the benefit of holders of contracts of the Annuity Fund. As the trustees of this fund have no administrative duties other than making investments computing distributable income and paying over of income to the Annuity Fund, we see no need to change the present well coordinated arrangement.

i. The Annuity Fund for Congregational Ministers is on an entirely different basis from the other societies. The members of the National Council are not members of the Annuity Fund. Under its charter, approved by the National Council, those who hold certificates of membership in the Fund elect trustees from a list of names of eligible persons previously presented to and approved by the Council.

We recommend that this corporation should remain in the control of its members, but that the nominating powers now exercised by the National Council should be exercised by the Home Board; and that five of the trustees be members both of the Board of Directors and of the departmental Committee on Ministerial Aid. This would leave this business corporation under its own control and at the same time give it the benefit of a vital connection with the Home Board while maintaining the present administrative unity with the work of Ministerial Relief.

In order to avoid the necessity of an appeal by the Annuity Fund to the Churches, we recommend that such designation in the apportionment as the Commission on Missions may determine for the Annuity Fund be added to the designation for Ministerial Relief for transmission to the Annuity Fund.

II. Relations of State and National Organizations

We realize that this Committee has no official relation to the State Conferences; that these Conferences are as free to accept or reject the advices of the National Council as the individual church is free to regard or disregard the findings of the State Conference. We also know that the Conferences are eager to co-operate and we propose the following recommendations as bases for negotiations between the Boards and the Conferences.

a. The Representative Relation. There is growing recognition of the responsibility of the churches of a conference for missionary and extension work within their borders. This obligation is not necessarily exclusive but it rests primarily on the churches of the state. This has long been recognized by the older states and is being vigorously asserted by the newer states. With this position we are in full accord and believe that this responsibility makes the state organization the logical representative within its borders for the national missionary societies and their regional agencies.

b. The States to Take Over Local Work. We recommend that the directors of the Home Boards, wherever it seems to them feasible and as speedily as possible, commit the execution of all local work now done by the Extension Boards, The Educational Society, and The American Missionary Association to the State Conferences. This recommendation of commitment of executive work does not include any suggestion that the national societies should not make appropriations for state work. This commitment of work should be made not alone where the Conference is now self-supporting but also where it is sufficiently strong to contribute, under the total apportionment, amounts equal to the needs of the state budget, including provision for the work turned over; arrangements being made so that part of the benevolent fund of the churches of the state may be paid to the national society, somewhat under the terms of the present plan for Cooperating States in the constitution of The Congregational Home Missionary Society. This would grant the states autonomy in administration with fraternal advice as well as financial assistance.

We recommend that the work of Ministerial

Relief, State and National, be unified to promote standardization of grants and equitable distribution of funds, and commend the co-operative agreement of the State Boards of Michigan, Maine, and Vermont, which is working to the satisfaction of all concerned. Each of these agreements consolidates the income of the State Board with that of the National Board with safeguards in the use of trust funds held by the State Board and transfers pensioners on the State list to the National roll. State initiative and referendum are maintained by making the State Superintendent, or a State Committee, the representative of the work of Ministerial Relief within the State, and their recommendation is made the basis of action on any application for a grant originating within the State.

c. Choice of Executives. In view of the fact that the state organizations are becoming more and more the official representatives of the national societies, and in our judgment this should be so, we approve the suggestions of some of the superintendents that the state organizations in choosing their chief executives might well consult with the national societies, to insure harmony and co-operation.

d. Co-operation at Board Meetings. We recommend that state organizations consider the advisability of inviting representatives of the national Foreign and Home Boards to sit regularly with them at their board meetings and that the National Boards reciprocate.

e. State Percentages. In view of the simplification of percentages through the proposed plan, we suggest that in the future the Survey Committee of the Commission on Missions, after conference with representatives from the states and the Home and Foreign Boards, shall present at the mid-winter conference three percentages for each state: one for state work, one for the foreign work, and one for the home work; and arrange with the Home Board for subdivision of its apportionment. These percentages should then be acted on by the states, which having once adopted them should adhere to them for the entire year.

III. Co-ordination and Promotion

If unification in the administration of foreign and home work shall be effected as proposed above, the co-ordination of the promotional work will remain to be accomplished. For this the Commission on Missions has been established. Up to the present time the Commission has not been able to fulfill completely its purpose, because although it represented the National Council, which has constituted the majority voting constituency of the Missionary Societies since 1913, and has therefore been in legal authority over the societies, nevertheless, the Commission has not, in practice, been able to enforce its rulings. We make the following recommendations:

a. The Commission on Missions. In the interest of economy, but even more for the sake of the clearest mutual understanding, we recommend that the National Council name as its Commission on Missions the members of the Prudential Committee and of the Board of Directors of the Home Board, plus nine members at large, of whom one-third should be women, to be appointed by the National Council. The Commission should have Executive and Survey Committees. At least one-third of the members of each should be women. There should be at least one member at large on each of these committees. The functions of the Commission on Missions would continue substantially as at present plus those specified below. In connection with the apportionment schedule, the Commission on Missions should provide, with the concurrence of the Societies, for the payment from their treasuries of the following items:

(1) Its own budget, including that of the Promotional Council.

(2) The necessary budget of The Congregationalist.

(3) A miscellaneous fund to meet the fair share of the denomination in inter-denominational projects.

b. A Joint Promotional Council. The Committee recommends a Joint Promotional Council which should be an empowered Cabinet, representing the two national boards directly, and through the Commission on Missions and the State Conferences having supervision of all solicitation of funds for the entire program of benevolences.

We believe a Joint Promotional Council can be so constituted as to provide imperatively needed unification of promotion and have the highest promise of success because this is the normal outgrowth of our past practice and true to our democratic ideals.

A Council of sixteen should include five chosen by each of the two National Boards, at least one of whom should in each instance be a woman, and three chosen by the body of State Superintendents; also the General Secretary of the National Council, the Promotional Secretary and the Secretary of the Laymen's Advisory Committee, ex-officiis.

The Promotional Council should be the administrative, but not the authoritative body. The Commission on Missions, and, ad interim its Executive Committee, authoritatively represent the Boards. A Promotional Secretary who should be the general administrative officer of the Promotional Council should be elected by the Boards on nomination of the Commission on Missions. He should be co-ordinate with the promotional secretaries of the Boards. The Promotional Council should annually elect its own chairman. It should report to the Executive Committee of the Commission on Missions or to the Commission itself.

The Promotional Council should:

1st: Prepare and direct a program of promotion culminating in the Every Member Canvass or other device as time and experience may show advisable.

2d. Develop a secondary program of promotion which may be helpful to churches not working under the standard plan.

3d. Have general supervision of individual appeals hitherto made by the various societies often for special pieces of work. Each society working chiefly in its own interests, has built up lists for special appeal; but these lists contain only a small percentage of the names of those Congregationalists who are of sufficient means to be able to respond to definite appeals. With reasonable regard for the confidential nature of these lists and of the past relations of each society to individuals, it is hoped that the Promotional Council can so co-ordinate such solicitation as greatly to augment the number of Congregationalists who during each year should receive special appeal, and to increase largely the sum secured from such solicitation. The development of practical plans to this end will require that the Promotional Council and the Laymen's Advisory Committee work in closest harmony with each other.

Relation with the Boards. The Promotional Council should be elected by each of the Boards as its official committee on Field Promotion as well as by the Commission on Missions.

Secretaries of the Foreign and Home Boards should be designated to maintain vital relations between the administrative committees of the n, Dr. William E. Barton, and Mr. Thomas B. McMillan, former Moderators. At Boards and the Promotional Council. Each of these secretaries should take such part in the common promotional work as shall be arranged by him and the Promotional Council, especially in cultivating lists of individual contributors and in fostering sources of income outside the denomination.

There should be a promotional force of secretaries and others corresponding roughly to the present associate, departmental, assistant, and district secretaries of the societies to be elected by the two boards acting as The Commission on Missions on nomination of the Promotional Council and to be realigned by the Promotional Council as the best good of the work shall dictate. This force should work under the immediate direction of the Promotional Secretary and report through him to the Promotional Council.

We recommend (1) that the National Council request the Commission on Missions to organize the Promotional Council as soon as possible; (2) that the National Council transmit to each of the Societies at its present biennial meeting the recommendation that the entire promotional work as provided under this section on Co-ordination and Promotion be conducted through its promotional committee; that is, The Commission on Missions and its Promotional Council. Specifically this should include the promotional work of the district offices and of the associate, departmental, and district secretaries; the publishing and circulating of promotional literature; the preparation and distribution of stereopticon lectures; the booking of speakers; the enlargement of lists of individual givers and similar services.

c. Joint Regional Committees. In order to give the two Boards the fullest contacts with state organizations and the churches, and in order to make effective the plans of the Promotional Council, we recommend the creation of joint regional committees, to be comprised of both men and women and to work in close co-operation with the State organizations. These regional committees should be joint branches of the two Boards, which Boards would be responsible for working out these organizations in consultation with the states. The members of these committees should be appointed by the two Boards sitting jointly as the Commission on Missions, the number of regions and of states to be included in each region to be a matter of joint decision by the Boards. Regional secretaries, state superintendents, and persons doing similar promotional work in states not having organized conferences should be members ex officiis, without vote, of the regional committee in their territory. These proposals with regard to appointment and functioning of the Regional Committees should not be construed as in any way invalidating the direct relations of state and national organizations mentioned in Section II of this report.

The functions of these committees should be:

1. The conservation of the work and interest of the present woman's organizations and the securing of active participation in the work by corporate members of the Boards.

2. Promotional and educational work under the Promotional Council in close co-operation with the state organizations so as to correlate the common work of each region as a whole.

3. The promotion of regional conferences, including inspirational gatherings.

4. The carrying on of certain services now rendered by the district offices and secretaries.

These Regional Committees may be built upon the present district organization of the Woman's Home Missionary Federation. They may also take over some of the district offices of the Boards. Other district offices may be discontinued. District offices should not be carried by the Boards themselves unless in certain cases it is found impracticable for the Regional Committees or state organizations to take them over.

These Regional Committees should be the agents of the two Boards in promoting all the interests of both Boards and of the individual churches. They should be made up of both men and women, and we express the hope that there may be associated with them a system of women's organizations formed by the uniting of the Branches of the Woman's Boards and the Unions of the Woman's Home Missionary Federation from local church organizations up to district organizations. This would utilize the voluntary organizations now in existence and at the same time bring the "Foreign" and "Home" women together and place them behind the whole program of the Church. We recommend that the necessary cost of maintaining the offices of the joint regional committees be borne by the two boards, but that in so far as these regional organizations are utilized for promotional work under the Promotional Council the additional expenses incurred on this account should be borne by the Commission on Missions, or by the states where they so desire.

d. Women's Work. This would retain distinctive women's organizations, existing because of the basic fact that many more women than men have free time for church work; it would place the women unitedly back of all church interests and responsibilities instead of behind only part of them, and it would do away with the duplication and the lack of direct contact involved in separate national women's organizations, because the local women's organizations would head up into the Regional Committees and through them and the Promotional Council into the two missionary boards. In many of the states the women's organizations might head up into state organizations, and these into Regional Committees. This detail we leave to be worked out by the women and the Promotional Council.

The women's organizations should be responsible in the local churches for:

1. Educational and promotional work in co-operation with the Promotional Council. This should include the establishing of contacts between churches and projects now known as "pledged work."

2. Enlisting women in box work (so far as this may wisely be perpetuated), and in various practical forms of relief work.

3. Promoting organizations for women in the local churches and advising with state leaders on the adjustment of various state and district organizations.

4. Maintaining inter-denominational relations.

IV. The Consolidation of Magazines

(On October 22, 1925, the National Council accepted Sections I, II, III, and V, and referred Section IV back to the Committee of Twelve for report to the National Council in 1927.)

V. General Provision

This proposal deals with the affairs of what are in fact several distinct corporations, which have separate properties and separate control over various trust funds. It is the purpose that all trust funds shall be faithfully conserved and administered according to the expressed wish of the donors and in all respects according to law and good conscience; therefore, notwithstanding anything elsewhere in this proposal written, it is to be understood to be the meaning of this proposal that as a condition precedent to the action of the several societies in taking the steps herein proposed, or any of them, each shall satisfy itself that the step proposed to be taken can be taken without violating any of the provisions of the trusts involved, and this shall include the prior submission of the matter to the courts, for their judgment, where that procedure shall seem wise and can be done.

We believe that the program we have suggested is expressive of the present desire of our church membership, that it will bring about considerable economies; that it will increase efficiency of adminstration, remove present confusion in the approach to the churches and individuals; that it will humanize and spiritualize the missionary appeal, enlarge the number of those who will have interest in our Missionary enterprises, and that it will materially strengthen our denominaional life.

Never has the Congregational Book Store brought to the Council such a display of the very books which Christian workers need—and the preachers found the personal counsel of our new manager, Rev. Alexander McKenzie, a very present help in the selection of the most meaty and inspiring sermon-timber. Swain's What and Why is Man? was far and away the best seller, with Glover's Paul of Tarsus as a close second, and Dr. Gordon's Autobiography going strong.

As tired and happy groups compared notes after seeing the grandeur of the Capitol, the smile that gives the White House its charm, the wonders of the National Museum, the solemn shades of Arlington, the evening splendor of the Library of Congress, and the alabaster glory of the Capitol dome against the night sky—the question often came, "What will you remember longest?" The reply was unanimous. It was the silent, pillared temple where the great, sad, kind face looks out upon his people.

World Hero Prize Competition

ıder Auspices of the National Council for Prevention of War, Washington, D. C.

VHO are the world's greatest heroes? Here is a question for the young people in our church-school classes and clubs. Id this question may serve as the starting point for the winter's ogram in many such groups. The announcement of this world o prize competition expresses again the new testing of old ideals ich is going on in the world today. Before we choose the world's atest heroes, we must come to some conclusion as to what char- eristics may be looked for in a world hero. Here the new testing evident. What does the reader think of the definition of "world o" as given below? Is this the interpretation which has been nmonly accepted since history began? Is it not rather a some- at new conception of such a character, a recognition of character- ics privately honored but not necessarily included in the popular ture of a world hero? Could there be any better program to put fore the young people than a discussion of the lives of men and men who have measured up to this ideal? Although the competition pen only to pupils in the secondary and higher elementary schools, er groups of young people may enter as heartily into the discussion.

We are not primarily concerned with the final list of world heroes which may result from this contest. It will be of interest but not of paramount importance. Twelve is not a large number of great characters to select from all the peoples of the world, and there may be many who would change the final list in some particular. The results are not of the greatest consequence.

The important thing is that this competition is turning the thoughts of young people all over the world to a new kind of world hero. Those whom the world may have called great will be tested anew. Some may stand the test; others may not. But the fact that young people today will be seeking the answers to such an inquiry means that they will be making the most worth while kind of study of the greatest personalities in history. Here is a "course of study" for classes in the church school. Here is a "program" for church-school or community clubs, something for various groups of young people to do, seeking the answer to a question of common interest, with discussions carried on in the language of today.

tional Directions for School Principals and Teachers normal boys and girls are hero worship- nd are molded by their ideals. The pur- of this competition is to stimulate in teachers and pupils alike throughout the world fresh study of the elements of greatness and broader and more intimate familiarity with the lives of men and women that have possessed these qualities.

Carlyle in Heroes and Hero Worship defines heroes as the Great Men. Greatness, says H. G. Wells, is shown in "constructive work for humanity of a permanent character." It will be noted that this phrase has been included as one of the three essentials to be considered.

Genius without character is destructive and dangerous. To serve as examples for the youth, heroes should be noble as well as great. This is the second test.

Finally, to stand out in history as the greatest among the heroes, men and women must be so profoundly possessed by a great devotion that they lose self and lose fear and are swept to heights that human beings otherwise never attain. This is the third test.

Teachers should guide their pupils to weigh carefully by each of these three standards the heroes of all peoples and of all periods of history. We make, however, two important exceptions. It has seemed best to exclude from the competition the names of founders of religions whom their followers revere as divine. The names of persons now living are likewise excluded because the permanence of their work cannot yet be determined.

Each school may determine the details of its own competition which, however, should follow these general lines:

First, it is hoped that there may be special research accompanied by classroom discussion.

Following this period of study, each pupil may submit to his teacher essays of not over 200 words on such of the heroes as he chooses.

On the basis of these essays shall be selected the twelve figures for whom, in the light of the terms of the competition, it is deemed the best case has been made; and these shall constitute the official list to be submitted by this school in the world competition.

The best essay that has been handed in on each of these twelve heroes shall be translated into English, written on one side of the paper —typewritten if possible—and transmitted with the winning list properly certified by the principal to the Chairman of the Committee of Award, Dr. Augustus O. Thomas, Augusta, Maine.

Blanks to be filled out and signed by the school principal in transmitting the essays may be obtained singly or in quantity upon application to the National Council for Prevention of War, 532 Seventeenth Street N.W., Washington, D. C., U. S. A.

Local Prizes Suggested

It would add to the interest and value of the competition if local newspapers, civic leaders, or organizations should offer prizes to local contestants. In the United States, for example, each Parent-Teacher Association may be interested to secure an award of prizes for its own school. Community, state, and national contests would still further quicken interest and in no way interfere with the world-wide competition.

Bearers of Wood

By Lisle Burroughs Swenson

A curious throng
Through the city's streets—
  Blue-eyed, black-eyed, brown—
Shifting their heavy Loads of wood
  From hand to head, then down.

Does the world seem a care
To the "bull" and the "bear,"
  With the stock going up—going down?
Have a look! See the boys!
See the girls! as they shift
  Their wood-loads to head and then down.

Have you followed them home—
Tiny bearers of wood—
  To look at the toys that are made
From the sticks and the chunks
That are borne on the heads
  Of the little street-arab and maid?

"Toys," said I? "Ha!"
The world crisps a laugh,
  "I drive them to hunt for the gain
Of the wood giv'n by kind men
Who've known naked coal-bins
  And chill and want and pain."

Oh, watch them again,
Christ's women and men!
  Can the children know God as they should,
Fighting comrades and quarreling,
Swearing, biting, and tearing
  To clutch a few pieces of wood?

Do your best loyally and cheerfully, and suffer yourself to feel no anxiety or fear. Your times are in God's hands. He has assigned you your place. He will direct your paths. He will accept your efforts, if they be faithful. He will bless your aims, if they be for your soul's good.—Frederick W. Farrar.

More About My Music Box

That music box of mine is a never-ending enchantment. Something within my mind, often without any conscious effort on my part, seizes and holds bits here and there from the great music upon which my ears have feasted. Something, without my conscious effort or even conscious awareness, starts up in my mind the memory of the sound, so that when at last I become aware of the music that is going on I am already far along, not seldom, in one piece or another. In some mysterious way I can hear, as if with hidden ears in the inside of my head, measures so intricate that if I try to reproduce them with lips or throat I find myself baffled.

If you go into psychology, you find one learned man speaking of these retained impressions as engrams, another as neurograms. Call them what you will, account for the process as you may, things are retained that I have not tried to retain. Without my knowing why or how, without any expectation on my part, this or that awakes to activity below the level of consciousness, while the conscious part of my mind is occupied with things entirely different. Then suddenly consciousness discovers what is taking place, usually (in the case of the music) to my joy, sometimes to my vexation; for now and then the music that I find going on in my head is something I dislike, but which has continued to live on somewhere within me in spite of my desire to be rid of it. That, too, is a "neurogram." That, too, is likely to surprise me by springing into activity perhaps after an interval of many years of apparent forgottenness.

But this I notice. The more I am in the way of music that is lastingly satisfying, the less likely am I to find any of the unwelcome stuff forcing itself upon me unasked. When my neighbor's phonograph squawked daily with the horrible noises of cheap jazz, I found the jazz taking root in my mind in spite of me; when he fed my ears with loveliness, then loveliness came daily from that mysterious inner music box which I carry around all the while—came spontaneously, without my being obliged to will it.

My neighbor is finding, too, that the soul's growth depends upon the food which is given it. As he lies day by day on his porch, or sits up for an hour or two before going back to bed for another long bout with the pillows, no longer does he turn on the jazz. Rather is it that airy-fairy Scherzo from the Midsummer Night's Dream music with which he regales his ears, and the Twelfth Nocturne, and a Spanish dance that Kreisler has made familiar, and Mozart's great E Flat quartet. At the same time he is discovering the delights of color and design. The grotesques of popular magazine illustration do not now satisfy his hungry spirit. He is studying the heroic artists, collecting reproductions of the masterpieces, adorning his walls with prints that bring refreshment to the eye and vision to the soul; and he is reading John Addington Symonds and Paul Van Dyke as guides into a republic of delights that only a year or two ago held for him no slightest lure. The new interests are leading him to beatitudes he had not guessed life could hold. "It gave me a boost from which I have never descended," he said the other day, about one of his finds; "it lifted me to a new plane."

SHUT-IN DAYS

The Lord will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing.—Ps. 41: 3.

In one thousand trials it is not five hundred of them that work for the believer's good, but nine hundred and ninety-nine of them, and one beside.—George Müller.

An illness like mine reveals many things to the soul. One is the vast difference between theoretic or unpractised religion and philosophy and experimental. My conclusion is that we learn nothing from theory, and that is the reason why life is so hard a school. Everything of value to us must be a suffered experience; otherwise, little or nothing is acquired. All evolution is through suffering, and there is no other mode of advancement and progress. That is my discovery.—William Davies.

Long days and nights upon this restless bed,
Of daily, nightly weariness and pain!
Yet thou art here, my ever-gracious Lord,
They well-known voice speaks not to me in vain—
"In me ye shall have peace."
Father, the flesh is weak. Fain would I rise Above its weakness into things unseen.
Lift thou me up. Give me the open ear
To hear the voice that speaketh from within—
"In me ye shall have peace."

Horatius Bonar, abr.

He that knoweth best how to suffer will best keep himself in peace. That man is conqueror of himself, and lord of the world, the friend of Christ, and an heir of heaven. —Thomas à Kempis.

Sure I am, it is better to be sick, providing Christ come to the bedside and draw the curtains and say, "Courage, I am thy salvation," than to enjoy health, and never to be visited of God.—Samuel Rutherford.

For what cause soever this sickness is sent unto you; whether it be to try your patience for the example of others, and that your faith may be found in the day of the Lord laudable, glorious and honorable, to the increase of glory and endless felicity; or else it be sent unto you to correct and amend in you whatsoever doth offend the eyes of your Heavenly Father; know you certainly, that if you truly repent you of your sins, and bear your sickness patiently, trusting in God's mercy for his dear Son Jesus Christ's sake, and render unto him humble thanks for his fatherly visitation, submitting yourself wholly unto his will it shall turn to your profit, and help you forward in the right way that leadeth unto everlasting life.—Anglican Prayer Book.

O God, who makest cheerfulness the companion of strength, but apt to take wing in time of trouble, we humbly beseech thee that if, in thy sovereign wisdom, thou sendest weakness, yet for thy mercy's sake deny us not the comfort of patience. Lay not more upon us, O heavenly Father, than thou wilt enable us to bear; and, since the fretfulness of our spirits is more hurtful than the heaviness of our burden, grant us that heavenly calmness which comes of owning thy hand in all things and patience in the trust that thou doest all things well. Amen.

Passing Our Joys Around

Comment on the Prayer Meeting Top for November 22-28

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: God's Bounties: How Can We S Them with Others? Deuteronomy 28: Matthew 25: 34-40. (Thanksgiving Meet

Light from the Bible Passages

God's richest blessings await the people live closest to him. Such relationship m an effort to hear God and to obey what h veals to us. Blessings, material as wel spiritual, are the reward of those who God's will above their own, who choose ways rather than their own.

Doing good to others deliberately is t heartily approved, but that which the M especially commends is the habit of mind w does kindnesses unconsciously and with thought of thanks or praise. The beaut such service is that it really is done for who went about doing good.

Leads for Leaders

Grateful joy should be the keynote of meeting. Sing a number of the more mo hymns of thankfulness. Ask for a chain of prayers of thanksgiving, specifying the th for which the people are thankful. Use beautiful prayer of David in 1 Chronicles 11-19, making only such verbal changes as be necessary. Have different members read tracts from the richer Psalms, like the 65: 2 145: 1-7; 103: 1-5; 44: 1-3; 106: 1-5; 105; 146: 1-10.

Consider the effect of our acknowled God's gifts to us on others. This may their thoughts to him who has innumer gifts to bestow, and thus secure them for t who do not now take them from the Gi hand.

Are there poor in our community? Are t those who feel that they have little cause t thankful? The value of a cheery word, a l call, a thoughtful, even if not expensive,

An excellent opportunity for emphasi sharing with others through missionary in est, prayer and gifts of life as well as mo Have we any right to "eat our loaf alone"

Thoughts for Members

"Another day in which to cast
Some silent deed of love abroad,
That, greatening as it journeys past,
May do some earnest work for Go

"Thanksgiving is simply remembering soned with justness and reverence. It thought climbing from the lowest to the h est. It is the mind traversing its old jour recognizing that God's company was all al the way, and lifting up here and there me rials of divine holiness."

Now sing we a song for the harvest;
Thanksgiving and honor and praise,
For all that the bountiful Giver
Hath given to gladden our days;

But now we sing deeper and higher,
Of harvests that eye cannot see;
They ripen on mountains of duty,
Are reaped by the brave and the free.

A Moment of Prayer

Thy manifold blessings to O God! May day never come, when we forget them. M our hearts, we pray with such deep rem brance of them that we may welcome opp tunities of gladdening the hearts of others w our generous sharing of them. Amen.

WITH THE CHILDREN

Two Blizzards and a Bear

By Winifred Davidson

Cash Trevis and Sandy Streaterson were ngratulating themselves on their good luck.

"There's hard tack. Three dozen. That ight to last us a week, if we're careful," id Sandy, as he finished counting the stale rackers.

"And almost a half-pound of tea. And atches. And two candle-ends," laughed Cash. Oh, we're in luck."

"With what rabbits we can get—we could ve ten days or two weeks here."

The boys had been returning from a lumber amp in the upper hills when they were over-ken by a snowstorm, which, beginning so ghtly that they paid no attention to it, had ded in a genuine blinding blizzard. They ad fought their way forward to an old camp, alf hidden among the trees and fallen brush.

"It will have to let up in a day or so," said ash, after a spell of listening to the raging orm outside. "It can't possibly last very ng."

"No, it's getting too late in the season," reed Sandy. "But in the meantime, whether can or can't, it's out there howling as if it ere the middle of January!"

Day after day passed. The boys were snug ough inside the hut, but to sit idle and know at rations and ammunition were getting fear-lly low was almost more than Sandy could dure after the second day.

On the third day they heard a faint haloo in e direction of the hills.

"Rescue party!" They laughed and gathered eir belongings together, ready to hurry along eir rescue.

"Funny—I can't hear more than one," mut-red Cash, stopping to listen more attentively.

"Nor I. Hello! Hello!" shouted Sandy.

"Help!"

There was no mistaking that cry. No res-ers, but some one else in trouble, they ran t to find.

It was Bert Hughes, hungry, frightened, ex-usted. They dragged him into camp, laid m on the floor, made hot tea and offered him me roast rabbit and hard tack—half of one rtion of the precious bread.

"Can't you be a little more generous?" ained Bert, eating ravenously. "I could do way with a stack of crackers as high as oor."

"We've got to go easy," explained Cash. We've been here three days now, and there's telling when we'll get out. What happened you?"

"I lost my job. I mean, I quit. I knew you lows were on the way home and I thought you could, I could"—

"We've got to get home for exams," ex-ained Sandy. "We were hired only until aturday. Are the men still working?"

"They were when I left. Billy tried to get e to stay—he was so short of help—but I was ck and tired of that job and I just left."

"But the storm must have started? You dn't walk right out into the blizzard?"

"I started right after you did. Oh, I took enty to eat and I was pretty sure I could id this place—but it took me longer than I ought."

"We'll start for home in the morning," said Cash, who, for some reason better known to his companions than to himself, usually made decisions for them all. "We can't last here two days more, and if Bert could travel this far in that weather—well, certainly it's bound to be better by morning and we'll start."

But when Cash and Sandy rolled out of their blankets in the morning, Bert had gone. There were two crackers left, about a spoonful of tea, and neither ammunition nor rabbit meat.

"There's gratitude," shouted Sandy, angrily, when the truth was upon them. "Give him half of our starvation rations and he takes all!"

"If he can find the trail down, we can!" said Cash, determinedly. "It can't be quite such rough going either, or Bert wouldn't have tried it. Let's take a good drink of tea now and put the crackers in our pockets. And let's start!"

They were making fine progress in spite of their hunger. They had been resting for days and felt a strange lightness that was almost like new strength.

"Tracks!" whispered Sandy. "Bear tracks!"

"More like a human," said Cash. "Do you suppose"—

"Suppose nothing," broke in Sandy. "If Bert's wandering around here, he can just wander. He's got everything to take care of himself with. Isn't that the sugar pine just over High Ledge? If it is, I know the way home, and we'll be there tonight."

Cash stood still. There was something familiar about the sound that came to him. It was a cry for help and it was no other than Bert Hughes. Involuntarily, Cash turned northward and set off in the direction of the calling, which seemed to him to grow even fainter than when he had at first heard it.

Sandy was stubborn. "Why should we look him up again?" he argued. "He's got everything to take care of himself with. Let's get home and send some one else out to look for him."

But Cash went on. He felt a good deal as Sandy did, but something kept his feet going in the direction of Bert's failing cries. He was conscious after some minutes of Sandy's following. Suddenly he began to run. The cries had ceased.

Within a shallow cave, too low to stand in, lay Bert, almost too worn out to speak. About him had drifted the last hours' snows, for it was evident that he had taken shelter earlier in the day and had made himself a rude screen of pine boughs.

"I had a fight," he whispered,—"a fight with a bear."

Cash could believe him. Bert's clothes were torn and his head was scratched.

"I think I shot him in the leg," he said, presently. "I don't know how I got away—how I found this place."

"Can you walk?" asked Cash. "Sandy thinks he knows the way home from here. Get up and let's try for it."

"Can't," whimpered Bert.

Cash began to wonder about Sandy. He had not approached the cave. Could it be that he was lost now? That he had turned back and left his companions in this place? Well, there was nothing for it but to wait where they were now. He couldn't leave Bert to die of terror.

To his dismay—Bert had fallen asleep and knew nothing of it—the storm increased. There had been comparative quiet all day, but now the wind had risen again and the snow smothered down until it seemed to Cash that they would never be able to dig themselves out. All night he crouched, listening.

From a half-conscious dazed state of mind he came to his senses. There was something going on outside. Bear or human, he must see what it was. Bert had revived and was on his knees beside him. Excitedly they tore at the screen of boughs and dug at the wall of snow. A voice outside was calling.

"Cash! Cash Trevis, are you there? Bert! Bert Hughes!"

"Here, Sandy!" cried Cash, and in a moment they were free.

"What happened?" he asked, looking from Sandy to the group of neighbors who were just straightening up after their swift shoveling at the mouth of the cave.

"I saw where you were heading for," said Sandy, "and was coming along behind you—much as I hated to do anything for Bert, after the way he had acted"—

Bert interrupted. "I don't blame you. I don't know what made me"—

Sandy went on, "And then I heard Mr. Franklin calling. Billy and the men had gone to the village by sleds, and when they found we hadn't got home yet the men organized a rescue party."

"And stopped to finish up our old enemy, a bear that's been prowling around the last few months," explained Mr. Franklin.

Bumpa's Cane

By Helen Hartness Flanders

My Bumpa has a shiny cane.
Sometimes it's just a peg
To hold his hat. Or it can be A pointer or a leg.
But it is NEVER what it is——A fine cockhorse—!

A cockhorse with a sweeping tail!
A cockhorse that can rear
And back and snort and plunge along
Kicking his heels. . . . I hear
My Bumpa wants a cane of his.
—Whoa, my cockhorse!—

Thanksgiving Fable

It was a hungry pussy cat upon Thanksgiving morn,
And she watched a thankful little mouse that ate an ear of corn.
"If I ate that thankful little mouse, how thankful he should be,
When he has made a meal himself, to make a meal for me!
Then with his thanks for having fed, and his thanks for feeding me,
With all his thankfulness inside, how thankful I shall be!"
Thus mused the hungry pussy cat, upon Thanksgiving Day;
But the little mouse had overheard and declined (with thanks) to stay!

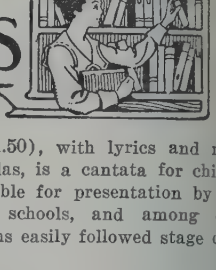
AMONG THE NEW BOOKS



Children's Book Week

Children's Book Week, which falls this year from Nov. 8 to 15, has become a notable feature in the world of books and libraries. It is much more than an occasion of publishers' and booksellers' publicity. It has become an expression and symbol of intelligent and well directed interest in the providing of wholesome, well-written literature for children, and in the exclusion from this field of trivial, unwholesome, and badly written books. The volume of good books, full of the zest of life and adventure, stimulating to the mind and the imagination, colorful, suggestive, informing, is so large, and is constantly so enlarging, that there is no excuse for allowing children to pick up their reading by chance, or without careful regard to its quality. It is interesting, also, to observe that though some fine editions run into much money children's books on the whole, particularly the standard, tried and tested books, continue to be much cheaper than the general run of books. This is no doubt due to the fact that desirable children's books, of recognized merit, can be issued in large editions. It is amazing and gratifying to watch the rivalry between the best publishing houses in bringing out the most distinctive and attractive editions of books old and new. In a world unduly given to business competition and athletic contest, may we not easily underestimate the meaning and value of these rivalries in the higher realms of art and literature? We may rest assured that besides its service in interesting and enlightening the young the modern volume of literature for children involves a real contribution to life. Grown-ups would find it well worth while to follow in the libraries, or as opportunity may offer, the production of books for boys and girls. It is a fascinating field.

Children's Book Week comes too early for adequate reference this year, in view of the pressure upon our space owing to the National Council gathering. On Nov. 26, however, The Congregationalist will issue a special Young Folks' Book Number, in which the most notable children's books of the season will be introduced to our readers.

Among the books for little children, of which the chief value lies in their pictorial appeal and in the beauty of their imagery, and which make accordingly excellent gifts for tiny tots, the following might be listed. Others will be noted, and books for older children will be characterized in the Young Folks' Book Number. For the convenience of our readers we give in this list of books for little children the name of the publisher and the price:

Beautiful Books for Little Children

Among the books of religious interest are Children of the Old Testament, and Children of the New Testament, published by Nelson in the Golden River Series, neat little volumes, nicely illustrated, in which the stories are excellently told ($.75 each). Stories from Tennyson is in the same series.

The Children's Master, by Winifred Scutt (Revell. $1.25), tells the story of the Christ-life in twenty-seven unique chapters in each of which a child appears as a witness of the event described in the progress from Bethlehem to Bethany.

Arthur Mee's Children's Bible (Doran. $3.00) is the Bible arranged for children, in the Authorized Version, with no word added or altered, and with a wealth of illustration from the art galleries of the world.

The Child's Bible, arranged by Ella Broadus Robertson (Nelson. $2.00), consists of connected readings from the Old and New Testaments in the American Standard Edition of the Revised Bible. It has sixteen full-page Bible pictures.

Sherman and Kent's The Children's Bible (Scribners. $1.75) is now available in a popular, low-priced edition, with full text and illustrations, and of excellent quality, though somewhat smaller than the original edition.

Though of special interest for workers with Primary children, Sundays and week-days, containing little nature songs, animal songs, and simple marches, as well as hymns, Song and Play for Children, by Frances Weld Danielson and Grace Wilbur Conant (The Pilgrim Press. $1.25), will appeal to children themselves and delight mothers who are teaching their children to sing. It is by the authors of Songs for Little People, already widely used.

Singing Games and Drills, prepared by Chester Geppert Marsh, Director of the Westchester County Recreation Commission (Barnes. $2.00), presents a wide variety of singing games, action songs, drills, etc., indicating the suitable accompanying movements. For younger children of school age.

The Musical Tree, by Sarah Stilwell Webber (Penn Pub. Co.), is a finely illustrated book containing words and music of fourteen songs for younger children, the first of which gives the book its title.

The King's Breakfast (Dutton. $2.00) presents fourteen lyrics from A. A. Milne's notable book of children's verse, When We Were Very Young, set to music by H. Fraser-Simson. The popularity of Mr. Milne's volume will make his book widely sought.

Without music, but illustrated by reproductions of famous paintings is A Book of Lullabies, compiled by Elva S. Smith, of the Carnegie Library, Pittsburgh (Lathrop, Lee and Shepard. $2.50). It is a comprehensive collection of Cradle Songs and Folk Lullabies from many lands and authors.

In the Little Library ($1.00 each) Macmillan has some new and attractive titles: A Dog of Flanders, by "Ouida"; Dame Wiggins of Lee, for which John Ruskin wrote some verses; The Pope's Mule, by Alphonse Daudet; King Penguin, by Richard Henry Horne; The Little Wooden Doll, by Margery Williams Bianco; and A Visit from St. Nicholas, by Clement G. Moore.

A Gallery of Children, by A. A. Milne, illustrater by H. Willebeek Le Mair (David McKay, Philadelphia. $3.50), is a de luxe edition, printed on heavy paper, with wide margins, and twelve beautiful full-page illustrations. An unusually artistic book.

David McKay also publishes Adventures in Our Street, written and illustrated by Gertrude A. Kay ($2.50). The everyday things that happen to children are written up with that happy touch that only those who come in contact with small children sometimes use so successfully in making everything that they elaborate seem wonderful adventure to a child.

The Little White Gate, by Florence Hoatson (Crowell. $1.35), is a delightful book of original verse for younger children, with four-color illustrations by Margaret W. Tarrant.

The Brownies in Fairyland, by Palmer Cox (Century Co. $1.50), with lyrics and mus by Malcolm Douglas, is a cantata for childre in two acts, suitable for presentation by chi dren in Sunday schools, and among othe groups. It contains easily followed stage dire tions.

Tales that Nimko Told, by Mary Brecht Pu ver (Century. $1.50), is an attractively illu trated book of stories and verse for small chi dren.

Little Dog Ready at Home, by Mabel Stryke (Holt. $1.75), contains the further adventure of a little dog who won friends in a former volume. The illustrations are by Hugh Spen cer.

Twelve Tales for Children (Appleton). A collection of fairy stories by various authors

Uzz, Fuzz, and Buzz, by Tinker Taylor (Ap pleton). The story of three Fairy-Babies

The Secret of Tarbury Tor, by G. C. Vicker (Appleton). A mystery story for boys

These three Appleton books are all importe from Great Britain and are attractive in tex and illustration.

The Story of Jack, by Horace Lytle (Apple ton. $1.50), is a book of dog stories. Th illustrations will quickly intrigue the youn reader.

Mr. Marionette, by Kathleen Colville, wit drawings by Albert Rutherston (Houghto Mifflin. $1.50), tells of the adventures of puppet-show man and a small boy who accom panied him.

The Lost King of Oz, by Ruth Plumly Thompson (Reilly and Lee), is an imaginative tale founded on, and continuing, the famous Oz stories of L. Frank Baum.

Merrylips, by Beulah Marie Dix (Macmillan. $1.75), is the stirring story of the adventures of Merrylips while disguised as a boy during the days of strife between Roundheads and Cavaliers.

The Water-Babies, by Charles Kingsley (Nelson. $1.50). This edition, illustrated by Anna Anderson, presents Kingsley's famous story in a beautifully-printed text and exquisite setting.

Skeezix and Pal, by Frank King (Reilly and Lee. $1.00). Pictures and stories of two characters whom the comics have made famous.

Mother Goose Secrets, by Barbara Webb Bourjaily (Small, Maynard. $1.50). The mother of three small boys reveals for children everywhere such secrets as why Little Boy Blue fell asleep under the haystack and other mysteries that Mother Goose did not explain.

JESUS AND THE JURY, by ASHLEY DAY LEAVITT (The Pilgrim Press. $1.00). See editorial reference.

THE HEAVENLY LADDER, by COMPTON MACKENZIE (Doran. $2.50). This book, which completes the trilogy begun in The Altar Steps and The Parson's Progress, relates the disheartening, sometimes turbulent, and eminently unsuccessful attempts of Rev. Mark Lidderdale to ram extreme High Church practices down the throats of his simple parishioners at Nancepean, on the seacoast of Cornwall. Conspicuous traits in Mark's character are his appreciation of natural scenery, his love of children, and his unselfish devotion, as especially shown in his kindness to the downtrodden girl whom he rescues from drowning. The book closes with the hero becoming an adherent of the Roman Church.

Maintaining the Standards of the Ministry

(National Council Addresses)

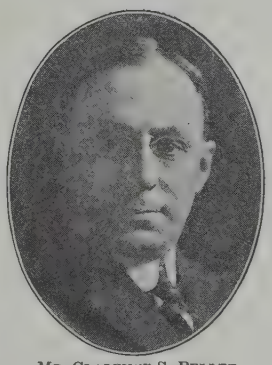
A Notable Pastor Speaks His Mind

REV. CLARENCE H. WILSON, D.D.
For sixteen years pastor Glen Ridge Congregational Church, New Jersey

"The day of good Saint Francis is past, and it will not return. The mendicant, once honored, has fallen, long since, from his high estate. A new ethic prevails. It requires that the man in every calling shall earn his keep and pay his way. The ministry can claim no exemption from this rule. In order to maintain its claim upon the choicest sons of the church, it must promise an adequate support which can be accepted without any implied humiliation."

What an Insurance Man Thinks of the Annuity Fund

"The test of an insurance management is its expense ratio. That of the Annuity Fund, 5.8%, is just one-third the average expense ratio of ten leading life insurance companies, and less than one-half of the lowest of which I have knowledge. The Annuity Fund enables ministers to help themselves. We ought to do these things: (1) Get a membership for our pastor on the new plan, paying at least one-half of his dues through the budget; (2) Build up the Pilgrim Memorial Fund to the objective of $8,000,000 established by the National Council; (3) Form the habit of meeting our apportionments in full before the dawn of the millennium."



MR. CLARENCE S. PELLET
Of the firm of Critchell, Miller, Whitney and Barbour, Chicago

What the Churches Are Doing Through the Apportionment

For the Annuity Fund. To fulfill the obligation of the churches to the older ministers through the Annuity Fund requires $50,000 a year from the apportionment. The churches have been paying only $20,000. In the apportionment for 1926 the designation to the Annuity Fund is lifted from 1% to 2% to meet the requirement.

For the Board of Relief. To provide pensions for the veterans who had no opportunity through the Annuity Fund, the apportionment designates 4% to the Boards of Ministerial Relief. Offerings, however, have not been sufficient to put into effect the standard of pensions approved by the Commission on Missions, since the roll has increased radically. It is significant that for the first ten months of 1925 the net increase was more than three times as great as in 1924. At present the average pension for a minister is only $360, including the Christmas remembrance, and for a widow, $265.

The Every Member Canvass is at hand. When you sign your pledge remember the part of the comprehensive program of our churches which deals with the safeguarding of the ministry.

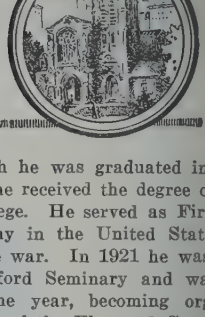
NEWS OF THE CHURCHES



Dr. Conrad's Twentieth Anniversary

The 20th anniversary of Dr. A. Z. Conrad's installation as pastor of Park St. Church, Boston, Mass., was celebrated in a series of significant occasions. At both morning and evening services, Nov. 1, Dr. Conrad preached anniversary sermons. At the close of the evening service the Foster Memorial Carillon Chimes in the tower of the church, just presented by Miss Harriet Foster in memory of her parents and grandparents, was dedicated in an out-of-door service.

On Tuesday evening, Nov. 3, the anniversary was observed with addresses by Dr. Daniel F. Poling, associate pastor of the Marble Collegiate Church in New York City and president of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, by Dr. Conrad, and by Alfred H. Colby, chairman of the board of trustees of Park St. Church. Dr. Conrad and Mr. Colby joined in burning a $55,000 mortgage upon the church recently paid off. Dr. Conrad was highly complimented for his remarkable ministry.

Large numbers attended the anniversary occasions. Many letters of compliment and congratulation from clergymen and others were received.

During Dr. Conrad's Park St. pastorate he has received over 2,000 members into the church. More than $600,000 has been raised and expended by the church during this 20 years. The church has prospered and Dr. Conrad's strong preaching ministry has attracted congregations which fill the church Sunday mornings and evenings.

Under Dr. Conrad's leadership the church building has been renovated twice, a new organ with echo organ and organ chimes has been installed, a new reredos and chancel has been built, the basement has been reconstructed, and many other improvements have been made.

The latest feature to be added is the much appreciated carillon chimes. An endowment fund of $40,000 has been raised.

Dr. Gordon's Lectures

During November and December Dr. George A. Gordon, minister of Old South Church, Boston, is giving a series of lectures under the general title, "Omar Khayyam and Christianity." On Nov. 6 the subject was "Omar and Fitzgerald." and on Nov. 13, "Omar's Experience in Life." The dates and subjects of the remaining lectures are: Nov. 20, "Omar's Philosophy of Life"; Dec. 4, "What Is Christianity?"; Dec. 11, "Christianity and Some of Its Distortions"; Dec. 18, "A Great Modern Christian."

Mr. English Installed at Putnam, Ct.

Impressive services marked the installation of Rev. James F. English as minister of Second Church, Putnam, Ct., on Oct. 15. He comes of a family long held in high esteem in Congregational circles in Connecticut. His father, Rev. W. F. English, Ph.D., is treasurer of the Missionary Society of Connecticut, and his brother, Rev. W. F. English, Jr., is secretary of the American Board for the Middle States District, with headquarters in Chicago. A notable feature of the service was the presence of both father and brother, the former giving the prayer of installation and the latter preaching the sermon on "The Church and the New Day."

A classmate of Mr. English's at Hartford Seminary, Rev. D. P. Hatch of Woodstock, extended the right hand of fellowship, and other parts were taken by Rev. S. T. Livingston, Rev. T. H. Jones, Rev. W. C. Prentiss, and Rev. F. B. Richards, D.D.

Mr. English is a native of East Windsor, Ct., and was educated in the public schools of that town and in Monson Academy in Monson, Mass., from which he was graduated in 191 Four years later he received the degree of B. from Trinity College. He served as First Se geant in the Army in the United States ar France during the war. In 1921 he was gra uated from Hartford Seminary and was al ordained the same year, becoming organiz and first minister of the Elmwood Communi Church, West Hartford.

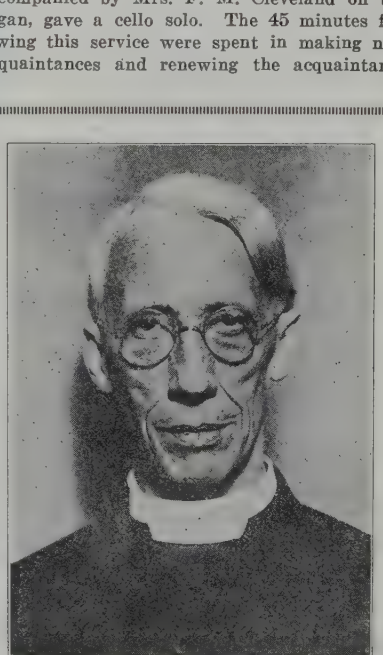
The Church and the Young People

Young People's Rally at Fargo

On Oct. 11, First Church, Fargo, N. D., was the scene of a young people's rally attended by young people from the Congregational Churches of Wahpeton, Hankinson, Dwight, Hillsboro, Amenia, and Valley City, N. D., Moorhead, Minn., and Plymouth, Fargo, N. D. They were guests of the young people of First Church, Fargo. A song service at four o'clock was followed by a general discussion of the theme: "What shall be our objectives for the year as to our young people's camp, our social life, our educational life, and our spiritual life?"

A vesper service at 4.45 was addressed by Rev. E. A. Allin of Wahpeton, who spoke on "Consecrated Character." Rev. Clarence Carr of Hankinson led in prayer and Robert Love, accompanied by Mrs. F. M. Cleveland on the organ, gave a cello solo. The 45 minutes following this service were spent in making new acquaintances and renewing the acquaintance of those met last spring in the young people camp.

After a supper served by the women of th church, representatives from the differen groups took part in a round-table discussio led by Paul Dickey, on the subject, "Wh Gives Jesus the Right to Spiritual Leadership The following were the sub-topics: Jesus t Great Heart; Jesus the Loyal Leader; Jes the Sincere; Jesus the Fearless; Jesus the Ma of Self-Control; Jesus the Complete Counselo



DR. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN

During the week of Oct. 26, Dr. Morgan delivered a series of lectures in Boston, both at Tremont Temple (Baptist) and Park Street Church. He is an English Bible authority and lecturer on the Bible, who claims that the younger generation of today have the nervous force and energy to revolutionize the world, but much of it is being expended in the pursuit of pleasures. In his addresses in Boston he interpreted the Bible from various angles Conference at Beverly, Mass.

Dane St. Church, Beverly, Mass., is awak to the fact that its young people are thinkin on subjects more important than the featu picture at the local theater, or the latest ja step. On Oct. 3-4 a Young People's Confe ence was held at that church, in which n only Dane Street young people participate but Congregational young people from nearb cities.

The various committees were at work sever weeks before the date set for the conferenc studying literature and holding interviews wit the secretaries of the numerous boards an others who were able to help in giving the de sired information. As a result of this tho ough investigation, the young people were read to present to the conference information of im portance not only to the young people, but t the older folks as well.

At the General Conference on Saturda afternoon, the theme was "Congregationalism and the subjects presented were: (1) Genera Organization; (2) Agencies; (3) The Nationa Council and Proposed Mergers. Following th General Conference were simultaneous confer ences on (1) Race Relations; (2) Peace Move ment; (3) Youth Movement; (4) Prohibition These conferences were conducted by the chair men of the various committees, who were as sisted by the following counselors: Rev. Erwi L. Shaver, Secretary of the Congregationa Education Society for New England; Rev Harry T. Stock, Secretary of the Congrega tional Student and Young People's Depart ment; Miss Anna Estelle May, Women's Sec retary of the Congregational Social Servic Department; Dr. William E. Jones, pastor o the church; and Mrs. Jones, counselor in th Dane St. church school.

Immediately following the simultaneous con ferences, a report of the findings of each con ference was brought before the General Con ference. The Committee on Prohibition wen on record as favoring law enforcement to th extent that violators of the Prohibition law should receive a jail sentence instead of th usual fine now imposed by the courts. A rec ommendation of the Committee on the Nationa ouncil and Proposed Mergers was made and opted that the conference go on record as faring a merger of some sort, even though it not exactly in accordance with the latest port of the Committee of Twelve, and that report of such action be submitted to the ational Council at its meeting in Washingn.

The banquet hour was, as usual, a merry e, and the air was filled with school songs d cheers. Directly after the banquet, Rev. seph E. Barker, student pastor at New ampshire State University, gave an inspirg talk to the young people on their place the world's program.

At eight o'clock the members of the conferce returned to the church auditorium to ten to Miss Margaret Slattery, who had only few days before arrived from a study of conions in Europe, especially as relating to the outh Movement there. Miss Slattery told the ung people that they had today, as never bere, an opportunity to show what they could ; that the world looks to them to untangle me of the great problems that others have iled to solve. She spoke particularly of the allenge to youth today to differentiate beeen that which is pure and noble and lasting, d that which is cheap and tawdry and tranory. She referred to the young people as ekers after truth, and said that when people e willing to know the truth, then, and then ly, will we have peace. She closed with an peal to the youth of today to dare to lead t to the finer and nobler things of life.

At the Sunday morning service, the sermon s preached by Mr. Shaver, one of the counlors of the previous afternoon. He took for s subject, "The Investment of Youth." At at service eight young men were commisoned to serve at the Communion service for e young people in the afternoon.

Rev. William E. Jones, pastor of the church, nducted the afternoon session, and was asted in the Communion service by Mr. Shaver d Rev. J. J. Russell of the North Beverly urch.

The conference was one of great interest and tal importance to the young people in the nsideration of some of the great questions the day, and it is hoped that a similar nference may be held another year.

X. B. K. Annual Meeting

The fifth annual convention of the young en's church fraternity known as X. B. K. as held with First Church, Methuen, this ll. The convention was welcomed by the nister, Rev. E. W. A. Jenkinson, and the eaker of the afternoon was Rev. Earl Harr of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Auburnle. It was a vital and challenging address the 125 delegates on the topic, "The story Life." Melvin Haynes of Ballardvale, a stunt at M. I. T., presided. This fraternity has d a splendid growth since it was founded out three years ago. It maintains its interdenominational character, having chapters in aptist, Congregational, Episcopal, and Methist churches, and it has grown from 36 chapers and 700 members in 1922 to 50 chapters d 1,500 members at present. It is taking re of the boys over 15 who otherwise begin drift away from the church. It uses the ang spirit" in the interest of Christian living.

Week-Day Religious Instruction

The churches of Rapid City, S. D., petitioned e school authorities for the dismission of the th, sixth, seventh, and eighth grades at three clock on Thursdays for religious education the churches. The Congregational Church co-operates in the movement. About 70 pupils from these four grades are receiving instruction at the hands of four excellent teachers in the Congregational Church.

From West to East

CALIFORNIA

Prayer and Social Service

Mount Hollywood Church, Los Angeles, is known as a "church where the people love to come to prayer meeting." Some consider it a secret of the interest in the work, where the rooms are pitiably crowded with youth in the church school. With the devotional and evangelistic note, there is combined in a rare way in the minister a passion for social service. Dr. E. P. Ryland is chairman of the Commission of Playgrounds in Los Angeles, which uses $750,000 in that important provision for the safeguarding and development of the children and young people of the great city. In going East to the National Council, he took the opportunity to visit and study playgrounds in various cities.

Messiah's Young People

Messiah, Los Angeles, has a wealth of fine young people; 340 were at the Sunday school rally and graduation service, 116 at the young people's dinner. These form two groups of 75 each for the League of Youth and are well organized and enthusiastic.

At the midweek meetings, the minister, Rev. E. D. Gaylord, conductd a series of discussions: "What Is Truly Spiritual Life?"; "The Spirit

Carry Your Influence into the Home

Hundreds of Ministers are increasing the influence of the church in their communities, keeping in closer touch with members, keeping members informed about church activities, and are relieving themselves of the worry and bother of detail work by means of the Rotospeed Stencil Duplicator.

More than a Dozen Uses

For but a little more than the cost of the paper, and with only a few minutes' work, you can send out letters, bulletins and special notices to every member of your congregation. And in your Sunday School, the Rotospeed will prove of untold value. It provides the cheapest and quickest possible method of printing maps, charts, special music, ruled forms, programs and accurate copies for any kind of work.

Inexpensively and Easily Operated

The Rotospeed is a duplicating machine that, without type or cuts, quickly and easily prints anything that can be handwritten, typewritten, drawn or ruled. It prints as many as a thousand clean-cut copies from one stencil. It prints on any kind of paper and any size form from a 3 x 5 inch card to an 8½ x 16 inch sheet. It is so simple that anybody can operate it and the cost is practically nothing.

Ten Days' Free Trial—Easy Payments

Without the slightest obligation and without investing a single cent you can test the Rotospeed for ten days at our expense. You can use it to print anything you like. Corps of Part Time Workers at Claremont Churches too numerous to mention possess an assistant pastor or a director of religious education. Claremont is trying the experiment of having such functions distributed among a corps of workers, who give part time and and are paid salary. There are 13 of these in the paid lay ministry, and include all the superintendents of departments in the church school, counselor for the League of Youth and girls' work, director of boys' work, those in the church office, and the directors in the ministry of music. Such a distribution of functions secures the hearty assistance of a large number of trained men and women. It is thought the variety of impact and the enthusiasm of corps effort will secure much more interest and more effective results than to combine all in one person with whole time.

When Sunday Comes
By John Andrew Holmes

When the minister faces his congregation he preaches as if they were all sinners, but when he buries them one by one he talks as if they had all been saints.

For its midweek meetings, the church is pursuing the studies in a syllabus, entitled Why the Church? Each opening fall meeting of the women's union is a "Presidents' Meeting." An address was given this September by Mrs. J. M. Eakin on "Some Presidents I Have Known." An Emmanuel Class meets Sunday evenings with Mrs. R. G. Denison as leader, which studies "Christian Thought."

With the ample ground space secured by the recent purchase of additional lots, the church is entering a campaign for two new buildings, one for religious education, the other an auditorium for worship. In shaping their plans, they wish to include facilities for conference service, schools and classes, young people's and other gatherings of more than sectional interest. When this matter was presented to the board of directors of the conference, it was heartily approved. Claremont would thus become a distinct and acknowledged center of Congregational effort.

Honored at Wedding Anniversary

Rev. and Mrs. Ernest Day were apprised in a new form of the warm regard in which they are held by the people of Whittier, by being surprised with a reception on the occasion of their 25th wedding anniversary. The 63 pieces of silver with 50 silver dollars were much; but the least really in the expression of love. Such affectionate words, such congratulation, such avowal of friendship—these are the gifts that puff the soul with pride, or enlarge it with renewed determination to service. The latter is the effect with the Days of course. It is their rare devotion that is so richly answered in the affection of the people of Whittier.

School of Missions in Houston

A successful Interdenominational School of Missions was held in the First Christian Church at Houston, Oct. 5-9, sponsored by the Federated Missionary Society of Houston. The committee which arranged it was composed of one member from each denomination represented in the federation.

The program was outstanding. The mission study class on "The Slave in America" was taught by Mrs. E. H. Silverthorne, of New York and Philadelphia, president of the Federation of Women's Boards of Foreign Missions for North America. Miss Esther Case, of Nashville, Tenn., taught the class on "Latin-America." Miss Case was a missionary in these countries for many years and is especially well fitted to conduct such a class.

Miss Anne Van Devanter, also of Nashville, conducted a highly instructive course in Junior Methods. Mrs. L. M. Hogsett, of Houston, held a class each day for leaders of young people's work. More than 25 members of this class pledged themselves to go out and make their lives count as leaders of young people in the highest sense.

A Bible lesson was given each day by Dr. A. Frank Smith of the First Methodist Church Houston. A strong address was also give every day by a different minister of the city The program included much inspirational musi and many other interesting features.

The inspiration of this school towards deeper interest in missions will be felt by larg numbers of people.

COLORADO

Third, Denver, Stresses Memory Work

Third Church, Denver, Rev. G. H. Burgess, minister, specializes in religious education. In addition to the graded lessons each class has definite memory work to learn. There is a systematic plan of credits for attendance, for work done, and for presence at the preaching services. At a recent rally day each class repeated the required memory work, one class of high school girls giving in concert the entire Sermon on the Mount. Certificates for the year's work were presented to the pupils, and six who had a class record of 100 per cent were given Nelson Bibles by the minister. A teacher training class helps keep up the working force of the school. Repairs and improvements costing $1,500 have been made to the church building.

Dr. Markley Thirteen Years at Longmont

Rev. Monroe Markley recently began his 13th year of fruitful ministry with the Longmont Church, the event being celebrated by the church with appropriate services. In his anniversary sermon Mr. Markley paid the following tribute to the church.

As the result of our quest for truth in the spirit of love we have here a church unhampered by rigid, man-made creeds, free from the murky atmosphere of dogmatic tradition, but a church marching forward in the exhilarating exploration of the life of the spirit, holding fast to the good in the old, accepting the good in the new, believing that the cross of Christ is not a symbol of death but a beacon of life—a church where hope visualizes, where faith actualizes, where love vitalizes—a church worthy of yesterday, ready for today, and prepared for tomorrow.

A large educational wing has been added to the church building and the interior of the auditorium has been redecorated. The church is united and enthusiastic in a larger program of religious education. Dr. Markley's pastorate is one of the outstanding as well as the longest in Colorado Congregationalism.

NEBRASKA

Corner Stone Laid at Fairmont

The corner stone for the new building of the Federated Church, Fairmont (Congregational and Presbyterian), was laid Sunday afternoon, Oct. 11. The building is of red brick with white stone trim. It will be ready for dedication in April, 1926; the total cost, including furnishings, being about $55,000.

The main auditorium will seat 250 and the balcony 100 more, and this seating capacity may be increased by opening French doors into the lecture room, which seats another 100. Departmental rooms are provided for five departments of the church school, and these will be sub-divided into rooms for the individual classes. The basement has a beautiful red brick fireplace, and connects with the main assembly room of the basement by French doors which will increase the dining room capacity to 275. These rooms, with a seating capacity of 300, have a well equipped stage with individual control for colored foot lights.

ILLINOIS

Long and Notable Service in Galesburg

Prof. W. F. Bentley, a graduate of the Oberlin Conservatory of Music, came to Knox College, Galesburg, in the fall of 1885 to take charge of the infant Conservatory there. He has been the only director the Knox Conservatory has had since then, and the trustees of the college, in expressing their appreciation of his work in that capacity last June, made special mention of the fact that in the 40 years of his administration the conservatory accounts have never shown a deficit. He has been not only a remarkable musician, teacher, and inspirer of other teachers, but an unusual administrator and business man as well.

In October, 1885, he became leader of the choir in the Old First Church, continuing in that position until the Old First and First Congregational Churches united to form Central Church, and passing without break to the leadership of the choir of the new church. Thus his service has never been interrupted. For 35 of these years he has had Prof. John Winter Thompson, head of the organ department of the conservatory, as organist, and thus the choir has enjoyed the long continued leadership of two exceptional men.

At the Communion service on Oct. 5, without previous plans or preparation, the congregation adopted by rising vote an expression of appreciation of the services of Prof. Bentley which was later printed in the church bulletin. Saturday evening, Oct. 24, the choir made him a present of a beautiful gold watch, and Sunday morning, Oct. 25, the congregation gave him two great baskets of chrysanthemums, 40 in all, and turned the morning service, at its close, into an impromptu reception when hundreds pressed forward to clasp his hand in greeting and gratitude. Scores are writing notes and letters also, to show how greatly they value the spiritual service he has rendered to them by his handling of the music in the church.

Rededication at Mounds

On Sunday, Oct. 4, First Church, Mounds, rededicated its edifice, which has been rebuilt at an expense of about $7,500. The building has been moved back from the walk 20 feet and raised up, a basement of concrete having been placed under the entire structure, and supplying coal room, toilet, kitchen, and a dining room large enough to seat 150 people. The auditorium upstairs has been newly plastered, a gallery to accommodate 100 people has been put in, three class rooms have been provided, and art glass has been placed in the entire building. On the outside the walls have been stuccoed, the tower changed to simple lines, and an entrance porch of concrete added.

Since the pastor, Rev. G. B. Waldron, took the work two years ago last Easter, 33 have been added to the church, 30 of them on confession. Most of these came from the Sunday school, so that practically the entire school above the primary department is now in the church. The school doubled its membership soon after the coming of the pastor and has now doubled again. The congregation has raised in cash and pledges enough to meet the cost of the improvements, including about $900 of the $1,500 loaned by the Building Society. Mr. Waldron was for nine years in charge of the mission work in Florida as assistant superintendent under the Extension Boards.

MICHIGAN

Richmond's Community Field Day

The church at Richmond recently made a new departure from its regular routine, by holding what was called a "Congregational Community Field Day." The committee in charge secured a grove about four miles out from town, arranged an interesting program, and sent postcard invitations to members and friends of the church. As a result a crowd of about 150 gathered in the grove, held a service together, and then had a bountiful picnic dinner. During the afternoon an impromptu program of singing and talks was carried out, and toward evening the gathering dispersed. The Columbus Congregational Church joined in the field day.

The results as regards the church have been beneficial. The work of the church is getting under headway more rapidly this fall than in previous years, and a better spirit prevails generally. Rev. G. H. Coman is pastor.

VIRGINIA

Czechoslovak Churches

Our Czechoslovak church in Prince George County has two houses of worship: one in Disputanta and the other about seven miles out in the country at Begonia. Rev. Andrew Kovac preaches at both places. The membership of the church is 159. Eighteen were received last year. There is a group of fine young people, and for their sakes an addition was built to the church at Begonia to provide for the Sunday school, and for social purposes. A tower also was added and the building was otherwise improved.

The renovated building was re-dedicated in August, in the presence of an audience that taxed the capacity of the church. Rev. John Kocerha from Pittsburgh was the principal speaker, preaching in Czechoslovak and English. At a later service during the week of rededication, a church picnic was held, at which Mr. Kocerha gave an account of his recent visit to Czechoslovakia and was surprised and pleased to find that he had visited and talked with relatives and friends of some of these Czechoslovak citizens of "Old Virginia." For several years the crops have been poor in this region, but the people are now rejoicing in a brighter future in their farm life and also in their church life.

NEW YORK

Accepts Call to First, Pulaski

At a meeting of the members of First Church, Pulaski, Oct. 29, a unanimous vote was cast to extend a call to Rev. L. H. Palmer, of Auburn, to become pastor of that church, which has been without a regular pastor since last January. Mr. Palmer has accepted the call and will begin his pastorate Dec. 13. He is a graduate of Colgate University, class of 1917; served a pastorate of three years in a church in the western part of the state, and has, for four years, been assistant pastor and director of religious instruction in the Second Presbyterian Church, Auburn.

Anniversary at Lebanon

Looking backward to the days of the Revolution, Lebanon holds a place of prominence. This was the home of the Trumbulls, and the war office still stands where 1,200 councils of war were held and Washington, Franklin, and Lafayette were frequent visitors.

On Sunday, Oct. 18, the Congregational Church celebrated the 225th anniversary, and the pastor, Rev. F. S. Sellick, welcomed an audience that occupied the room to the fullest capacity. The anniversary address in the morning was given by Dr. B. W. Bacon of Yale Divinity School, whose ancestors lived in Lebanon a century ago. In the afternoon greetings were brought from former pastors, and from the New London Association by Rev. C. H. Rick

n Sunday, Oct. 11, the members and friends he Whitneyville Church assembled to ded- their new parish house. The dedicatory ce, at 10.30, was in charge of the pastor, P. E. Mathias. After a short address on the Glory of God Through Service to Men," he led the people in a beautiful and impressive service of dedication. At a fellowship service in the evening the ministers and members of a number of neighboring Congregational churches attended, four of the visiting ministers making short addresses. The concluding feature of the dedication exercises was a social for the members and friends of the church on Oct. 14.

Whitneyville is a suburb of New Haven, and has had an amazing growth in population in recent years. This made necessary the erection of the parish house, which is splendidly adapted to be of wide and varied service to the people of the church and community.

The building is 87 feet, eight inches, by 49 feet, eight inches, and includes a basement, a main floor, and a wide gallery floor surrounding

By taking advantage of a sharp slope in the land the basement has been made a ground floor fronting Lake Whitney. It contains the heating plant, a fine kitchen, a large dining room, and space for bowling alleys.

On the main floor is a large auditorium which also serves as a department room for the intermediate, senior, and adult grades of the Sunday school. This floor also contains a splendid stage flanked with dressing rooms which make good Sunday school class rooms. At the end of the floor opposite the stage are two department rooms for the kindergarten and primary grades of the Sunday school.

The gallery floor contains the department room for the junior grades of the Sunday school and this room is flanked on the one side by the Sunday school library room and on the other by the ladies' parlor. On this floor there are also Sunday school class rooms and space for class work.

The building occupies a commanding site on the bank of Lake Whitney, opposite the Ne Haven Country Club. The site offers wonde ful scenic possibilities, and it is hoped that wi the aid of a landscape artist it may be ma a beauty spot in the community.

The approximate cost of the building, exc sive of the land, was $42,000.

Peloubet's Uniform Graded Quarterlies

THE tremendous growth of the Sunday Schools of the world for the past fifty years can be in a large measure attributed to the Uniform Lessons.

A Few of the Advantages

They teach the Bible
A common subject
Home and family study and discussion
Make teachers' meetings possible
Fresh texts each year

The Peloubet Series of Sunday School Quarterlies are used the world around, because they place before the scholar the salient points of the Scripture texts in such a manner that they are quickly comprehended and easily remembered.

We also publish a Series of Teachers' Quarterlies which contain helpful material for the teacher to use in preparing the lesson and which have become very popular during the past years.

We should be glad to send free samples and catalogs giving full detail to all intending purchasers

FULLER, REV. AND MRS. F. A., West Stafford, Ct., were recently given a reception by members of the church and were presented with a purse of $50 in gold, the gift of parishioners and townspeople. During the past four years Mr. Fuller has been pastor at West Stafford, but left Oct. 1 to take up residence in Putnam, where he recently purchased a home.

MASON, WALTER L., headmaster of the Wilton, N. H., High School, was licensed as a lay preacher at a special meeting of the Hillsboro Association at Wilton, Sept. 17. Mr. Mason is not looking forward to ordination. After the candidate's statement of experience, he was asked many questions, and the association voted unanimously to license him.

NORTON, DR. STEPHEN A., who three years ago completed a pastoral service of 20 years at First Church, Woburn, Mass., is at present supplying the pulpit of that church, now without a pastor. The church has made him pastor emeritus. Dr. Norton has been for three years with the Manhattan Beach Church in California and plans returning to that state in the early winter to make a home at Claremont, where his brother, Dean E. C. Norton, has been from the beginning of its history connected with Pomona College.

STANNARD, REV. E. L., recently retired from the pastorate at Dalton, N. H., and has remained in the community as a citizen of the town. He has been already honored by being appointed town clerk. He has built a home there and secured employment in a neighboring industrial plant. Since Dalton has not yet secured a successor, Mr. and Mrs. Stannard have continued their interest in the Sunday school, and that department of the church activity is kept up, with several additions to the cradle roll.

TUCK, REV. E. A., of Federated Church, Sturbridge, Mass., is taking a motor trip to Florida on a six months' leave of absence on account of Mrs. Tuck's health.

ALONG OUR STREAM OF FREEDOM (Ps 126)

Its True Head

It is said Lake Itasca, the source of the Mississippi, received its name by the combination of the last and first syllables respectively of the two Latin words, Veritas and Caput, meaning True Head.

Having followed this stream in its meanderings in various parts of the land and at various depths, it is good now to come back again to its true head. For old New England is the true head of that stream of freedom that has blest my race in every part of the Republic.

THE MOTHER OF ALL

It should not be forgotten that this section which has been a real mother to the country owes in turn its greatness to the church. The idea of the primacy of God and the equality of man nurtured by the church made New England unique and germinal. The little white meeting house was the mother of the Republic and the town meeting the model of our political system. Back of this lies the observance of the Sabbath, now, alas, all too slack, and underneath it the impregnable rock of Holy Scripture. It was, therefore, a great privilege and a source of inspiration to preach in the Belleville Congregational Church of Newburyport, Mass., founded over one hundred and twenty years ago. Standing in such a place one has a real conception of the stability of the Christian Church. Realizing what streams of good have flowed from such a church, it is forceful and appropriate to declare that the church is the mother of all that is good, and therefore deserves the best of our time, talent, and treasure for her service. And it should be illuminating and suggestive that this centenarian church holds services through the summer, morning, noon, and night, and the attendance is good.

THROUGH WHITTIER'S COUNTRY TO GARRISON'S HOME

Motoring from Haverhill to Newburyport one is traveling through an enchanted land where Whittier sung his immortal bards of liberty to the spot where Garrison was born, who dared to be as harsh as truth. New England will be remembered as the mother of two wars,—the Revolutionary and the Civil. The deeds of both these were nurtured in Newburyport. This was the first town of the Province to agree to refuse to buy British goods. This was the beginning of the movement that came to a climax in the Tea Party in Boston Harbor. Then, too, William Lloyd Garrison, born here, was the first to devote his life to the work of agitation in behalf of the freedom of the slave. It was because he would not retract or equivocate but would be heard that the country eventually burst into fratricidal flame. His native town that once refused to hear him has erected a monument to him as its chief citizen. Thus the man who was threatened, mobbed, beaten, imprisoned for his work's sake eventually won, dying at a ripe old age, full of honors both at home and abroad, the Father of Abolition.

IT SHOULD BE DONE

In the South, where the vast majority of the whites are Baptists and Methodists, Negroes are prevailingly so, and have great churches of those faiths and orders. By the same token, in Boston, where Congregationalists are in ascendency in the dominant group, we should have a strong Congregational church among the colored people. Of course, I know there are many considerations involved, and yet after all has been said, it is still true that there ought to be such a church here. There are ideals our people need that are peculiar to the Congregational people. Such a church would unify the colored people of Boston and make them a power for their race and a blessing to the community far beyond their present possibilities. By consolidating churches on the border of the thickly populated colored community adequate facilities could be provided that would be the home for such a church, and not one worshiper would thereby be deprived. Progress waits on co-operation. Who denies that it should be done? The quicker the better!

HENRY HUGH PROCTOR.

"Spanish Moss" for Christmas from Tougaloo College

Colored students of Tougaloo College, Tougaloo, Miss., will gladly send to anyone who asks for it, as a Christmas decoration, a package of the gray moss, often called "Spanish moss," that drapes the trees of their campus. Unique as such a decoration, it is most effective not when used by itself in heavy masses, but when hung in light festoons against backgrounds of dark Christmas greens. And so used, a pound will serve for a parlor with its Christmas tree; two or three pounds for a Sunday school room, church parlor, or small church; five or six pounds for a larger church.

Address: MOSS DISTRIBUTORS, TOUGALOO COLLEGE, TOUGALOO, MISSISSIPPI, and without fail give your own address in full.

While this will be sent without charge, as a Christmas greeting from Tougaloo College students, those who enjoy the moss are asked to make it known publicly, by church calendar if possible, whence this unique decoration has come. And it will be appreciated if they add at least most of the following facts:

Tougaloo College, founded in 1869, is the American Missionary Association school of Mississippi for the advanced education of colored youth. Attendance, about 450. An interracial faculty of 34. The college of about 40 students, though still small, is rapidly growing. The high school stands at about 160. The elementary grades are needed as a practice school for the teacher training students. And through its great specialty as a trainer of teachers, Tougaloo College renders its state its greatest service, because Mississippi (1) is rapidly establishing colored high schools and improved rural schools for which it must have more and ever more well-prepared teachers, but on the other hand (2) has no publicly-supported standard colored normal school. Tougaloo College is specially well qualified to supply this lack, in a state having a colored population of more than 900,000. And to increase its equipment it has been offered by the General Education Board $25,000 toward a new school building, on condition of its first raising $25,000, of which about $22,000 has now been raised in cash. Thus is this American Missionary Association school endorsed by educational experts as having educational leadership.

The American Fleet in New Zealand

The Congregational Churches of Auckland, New Zealand, made the visit of the American Fleet an occasion for a great denominational rally on Aug. 16. Realizing that neither of the city churches—Beresford Street and Mount Eden—would be large enough to accommodate the congregation expected on such an occasion combined services were held in the Auckland Town Hall. A massed choir of 250 voices rendered special music. Some 2,000 people gathered for the morning service, while in the evening the attendance numbered 3,000. The preachers for the day were Rev. L. B. Fletcher, recently of Cardiff, Wales, and the Rev. Stanley Morrison, late of Boston, and a special writer to the Boston Evening Transcript. A large number of officers and sailors from the American Fleet attended. Altogether there were eight battleships in the Auckland Harbor, including the "California," "West Virginia," "Tennessee," "Maryland," "Colorado," "Idaho," "New Mexico," "Mississippi," with 12,000 men aboard. After the morning service a large number of sailors were taken off to the homes of their hostesses for the day. The men were

From ninety and nine in the fold.

Out on the hillside, out in the cold,
'Twas a sheep the Good Shepherd sought;
And back to the flock, safe into the fold,
'Twas a sheep the Good Shepherd brought.

And why for the sheep should we earnestly long,
And as earnestly hope and pray?
Because there is danger. If they go wrong,

A WISE DECISION

'God gave me this good body
To grow both strong and tall;
TOBACCO helps to weaken it,
And so does alcohol;
Into my mouth they shall never go,
And here's my name to prove that's so.'

The Girl Guides of a certain church in Yorkshire always put flowers in front of the pulpit each Sunday.

One was asked by an elderly person what they did with the flowers after the service.

"O, we take them to people who are sick after the sermon," was the innocent reply.

In the calendar of one of our Congregational churches the following notices recently appeared:

"Miss S. would be glad to receive men's clothing. The demand is great and her supply is entirely exhausted."

"Frank Shepard Tolman, Ph.D., Psycho-Analyst and Vocational Adviser of New York City, will not speak again until Friday, April 6th."

There was a long line at the ticket window when a woman breathlessly pushed her way to the front.

"I want to go to Cincinnati," she began, "in about three weeks."

"Morning or night?" the agent asked, reaching for a time table.

She told him at night. After she had asked every conceivable question she said:

"Tell me, do you think there'll be a moon that night?"

The agent admitted he wasn't sure.

"Because," she finished sweetly, "if there is a moon I'm going to take the boat."—Boston Globe.

A new aid to good preaching has been discovered.

During the past summer a suburban church asked a church bureau to send a supply for a certain Sunday. The following Monday the clerk of session called to tell how much the congregation enjoyed the preacher of the day.

"That was a fine man you sent," said he; "the people all sat up and took notice. His gestures were great; he swung his arms and certainly sent it home. Can't you get him again for next Sunday?"

The minister was called on the phone and told that the congregation were so well pleased with him that they would like to have him return the following Sunday.

"Well, I'd like to," said he, "but I think I'll have to refuse. I liked the people and enjoyed the service, but there was one thing that did not appeal to me: There were too many mosquitoes."—Continent.

Mr. Reader—"This is wonderful! A poor young man stopped a strange young woman whose shoe string was loose and tied it for her. That act led to their marriage, and she was worth $2,000,000."

Mrs. Reader—"What's wonderful about that?"

Mr. Reader—"Why, it simply shows what one can do by starting on a shoe string."—Detroit Free Press.

A woman went to the bank and asked for a new check book. "I've lost the one you gave me yesterday," she said. "But it doesn't matter. I took the precaution of signing all the checks as soon as I got it—so, of course, it won't be any use to anyone else."—Efficiency Magazine.

Thanksgiving: The Measure of Living

THANKSGIVING, if it have any vital meaning and place in our lives, is something more than an incident in the year's calendar, or a mood of ecstasy and expansiveness when all is going well. It becomes ultimately the truest and deepest expression of life, and the test of the worth of life itself. If we have nothing to be thankful for, life itself is not worth while; so that the value of life for us becomes measured in a very real way by the extent to which we attain the vision, and express the spirit of thanksgiving. Much conventional thanksgiving is formal, thoughtless, and selfish. It may even be a spontaneous outburst of gratitude for prosperity and good fortune, without having any social quality and without being the expression of a philosophy of life and a religious experience. It is only when there is such a deeper note of human solidarity, and a sense of the unity of life in the presence of God that relates us to all his universe, that thanksgiving becomes real. When A in his thankfulness for good things begins to ask himself whether he could be thankful if, like B, he were facing experiences of poverty, sorrow, failure, and disappointment, his thanksgiving is immediately put to the test. If it be genuine it is immediately deepened by new relationships of A to his own soul, to his neighbor B, and to his God. When personal thanksgiving is dominated by social vision and the love of God it is in the way of creating for all men a consciousness of life and its value, that instinctively quickens the spirit of worship. Thus the secret of thanksgiving is the secret of living itself. Where there is no sanctuary of thanksgiving there is no sense of the sacredness of life, and no reaching forth of the soul in that giving and getting which under God's power and blessing constitute the true commerce of the spiritual world.

John Freeman's New Story

(Beginning in December)

"Kennedy's Second Best"

THE readers of THE CONGREGATIONALIST have a great treat before them in the thrilling and purposeful serial story which will begin in our December issues. Its title is Kennedy's Second Best. Kennedy is an upstanding virile preacher on the way from success to still greater honors, when the crisis of his life comes in the far west of Canada. The story presents frontier life on the broad ranches near Calgary, with a swift-moving succession of dramatic incidents. A gripping romance runs through this narrative. Heroism, love, ambition, conscience,—rise in the struggle of human forces which run their strong current through this remarkable story. The frontier life is vividly shown and some of the scenes carry the reader to Vancouver, to Toronto, and to old Quebec. We are fortunate to be able to give our readers in Kennedy's Second Best what we have long sought,—a worthwhile serial story of sustained interest from beginning to end, having appeal for all ages, true to life and with real religion, as real men and women live it, running like a thread of gold through it all.

The author is a writer and preacher of distinction. John Freeman is a native of Nova Scotia. He was born in Milton, Queens County, near Liverpool. He was graduated from McMaster University, and his degrees include that of Doctor of Divinity. A succession of successful pastorates in New Brunswick and Ontario, included that of Bloor St. Baptist Church, Toronto. During the last 17 years Dr. Freeman has conducted a notable ministry in England, serving the historic Belvoir St. Baptist Church, Leicester, for 15 years; and during the war rendered important service in camps and hospitals. He is much in demand as a preacher and orator. He has come recently to the United States, where he expects to remain, preaching and writing.

Dr. Freeman's religious books include Life on the Uplands, Concerning Christ, and The Edge of the Age. His novels include Fan of Belsey's and This My Son, both New Brunswick stories, Punch and Holy Water (Polish), and God's Infidel (English).

Dr. Freeman knows personally the regions and the types of people that appear in his stories.

The Editorial Outlook

"Red-Blooded"

IN deploring the absence of intellectual development among present-day college students in an address to the convention of American universities at New Haven, President Lowell of Harvard apparently did not leave his meaning in doubt or insufficiently applied. The address was given behind closed doors, but was released to the press a few days after delivery. Remarking that students and graduates of this generation "are far more proud of their achievements on the athletic field and on the campus than in the classroom," and that "their studies are regarded as a chore that must be done as quickly and as easily as possible," President Lowell laid the blame for this as much against the alumni as against the undergraduate. He said:

When I have one of Harvard's robust graduates come up to me and loudly say, "I am a red-blooded man, I want to know why the football team doesn't win," I cannot help recalling what the psychologists say—that the human blood is most red when it has not been through the brain.

President Lowell's diagnosis of the trouble and his suggestions regarding its solution are striking:

If it is true [said President Lowell] that in four years men in college will not acquire any desire to live an intellectual life, how can we expect to produce the men we need to carry on the work of the last generation in business, politics, and the other walks of life? We can only give the world leaders of proper learning by arousing in our youth a love and desire for the things they have no use for now.

What can we do to arouse this interest? I would say that this is the crux of our educational problem. Certainly the answer to this does not lie in abolishing outside interests, such as athletics, publication competitions, and other activities. Such a course would simply throw the men off into other forms of pleasure that would be harmful and destructive and take them all further from intellectual and all round development.

What youth wants above all else is to sacrifice itself for something that is worth while. Students are willing to train vigorously and deny themselves all sorts of pleasure in order to make the football team; they give up a lot of their time to the acquirement of other ends which they feel are worth the effort, and during the war they left everything immediately to get overseas and participate in the struggle.

The Sacrificial Spirit

THE hope that President Lowell expresses of developing a new passion for scholarship through quickening and directing the sacrificial spirit of youth is one that ought to inspire and actuate the church in all its influences and appeals. Until we produce the sort of youth in loyalty and devotion to Christ that the war produced in loyalty and devotion to the state, or to the cause of democracy, we have failed alike in our deepest appeal and in our highest hope of attainment. It may be worth while to remember that in the attainment of this result educationally, President Lowell specifically stressed the importance of personal contacts, particularly of such contacts and personal influences as might enlarge the vision and give a student an interest outside the one particular phase of his subject with which he might be narrowly concerned. Beyond this he attached much importance to the curriculum and to the personal ideal of scholarship. Recent emphasis in the church has been strongly upon ideal and curriculum; it might be inquired whether we have sufficiently stressed and manifested the power of personal contacts.

A Tribute to Dr. G. W. Nash

DR. HENRY STILES BRADLEY, of Portland, Me., sends to The Congregationalist the following communication. In view of its semi-official character as a tribute on the part of his co-workers to one who has borne a conspicuous denominational responsibility, it seems fitting that it should appear in these columns rather than in those devoted to general correspondence. Dr. Bradley writes:

During the session of the National Council in Washington the trustees of the Congregational Foundation for Education held their last meeting. Before we adjourned I made a few remarks about our president, Dr. G. W. Nash, who was not present. Every man in the room said that he agreed with me heartily, and a motion was passed unanimously that I should be requested to repeat what I had said in The Congregationalist in order that Congregationalists throughout the country may know the esteem in which he is held by those who have been closest to him in the work of the Foundation.

This is the sentiment, and these, as far as I can recall, are the words:

"I have never known an officer in any society in the church to discharge the duties of his office with a more tireless energy, a more whole-hearted devotion, a saner judgment, a sweeter temper, a more courteous consideratness, a more genuine modesty, a more beautiful spirit of Christlikeness than Doctor Nash. Everybody knows that he was set to a difficult task. Few besides the trustees know how hard it was. I do not believe that there is one among us who could have succeeded more largely than he."

We all sincerely hope that, in the merging of our societies, the object which called the Foundation into existence will not be lost sight of.

Though our friends of the Federal Council Research Department assure us that it is unnecessary, for our own peace of mind we must say publicly what we have said to them privately, viz., that we have discovered that an earlier copy of the Bulletin on Prohibition, than that upon which our comment was based, did actually come to The Congregationalist office. In our first reference to the matter, not in complaint, but in explanation of the delay in making such reference, we mentioned that the Bulletin had not reached us until sometime after it had been exploited in the daily press. We have since recovered this earlier copy, which disappeared in the forwarding of mail during the vacation period. We make due apologies to the Federal Council of Churches, with which we have always enjoyed the fullest and heartiest co-operation.

The President's Proclamation

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE'S Thanksgiving proclamation goes straight to the mark. In simple, reverent phrases he expresses the outstanding reasons why Americans should be thanksgiving at this time, and he emphasizes the significant thought, that, "as we have grown and prospered in material things, so also should we progress in moral and spiritual things." He sets before the people the duty of opposition to evil, righteous living, help for the less fortunate, and gratitude to God. Every child of school age can understand the proclamation, and we trust that all Americans of all ages will seek to follow the President's lead on Thanksgiving Day. The body of the proclamation follows:

The season approaches when, in accordance with a long-established and respected custom, a day is set apart to give thanks to Almighty God for the manifold blessings which his gracious and benevolent providence has bestowed upon us as a nation and as individuals.

We have been brought with safety and honor through another year, and, through the generosity of nature, he has blessed us with resources whose potentiality in wealth is almost incalculable; we are at peace at home and abroad; the public health is good; we have been undisturbed by pestilence or great catastrophe; our harvests and our industries have been rich in productivity; our commerce spreads over the whole world, and labor has been well rewarded for its remunerative service.

As we have grown and prospered in material things, so also should we progress in moral and spiritual things. We are a God-fearing people, who should set ourselves against evil and strive for righteousness in living, and, observing the Golden Rule, we should from our abundance help and serve those less fortunately placed. We should bow in gratitude to God for his many favors.

Now, therefore, I, Calvin Coolidge, President of the United States, do hereby set apart Thursday, the twenty-sixth day of November next, as a day of general thanksgiving and prayer, and I recommend that on that day the people shall cease from their work and in their homes or in their accustomed places of worship, devoutly give thanks to the Almighty for the many and great blessings they have received, and to seek his guidance, that they may deserve a continuance of his favor.

A Reformer's Confessions

ONE of the most quotable books that we have read for a long time is The Confessions of a Reformer, by Frederic C. Howe. It fairly teems with passages so interesting in their candor and self-revelation, so searchingly analytical in their examination of actions and motives, and so incisive in much of their criticism of political and social affairs of the past generation, that one cannot read the book without a strong impulse to pass its comment on to others.

Mr. Howe's twenty-five years in public life, in the City Council of Cleveland, in the State Senate of Ohio, as Commissioner of Immigration at Ellis Island, and with President Wilson at Paris, gave him close-up views of many matters, and at some time or other brought him rather intimately across the trail of such men as Tom Johnson, Brand Whitlock, Mark Hanna, and Senator Quay. We confine our references to three typical passages, in which the criticism and comment seem to go to the very roots of social and political matters.

The first is a keen criticism of the method and spirit of much so-called "welfare work." Mr. Howe tells how while living at a "settlement," he was invited to become a trustee of the Charity Organization Society, "an institution of which," he remarks, "its members were infinitely proud." His account of this society and its work is interesting. He says:

It was putting charity on a new basis. It had scoured the country for an efficient secretary and was organized like a business corporation. Through it questionable private charities were being frozen out. Without credentials they found it difficult to collect funds; periodical accountings were demanded from them. The society was stamping out indiscriminate giving. Personal charity was out of date. Pleas for help were subjected to an acid test before relief was given; there must be no drinking, there must be evidence of willingness to work. People were "cases." They were card-indexed. The applicant had to prove himself worthy before he could receive any aid, and the decision as to worthiness was left with a corps of young girls trained in the profession, then just emerging, of social work. Prominent business men who sat on the board of trustees admired the efficiency of the society. Our monthly reports were terse, matter of fact. There were no sob stories. Our new secretary was a great success. He could mix with business men; he could dine at the Union Club with credit, and hold his own in argument as to the proper way to handle impostors, weak women who fell, and men who were out of work. He never permitted sentiment to confuse his judgments and showed an outstanding courage in opposing the president of the board, our most generous patron, who had a tendency to be tolerant of human derelictions.

There is, of course, another side to all of this, but the letter from "a certain Doctor Tuckerman, an active member in one of the prominent evangelical churches," which led Mr. Howe to see that vital, human sympathy must underlie all real and effectual charity, and which Mr. Howe prints in full, is a vigorous piece of social criticism.

The second extract has bearing on the question of law enforcement. While we are being told from so many quarters that it is prohibition that is responsible for the lack of respect for law, and for the lack of law enforcement, consider this statement concerning Mark Hanna and Tom Johnson by one who knew concerning both men about all that there was to know. Mr. Howe says:

Both men were lawless. They respected neither the law nor the courts. They knew how laws were made. They had used political power in the city council and in the state legislatures to tighten their grip on the community. They had made judges, and they knew that the judges they made would come to them again for support. They were lawless by temperament; they felt themselves above the law.

Who can doubt the truth of these words? Their significance is too plain to need application.

The third extract cuts even deeper into the criticism of government in a democracy that has left too much to party bosses and officialdom. It refers to the time when, thoroughly disheartened and disillusioned, Mr. Howe had resigned his post as Immigration Commissioner at Ellis Island. He had found himself double-crossed at Washington in his efforts to prevent the most heart-rending injustices and cruelties in connection with deportations from Ellis Island. Possibly the situation at that time was extreme. The hysteria that saw in every gentle idealist who dreamed that the world could be, and ought to be, made better, a dangerous "red," or a potential enemy of the state, had found its impersonation in an Attorney-General whose ruthlessness and inhumanity were equaled only by his fanatical contempt for justice. Some of the things that Howe records are appalling. He resigned, and it is in connection with his resignation, and his leaving Ellis Island for good, that he records these words, too honest to be merely cynical, too full of tragedy for every man who knows how far removed is the goal, how inexorable the struggle for good government:

When I stepped from the ferryboat in New York I felt that I was through with politics. I had seen the government at close range, with its mask off; it existed for itself and for hidden men behind it, as the realists in Paris had said. It was as dangerous to the innocent as to the guilty. It was frankly doing the bidding of business. At home as in Paris men said: "The ideals of President Wilson had been necessary to win the war, but now that the war is won let us get back to business." That meant using the Department of Justice frankly as an agency to protect profiteers, high officials, and business men who looked upon the government as their own, it meant crushing liberalism by deportations, arrests, a terrorism of fear. This was the democracy that the boys were to come back to from the trenches. There was no place for the liberal in it.

There are many equally interesting and moving things in this illuminating autobiography. Mr. Howe does not pose either as saint or martyr. He is very human, and he disarms criticism by the candor with which he acknowledges his errors and shortcomings. Both in his activities, however, and in his account of them, he has made a most human contribution to America.

The Unannounced Christ

"FEW churches would permit him to occupy the pulpit," says Rollo Walter Brown, with reference to the possible coming of Jesus unheralded into the area of the modern church, in his chapter concerning the church in his book, The Creative Spirit. "The church," says Mr. Brown, "has drawn so far away from its origin, it has been so zealous in fortifying its own traditions, in providing itself with the trappings of temporal warfare, that it would not be a welcome place for Jesus were he to arrive unannounced."

These words convey a challenge which might be described as "old stuff," but it is a challenge which is still pointed and vigorous. What is not old and commonplace in Mr. Brown's criticism of the church is the underlying sympathy with which he approaches the church's shortcomings, and the sureness with which he perceives that the church is by no means the only institution with high professions and purposes that Jesus would find wanting. He turns to consider how the re-appearing Jesus would fare among the colleges:

Does any one know of an accredited college where this preacher of doctrines designed to convert the world into a kingdom of heaven could, without academic degrees, professional "standing," and other similar sanctions, secure a position as a teacher of morals? In some colleges he would be permitted to address such as might assemble on the campus to hear him; in many, he would not. College officials would look askance at this man who "drifted in" from nowhere in particular and who came without proofs of his right to instruct the young. If he were not arbitrarily ruled out for being a disturbing element—which he always was to the static—it is not unlikely that the trustees of the college would find "with deep regret" that the conditions of the gift of the college chapel made it impossible for him to use it as a forum in which to discuss topics of the day.

Mr. Brown thinks, however, that the students might hear him gladly. We should like to be as sure as he seems to be that the student body would give the uncredentialed Jesus a welcome hearing. If Mr. Brown is right, will the student body of today transform the church and college of tomorrow? Or will they themselves succumb to the conservatisms of new environment, and the less crusading tempers of middle age?

Sitting on the Platform

A Contributed Editorial by G. Glenn Atkins, D.D.

A SIMPLE-MINDED church without bishops or others in authority is somewhat handicapped in the pageantry of ecclesiasticism. It cannot hope always to have the President of the United States for Honorary Moderator, or borrow a touch of color from his staff. Of course there are always the Moderator, the retiring Moderator, and former Moderators, but these gentlemen, though they lend gravity to any occasion, are, in point of vested splendor, inadequate. We Congregationalists simply do not know how to make a show. The silver screens of the nation are not showing moving pictures of the opening of the National Council.

Our highest denominational honor is sitting on the platform, a modest distinction yet not without its significance. There is an accepted formula for the summons. "The secretaries, directors, and workers of the Board for the Extension of Illumination among the Unenlightened will please come to the platform." Whereupon there is a stir in the audience and the platform chairs are filled with men—and some women—who endure the scrutiny of their fellows with more or less unconscious seriousness and sit out their little hour.

Only the searcher of hearts knows what they are thinking about but they would be more than human—or less—if they did not reflect a little on the just way in which solid merit is always recognized and useful men come to their own. Also if they have been much together in the direction of the particular form of illumination in which they are engaged they will quite inevitably have acquired a strong loyalty to their peculiar corporation and see it written in capital letters as the story of its accomplishments is told. It's really a heart-warming experience—sitting on the platform.

Meanwhile the spectators are taking a different line. Only the searcher of hearts knows what they are thinking, but they would be more—or less—human if they did not note that the elect on the platform are men of like passions with themselves, and reflect a little on the way in which solid merit often gets overlooked. Things look different sitting on the floor.

First and last, a good many consequential issues grow out of these tangential lines of vision; the people who sit on platforms must be always looking down on their fellow-men, which is a minor matter when the vision is purely physical but a searching matter when the line of vision becomes spiritual. For then a man may easily rate himself too high and his neighbor too low. He may get his own importance in wrong perspective or even the importance of the cause he represents. He may easily fall into the habit of taking his high place for granted and honestly believe he is contending for some vital cause when he is only trying to save his platform seat.

Or else the man who looks up may let some darkening of envy get his sense of proportion out of drawing and honestly believe he is carrying through some vital amendment in the affairs of the world when he is only trying to get the man on the platform out of his seat. It is very likely that the Athenian who voted against Aristides because he was tired of having him called The Just, mistook his own motives. He was simply trying to get Aristides off the platform.

First and last a good many revolutions have been started by the natural instinct of the man on the floor to get the man on the platform out of his chair, whether it be regal, pontifical, or a gilded chair in Peacock Alley. That order is most secure, on the whole, where the platform is not too high nor too conspicuously occupied, nor held too long by the same sitters, and the grace of knowing when to come down is one of the saving graces of life. But there is a place for the platform, for all that, and need of those who fill it with authority and service-bought distinction.

Unless the leveler has his stupid way with us there will always be the chosen on the platform. All the mutations of history have heretofore done little more than change the seating in the human setting, pulling down the mighty from their seats and exalting them of low degree; which is a disturbing but wholesome, though sometimes costly, process. A static society in which the same people are always sitting on the platform is not good for the souls of men, but a world—or a church—in which some are not wise enough or useful enough to sit on the platform as the outer sign of an inner distinction would be a poor sort. We gain nothing by pulling down a cause or a man unless we put something better in their places.

But if so natural an order is to be secure there should be a mutual interchange of vision. The people who sit on platforms should be always trying to see themselves through the eyes of those who see them, and consider only their representative capacity and, very greatly, their natural fallibility and the transient estate of any elevation save those high levels of mind and soul which need no platform at all to give them honor.

The people who sit on the floor may consider how the people on the platform, whether they be the President of the United States or the Secretary of the B. I. E., are there as their representatives, having no dignity or authority which is not shared by those who put them there, and that for the most part they do their work well and at some price of labor and wearing responsibility, contributing thereby to the common good. Also that their high estate is at the best uncertain.

And if those who face one another should together look higher toward such things of enduring worth as mutual consideration and common devotion to the common good they would see how the little space between the floor and the platform is not high enough to nourish either undue pride or prejudicial criticism, since in the sight of God they are all on the same level.

From Our Western Editor

A good time was had by all." This ase describes the feeling of most of our ple who attended the National Council Washington. The Council has never met any city, not even Los Angeles, which so attractive to so large a number of ple as was Washington. For many of number it has a glamour of romance, to say of sacredness, above that of any r city in the country. The fact that Council was held in the Capital city ably accounted for the presence of so e a number of visitors at the sessions. re had been meeting in Los Angeles and been given such weather as Washington ished us, I suppose we would have heard ood many times that the weather was sual. Washington folks, however, ad- ed the weather just like Chicago people The Council delegates had a good time pite of the weather.

n reporting the Council our people have hasized, first of all, its fine fellowship. fact that we are tinkering the machin- and that there was a wide difference of ion as to how the tinkering should be e, did not mar the fellowship of the tings. A minister who had never at- ed a Council before reported that here- r he would go and if necessary pay his expenses, because he could not afford miss the inspiration that came from the owship of the meeting.

nother feature of the meeting, stressed those who reported the Council to the st, was the method used of arriving at mentous decisions. In some denomina- al bodies so great a difference of opinion cerning organization would have led to at bitterness and to angry words. With haps one exception, no word was spoken the sessions of the Council that was at harsh, or that reflected upon any one. . James A. Richards of Winnetka, Ill., s the matter well:

n the matter of merging the societies the ncil did not think for the churches, but istered thinking our people had already e. The question was settled before the ncil, not at it, except in details; debate no influence. Notable also was the l spirit with which the minority went to meet the merger decision after the t test vote had brought it in sight.

nother fact of great significance in the ing of decisions was the vote taken n the merger of the magazines. In some gious bodies the merger would have n voted in spite of the opposition. We not do it that way. In the estimation our people these methods of arriving at rganization are indicative of a Chris- n spirit that is worth cultivating.

The West is in general progressive and our people expected the Council to make ward-looking pronouncements upon the ies of world, racial, and industrial re- onships, and the Council fulfilled the ectations. I judge that many of our s would have been sorry to have had the program of social ideals passed in its original form. As it was finally adopted it commended itself to the majority as being a fair statement. It has been especially commended because it takes into account the thinking of both parties that exist in our midst. Reports indicate that our pastors will give large attention in their work, during the next two years, to the items of this program.

Our people returned from the Council with a new appreciation of the work carried on by the denomination. The addresses upon the floor made our work vivid and the displays in the basement and the service of the secretaries in giving information were the most effective we have ever had. Rev. Naboth Osborne of Burlington, Iowa, puts his impressions in this paragraph:

I come away from every meeting of the National Council with a deepening consciousness of the vastness and complexity of the work in which the church is engaged. The present Council only deepens this conviction. Our world has had many would-be conquerors. The imagination of Alexander, of Caesar, and of Napoleon pales before the spiritual imagination of our Lord. At the death of these warriors the kingdoms they established were already disintegrating; the death of Jesus marks the beginning of his world-wide and eternal conquest. From that Cross there have radiated influences which have changed the civilization and are destined to mould the destinies of the world. It is these spiritual influences with which the church has to do. All through this Council they stand in evidence. They are as various as the races of mankind, and as deep as the needs of humanity. They call for statesmen, philanthropists, philosophers, prophets, preachers, and organizers. Every variety of noble human talent is in demand and throughout the sessions of the Council makes itself felt. When we pray "Thy Kingdom come," we are praying for something much vaster and deeper than we comprehend. The coming of the Kingdom is the end which the church has in view. This is the one ideal, an ideal which for beauty, extent, and influence is unmatched outside the imagination of our blessed Lord. This greatness of the work in which we are engaged, and the devotion of those who are engaged in it, is to me the greatest impression made by the Council.

Apparently our folks do not expect the millennium to arrive with the reorganization of our societies as voted at Washington. The discussions led many of our delegates to see how complex our task is. What seemed to many to be a very simple matter so far as reorganization is concerned, now assumes in their minds more nearly its real proportions. Many frankly say that they do not see how such details as those setting up regional committees can be worked out, but everybody is in the mood to try. The West will do its best to make the new order of things effective.

November first was an auspicious day for the Forum movement in this district, for the first meeting of the Chicago Forum Council was held on that date in a downtown theater. Rev. Fred Moore, a liberal minister, who is minister of assemblies, is the director. The list of speakers already scheduled includes some of the men most prominent in the discussion of the issue of the day.

Prohibition was the topic handled at the first session and the speakers included Rev. F. Ernest Johnson of the Federal Council of Churches and representatives of the Anti-Saloon League and of the league opposed to prohibition. About five hundred people were in attendance; their sympathies apparently were about evenly divided between the Wet and Dry causes. The representatives of the leagues were well known to Chicago audiences and drew little fire; Mr. Johnson was the center of the discussion.

He dealt with his facts in the open, frank manner which he used in his report for his department in the Federal Council. Questions directed to him gathered around the criticisms made of his report. As we indicated in this department two or three weeks ago, nobody in the West had any objection to Mr. Johnson making the baldest statement concerning prohibition that the facts would permit. Collier's Weekly and the New York Outlook have both done this with brutal frankness, and I have heard little or no complaint from prohibitionists. They did object to Mr. Johnson setting up what seemed to them to be a survey of a part of the facts only and treating it as if it were a survey of the whole situation. The other thing to which they strenuously objected was Mr. Johnson's interpretation of his facts. If Mr. Johnson had taken in his report the attitude which he took in the period given to questions in the Forum last Sunday, there would have been very little criticism, so far as the West is concerned. Apparently when Mr. Johnson got out of the realm of mere statistics in his office and came into the field, he found that there were some other facts which he hadn't taken into account, facts which have lead him materially to change his attitude.

The Faith of Old

By Maud Frazer Jackson

America, hold fast today
The truth the Pilgrim fathers knew, —
That for each blessing of the way
To God are highest praises due.
For that first harvest garnered here
Their hearts with gratitude o'erflowed.
Let us, their children, year by year,
Be mindful of the grace bestowed.

So meager was their harvest-hoard
Beside our country's riches now;
Yet men take favors of the Lord
And never to the Giver bow.
Today as in the days of old,
God's power quickeneth the seed.
Year after year the tale is told
Of love providing for our need.

Our God, to us their faith restore
Who praised thee in the wilderness.
'Twas by thy grace they went before
And won the freedom we possess.
We need as then thine arm of might;
For foes remain to be withstood.
America, still pray for light
And bless the Lord, for he is good.

Thanksgiving

A Sermon by Rev. George D. Owen

In everything give thanks. I Thessalonians 5: 18.

Fairhaven, Massachusetts

IN everything? Is that possible? Is God always good and are his gifts always pleasing? If so, then we can give thanks. Is pain good? Are clouds necessary? Must we have grief and sorrow?

Yes, if we would come to our best. We like sunshine and prosperity but not clouds, darkness, and adversity, but who has any right always to claim for himself sunshine without cloud? We must have clouds or the sunshine would be too much for us. It would destroy us, ruin us. God knows best.

Ruskin says: "Sunshine is delicious; snow is exhilarating; there is no such thing as bad weather—only different kinds of good weather." All His dealings are good dealings. Is that not the way to think of them? If in the hour of pain there has come new patience, if when purpose were failing there has come new courage, if when doubt was spreading its shadow faith has come to lighten the way, if the words of eternal life have silenced the appeal of temptation "to eat and drink for tomorrow you die"; give thanks. If you have felt the comradeship of men and women moved by glowing faith and noble impulse; if brave souls have joined with you in a good cause; if in the daily turmoil where selfishness wrestles so hard you have seen devoted service and consecrated life and felt the inspiring power; give thanks.

The man of God should prosper in all circumstances. His experiences tend to put the roots of life deeper into the great unchangeable sources of happiness. The greatest joys cannot be known except as we know the greatest trials and burdens of life, too. We never fully appreciate health until we have been sick, nor what kindness means until we have greatly needed it and it has come to us rejoicing the soul. Have life's experiences heightened our appreciation of the spiritual? Have we been led to God as children unable to take care of ourselves? If there were no reverses would we not be in danger of becoming wedded to things? We should forget that the life of man is spiritual, and lose our souls amid the stuff. The wayward son in the far country discovered how insecure the foundations of life were. And he learned that fellowship, and peace, and communion, far exceed the things of taste. He might well thank God for poverty and disaster; he lost things but he found himself and God. Paraphrasing Ruskin we may say: All God's dealings are different kinds of good dealings. There is something wrong with our religion if we do not thank God every day.

One trouble with us is that we think of what we lack rather than what we have. We begin at the wrong end and go in the wrong direction. We keep books with complaint and not with gratitude. Really, we do not know what misery is; we have seen it or heard of it but never experienced it. Ours is a royal state compared to real misery. And ought we not to be thankful for the richness of the land, the liberty and peace of the land, for the spirit of Christ that so much pervades our life, for the chance to help the world, for great tasks that challenge our manhood and womanhood?

But what is the use of being thankful? It makes us feel better for one thing. As "drank" is the past tense of "drink," so "thank" ought to be the past tense of "think," for if we begin to think we will soon thank. The pessimist has a poor memory.

The Optimist met the Pessimist one day, a rainy day. "Good day, how are you?" he smilingly said. "Ump!" growled the Pessimist, "this is the worst day I ever saw." "Better than no day, isn't it?" "I guess so." "I'm hard up," he sighed, "the wolf is at the door." "How lucky to have a door," beamed the Optimist.

Dr. Burns Thompson, opening a great flower show in Scotland, waved his hand over the display of flowers and fruits and said, "But the best of it all is that our Heavenly Father made them all." A hearer said many years afterward that he never entered a summer garden, or a conservatory, or a flower show, that his swelling heart did not remind him that his Heavenly Father's power and wisdom and love and beauty were spread out before him.

Madame Catalani in the height of her career as a singer used to pray before going onto the stage and said in explanation that she never went upon the stage without praying God to grant her to sing well and to meet with success, nor did she fail on retiring to rest to thank him for that and all his mer cies vouchsafed her.

We should be thankful and say so, bu thanksgiving is only thanksgiving when becomes thanks-living, and blossoms into ex pression. A noble-hearted Indian rejoice in some literature the missionary left in hi town and then measuring the footprint his benefactor made some magnificent mo casins, which he traveled 200 miles to pr sent. Both were enriched but the India the more. Thanksgiving should be a da of worship and prayer, of reverence and d votion, a time to empty the purse in blessin recognizing God's blessings. "Give to hi that hath not, take portions to them fo which nothing is provided."

And more than this for what shall we giv thanks to God? For what does an intell gent child thank a devoted father? Fo every gift of course, but beyond all gift for the love they came from, for what th father is, the radiant source of his happ home life. Compare the small with the larg What is God to us? He is far more tha the giver of good things that perish in th using. God has given us life to make u recipients of all that infinite love can b stow. What would a godless world be t us? What would we do if there were n God? And so the Psalmist sang, "Whom have I in heaven but Thee? and there i none on earth that I desire beside Thee Is that high note of thanksgiving too loft for us?

Many good people under a passing clou of ill acknowledge in a half cheerful ton

Thanksgiving

By Edgar Daniel Kramer

White in the moonlight the frost is now gleaming,
As we trudge homeward through the gray dusk,
We who have garnered the fruits of our dreaming,
The apples, the honey, the corn from the husk.

Little winds murmur and candles are throwing
Light on the path that is leading our feet
To the glad homestead, where Love with eyes glowing
Is waiting with laughter and lips passing sweet.

We have reaped of our sowing; our barns are now teeming
With the rich largess of meadow and field,
And through the twilight the stars softly beaming
Whisper of God and the pact we have sealed.

Ever He spoke to us in the birds' singing,
The thunder, the lightning, the breath of the storm;
The Master walked with us where green grass was springing,
Until our dim dreamings took ultimate form.

We have hearkened and lo, the sweet secret of living
Has come to our hearts in the breath of the sod,
And now in wild rapture and songs of thanksgiving
Our gladness exults to the glory of God.

s if finding some balance of good over evil, nat "they have much to be thankful for." Much? Nay, everything while we have God, nd like Paul have nothing yet possessing ll things in Him. The bitters of the soul re the tonics of the spirit. "Rejoice in the ord always, in everything give thanks, for his is the will of God in Christ concerning ou." Nothing less than this is the spirit of hristian thankfulness.

What cares a patriot soldier for his ounds so long as his country's flag ad-ances from victory to victory? Shall not ach loyal follower of the Christ, even in orest trials, rejoice in thinking of Christ's ast, present, and prospective overcoming evil with good? Shall we not rejoice in he advancing gains of the gospel, in pure eligion and devoted philanthropy at home nd abroad, in personal experiences of the ivine Comforter in all tribulations? In hanksgiving to the Great Giver let us give bless others. Not this alone but all our ays should be spent in gratitude.

Let us ponder the fine words of Henry n Dyke:

o you give thanks for this or that?
o, God be thanked I am not grateful that cold, calculating way, with blessings ranked s one, two, three, and four—that would be hateful.

only know that every day brings good above y poor deserving;
only feel that in the road of Life true Love leading me along and never swerving.

hatever gifts and mercies to my lot may fall, would not measure
s worth a certain price in praise, or great or small;
ut take and use them all with simple measure.

or when we gladly eat our daily bread, we bless he Hand that feeds us;
nd when we tread the Road of Life in cheerfulness, ur very heart-beats praise the Lord that leads us.

Parables of Safed the Sage

The Parable of the Snapping Turtle

There came from the Little Lake a Great urtle, and he swam up the Brook nigh unto e house where we spend the Summer. nd he had upon his back a great Mass of ud and Sea Weed.

And I had never seen so large a Turtle our lake. Albeit the boys sail out and tch little Turtles, as did their fathers, r sons. And when we have the Nine randchildren with us in the summer, as e sometimes do, we have Aquariums of any sorts. For the children dam the ook and put in Fishes and Turtles, and hurteth not the Turtles nor the Fishes, d it doeth the Children good. But so rge a Turtle I knew not to inhabit our ke.

And I called unto Keturah, and I said, is a pity that the children are not here see this Great Turtle. For the children d gone back, but I and Keturah stayed on.

And I said unto the Turtle, I think thou t the Grandfather of all the Turtles in this Lake, and I am the grandfather of all the children that splash about here. Let us be friends.

But the Turtle looked at me Suspiciously.

And I said, Old fellow, thou hast on thy back a great load of Mud. Yea, and it looketh as if thou hadst Barnacles and other forms of Marine Life attached to thy shell. Let me help thee.

So I got a Pole, and I began to poke Mud off the top of his Shell.

But he snapped at me, and would have bitten me if he could.

But I still poked, and I relieved him of quite a Burden. For so far as I could observe, he had no way of scratching his back, and that I think a Turtle must regard as a Misfortune.

But as I poked, he grew calm, and I began to think he was enjoying it.

And I said, I wonder if through that thick shell there may be any pleasant sensation in the stroking of a pole.

And Keturah said, I verily believe he liketh it. And what a relief it must be to be rid of the Mud and Weeds.

But as I finished the task, the Turtle gave a vicious bite at the pole.

And I said, Thou art no more grateful than Some People. Many are their Benefits, and they take them without Thanksgiving; and when it is all past, they are more likely to Bite than to show Gratitude.

And Keturah said, Not all people are ungrateful, and we will not be. For we have many blessings, and will not fail of Thanksgiving.

Along the Council Trail

By Herbert A. Jump

One of the liveliest debates of the Council was stirred up by the new Statement of Social Ideals proposed by the Commission on Social Service. The clock steadily rolled round to 7 P.M. before adjournment was demanded. Several of the brethren—though surprisingly few of them—were evidently disturbed by many sentences of the social "creed." A delegate was overheard to remark on his way out, "I wonder if these objectors are afraid to let the Christian preacher be a pioneer in social reform. Or perhaps they want him to be a leader of the sort described once by Samuel Gompers. 'Doesn't Jim So-and-So have all his union behind him?' he was asked on a certain occasion. 'Yes, he has all of them behind him, and he is always stepping on their toes.'"

When Dr. Potter had been elected president of the American Board, a committee of three was appointed to escort him to the platform. Whereupon the Council enjoyed for several minutes a little game of ecclesiastical hide-and-seek as four dignified individuals dodged one another back and forth in the mazes of the stage boxes. Finally the victim was found. It reminded me of a happening in my own Ann Arbor church some years ago. The ushers discovered to their dismay one Sunday morning when the offering had been announced that the collection plates had been misplaced. One usher ran hither, another ran thither searching for the sexton who might locate the necessary but missing utensils of salvation. At that moment the chorus choir appropriately began to chant, "O that I knew where I might find him."

Many of the delegates stopped at the Hotel Powhatan. From the rear windows of that lofty caravansary one could look down on the roofs of some two-story business blocks. On the top of one of these was a large sign so placed that it was not visible to the street at all but only from the windows of the overshadowing hotel. It read: "H. I. ROTHROCK, FINE PRINTING." That's pretty fine," commented one delegate. "I wonder how many business men would dare display their sign that way, so that God himself could read it and check up on its accuracy."

One of the high spots in the emotional history of the Council was touched that Thursday afternoon when the Social Creed was being discussed. A speaker had warned the Council to refrain from saying anything in this declaration that might savor of socialism. "It will anger some of our rich men and the gifts to our missionary societies will suffer." Then Roger Babson of Wellesley strode onto the platform and shouted, "That utterance is the most un-Christian, the most un-Congregational thing I ever heard at a Council. Brethren, we are to make our declarations on the social question not with our eyes on possible donors but with our eyes on the Christ."

Professor Holloway, the dark-skinned philosopher from the South, made a deep impression by his keen analysis of race conditions in his part of the country. "There were many folks a few years ago," he said, "who feared that if we taught the Negro to recite 'hic, haec, hoc' we should be unfitting him to say 'gee, haw, buck.'"

* *

Miss Mary E. Woolley would have been elected a Vice-Moderator if she had been on the ground. In this connection the story was told that when her candidacy for the president's chair of Mt. Holyoke was under consideration, some friendly soul approached one of the trustees of the college with the suggestion that now the time had come to select a man for the office of president. The reply was, "All right. We'll hunt around till we find the best man that is available, and then if he is a woman, we'll elect her."

Next Steps in Missionary Reorganization

What may be expected in the near future in consequence of the report of the Committee of Twelve

By Charles Emerson Burton
Secretary of the National Council

ONE cannot speak categorically at this moment on just what will be done next week, next month, or next year in missionary reorganization, but there are some things on which fairly dependable forecasts may be made.

Foreign Missions Mergers

The American Board and the three Woman's Boards can now begin at once to work out their mergers in a practical fashion. Some time will be required, of course, for necessary court and legislative action in connection with charters. Two years will be required before the newly constituted Prudential Committee representing all foreign missionary work can be legally at work. In the meantime the four boards can be working together, and by a natural process of evolution work out readjustments without jar.

Home Board Merger

More complex are the questions in connection with the mergers of the Home Boards. The Education Society, the Publishing Society, and the Foundation for Education can proceed with unification at once. The three Extension Boards, Home Missions, Church Building, and Sunday School Extension, have already set in motion studies of the necessary steps for the merger of these boards, and if no legal obstacles are discovered this will open the way for the organization of the new Home Board, embracing at first these three societies, and possibly the Board of Ministerial Relief, concerning which action was taken at the National Council looking to this organization merging with the Home Board as soon as possible.

It will not be possible to elect a new identical Board of Directors for all the Home Societies, including the Extension Boards, the Ministerial Boards, the Education Boards, and the A. M. A., until the next meeting of the Council. In the meantime it will be possible for the administrative boards of these societies to confer together, hold joint meetings if called for, and proceed somewhat as though the new organization were perfected.

Promotion

In the work of presenting the interests of the societies to churches and individual givers, the Commission on Missions, which will be the authoritative body, cannot be reorganized until the next meeting of the Council. In the meantime, however, the Promotional Council, which is the active arm of the Commission, is being organized at once. By the action of the Council the Commission on Missions and the Promotional Council, made up chiefly of the Home Secretaries of the Board, is charged with the whole range of promoting missionary interest and income. Processes can begin at once for constituting the unified field staff and where technically delay is necessary, actually this staff can work as though the unification were legally perfected.

As rapidly as this staff unification proceeds the work of the Woman's Home Missionary Federation can be closely allied with it—perhaps actually merged. In the meantime the Woman's Home Missionary Unions and the Federation should carry on just as in the past. A good motto is to stop doing nothing until we begin doing something better.

The provision calls for issuing three percentages as soon as the plans are perfected; one for foreign missions, one for home missions, and one for state work. Obviously such percentages cannot be issued in time to take effect in 1926, although state committees and state offices can do something in preparing their constituency for the complete change which may be hoped for in 1927. This can be done by grouping the percentages for foreign missions in one section, for home work in another, and for state work in another. As in the past, remittances may be made through state offices in one check to be divided under the appropriate percentages, or where such offices are not operative, then to any one of the societies with request for distribution.

State Work

The plan calls for the commitment of work done in states to the administration of state bodies wherever these bodies are of sufficient strength. This would include home missionary work, Sunday school extension work, the church work of the A. M. A., and local religious education field work.

States may begin negotiations with the national societies immediately concerning these readjustments. Of course it will mean the modification of apportionment percentages, and this will take at least one year to work out, although in the meantime budgets could be accommodated by mutual arrangement.

Regional Committees

The provision for regional committees calls for blazing new trails. Since these committees are to be wholly voluntary, with no legal entities involved, their organization may be begun at once. The present plan is to call together groups of workers in the various regions for the purpose of facing the tasks now needing to be done. The expectation is that the form of organization needed will come better out of working together than it will by artificial construction. As the workers face the tasks that have been performed in the past, together with some which have not been performed, it is to be expected that practical processes will emerge.

The Congregationalist and the Magazines

The question of realignment of our denominational periodicals was referred back to the committee for report in 1927. Here again it is best to assume that there will be no changes and proceed as though nothing were under advisement. No one need hesitate, for example, to subscribe for any one of these periodicals, since such subscriptions will be duly recognized in equivalent value no matter what may happen in the future. Likewise the management of the periodicals may assume that any plans they make for carrying on will constitute a real contribution to any new developments, and not to make such plans might be fatal whether the denomination should decide to merge or not to merge.

In the meantime provision is made for financing The Congregationalist in a business-like fashion through the Commission on Missions and a special committee of the Commission was ordered by the Council, which has been appointed, which committee is to co-operate with the Publishing Society in making The Congregationalist the best denominational periodical possible and in furthering its circulation.

In conclusion, it should be said that the prevailing spirit among the officers and committees of the societies is committed to carrying out the will of the churches as expressed in the Council actions to the very utmost. This gives promise that what may not be set down categorically now may be expected in the development of the work in the immediate future.

nternational Y. M. C. A. Triennial at Washington

Revised Basis of Membership Adopted

By Howard B. Grose, D.D.

HIS Forty-Second Triennial Convention f the Y. M. C. A. of North America, in Washington, Oct. 24-26, had high ts of interest. The opening address President Coolidge was not only a note- hy tribute from the Chief Magistrate a great American institution, but a chment that deserved to be broad- ed because of its plain and wise deal- with present-day problems. Then youth the helm of the Association ship by election of Charles P. Taft, 2d, a young of twenty-eight, as president of the ention. Genial son of a genial father, f Justice William H. Taft, this young yer of Cincinnati, member of the scopal Church, active in the Y. M. C. A. e he entered as a boy in the Boys' nch in Washington, presided with in- nality and intelligence and approved self to all. This was putting new em- sis on the "Y," according to Dr. Mott's uent appeal that the organization be an association of young men.

The Basis of Membership

oubtless the most anticipated and in y ways important action was that re- ling the basis of membership. A mat- of discussion and division of sentiment years, it was hoped that the committee ix appointed three years ago at Atlantic y and instructed to report at this meet- would bring in a report that would meet h approval and dispose of the vexed ie. This happened. There was a debate, it was brief and the opposition was thing but formidable, while the vote of ption was overwhelming, showing a re- kable unanimity of opinion that the e thing had been done.

he one change made in the basis is the oduction of an alternative requirement. herto membership in an evangelical rch has been requisite to voting or ve association membership. Under the basis, voting membership in associa- s in the United States and Canada ll be open to any male at least sixteen complies with the local requirements o fees, etc., and (1) is a member of an ngelical church; or (2) who subscribes writing to the following:

hereby declare my faith in God, and acceptance of Jesus Christ as Savior Lord. I desire to serve him and to be disciple in accordance with the teach- of the New Testament, and to unite others in the extension of the King- of God; and I am in full accord with following purpose of the Young Men's istian Associations of the United States of Canada, and commit myself to its ntary service and support: "To lead ng men to faith in God through Jesus ist; to promote their growth into full- s of Christian character; to lead them active membership in the church of r choice; and to make the extension the Kingdom of God throughout the rld the governing purpose of their lives."

tudent associations have for three years a special statement, which is not inter- d with. To avoid misinterpretation of the action, it should be clearly understood that no association is required to change its present status. No local association need adopt the alternative, which is not mandatory, only permissive. In presenting the report, C. R. Joy, chairman of the committee, declared that they were conservatives even under suspicion of being "stand patters"; that instead of "lowering the bars" they had raised them higher and added to church membership a personal and definite statement of faith and purpose which now they did not have. He proved the preference of the committee by offering a supplemental report at a later session, recommending that wherever possible the first two qualifications be combined, and as soon as practical be made a standard for local associations. This does not do away with the alternative, but recommends its addition as tending to produce a better qualitative membership. Mr. Joy said that as nearly all the associations are on the regular or Portland basis, it was believed that few would change their practice. On the other hand, the committee had to regard the repeated requests for a modification that would meet particular cases and permit any association to practice it without losing standing and omission from the official roster of the International Committee.

There surely ought to be no misunderstanding on the part of the churches regarding this action. It is a pretty strict statement of purpose, as well as of faith, in receiving new members. Those who have most strongly advocated the change for years have made the point that experience proved that the mere fact of church membership was not enough to guarantee a serviceable and active working member in the Association, and that the need was for something that would look out for quality more searchingly.

President Coolidge's Message

The home, and parental responsibility, got a great deal of attention from one source and another. President Coolidge praised the associations as a practical effort to secure the development that comes only through action, and to strengthen the physical, intellectual and moral life; to reveal young men to themselves, direct them into unselfish ways, train them in citizenship, and prepare them to be the future heads of the homes of the people.

There are too many indications that the functions of parenthood are breaking down. Too many people are neglecting the real welfare of their children, shifting the responsibility for their actions and turning over supervision of their discipline and conduct to the juvenile courts. . . . The home is the corner stone of the nation, and any effective better-homes movement must begin with the training of the youth for those responsibilities, or we shall see the disposition to attempt in some way to turn over to the government the responsibilities for the rearing of children constantly increased. What the youth of the country need is not more public control through government action but more home control through parental action.

The applause which greeted this showed keen appreciation of its truth. He said the associations are an effort in this direction. The movement has created and organized one of the greatest lay forces the world has ever seen—forces which seek to translate the truths of religion into the life of the people. Probably no other lay force exerts so large an influence upon the youth. It stands as a direct challenge to materialism. It represents a militant and crusading faith, constantly spreading its truths. If that faith is to maintain its vitality that work must go on. It is not enough that there should be action in the pulpits—there must be reaction in the pews. It will not be sufficient to have exalted preaching by the clergy unless there is exalted living by the laity. He spoke also of the movement as a recruiting agency for the ministry and foreign mission fields, paying high honor to the missionaries who are carrying into the life of distant peoples a true interpretation of that which we consider best in America and Canada. Amid all the divergent influences here was a unifying and harmonizing agency at home and abroad. It was a noble address, showing grasp of the association work and a keen sympathy with its objects.

Dr. Cadman on Home Laxity

Dr. Cadman also spoke of the menace of laxity in the home and lack of discipline, putting the responsibility for youthful depravity on the parents more than on the children. He raised a great laugh when he said he liked the President because he was one who conserved steam for real work by not letting it all blow through the whistle. Secretary Hoover, who had a great reception, touched on the same subject. In the forum on tendencies of today which beset young men and boys there came from all sections the same report of increasing love of frivolity and decreasing home training, of disregard for law with the parents setting the example. The younger generation did not get all the raps by any means, the elders came in for the major share of condemnation for present evil conditions. And of course there were not wanting extravagant defenders of the young people of the present as altogether the finest and best ever. The churches may well go on with the discussion, attempting what the forum did, to find practical ways of meeting and counteracting the forces of evil, beginning with community studies of the situation so as to move intelligently.

The International Committee Report

The report of the International Committee, presented by Dr. Mott, reviewed its notable achievements in pioneering and creative work. The committee is to be continued, but reduced from 200 to 50 members. It will safeguard the joint property, arrange for conventions, maintain the friendly and helpful relationships that have existed between the two countries, and preserve the historic unity of spirit, purpose and program. It is proposed to place the foreign work in the hands of a Joint Foreign Committee of the National Councils of the two countries. This foreign work has grown to be one of the significant activities of the International Committee, with a budget this year of $1,700,000. The influence of its work in Europe and the Far East cannot be measured. The convention registration was just under 1,200.

"Keturah"

Mrs. William E. Barton, known to the readers of this paper as "Keturah," died at Foxboro, Mass., Saturday, Nov. 7, 1925. She had been in apparent health, and was happy to her last conscious hour. Stricken with cerebral hemorrhage, her last words were words of affection for those she loved, and she died peacefully in four hours. Esther Treat Bushnell was born in Johnston, Ohio, daughter of Lewis and Elizabeth (Treat) Bushnell. On her father's side she was descended from a family famous in Connecticut history from 1636 and on her mother's side she sprang from Governor Robert Treat of the Charter Oak. Among her forbears were John Davenport, founder of New Haven, Abraham Pierson, first President of Yale, and many men and women notable in early and later Connecticut. She was married to Rev. William E. Barton, July 23, 1885. Their eldest son, Bruce, was born in the Tennessee mountains, the next three children, Charles, Helen and Fred, were born in Ohio, and Robert was born in Boston.

Sharing with her husband the adventures of a ministry of forty years, she accompanied him on many of his journeys as Moderator of the National Council of Congregational Churches (1921-1923), and after the completion of 25 years in the First Church of Oak Park, Ill., they were privileged to make a tour of the world together. Returning to Foxboro, Mass., which for thirty years has been their summer home, they celebrated their fortieth wedding anniversary, and gathered their children and grandchildren about them in a memorable summer reunion.

For her were named the Esther Barton Hospital for women and children at Tai-ku, China, the Esther Barton Assembly Hall of the Madura Mission in India, and the Esther Nursery at Camp Algonquin on Fox River, Ill. She was a trustee of the Woman's Board of Missions of the Interior and a devoted friend of many good causes.

Mrs. Barton's funeral was held in the Foxboro Church, Nov. 11, conducted by Rev. Archibald Cullens, pastor of that church, assisted by Dr. A. F. Pierce of Shawmut Church, Boston, of which Dr. Barton was once pastor, and Dr. A. W. Palmer of the First Church, Oak Park, Ill. President and Mrs. Coolidge sent flowers. The burial was on the shore of the little lake near the Bartons' Foxboro home.

Only to those who knew Mrs. Barton intimately would it be possible to speak truthfully and without apparent exaggeration of her noble qualities. She had a good mind, sound judgment, rare common sense, and with these qualities had ready sympathy, affection that always sought the welfare of others, and sublime Christian faith. Her life was a life of the beautitudes. If unselfishness is noted in heaven; if peacemakers are blessed, and the pure in heart see God, great is her reward.

Our New Moderator

I had the privilege of being the pastor for nine years of the church in which our new Moderator has worked for over forty years.

Mr. Harwood was a resident of Ripon, Wis., in the same town where the Republican Party was organized. He has been a manufacturer in an increasingly successful way, making paper makers' felts and woolen goods. Like his felts, which require most careful manufacturing, he is all wool, and more than a yard wide.

For forty years he has been superintendent of the Sunday school of the First Congregational Church of Appleton, Wis. In addition to being a successful business man, he has unstintedly devoted a large part of his time to the church and welfare work in this not large community. He has been active in Christian Endeavor work, conducting the first excursion to the great Minneapolis Convention. He has been foremost in securing the fine Y. M. C. A. building for his community. He has held offices of importance in the city government. He has held almost every office open to male members in his church, which largely through his influence, in a small town, has become the largest church with the largest Sunday school in the state.

He is a man who has been present at the Sunday services and midweek prayer meetings, always ready to be called on for any good work. He is large and tolerant in his spirit, not declining to receive into the church membership those of liberal tendencies or of Christian Science proclivities.

He is a trustee of Ripon College, and led the financial campaign for Northland College; has moderated at state conventions, and has been active in every forward movement of the state, unless we except the LaFollette movement.

His manly presence and address, his ready wit, his modest spirit, and his layman's point of view will make him a welcome and valuable visitor in our churches.

I could not help feeling as I saw him beside our President upon the National Council platform on the White House grounds that the promise of the Scripture is true: "Seest thou a man diligent in his business? He shall stand before kings." The honor of the moderatorship has well come to one of the best loved and most faithful men in the state of Wisconsin.

The Security Pact of Locarno

By Laura Bell Everett

A truce—the Armistice—stanched the flowing blood;
The wounded world, deliriously glad,
Sought wild expression for its ecstasy.

A truce—mad joy—then seven long menacing years,
Each with the threat of internecine war,
To rend world wounds beyond all power to heal.
Now enters Peace. Is all the waiting world
In transports, rapturous that Peace can end
The curse of war that would destroy the lands?

What do men say? "And now you speak of it,
I did see mention of a peace or pact—
What was it we were talking of before?"

The First Assistant Moderato

Mrs. E. A. Osbornson, of Oak Park, I elected First Assistant Moderator of the N tional Council, was born in the city of Chica and has always lived in the city or near suburbs. Her maiden name was Grace Brya and her father's home was near the old Tab nacle Church. She became a member of th church while still a girl and afterwards w for many years with her husband a member Warren Avenue. Mr. Osbornson has long been a mem ber of the board of the City Missionary So ciety and Mrs. Osbornson years ago becam president of the West Division of th W. B. M. I. In 1899 she was elected to th board of managers; in 1920 she became secon vice-president and in 1924 first vice-president During the Interchurch World Movement sh served on a team which had a speaking tou from Coast to Coast. She has also been greatl interested in the industrial work of the Nea East. She has been for several years on th Commission on Missions and was one of th Committee of Twelve on reorganization. She is tolerant of the opinions of others, gentl spoken, and can be counted upon to represen the denomination with grace and good judg ment when she is called upon.

The Oldest Minister at the Council (?)

Perhaps the oldest Congregational minister in attendance at the National Council at Washington was Rev. James L. R. Wyckoff, retired, of Woodbury, Ct., and father of Rev. Herbert J. Wyckoff, a teacher (and also a Congregational minister) at Haverford, Pa. Rev. James L. R. Wyckoff is in his 87th year, and not only was at the Council himself, but also solicited funds from the men of the congregation to send his pastor, Rev. Luther G. Coburn, of North Woodbury, Ct.

Universal Christian Conference on Life and Work

III. Results and Reactions

By Theodore Ainsworth Greene
Associate Secretary of the American Section

EDITORS' NOTE. This article follows two hers which were published before the meeting the National Council in Washington. We ve delayed the final article because of the mands made upon our space by Council ma- ial. We call special attention to the state- nt of impressions of the Stockholm Confer- ce at the end of this article.

T is with considerable trepidation and ti- midity that one attempts to summarize the Results" of the Stockholm Conference on fe and Work, partly because these so-called Results" have to do with intangible and spir- al forces, and also because the effects of is great gathering have only begun to be lt. There are certain accomplishments of e conference, however, which anyone ac- ainted with the facts may tabulate.

There has been no such gathering of the ristian clans since the last time the East- n and Western Churches met together at icæa in 325 A.D. Note how wide was the presentation. On the International Com- ittee of Arrangements were 83 different in- viduals from 27 different nations. In the embership of the conference were included presentatives of 103 independent churches and nominations, from 44 countries, or—if one unts Australia, Canada, South Africa, and dia merely as units in the British Empire— om 37 nations of the world. Further, the ster of official delegates reveals the fact that addition to the representation from the four eat sections, American, British, Eastern Or- odox, and European, there were nine churches presented from such other countries as China, pan, and South America. Seven branches the great Eastern Church sent their delegates Stockholm, the Greek Church having the rgest number present from that communion; evangelical Protestant churches from Conti- ntal Europe, including in that number men om every country except Russia; 18 different rieties of Protestantism from Great Britain d the Empire; and from America, 25 separ- sects and denominations, every one of them the membership of the Federal Council. I ow that the latest available census statis- s reveal the divisions of Protestantism in e United States to have reached the appalling ure of 205 sects. It is no exaggeration of e truth, however, to insist that in the list 25 churches sending delegates from this untry to Stockholm will be found every one the larger and more important denomina- ns. Prof. William Adams Brown of Union minary, attempting to estimate the truly uni- rsal character of our gathering, states— The bodies officially represented at Stock- lm—more than one hundred independent mmunions—included in their membership proximately 300,000,000 professing Chris- ns, some three-fifths of all those who own e Christian name."

Of course it is not possible in the brief mpass of this article either to enumerate or aluate the results of the work of the com- issions. Nearly every one of these commis- ns included certain resolutions in its re- rts to the conference. These resolutions nt without formal adoption by the confer- ce with only two exceptions,—those hav- g to do with the formulation of a message r the world and the organization of a con- uation committee. All the rest were re- rred to the Continuation Committee for con- leration and action, if advisable. In so large a body of such widely diverging opinions, this seemed inevitable. All resolutions, however, together with the reports of commissions and conference proceedings, are now being collected, and will shortly be published by an editorial committee, of which the Dean of Canterbury is the chairman. Mr. Shillito, of the British Weekly, author of The Story of C. O. P. E. C., has been chosen to write the narrative of the conference, and is already at work upon the manuscript in London. The combined volume, it is hoped, will be off the press before Christmas, 1925.

We are at liberty, however, to publish the "Message of the Conference to the World." Compiled by the Executive Committee, it was accepted with only four dissenting votes. One of these four, Dr. Peter Ainslee of Baltimore, stated that his sole reason for dissenting lay in the fact that this document did not go far enough to satisfy his feeling of the church's duty in relation to such problems as war and international relations.

The Message of the Universal Christian Conference on Life and Work

The Universal Christian Conference on Life and Work assembled at Stockholm from August 19 to 30, 1925, and composed of representatives of the greater number of Christian communions coming from 37 nations of the Old and New Worlds, and of the near and far East, sends this brotherly message to all followers of Christ, beseeching them to join with them in prayer, confessions, thanksgiving, study, and service. We regret that not all Christian communions have found it possible to accept our invitation, for in view of the vital and far-reaching issues with which we have been concerned, we cannot but hope for that co-operation of all parts of the Church of Christ without which its testimony and influence in the world must be incomplete.

For five years men and women have planned and prayed that this conference might be held. Other efforts for closer relations between the churches have prepared the way. But this has proved the most signal instance of fellowship and co-operation across the boundaries of nations and confessions, which the world has yet seen. The sins and sorrows, the struggles and losses of the great war and since have compelled the Christian churches to recognize humbly and with shame that the world is too strong for a divided church. Leaving for the time our differences in Faith and Order, our aim has been to secure united practical action in Christian Life and Work. The conference itself is a conspicuous fact. But it is only a beginning.

We confess before God and the world the sins and failures of which the churches have been guilty, through lack of love and sympathetic understanding. Loyal seekers after truth and righteousness have been kept away from Christ, because his followers have so imperfectly represented him to mankind. The call of the present hour to the church should be repentance, and with repentance a new courage, springing from the inexhaustible resources which are in Christ.

It is a matter for deep thankfulness, that in the plan of God and through the guidance of his Spirit the representatives of so many Christian communions have been led to assemble, and have renewed in common fellowship their Faith, Hope, and Love in Jesus Christ their Savior and Lord. It is a matter for deep thankfulness, that in spite of differences, sincere and profound, they have been enabled to discuss so many difficult problems with a candor, a charity, and a self-restraint, which the spirit of God alone could inspire. As we repeated the Lord's Prayer together, each in the speech his mother taught him, we realized afresh our common faith, and experienced as never before the unity of the Church of Christ.

II

The conference has deepened and purified our devotion to the Captain of our salvation. Responding to His call, "Follow me," we have in the presence of the cross accepted the urgent duty of applying His Gospel in all realms of human life—industrial, social, political, and international.

Thus in the sphere of economics we have declared that the soul is the supreme value,

UNIVERSAL CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE IN SESSION
In the Academy of Music, Stockholm. The Crown Prince and Princess are in the Royal Box at the rear that it must not be subordinated to the rights of property or to the mechanism of industry, and that it may claim as its first right, the right of salvation. Therefore we contend for the free and full development of the human personality. In the name of the Gospel, we have affirmed that industry should not be based solely on the desire for individual profit, but that it should be conducted for the service of the community. Property should be regarded as a stewardship for which an account must be given to God. Co-operation between capital and labor should take the place of conflict, so that employers and employed alike may be enabled to regard their part in industry as the fulfillment of a vocation. Thus alone can we obey our Lord's command to do unto others, even as we would that they should do unto us.

In the realm of social morality, we considered the problems presented by overcrowding, unemployment, laxity of morals, drink and its evils, crime and the criminal. Here we were led to realize that these problems are so grave that they cannot be solved by individual effort alone, but that the community must accept responsibility for them and must exercise such social control over individual action as in each instance may be necessary for the common good. We have not neglected the more intimate questions, which a higher appreciation of personality raises in the domain of education, the family, and the vocation, questions which affect woman, the child, and the worker. The church must contend not for the rights of the individual as such, but for the rights of the moral personality, since all mankind is enriched by the full unfolding of a single soul.

We have also set forth the guiding principles of a Christian internationalism, equally opposed to a national bigotry and a weak cosmopolitanism. We have affirmed the universal character of a church, and its duty to preach and practice the love of the brethren. We have considered the relations of the individual conscience to the state. We have examined the race problem, the subject of law and arbitration and the constitution of an international order which would provide peaceable methods for removing the causes of war—questions which in the tragic conditions of today make so deep an appeal to our hearts. We summon the churches to share with us our sense of the horror of war, and its futility as a means of settling international dispute, and to pray and work for the fulfillment of the promise that under the scepter of the Prince of Peace, mercy and truth shall meet together, Righteousness and Peace shall kiss each other.

We have not attempted to offer precise solutions, nor have we confirmed by a vote the results of our friendly discussion. This was due, not only to our respect for the convictions of individuals and groups, but still more to the feeling that the mission of the church is above all to state principles, and to assert the ideal, while leaving to individual consciences and to communities the duty of applying them with charity, wisdom, and courage.

III

If this goal is to be attained we recognize the pressing need of education. The individual must be educated by the church, so that he may be enabled to exercise a Christian discernment in all things. The churches must educate themselves by study, conference, and prayer, so that being led by the spirit of truth into all truth, they may be enabled in increasing measure to apprehend the mind of Christ. We recognize that the root of evil is to be found in the human will; we therefore desire to re-emphasize our conviction that this will must be surrendered to the high and holy will of God, whose service is perfect freedom. Even Christian ideas and ideals cannot save the world, if separated from their personal source in the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and unless they are themselves taken up into the personal life of the believer.

To this end we address our appeal, first to all Christians. Let each man, following his own conscience, and putting his convictions to the test of practical life, accept his full personal responsibility for the doing of God's will on earth as it is in heaven, and in working for God's kingdom. Let him, in entire loyalty to his own church, seek to have a share in that wider fellowship and co-operation of the Christian churches of which this conference is a promise and pledge. In the name of this wider fellowship, we would send a message of sympathy to all those who, amid circumstances of persecution and trial, are fulfilling their Christian calling, and we would comfort them with a thought that they are thus brought into fellowship with the suffering of Christ.

But we cannot confine this appeal to our churches, for we gratefully recognize that we now have many allies in this holy cause.

We turn to the young of all countries. With keen appreciation, we have heard of their aspirations and efforts for a better social order as expressed in the youth movements of many lands. We desire to enlist the energy of youth, the freshness and the fullness of their life, in the service of the kingdom of God and of humanity.

We think also of those who are seeking after truth by whatever way, and ask their help. As Christ is the truth, so Christ's Church heartily welcomes every advance of reason and conscience among men. Particularly we would invite the co-operation of those teachers and scholars who in many special realms possess the influence and command the knowledge without which the solution of our pressing practical problems is impossible. In the name of the Son of Man, the Carpenter of Nazareth, we send this message to the workers of the world. We thankfully record the fact that at present, even under difficult conditions, multitudes of workers in the different countries are acting in accordance with these principles. We deplore the causes of misunderstanding and estrangement which still exist, and are determined to do our part to remove them. We share their aspirations after a just and fraternal social order through which the opportun shall be assured for the development according God's design of the full manhood of every ma

We have said that this conference is o a beginning. We cannot part without maki some provision for the carrying on of work. We have therefore decided to form continuation committee to follow up what been begun, to consider how effect can be giv to the suggestions which have been made, examine the practicability of calling such other conference at a future date, and in p ticular to take steps for that further study difficult problems, and that further educati of ourselves and of our churches, on which wise judgment and action must be based. M we not hope that through the work of t body and through the increasing fellowsh and co-operation of the Christians of all tions in one spirit our oneness in Christ m be more and more revealed to the world in L and Work.

Only as we become inwardly one shall attain real unity of mind and spirit. T nearer we draw to the Crucified, the nearer come to one another, in however varied colo the Light of the World may be reflected our faith. I would not be willing, however, classify even these sections as "platitudino garrulities." Having seen behind the scen I know too much of what this effort cost. Americans need to remember, with our Soc Gospel emphasis, that at Stockholm were re resented the ends of the earth in churchly w dom; but that at this conference were i cluded churches which look backward as w as forward. Still further, we need to recall t sad fact that, whenever a large body of m aim to strike at an average, upon which th can all agree, "Things level up"—as Dr. F dick puts it—"but they also level down." Nica published nothing very prophetic, if my memo serves me right. One could wish that the Continuation Co mittee included a larger number of men earlier years. Also, that it had named mo women members. (Only three women were i cluded, one from England, and two from Ame ica.) Some one jokingly remarked that t aggregate ages of the full committee of 67 Eastern patriarchs, archbishops and all amounted to "not less than six thousand sev hundred years." This is a hyperbolic estimat of course. We come nearer the truth, if w admit that the eldest member was only 85, a the youngest just past 48. The Congregation members are Drs. S. Parkes Cadman and Hen

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE CONFERENCE

In summarizing our impressions as to the nificance of Stockholm, it seems to me we ist begin by insisting that:

The first significance of the conference is the nference itself! The mere fact that hunds of men and women from widely different igious organizations should meet together— they did, and in the spirit they did—is of tstanding importance. The size of the differt delegations (155 from 25 denominations in nerica, for example), the high and responsible sitions held by many of their members, gave e conference genuine dignity. It has further ade possible a number of contacts, which have veloped into genuine friendships between the mbers of the different communions. Indeed, e conference might almost be described as the niversal Conference of Christian Friends.

The second important fact about this Conence on Life and Work is its Universal reement that Christianity is a religion with inner significance, rather than a merely ecsiastical or philosophical system. Through e discussions there was repeated emphasis on the church's obligation in view of God's rpose for the world.

The third significant discovery, we all made, of the profound differences of opinion as to e interest and scope of the Gospel in its apcation to life among the different groups. ese differences were due to personal characistics, to begin with, to ecclesiastical history, varying political and national situations. t, these differences—while frankly expressed were nevertheless balanced by a genuine ristian courtesy that carefully avoided misresentation and criticism.

There is evident—in the fourth place—a difence of opinion between different groups rela-e to the extent to which the church should rticipate in social and economic affairs. On e one side were the English, French, and nerican Sections, who stood committed to a rked extension of the Christian spirit into forms and relations of society; on the other e were the Continental churches, especially e German and Central European Churches, t with one or two exceptions, hesitating to ke an equal commitment of themselves to ial activities.

Nevertheless, there is evidence,—in the fifth ce,—of a growing general agreement, dete marked differences as to details, that the urch has a social task and opportunity:

Sixth—A healthy acknowledgment of the urch's failures was expressed on all sides, d a sense of the decided need of further study conditions as a basis for the extension of ristian principles into society. Illustrating s very point, two characteristic sentences ll stick in my mind:

One—"If the church is to speak to the heart of world, it must take the world to its heart."

The other—"The church that would teach st be a learning church.

Seventh and finally, one comes away conced that this conference is one phase of a le—yes a far wider—movement towards the velopment of a Christian unity and solidar-

There will certainly be other world Conences on Life and Work—perhaps another ten years. That rests with our committee. may well be sooner. But, sooner or later, the name of Christ, we must get together! d, thanks to Stockholm, 600 of us, from re than a hundred segments of the Chrisn circle, have proved to our own eternal satction that in the name of Christ, we can!

Disciples of Christ in Convention

By Frank M. Sheldon, D.D.

Pilgrim Congregational Church, Oklahoma City

FIFTY-THREE HUNDRED Disciples of Christ (1,000 of them from Oklahoma City) paid the registration fee, received the official program and badge, and thus became voting members of the International Convention which met in Oklahoma City, Oct. 6-11. It was the Convention Diamond Jubilee and centered upon the theme, "Make Disciples of All Nations."

Emphasis upon evangelism and outreach was dominant throughout the meetings. Yet the strong intensive note should also be recognized. The Religious Education Board is one of the best in any denomination. The Board of Temperance and Social Welfare is a forward looking group, fearlessly emphasizing social Christianity. Missionary and educational leaders of this communion are a well trained, broad minded, earnest, progressive group. Touch with this denomination fifteen years ago and again at the present time reveals significant progress along many lines, but especially in progressive outlook and co-operative attitude.

While the statement above would surely hold for an increasing number of Disciples, there were certain reactionary efforts and acts which are disturbing.

An outsider cannot but wonder when the Disciples are to become a delegated body, really representative of the constituency as a whole, when they meet in convention and act upon most important questions.

The major part of two afternoons was given to the Report of the Peace Conference Committee. This committee recommended that the United Missionary Society should employ no person "who has committed himself or herself to belief in, or practice of, the reception of unimmersed persons into the membership of Churches of Christ." The committee also recommended that any now employed who have committed themselves to "the reception of unimmersed persons" (commonly known as open membership), should be dismissed.

The Committee on Recommendations, of 45 outstanding Disciples, by a slight majority, recommended that the portion of the report indicated above be rejected. The report of the Peace Conference Committee was supported on the ground that the New Testament is the only guide. It teaches baptism (which means immersion) and since the Missionary Society is a business organization, and its representatives simply employees (the employer having absolute right to dictate what his employee shall do), therefore believers in open membership should not be employed. Those who opposed the report took the ground that the New Testament, without ecclesiastical interpretation, is the only guide, and that to take this action was to depart from the historic position of the Disciples, by making and seeking to enforce an ecclesiastical interpretation.

The vote was approximately two to one in favor of instructing the Missionary Society to dismiss and not to employ believers in open membership.

The same issue appears in the proposal to sever connections between the International Convention and the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity. Some leaders of the movement for Christian unity, notably the president, Rev. Peter Ainslie, are openly against insistence upon immersion. It is charged that "The teachings of the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity are not in accord with New Testament Scriptures"; hence, the proposal to dissolve relationship. There is hope in the fact that action upon this matter was postponed for one year.

One wonders how much longer Disciples and Baptists are going to fellowship unimmersed believers as equally acceptable to God, as members of God's kingdom, and yet maintain this barrier which prevents membership in their churches. Especially, how can a church talk in a serious way about Christian unity while refusing liberty upon a matter which excludes millions of recognized Christians from their church?

It would be a mistake to conclude that what seems to us a reactionary step is evidence of growing conservatism among Disciples. Quite the contrary. It is the growth of liberal viewpoint among an increasing number, which has caused more conservative members to seek to force the issue, and thus, as they think, check the liberal movement. Eventually their effort will fail. The conservative position is untenable and must sooner or later give way.

Congregational Students at Carleton

Congregational students lead in numbers at Carleton College, as compared with other denominations. There are 244 out of a total enrollment of 849. Twenty-five churches are represented, and only eight students have no church preference or affiliation. Several Western states, three Eastern states, and China and South Africa contribute to the Congregational roll. One new student is the son of missionaries under the American Board at Tunghsien, Peking, China. He is Lyman Martin, son of Mr. and Mrs. H. S. Martin, graduates of the class of 1903 from Carleton College.

Eight Carleton students who spent their vacation in summer church and Sunday school service have returned to school. Their work ranged from performing baptismal rites to directing social activities in their parishes, and they are all enthusiastic about results. One of the group, a young man, has accepted a pastorate in the Congregational Church at Zumbrota, Minn. He motors down every Sunday morning for church and Sunday school, and pursues his studies at Carleton during the week.

On Sunday, Oct. 18, "Carleton College Day" was quite generally observed in the Congregational churches of Minnesota. In several of the churches members of the college faculty preached by request. Some of the churches, for the convenience of their program, chose another date. Among the special speakers on Oct. 18 was Dr. Percy T. Watson, of Fenchow, Shansi, China, who is in America on furlough.

Two of Carleton's senior students were elected to Phi Beta Kappa this fall.

Washington Sectional Meetings

Held in Connection with the National Council, October 27

Religious Education

This very important conference was held in First Church, Washington. Dr. Herbert W. Gates, presiding, had assembled a strong battery of educational leaders in a symposium which will be of lasting value to the large company who attended. Dr. Gates recommended, for the vital work of teacher-training, that every school should have a teachers' and officers' conference with a series of topics laid out for a year, recommending strongly Miss Margaret Slattery's You Can Learn to Teach and Frank Wade Smith's How to Improve Your Sunday School, the latter meeting practical problems in almost every type of church; also Erwin L. Shaver's important new book, The Project Principle in Religious Education, giving a list of 77 descriptions of projects that have been successfully carried out in school groups from primary to adult.

Dr. Gates introduced Dr. John L. Lobingier, a missionary-educator-pastor, the author of World Friendships through the Church School and Projects in World Friendship. Dr. Lobingier brought out the place and value of missionary education in the local church. This education should work upon Personality, with the aim to make each individual a friendly man or woman, with an emotional loyalty. It should work on the Church that it may find and keep its soul in the missionary passion. It should center, in these days, upon World Friendship. Christianity always widens individual lives out of provincialism; it creates the international mind. If the very word missionary in the church gets a chilly reception, use "World Friendship." Rev. Erwin L. Shaver spoke in explanation of the Project Method of Religious Education. It is "getting method over into life," as instanced by one church which in marble time informed its boys that the lads of a certain city in India did not even have marbles, whereupon these American boys took a community marble offering and appeared at church the following Sunday with bulging pockets-ful, all of which were sent to supply this important element in a Christian civilization to their dark brother boys.

The Project Principle in Religious Education is the first book to deal extensively with the project approach in religious education. Part I is a careful and lucid treatment of theory and technique. The nature of the project principle; the project principle in relation to the curriculum; and the distinctive task of religious education are here taken up. While Mr. Shaver insists on high educational ideals throughout, he is thoroughly aware of the necessity of helping teachers to begin where they are, and one finds in Part I such definitely practical chapter themes as "Carrying through a Project," "Discovering Pupils' Interests," "Using the Techniques of Teaching," and "Introducing Project-Teaching."

The 77 descriptions of project teaching in Part II represent 53 qualified contributors in addition to Mr. Shaver, and contain accounts of over 100 distinct main projects. They are classified by church-school departments and show the possibilities of the use of the project method with children of all ages.

A captivating feature of this conference was the description by Miss Frances Weld Danielson of a period with her little people, the primaries, showing how, with such resources as they all had at hand, a cheerless back yard was transformed into a gladsome garden, and bringing out the still more beautiful flowers of good will and truth and reverence which this common task brought forth in the lives of boys and girls.

The conference, all too limited in time, at least, served to show the mine openings from which our Congregational educational leaders are bringing out the precious metals of Christian teaching for our coming leaders.

Country Life Institute

The Country Life Institute was held in Room 5 of the Washington Auditorium, Tuesday morning, Oct. 27. There is an indescribable correspondence between the human nature we find in all rural sections and the setting which it has from nature. The secret of the success of the men and women who are really doing things in these regions is that they relate the human quality of their work to the physical atmosphere.

The seamy side of life in Aroostook County, Maine, was visualized by Benjamin Andrews, Wilbur I. Bull, and Mrs. Hilda Ives. Their talks were called "Five Minute Nuggets" by Dr. Malcolm Dana, who presided. They described the new rural movement in which the church is not an end in itself, but a means of elevating a "natural trade unit," that is a community with common commercial ties. This larger parish covers many miles, but is all linked up with a central station. The professional men of the whole territory live here, and radiate to its extreme points. It seems the better plan to make contacts between people in these hidden places, and the banks, hospitals, and markets of the central station. The staff of missionaries not only preach, but aid in effecting these secular contacts. They touch the people in their deepest economic needs and thus win their truest loyalty to the church.

Some most touching incidents of healing were related. There is not much theological prejudice out in the open spaces. Any real human leadership is appreciated. All these workers in Maine told of the responsiveness of the whole countryside, when approached in this common-sense way.

E. L. Larson of Nebraska told of the double life of the cowboy, who moves out from the village where he winters on to the ranch for the summer. Our trained leaders follow up these young men, who have only known of religion in the terms of a few spasms of poor evangelism. The ranches are ten miles apart. All social organization is at a minimum. They never hear a locomotive whistle, except over the radio. Guy M. Van Buskirk of Illinois, Elmer H. Johnson of Montana, and N. C. Wallin of Wyoming all declared that "Saint Henry of Detroit" had made it possible to develop a new missionary technique in this long-distance service. A good set of "Ford" wheels will readjust any man to the work. "A good first-class Montana man would not care to live in some of the rural sections of New England, for they are too thickly populated." Great emphasis was put upon the fact that the distance which separates is not physical but spiritual, for a minister might wait six years to get an interview in a city. "If you do get to a man in the city, he always tells his friends how terribly he was bored." It is not so out in the open spaces of the inter-mountain regions.

A staff of pastors, with a different type of work for each, one social, one recreational, and another religious, has solved the problem of fellowship. They check up at staff meetings once a week. Thus there is a larger circulation. Communities are really thrown together through vacation schools. The transportation problem is the greatest, and this has now b solved.

Charles H. Baldwin told of his work in w ern and southeastern Massachusetts. And t jump from Montana to Massachusetts did seem unnatural, for the prejudiced backgrou of the New England farmer is as hard to ov come as that of the "hard-boiled" cowb Scout programs worked well. Courses at Agricultural College in Amherst resulted in complete transformation of some young m These material approaches led straight to real appreciation of the church in these h side towns. Even fishing expeditions were ranged to get the young men out of blind alle Mr. Baldwin satisfied the critics of his metho when he said "every field was in a class itself." A town within twenty miles of B ton had reached a tragic condition, but t introduction of free bus transportation a good preaching completely changed the sit ation.

At the end of these testimonies directly fro the field, a discussion of the interlocking pro lems of city and country brought out some an lytic thinking. Dr. Ashley Day Leavitt Brookline expressed his great appreciati of the words of these picked workers, comparin their reports to the Book of Acts. He deplore the attitude which treated the countryman a special kind of an animal, and yet thoug the approach in the rural districts and that the down town church more distinct. W should differentiate the need in a way to carr no prejudice. Men of the finest spirit we needed in this rural work, men like the stu dent who said, "Show me the place nearest he I want to work there." The romance, swin and challenge of the foreign missionary servi should be transferred to the rural work. Re blooded men should be thrilled to specializ for a life work along this line. The open space of our land should offer a challenge matchin that which came to the student volunteer move ment.

City Church Work

At the Sectional Conference on Church Wor in Cities Rev. George F. Kenngott spoke fro the point of view of the Los Angeles Societ for Church Extension. He deprecated the us of the word "missionary" in the titles of thes societies as misleading. Added effectiveness he thought, would be gained by having a ger eral director of religious education, a directo of music, and other such directors of specia departments of church work, in the employ o city church extension societies. He gave inter esting data on the starting of new churche by such societies with the expectation of thei becoming "home bases," and he described how strategic sites have been purchased by the Lo Angeles Society for new churches, sites whic were soon increased in value manifold.

Rev. J. R. Nichols of Chicago spoke of th relation of physical equipment to spiritua efficiency and carried further Dr. Kenngott' thought that the city's societies should give ne churches they establish the sort of plant an position calculated to make an impression o the community. Where schools and librarie and business institutions are being housed i structures of architectural beauty and dignity Christian loyalty must count similarly attrac ive church buildings no less necessary. Ugli ness is no longer identified with piety and church may use helpfully more than a mer place of worship. Protestants build statel nes, but too often leave it to Roman Catho- to build stately churches.

From the Minneapolis and St. Paul urch extension work Rev. J. R. Miller ought a stirring message on "City Evangel- tion." The city is just people, he said, and e-seventh of the people in our country are our 12 largest cities. They are to be ached for Christ by an evangelization which in the broadest sense evangelical, and which cludes evangelism and service alike, recog- ing that we may often find the eyes of the rit, as Jesus did, through touching the eyes the body.

"Keeping up with the Cities" was the sub- t used by Rev. John L. Kilbon of New rk in discussing some of the church prob- ns arising from rapidly shifting populations. ere is danger that the ideal of institutional intenance and growth be substituted for at of evangelization. The church is a social stitution, but even more it is the embodi- nt of Christ. There should be less shyness the part of Christians, then, in making their ewpoint known to their neighbors. Where ey will do so they will help keep up the neces- y Christian institutions.

Social Relations

The large place which social relations held the mind of the Council was indicated by e fact that on the day of sectional meetings, e largest meeting place, namely, the Audi- rium itself, was given to the social relations oup, John Calder presiding.

Dr. Jerome Davis was obliged to return to ile and so Secretary Herring spoke briefly the Social Creed. He said that the place social service was wherever there is a strain human relations, wherever the social fabric ows signs of tearing, there to present the rist of reconciliation. Its business is more an community houses and Boy Scouts. It to teach men constructive and world-minded cial thinking. The Creed itself has helped to clarify our own conviction. It is not a ed form; its revision is to go on continually. he church's business is to translate it from printed pamphlet into terms of life. The al work has just begun.

Working Woman

Mary Anderson, chief of the Woman's Bu- au of the National Department of Labor, oke on "Uncle Sam and the Working oman." Most women are working at the less illed trades nine and ten hours and even more day. They are largely "machine tenders," here the endless repetition is a monotonous ind. While believing that machinery ought do most of the laborious work, the danger the machine tender is the "machine mind." he eight-hour day would be a boon to such.

Two million married women are working in r factories, and doing another day's work home. They prefer to work at night when eir children are in bed. This militates against e best family life. In days gone by the saloon id much to do with this condition. Now man id wife are working because of the higher andards of living.

Miss Anderson pleaded for the eight-hour y for women as more productive as well as ore humane. Light, heat, comfort, safety, elfare, and all things that better the condi- n of the worker make for better production. closing she said, "No religion can escape the sponsibility for the industrial life of today."

Anthracite Ethics

"The Ethical Aspects of Anthracite" was e timely theme of Father John A. Ryan of e National Catholic Welfare Council. All onomic questions are at the heart, moral. The crucial question is "right or wrong?" "just or unjust?" Four parties are concerned in the anthracite strike, labor, capital, consumer, and the government, the latter especially because the anthracite industry is a monopoly.

The first thing is to get at the facts,—all the facts. We don't always get them. An editorial in a Washington paper represents the check-off as already in operation. Lewis, the head of the miners, in giving the enormous profits of the companies, quotes only the four most prosperous, while operators, in an advertisement of the miners getting $14 per day, are giving the highest, not typical wages. Labor demands a ten per cent increase for contract or piece work and a one dollar per day increase for day workers. Also it demands the check-off, that the companies deduct enough from the pay envelopes to pay the union dues. Already they collect from the miners for supplies. The union refuses to arbitrate, because it has the upper hand and because it says that it is hard to find an impartial arbitrator. Dr. Ryan believes while this is not easy, it is possible to find "competent as well as fair-minded arbitrators."

Roger W. Babson

The Congregational layman, distinguished as a statistician, who was prominent in the National Council

Who shall pay increased wages? While some companies get enormous profits, as high as seventy per cent, some on account of the high cost of production make small profits. Hence these high cost mines could not pay the increased cost. Not much could be cut from the profits of the distributor or the retailer. Therefore it must come from the consumer at the price of at least an extra dollar a ton and perhaps more. Here lies the rub between the "comfort wage" of the miner and the "comfort wage" of the consumer. Father Ryan was not ready to advise the miners (though much less in numbers than the consumers) to give up for the sake of the consumer.

The remedy he suggests is reorganization, either by the companies themselves or by the government. The companies might pool expenses, get unified operation and become their own distributors and thus lower the cost to the consumer. This they will not do. The only satisfactory settlement is for the government to take over and operate the mines. Since the anthracite mines are all in Pennsylvania it would be better for that state rather than the Federal Government to do it. The United States Coal Commission says that we cannot eliminate the high cost mines; all are needed to supply the anthracite demand. Many questions were asked of the speaker and a lively interest was manifest.

The Trend in Industry

Robert W. Bruere of the Survey spoke on "The Present Trend in Industry." He illustrated the changed conditions in the anthracite industry in 1901 when John Mitchell was leader of only 8,000 union men out of a total force of 100,000. In the strike of 1902-03 the operators in fact recognized collective bargaining, but it took 17 years before they recognized organized labor in 1920. It is strange that the fine group of men on both sides have such hard work to come together on common ground.

On the other hand after the railroad shopmen's strike in 1922, the head of the union went to Willard, the president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and asked if they could not get away from class struggle to inter-group cooperation. Willard himself had been a wage-worker on the railroad. They started their experiment in the Glenwood shop, the worst of all. The result was improvement in efficiency, in working condition, and in service. The inter-group co-operation spread not only all over the Baltimore and Ohio, but to other railroads and even to Canada.

The test came when the men wanted and demanded an increase in wages at a time when the company needed to keep up its balance sheet to insure the sale of new bonds to retire old ones.

The company and men met in friendly conference. After putting their demands as strongly as possible, the representative of the men said, "But we are not going to let this interfere with our co-operative relations." Willard said, "I had expected to stand pat but your attitude has touched me deeply. We must find a way out." Much depends on the representatives of labor and capital and their attitude toward each other.

Socializing the Pulpit

"Socializing the Pulpit" was the topic of Dr. A. W. Palmer of Oak Park, Ill. No man has the right to preach the social gospel unless he first knows how to preach the individual gospel, the priestly application of the mind of Christ to the problems of the soul. He must first preach a spiritual gospel, not lecturing on social ethics but convicting the world of sin.

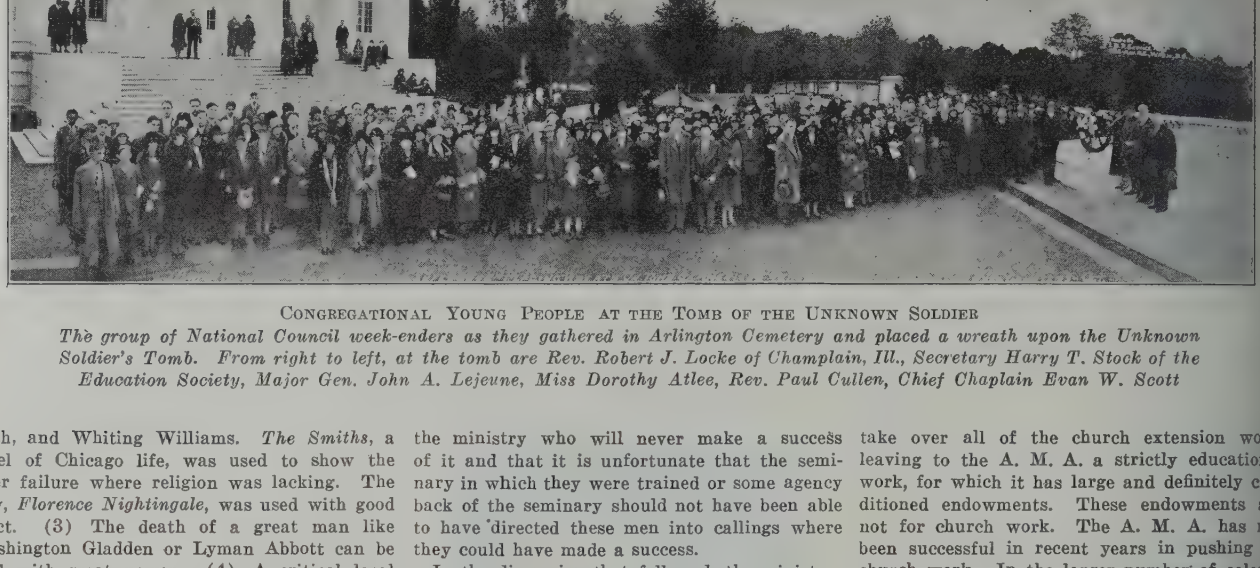
Our commission to preach the social gospel will depend on one's sense of sin. We need to see not only personal sins such as selfishness, drunkenness, and hypocrisy, but community sins, stunted children, poor housing, and the backwash of the war. Wherever there is sin there your gospel goes. Then you become a prophet and bring prophetic application of the mind of Christ to the problems of modern society, citizenship, playgrounds, housing conditions, temperance, industrial relations, and inter-racial good will and international peace.

You must know your facts. A sound course in economics, sociology, and social psychology should be given in the training of every minister.

You should have experience in industrial relations. Here Dr. Palmer spoke of his own experience in a carpet store. A year in a factory would be good training for every preacher.

But how shall we preach? (1) Use special days! "The Christlikeness of Lincoln and his birthday"; Memorial Day, "What heroism for today?"; July Fourth, "What freedom means"; Labor Day, "Christ and Labor"; Armistice Day, "The New Conscience about War"; Thanksgiving, "Our debt to the Puritans"; and the Welfare Drive, "Except the Lord build the house."

(2) Use new books with a social message, like those of Will Irwin, Rockefeller, Arthur



CONGREGATIONAL YOUNG PEOPLE AT THE TOMB OF THE UNKNOWN SOLDIER

The group of National Council week-enders as they gathered in Arlington Cemetery and placed a wreath upon the Unknown Soldier's Tomb. From right to left, at the tomb are Rev. Robert J. Locke of Champlain, Ill., Secretary Harry T. Stock of the Education Society, Major Gen. John A. Lejeune, Miss Dorothy Atlee, Rev. Paul Cullen, Chief Chaplain Evan W. Scott

Nash, and Whiting Williams. The Smiths, a novel of Chicago life, was used to show the utter failure where religion was lacking. The play, Florence Nightingale, was used with good effect. (3) The death of a great man like Washington Gladden or Lyman Abbott can be used with great power. (4) A critical local situation like the sugar strike in Hawaii, where Dr. Palmer, a college president, and a physician, came together and studied and then made a proposition to each party to the strike. The companies absolutely refused to treat and then Dr. Palmer took it to his pulpit. Did he lose prestige or position? No!

Remember always to do it graciously, to speak the truth in love.

(5) Interweave it in current sermons. This makes the social gospel a part of religion, the main top and not a side-show. It enables you to pick up illustrations out of the day's news.

(6) Practice the social gospel! Gymnasiums, parish hours, Boy Scouts, community service of every kind, but use these not as bait but as service.

They will hear your spiritual message if you have been socially minded and served the communities' needs.

Strengthening Our Ministry

The leader of this section was Supt. Charles C. Merrill of the Illinois Conference. The discussion revolved around the following topics:

Can our theological seminaries devise and carry out plans for more careful selective admission and selective graduation, to the end that men shall not be sent out into pastorates, no matter what their scholastic standing may be, who do not exhibit definite promise of substantial success as pastors of churches?

Can our theological seminaries devise and carry out plans for giving more concreteness to their training for the pastorate, particularly in the way of making the practical service which students render in churches as pastors and assistants an essential part of the curriculum, to be carried on under faculty supervision?

Can something in the way of a "Sabbatical Year" be devised for the ministry, whereby from time to time a minister can return to the seminary and take a course there which will help him to be a stronger and more resourceful minister?

What steps can be taken to increase the salaries of Congregational ministers, with the thought that no man shall be asked to serve a church for an amount which will not permit him to render efficient service?

What can be done to insure longer pastorates and when there must be a change, to enable a man to move in a satisfactory way?

How can the quality of Congregational preaching be improved?

Dr. Merrill made an opening statement showing the problems of the ministerial relationship to the churches as seen by a state superintendent. He indicated that there are men in the ministry who will never make a success of it and that it is unfortunate that the seminary in which they were trained or some agency back of the seminary should not have been able to have directed these men into callings where they could have made a success.

In the discussion that followed, the ministers criticized themselves very severely. They held that for the most part the failures of ministers can be charged up to themselves. It was recognized that churches not infrequently make life hard for the minister but they also held that in the majority of cases the minister makes his own destiny.

A good deal of discussion was given to methods of increasing the minister's salary and making it possible for him to have books and other necessities of his calling. It was especially urged that seminaries use the laboratory method in giving direction to their students in their early preaching and pastoral work.

The remainder of this session was under the leadership of Rev. Lewis T. Reed and the topic was, "Enlisting Followers of Christ." Rev. A. B. Patten, Rev. Frederick W. Gordon, Rev. Wilmer P. Johnston, and Rev. A. E. Bartlett led the discussion. Many unusual methods of recruiting the church membership and of getting decisions for Christ were described. All of these apparently were dependent finally upon the leadership of the minister in dealing with individuals and his ability to enlist laymen in this service. None of these leaders use emotional adult revivalism for recruiting.

Some Merger Suggestions

To the Editor of The Congregationalist:

May I call your attention to the fact that in the discussion of the merger of the homeland societies at Washington, which resulted in the decision to place all these agencies under one board, very little was said about the details of the consolidation, as to the distribution of the work to be done in the separate bureaus or divisions of the Homeland Society. It was provided, of course, that the three homeland divisions now operating under the Extension Boards should be completely merged. Just as the debate was to close I took occasion to suggest two matters that had not been discussed:

First, the overlapping of the church extension work as carried on by the Home Missionary Society and the A. M. A. For years the church extension and maintenance work among the colored people, the Indians, and the Chinese and Japanese has been carried on by the A. M. A. in the same territory where the Home Missionary Society is doing its work. My suggestion was that the Home Missionary Society take over all of the church extension work leaving to the A. M. A. a strictly educational work, for which it has large and definitely conditioned endowments. These endowments are not for church work. The A. M. A. has not been successful in recent years in pushing its church work. In the larger number of colored associations there have been for several years net losses in membership. The A. M. A. has neither the means nor the organization to help these churches. In several cases the colored church in the vicinity of the A. M. A. school has for its pastor the president of the school a white man. Of course this is due to the necessity for economy, but it would be impossible to expect a strong church to grow out of such arrangements. On the other hand, the Home Missionary Society is equipped and is expected by the churches to plant and push Congregational churches, regardless of race or color. It has the Building Society at hand to assist in equipping these churches, and nowhere are the churches in such need of modern equipment as are these colored churches. It has the Sunday school agency to help the colored churches do a better class of work in the Sunday school. Moreover, it will eliminate the color line in our church extension work, and put the colored and Indian churches on a parity with the work among whites.

Second, the Foundation for Education was organized four years ago to care for the colleges and academies that were being feebly looked after by the Education Society. Following the report of a competent committee it was decided to place the care of these schools, most of whom were in desperate need, under a new board composed of competent educational men and certain pastors and laymen. The four years of Dr. Nash's administration justified the plan and helped to save several of these institutions from extinction. Now they are to be returned to the Education Society, which never had, and has not now, a consuming interest in preserving them. My suggestion was that these interests should be conveyed to the A. M. A., which, relieved of its church extension work, would then become strictly an educational board to care for all the institutional work of the denomination. Its board could be so chosen as to gather our strongest educational experts, of which Congregationalists have many, and once more make Congregationalism stand for the highest ideals of education, in which field we have been steadily slumping.

I may add in conclusion that in talking with the colored delegates at Washington I found them unanimously in favor of the plan I have suggested of relieving the A. M. A. of all church work.

The National Council Exhibits

ignificant Evidence of Many Kinds of Good Work

WHILE the amplifiers were repeating in their metallic tones the voices of the men the platform in the upper hall of the Audi-rium at Washington, the exhibit booths in e lower hall were really speaking in no less ear tones of the glory and genius of the urches of our order. Not only were the his-ric traditions of Congregationalism in evi-nce, but the educational, literary, missionary, d building programs were written in plain aracters all over these sections.

At one end was the exhibit of the Congrega-nal Home Missionary Society. In a most ılistic manner the three original "covered .gons" spanned the century of the society's ırk. Nothing could be more symbolical of beginnings of things. On the hooped can-s-top of one of these wagons was a chart owing the various ways home missionaries ve served in their fields. They were pictured traveling on horse-back, then in wagons, er by bicycle, motor cycle, and lastly by rd.

A remembered touch was the very inflamed ir of red soles hanging below the chart and ıring the legend, "often they walked."

Few appreciate that the Home Missionary ciety stands at the portals of the nation to lcome all newcomers. Mrs. J. H. Heald, at Paso, Tex., is working among Spanish Amer-ns in the Southwest, and Mrs. Jennie Pratt, charge of the Ellis Island kindergarten work, es the human touch to the children entering m foreign lands. Specimens of the work ne by the children themselves under her di-tion were most interesting. Language teach-g by pictures of words was impressively given. Breakfast" was represented by a bowl of real in front of a child. "Cleanliness" also is emphasized. Two little boys with tooth-ushes were demonstrating to little folks the cessity of caring for the teeth. The foreign-aking work of Ellis Island extends all over e country. One hundred and seven Swedish urches, 15 Slovak, Danish, Norwegian, and nnish chapels speak for themselves.

An outstanding department is that which is ving the migrant Negroes. This work is in e North and is under the supervision of ırold M. Kingsley.

We then follow the trail into the exhibits the Sunday School Extension Society. The ıation of 50 young people who were doing mmer student work in the season of 1925 re indicated in a striking way by electric hts on the map of the United States, for ch one. In this large daily vacation Bible ıooling, three lights appeared in Hawaii. A oup of boys in Chelsea under the direction a Harvard student made this suggestive map. The quality of leadership developed by this ın is illustrated by the panorama photo show-g Shungo Sakamaki of the University of nolulu organizing a Sunday school rally of ıny hundred.

These pictures of pioneer Sunday schools in e missionary states of the Southeast, South-st, Northwest, and Far West, revealed the tivities of young folks of today, all of col-ge grade, with intellectual grip, and all Con-egationalists. One hundred and fifteen Sun-y schools were organized by this comprehen-ve plan last year.

The Congregational Education Society is re-onsible for a combination work in both state ıiversities and in the churches. The Foun-ıtion for Education furnished funds for 40 stitutions of learning under denominational auspices. It also assists in plans of administration. The main exhibit was of the new Schauffler Missionary Training School at Cleveland, which gives instruction to foreign and native born girls.

A feature of this exhibit which attracted crowds every day were the articles of embroidered linen of which the flax was grown, spun, and woven by one of the Slovak students before coming to America. This girl had never seen a Bible until a colporteur, four years ago, put one in her hands. In a short time she gathered the persecuted exiles in a neighboring village and read to them. She came to this country, married one of the Schauffler students, and is now planning to return to her country as a missionary. Her portrait discloses a strong, eager, dramatic witness to the discovery that comes through a reading of God's word.

The movement to safeguard the ministry has reached the point where nine million dollars are in reserve as contrasted with the seventeen millions of the Episcopalians. The underlying foundation of the Annuity Fund is the Pilgrim Memorial Fund. The greatest solicitude remains with regard to the $800,000 unpaid pledges. This fact makes the ultimate goal seem dim and far away. Another fact stressed in the exhibit is that we ask much less of our ministers than the Presbyterians and Methodists, the former taking seven and one-half per cent of the ministers' salary for their church pension fund, the latter taking eight per cent, while we take only three per cent.

The exhibit of the Church Building Society featured the various types of architecture used in the denomination from the Colonial at Rollins College, Winter Park, Fla., to the fine new Gothic at Fort Wayne, Ind. In a university center of Missoula, Mont., the Spanish type appeared. There was something emblematical of defense as well as light in all the buildings from the first old church at Plymouth built in 1622 on the hill-top. One city church on the Pacific Coast has grown to such strength that it seems incredible that it was once helped by the Building Society. The booth showed the comprehensiveness of the work, not only the little country church being aided, but the church that is built to impress the community in metropolitan districts. If this is boosted and gets a start, it serves ten times as many people. Parsonages all over the land and a parish house at Durham, N. H., stand for the money put in by this organization.

The distinctive thing about the A. M. A. exhibit was the revelation of the Negro race's ability and inclination to help itself rise. When the work began, every school had a full white faculty. Now half of the 22 schools have Negro principals. Educationally they are in the lead. The tuition paid by Negro parents totals $100,000 a year. This is six times as much as the original budget of the A. M. A., also one half as much as all white Congregationalists contribute to the work. Notable pictures in the booth were the types of architecture in the dormitory of Talladega and Ryder Hospital at Humacao, Porto Rico. The society's service for "Americans of nine races" was outlined from the palm trees to the intermountain region.

The Schauffler dormitory at Cleveland for training foreign girls to work among their own people is a project that drew attention during the Council's session to the booth of the Woman's Federation. Forty-five state unions illustrate unified promotion which women have developed in missionary study. All originated in the "New Hampshire Female Cent Institution" 116 years ago. No more appealing work was in evidence than that among the migrant farm and canning workers who live in camps and shacks. Here is no true child life until these missionary stations give the children a chance.

Howard University naturally was considered by all the delegates. Many visited it and were astonished at its expansion, its modern equipment, and its campus of twenty acres, and those who did not do so were under its spell during the university chorus singing in the Auditorium Thursday evening. The magnitude of Howard's achievements since the close of the World War can only be estimated by the picture in the booth showing the distribution of the graduates in foreign lands. Two other photos were evidential, that of the student army training corps and that of President Coolidge addressing the body at Commencement, 1924.

The American Bible Society displayed the Scriptures in most attractive pig-skin bindings, suggesting Roosevelt's library. A banner hung above the booth which was carried on an elephant's side in a procession in Siam. A chart declared that a new translation appears every six weeks.

The unique feature of the exhibit of the A. B. C. F. M. was the credit the Christian Church is receiving from the Chinese for pushing the Bible in the vernacular. The younger literary men of China here joined the movement and feel that the Board has done for the Chinese what Dante did for the Italians. The posters issued by the Stewart Fund were of singular interest.

A most human appeal was made by a picture of a nurse holding an "opium baby" at Wai, India.

In the section devoted to work in the Philippines it was noted that each denomination puts over the church door the word "Evangelical," then underneath in small brackets the denominational name. After looking at the beautifully carved metal work of the Mohammedan Moros, it was reassuring to learn of this great piece of missionary team-work in Mindanao which had captured the good will of this race. Respect for our flag has come through the missionaries. One of the biggest things in any board exhibit is always the collection of shields, war clubs, and wonderful bead-work of the Zulus, but this year against this background was a little glass case which acted like a magnet to the delegates, for it contained letters of the great Livingstone.

The crowd in the exhibition hall was not slow in recognizing the importance of the project to erect a national church in the capital. The preliminary sketch of the new down-town building for the First Congregational Church gripped all the pilgrims. Had the founders of the church been city planners they scarcely could have chosen a site for the First Church which would have more nearly coincided with the place designated by the great French architect, for L'Enfant picked the site for a "national church" where the Patent Office now stands.

The Pilgrim Press book stand, in charge of Managers Finley and McKenzie of the Chicago and Boston Book Stores, with competent assistants, was a constant center of interest. The large and attractive stock of books there dwindled steadily as the visitors yielded to the lure of the latest and best in good literature.

Many friendly visitors were received at The Congregationalist booth, where copies of the paper were distributed with literature regarding it and souvenir pencils. The booth was attractively decorated, and arranged with writing tables and comfortable chairs, for the benefit of the visitors, and Miss Katharine C. Churchill of the Circulation Department graciously served as hostess. Many names were enrolled in the Guest Book and many subscriptions to The Congregationalist were received.

The Commissions on Missions, Social Service, Religious Education, and other good causes were well represented in the exhibit sections.

Medical Secretary for the Board

At the annual meeting in Washington the bylaws of the American Board were amended so as to allow for the election of a Medical Secretary, "whose duties shall be those of investigating the health of candidates for missionary appointment; supervising the care of the health

MARK HOPKINS WARD, M.D.
Newly appointed medical secretary of the American Board of missionaries, both at home and abroad; supervising the medical work on the field; and performing such other duties as the board or the prudential committee shall direct."

This action grew out of the vote taken by the board in Providence last year, following the presentation of an able paper on the subject prepared and read by Dr. Joel Goldthwait of Boston. Other medical men, especially Dr. John C. Berry of Worcester, Mass., formerly a medical missionary in Japan, later a member of the Prudential Committee, and also Dr. George L. Richards of Fall River, a well-known specialist who has traveled extensively in the mission fields abroad, had not a little to do with the creation of an atmosphere favorable to the acceptance of Dr. Goldthwait's proposition.

This step, long advocated by the foreign secretaries and other officers of the board, and by the missionaries as well, is taken none too soon. Alongside of the personal problem of the missionary, so vitally affecting the efficiency of the work, has been the problem of administering the large number of hospitals and dispensaries under the care of the board. Indeed, the medical arm of the service has reached such proportions that it requires the oversight of an official who has himself received medical training and who, preferably, has had experience in medical work under the board.

The first medical secretary of the board is Dr. Mark Hopkins Ward, who has been serving at headquarters the past two years and more. He is no stranger to our readers or to the missionaries on the field. Indeed he is veritably a child of the board, his father being Langdon H. Ward, former treasurer of the board, and his mother, Laura A. Bliss, of the famous Bliss family of Turkey. His six brothers and sisters have served in connection with the board in Turkey, India, or China, all of those living now being in some form of foreign missionary work.

Dr. Ward was born in Newton Centre, Mass., in 1884; graduated from Amherst College in 1906, and from the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Columbia University, in 1912. After two years of interneship in New York he was appointed missionary of the American Board to Turkey, arriving at Constantinople in October, 1915. Later he was transferred to the Eastern Turkey Mission and located at Harpoot. During the war he was in medical service in France. Later he served under the Near East Relief at Harpoot; and, when asked to retire by the Turks, joined the forces of the American Board in Boston, where he has since served as acting candidate secretary and medical adviser.

Impressions of the National Council

By A Reporter

What is the significance of the National Council now that it has passed into history?

(1) It was not concerned with theological controversy at all. The Fundamentalist-Modernist debate, so prominent at most denominational conferences, was conspicuous by its absence. The Council did not try to form a theological creed. It did not promulgate any theological statement as at Kansas City. It was more concerned with religion.

(2) Its emphasis was on the social and the industrial and not the theological. The most largely attended sectional meeting was that on social relations. The most thrilling debate was on the social creed or social statement,—the attempt to state the teachings of Jesus in terms of living conditions of today. The statement did not please everybody, but everybody was interested in it. "Too advanced," said some. "Forward looking," said those who worked for it. "There are manufacturers who are running their business according to those principles, not in the name of Christianity, but efficiency. Can the church afford to follow instead of lead in social ethics?" said John Calder, chairman of the Commission on Social Relations.

(3) The Council was "forward-looking": it did not hark back to the past nor call up traditions and history as much as usual. "One of the functions of the church is to discover new duties, to develop new and startling extensions of old ethical principles, to apply them and to teach them to the world as a whole." These are the words of a Congregational layman, E. E. Slosson, in Sermons of a Chemist. He adds, "For the church as a leader there is more demand than ever before; for the church as a follower there is no vacancy. As a duplicator, as a drag, the church looks sadly out of place; but a church with imagination, with ideals, will make its own place." This forward look was shown in the Council's social statement. This was at the heart of the "merger" of the missionary societies, future efficiency rather than past history. For the first time the young people had an integral part in its program and proceedings. The Congregationalists of the future had part and portion with the men and women of yesterday. In the sermon of Dr. Patton, and in many speeches the liberal and progressive note was heard. Congregationalists are keeping step with the best thought of the scientific and religious world. They are not marking time.

(4) While little was done officially looking toward a men's movement like the Unitarian Men's League or the men's activities among the Universalists led by Arthur Nash, there was a concrete emphasis on the place of laymen in the churches. There were five laymen and three women on the important Committee Twelve. The Moderator was a layman, also t Honorary Moderator. Men like John Calde Roger Babson, and Henry M. Beardsley we very much to the fore. Some of the be speeches made to the Young People's Pilgrim age were by such laymen like Congressma Kelly of Pennsylvania, a Presbyterian, an General Lejeune, an Episcopal vestryma Never was there time in the national life whe Christian laymen of the highest type were s prominent in public and official life. See Th Congregationalist's "Who's Who in Washing ton!"

(5) The Council shows that we believe i getting together. The largest Council ever wa assembled far away from the center of popu lation of Congregationalists. We are gettin a denominational consciousness and are inte ested in what the Congregational Churches d as a whole. What the National Council say and does counts more than ever in its history We are beginning to put the emphasis on fe lowship equally at least with the independenc of the local church.

(6) We need something more than machin ery or methods. Mergers, social creeds, com missions, exhibits, and talk is all right! Wha Congregationalism needs is a dynamic. W need a spiritual urge to get out and do Christ' work in Christ's way. We need a passion o soul and a power of heart to carry the messag of the Master into the heart of the world. W need a soul-gripping personal experience whic shall fit us to preach a gospel of the spirit As Dr. Lichliter said in his soul stirring ap peal, we need to pray. Create in me a clea heart, oh God; and renew a right spirit withi me. . . . Then will I teach transgressors th ways; and sinners shall be converted unto thee

Thanksgiving

By Louella C. Poole

Again the blessed season comes
That ancient custom sets apart
For special praise and gratitude
From every overflowing heart.
And once again for all good gifts
We offer thanks, O Lord, to thee—
For progress as we stumbling go,
So human frail and weak are we.

That this sad world's great throbbing heart
Inclines to peace and brotherhood
At last, so weary 'tis of strife;
That man has longings for the good
As ne'er before, though blind and weak
In judgment, maybe; that his ways
Tend slowly nearer to the right,—
We offer, Lord, our grateful praise.

That more of mercy, tenderness,
Of simple justice to the weak
And helpless creatures of the earth,
More hardihood with which to speak
And act in their defense prevails,—
More kindness to all things that live
Upon thy earth,—for this, O Lord,
For this our grateful thanks we give.

You and I will be long since passed away from this mortal sphere when the recognition of the complete unity of mankind is here; but, let me say, that day is coming, and when that day comes the patriotism of a nation will not have decreased but will have, then, for the first time in all the centuries of this world's history, its full opportunity. Then a nation will not attempt to live for itself, nor attempt to talk in such terms as "my country, right or wrong"; but every nation will consider itself in relation to every other nation, and there will be an interchange of mutual service. I look for that day as I look for the rising of the morning star.—Bishop Brent.

WITH THE CHILDREN

A Thanksgiving Crown

By Rose Brooks

Mrs. Martin's eyes were on the black cloud-shadows shifting up the slope of Mount Alexandria, but for once she failed to thrill to their beauty, as she sat at her desk by the north window, paper spread before her, pen ready to her hand.

"Lonesome — fiddlesticks!" she suddenly scolded herself aloud, for all alone in the house for the winter was Mrs. Martin. "I've got to get used to their being away. Tie them to my apron strings forever, I will not. Of course if they wanted to—If, of their own accord they wanted to"—and resolutely she wrote three short letters. Rapidly her pen covered the pages, and, the letters sealed, Mrs. Martin ran out to her letter box, perched on a sturdy post beyond the lilac bushes. "There!" she gayly saluted the little red flag as she stood it upright, a sign to the postman that letters lay within. Lonesome—fiddlesticks! I'll not be that kind of mother!"

Peter, Betty, and Jimsy Martin were all away at school for the first time. Long had been the planning, hard had been the saving, if father had lived! But since his going, never once had they fallen below his own high hopes for them. "A gentleman and a scholar—like father." What better memorial to any man than this, his children's phrase?

So September saw all three packed off for school,—budgets made, studies planned. No, Mother wouldn't leave the hills, she told them. How could they ask her to leave the hills? Lonesome? Think how busy she'd be! Hard to keep her little farmhouse warm? Poof! A wave of her hand toward the woodshed settled that. Hadn't her two stalwart boys chopped and sawed and piled wood to the roof?

The three notes sped on their way. In effect they were the same. Of muddy roads they told; of understanding of their good times they told; pride in their high standing; and last of all wouldn't they themselves prefer not to come home for Thanksgiving? Christmas was different. Of course they'd all be home for Christmas. Thanksgiving fares had been included, all around, in the budget; but from Wednesday night to Monday morning was a vacation short at best, and if, for any reason they preferred other Thanksgiving plans? Schoolmates urged them for the day, perhaps? Not out of duty were they to come—subtly the notes made that point clear, though not in so many words. And above all things, they were not to think of her as lonesome! Hadn't she birch logs snapping in the fireplaces? Hadn't she Shep and Puff for constant companions? Wasn't she as snug as the proverbial bug—her lot altogether enviable?

Three notes came promptly back. She was sure she wouldn't be disappointed? Marjorie Williams had asked her for Thanksgiving dinner—and there wasn't much time—and of course Christmas was different. Thus wrote Betty. And Mother, again at her desk, her eyes again on the shifting cloud-shadows which she didn't see, folded the note with a sigh and a smile, and picked up the letters from her boys. At the same school were the boys. They'd talked it over. Sure she wouldn't be lonesome if they didn't come home for Thanksgiving? There was to be a skating party, if only cold weather came early enough, and Bob Herrick's mother had asked them both for dinner, and fares did cost a lot, and Christmas would be here in a jiffy. She was sure?

"Puffball—lazybones!" Mother sat down on the hearthrug and stroked his golden length. "Have you any friends you'd like to invite to Thanksgiving dinner?" Puff opened a sleepy yellow eye, purred loudly, and reclosed his eye in slumber. "You haven't? Very well. How about you, Shep?" Shep, also stretched before the fire, thumped a lazy tail, but never so much as opened one eye. "Nor you? Very well. Thrown upon my own resources, I'll do my own inviting"; and taking up the telephone, she called up Burton village, five miles away.

"Mr. Fletcher? This is Mrs. Martin. Early for a Thanksgiving order, I know, but I want to engage your best turkey. The children? It's doubtful if they will be at home, but Thanksgiving is in the calendar, none the less. Lonesome? Not I! And a large pumpkin, and sweet cider, and three quarts of cranberries and two bunches of celery. Everything else I have, thank you. Real farmers we are, you know."

"Lonesome—fiddlesticks! Now let me see." In the old wing chair before the fire she sat and made her list. "I can hitch up old Bess and drive around and get them—all three. They'll have to come early and sit around the fire while I get dinner. Lonesome, indeed! Mrs. Green, "Uncle Tom" Burns, "Aunt Sally" Goodwin,—six mince pies, three pumpkin pies, cranberry jelly, celery, turnips, creamed carrots, potatoes, turkey! There, read it backwards, and you have my party, menu and guests included!"

The days passed till the day before Thanksgiving dawned—cold, and with a sugary sprinkle of snow that turned the hills to fairyland.

"The fun of getting ready for company!" Mother rolled and cut crust, and slipped pies into the oven. "I'm making enough, as though my guests were aged fifteen instead of seventy." At a suspicious choke, Mother shook her head in disgust at herself. "Lonesome—fiddlesticks! How many times must I say it? An apron-string mother I will not be."

"Puff and Shep," she announced gravely in the twilight, "you are hosts at a Thanksgiving party tomorrow." She paused at a distant crunch of wheels. "Too dark to see who's going past, Puff. You are to receive your guests"— The wheels weren't rattling down her own lane? Some one sick?

Mother flew to open the front door and was instantly smothered with kisses and hugged breathless.

"Mums!" Peter and Jimsy dragged her right-about-face.

"Mother! This is Marjorie Williams. She came home with me, instead of my going home with her"—

"Mums, this is Bob, and this is George. They've never had a real country Thanksgiving, and when the time came we couldn't stay away"—

"And we knew you didn't expect us, but we couldn't stay away; and we don't care if we don't have a thing for Thanksgiving but scrambled eggs, so we're home" —

"And griddlecakes!" suggested Peter with enthusiasm. "Anything's all right, Mums!"

Mother, her eyes like stars, looked at the eager, joyous faces swirling about her. "Griddlecakes? This minute! And tomorrow—well, there's always enough to eat in this house for an army. We're real farmers, you see," she explained to the young guests.

"Just what we said!" chorused Betty, Jimsy, and Peter. "Oh, Mums, to be home!"

"Mums, how did you know we were coming?" Jimsy, returned from the pantry on a maple-syrup quest, accused her, with eyes round as moons.

A rush for the pantry. "You guessed! We didn't surprise you!"

"We wanted to surprise you!"

"How could you know when we didn't know ourselves?"

"Six mince pies and the fattest turkey that ever I saw!"

"Surprised? Never was mortal so dumfounded. Speechless—with joy." Looking in her face, they knew she spoke true.

"But Thanksgiving was on the calendar, even if my children were away, and Shep and Puff and I invited guests"—

"You were lonesome!"

"Lonesome—fiddlesticks!"

"Oh, Mums, weren't you? We were." And Betty, Jimsy, and Peter gave her a bear hug, all at once.

"Who are your guests?" demanded Peter suddenly.

"The old dears!" said Betty, when she heard.

"I'll get 'em!" said Jimsy. "We love 'em," he explained to his friends.

"So will you," said Betty to Marjorie.

And in Mother's happy head sang itself a refrain: "Unspoiled! Unspoiled! The darlings. They wanted to come! They said they couldn't stay away!" They said themselves they couldn't stay away!"

A Thanksgiving feast as never was. The dining table pieced out by the hall table. Mrs. Green, "Uncle Tom," and "Aunt Sally" had frankly the best time in their "young-old" lives, and the boys and girls were bubbling springs of happiness from dawn to dark.

"Oh, Mums, to have a home to come to!" Peter sighed over his last piece of pie.

"You're all 'vited for Christmas!" said Jimsy, looking confidently at Mother, who beamed at him and said:

"Indeed you are—if you really want to come."

"Want to!" The chorus was unanimous.

"What you keep putting your hands up to your head for?" Aunt Sally leaned across the table to ask Mother gently. "Headache?"

"Headache? Never in the world. I'm feeling my crown. Can't you see it?"

"Mother, you're always saying things we can't guess!"

"How can you help seeing it? You said—you all said you couldn't stay away! Could any crown be of more shining gold?"

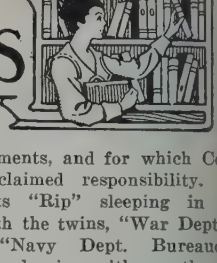
AMONG THE NEW BOOKS



Europe Through American Eyes

SOCIAL CLASSES IN POST-WAR EUROPE, by LOTHROP STODDARD (Scribners. $2.00). In the background of Mr. Stoddard's survey of classes in Europe and their inter-relations is the recognition that the Great War marks the beginning of a new epoch as definitely as did the fall of Rome, or the discovery of America. He falls back on much generalization when it comes to estimating the developments of the future, but he offers much valuable fact and comment upon the conditions of today which are likely to determine the Europe of tomorrow. His survey is in five chapters, in which he discusses successively The Peasants, The Urban Working Classes, The Middle Classes, The Intellectuals, and The Upper Classes. How deeply rooted and widespread are the forces that are quietly and persistently at work toward reconstructive social change is evident in the amount of space that Mr. Stoddard gives to an account of the Green International, an eastern European farmers' movement, the one definite policy of which is to break up large estates into small peasant holdings, and through strengthening the interests of the peasants make them numerically and economically the chief power in the state. On the whole one derives from Mr. Stoddard's survey an impression of optimism, though there are dark pages, and none darker than those that tell of the plight of the intellectuals, who have been hardest hit in the changes following the war.

EUROPE TURNS THE CORNER, by STANLEY HIGH (Abingdon Press. $2.00). Mr. High has put his optimism in his title. Much of it centers around the year 1924, which witnessed the rise to power of the Labor Government in England and the overthrow of Poincaré in France. Since then, however, both Ramsay MacDonald and Herriot have in turn been defeated. A Conservative Government rules in Britain, and France, still harassed by war, seems less disposed toward radicalism. None the less, though the promise of 1924 is not all fulfilled, there is much to justify the hopeful outlook of this volume. Mr. High has made a name for himself as an effective journalist. He combines in unusual balance passionate idealism and sanity of observation and judgment. Much in the present volume will not be new to our readers, but such chapters as the two on The Russian Riddle, and that on European Religious Reconstruction, cite facts and incidents in an illuminating way. In a chapter on the League of Nations the author gives his reasons for his conviction that that organization is gaining constantly in prestige and power, and in effectiveness as an agency of international peace.

BRITISH POLITICS IN TRANSITION, by EDWARD MCCHESNEY LAIT and DAVID P. BARROWS (World Book Co. $1.80). This book, in which two professors of the University of California have collaborated, is exceedingly important for the student of government and politics. It is a textbook which follows the case method. Probably in no country, not even our own, is political transition more marked or more significant than in Great Britain at the present time. The changes happening and impending in the "mother of nations and constitutions" may have the most far-reaching consequences, not only at home but throughout the world. This textbook offers valuable guidance in studying these changes at their source.

Roosevelt and Lodge Letters

SELECTIONS FROM THE CORRESPONDENCE OF THEODORE ROOSEVELT AND HENRY CABOT LODGE, 1884-1918 (Scribners, 2 vols. $10). These volumes are of large significance because of the frank and intimate revelation they contain of the minds and motives of two outstanding political leaders, and because of the light they throw upon important political events. The reader will be interested to learn that Mr. Lodge was Mr. Roosevelt's "closest friend, personally, politically, and in every other way," as Mr. Roosevelt expressed it. He also said in 1908:

"We have not always agreed, but our subjects of disagreement have been of but little weight compared to the matters upon which we did agree. For the past twenty-four years I have discussed almost every move I have made in politics with him, provided he was at hand and it was possible for me to discuss it; and as regards many matters of policy and appointment, it would be quite impossible for me now to say whether it was he or I who first suggested the appointment I made or the course that I followed."

The comradeship began in the spring of 1884, when they came together in connection with the effort to prevent Blaine's nomination for President. Mr. Roosevelt said: "We both took the same view, namely: that if possible Blaine should not be nominated, but that if nominated we would support him."

The letters published are largely Roosevelt's to Lodge, but Lodge's to Roosevelt appear occasionally to keep the facts clear and fairly complete, and thus one becomes better acquainted with the Lodge whom Roosevelt knew and admired.

This correspondence gives one something like a moving picture of two brilliant, ambitious, public-spirited young men of high ideals who enter the lists as commanders for political reform. They are on common ground in good literature and in historical study.

Both were intense in their likes and dislikes, their loyalties and their enmities. Both were shrewd politicians and strong Republican Party men, but were seeking reform in and through their party. Love of home and family and personal affection between friends are among the revelations of these remarkable letters.

Political and Social

PERSONALITY IN POLITICS, by WILLIAM BENNETT MUNRO (Macmillan. $1.50). An illuminating book by the Professor of Municipal Government in Harvard on the personal equation in practical politics. It consists of three chapters: The Reformer in Politics, The Boss in Politics, The Leader in Politics. It is full of good sense, good humor, and plain speaking.

WINGED DEFENSE, by WILLIAM MITCHELL (Putnam. $2.00). The trial of Colonel Mitchell, which seems destined to be long drawn out and to develop into an investigation of the whole aerial service, would give interest to this volume did it require any outward circumstance to increase its appeal. It presents in a systematic and effective way Colonel Mitchell's criticism of the air service and his plans for reconstruction. It has a number of striking illustrations. The "jacket," with its air plane trailing a smoke screen through the clouds, is very effective, and the inside cover is effective in a different way. It contains the cartoons which have given so much offense to the War and Navy Departments, and for which Colonel Mitchell has disclaimed responsibility. One cartoon represents "Rip" sleeping in "The Army Berth," with the twins, "War Dept. Bureaucrat" and "Navy Dept. Bureaucrat" either howling, or sleeping with mouths open close by. Colonel Mitchell is calling, "Boss your house is on fire," to which "Rip" replies "You're fired for waking me up." "Rip" bears some resemblance to Sec. Weeks, but in a cartoon on the same page a figure is definitely labeled "Sec. Weeks." Colonel Mitchell's main contention is that there should be an independent and unified air service.

TWO ORDEALS OF DEMOCRACY, by JOHN BUCHAN (Houghton Mifflin. $2.00). A beautiful edition of a lecture delivered at Milton Academy on the Alumni War Memorial Foundation, 1924, in which this brilliant novelist and historian of the Great War developed a masterly analysis of the similarities in their significance in relation to the problems of democracy of the Great War and our own Civil War. The lecturer closes, following a keen and careful characterization of the work of Lincoln, with the tribute: "If we of England have given Shakespeare to America, you have paid us back with Lincoln."

THE DOMINION OF SEA AND AIR, by ENID SCOTT RANKIN (Century Co. $2.50). All efforts to secure the freedom of the seas to all nations having failed, the author sees the freedom of the air as still a possibility. In fact the failure to maintain such freedom, and leave the air open to belligerent control, would involve such disaster as to make that issue inconceivable. Along this line Mrs. Rankin finds hope of the development of an extra-national field for international co-operation which might make sea and air alike inviolable. Thus far, however, nations and peoples have shown no great disposition to refrain from creating the Frankensteins by which they have ultimately been crushed. Will mankind suddenly, or soon, develop a new disposition in relation to the diabolical possibilities of warlike domination of the air? We hope so. At any rate Mrs. Rankin's study is worthy of attention.

THE RECENT FOREIGN POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES, by GEORGE H. BLAKELEE (Abingdon Press. $2.00). These lectures by the Professor of History and International Relations in Clark University were delivered on the Bennett Foundation at Wesleyan, last year. They constitute an excellent survey of American Foreign Policy during the entire period of Mr. Hughes' service as Secretary of State. The successive chapters deal with our policy toward Europe, the Munroe Doctrine, Pan-Americanism, and its relationship to Washington and the League of Nations, the problems of the Far East, and tasks of international co-operation.

ECONOMIC LIBERALISM, by JACOB H. HOLLANDER (Abingdon Press. $1.50). The Bennett Lectures for the present year turn from politics to economics, with the Professor of Political Economy in Johns Hopkins University as Lecturer. Professor Hollander defines liberalism as "less a formal creed than a habit of mind." In its economic aspects he regards liberalism as involving an extension of the principle of democracy to economic and social affairs. He discusses such liberalism in relation to the price level, taxation, trades unionism, and social reform. A closing chapter discusses its bearing upon "the American spirit."

Novels of Religious Interest

ONE INCREASING PURPOSE, by A. S. M. HUTCHINSON (Little, Brown. $2.00). The outstanding novel of the season from a religious point of view is One Increasing Purpose. It will be the theme of many sermons. It is a sermon in itself. Unlike some sermons it is never dull and prosy, and like many others it will challenge discussion and annoy. It deals with the attempt of Sim Paris to adjust himself to life, to find some meaning and purpose in it all. Until the war he had been happy, popular—a good fellow. Escaping without a scratch, almost miraculously, from many grim experiences, appalled by the horror of seeing all about him slain, he asked himself the question, "Why am I spared?" and to answer this question he devotes all his thought. There is considerable of horror and tragedy in the story and there is also humor. A novelist of sudden fame, so modest and retiring that he maintains a second domicile where he can escape from the strain of living as the most popular author of his day,—this most amusing figure is the author's self, say those who know him best. The stories of his brothers and their wives, his own love story, the account of Stupendity's Stores are all only incidental to the religious developments of the story. Some readers may deplore the curious involved style of the book; others may be disappointed that after all the questing he does not develop any new social theories and that the Purpose disclosed presents no entirely new facet of truth. That does not detract, however, from the fact that the book is one of earnestness and power, greatly appealing, never dull. It will rejoice the heart of many to see one of the most popular writers of the day concerned so entirely with religion and devoting his great powers to such inspirational service.

THE KENWORTHYS, by MARGARET WILSON (Harpers. $2.00). Miss Wilson attained double fame when her novel, The Able McLaughlins, won the Harper Prize of $2,000, and was later awarded the Pulitzer Prize as the best American novel of 1923. Her latest novel displays marvelous skill in dealing with intense and difficult situations. The relentless realism of certain pages will give offense to some readers, but to us it has seemed a book fairly overwhelming in its moral conviction and in its portrayal of the effects upon her son, of a mother's loose living and divorce. The strength of the book reaches its climax in the scenes between father and son, in which the passionate plea of the boy for some assurance that will set at rest his doubts concerning his paternity reveals the harrowing effect upon a high-strung and sensitive boy of the knowledge of his mother's infidelities, brought home to him in a chance remark that has poisoned his whole life.

WE MUST MARCH, by HONORE WILLSIE MORROW (Stokes. $2.00). A passage from a poem of Walt Whitman's:

We must march, my darlings, we must bear the brunt of danger, is the source of the title of this book, which has to do with the winning of Oregon for the United States. Sir George Simpson, of the Hudson's Bay Company, claimed and was determined to hold this territory for England. But Dr. Marcus Whitman and his wife Narcissa were sent out by the American Board to convert the Indians. Narcissa was the first white woman to cross the Rockies. Her husband took the first Conestoga wagon across the mountains to prove that settlers could follow. Mrs. Morrow, despite the contention of certain historical critics, evidently holds quite strongly, as do her publishers, to the traditional view that Dr. Marcus Whitman saved Oregon for the Union. Having read much upon both sides of that question, which was raised in connection with articles in The Congregationalist some time ago, we are disposed to believe that that tradition has at least a basis of fact which will persist in spite of the plausible efforts of historians to explain it away. This book is history but it is history alive in the form of an engrossing novel.
We, the youthful sinewy races—

THE HIGH FORFEIT, by BASIL KING (Harpers. $2.00). Can a millionaire's daughter marry a man earning $45 per week, live within his income, and yet be happy? Mr. Basil King discusses this in his new novel, The High Forfeit. To discuss such a problem, occurring almost never in life, would seem a waste of effort, but the book develops into something much greater. The millionaire says, "a forty-five-dollar-a-week man isn't exactly a man. He's just a bit of stuff fed into the machine—business fodder." The young husband, a war-hero, finds himself caught in the machine. He seems unable to better his position. His father, a professor of English, used to say "the most essential things to the life of the nation are education and religion but there is no meanness which the nation doesn't practice towards the men and women who teach them." The son is a thinker. He sees that it isn't any lack of manly spirit which keeps many men from rising in the world but a vast system, social, economic, political, and he sees too that men are needed in the world for jobs like his own. Above all he has a deep loyalty to those of his own class, the genteel poor. The book is a splendid discussion of this class which, the author says, "belongs to the No-Man's-land, which comes in between Capital and Labor, and is battered by the guns of both." But to have everything turn out so very nicely at the end of the story spoils to some extent its very fine realism.

THE FURNACE, by DAN POLING (Doran. $2.00). A story of steel workers and industrial conflict. The life of the workers is vividly shown, a hard life indeed. The hero is promoted from the furnace to a high office position. There is a strike, which he joins. The Steel Report of the "United World Movement" suggests that of the Interchurch World Movement, with its high idealism. Dramatic scenes, love, heroism, and a clear message of industrial justice are features of this story which deserves wide reading.

Other Notable Fiction

THE PERENNIAL BACHELOR, by ANNE PARRISH (Harpers. $2.00). This book is the winner of the Harper $2,000 Prize Novel Competition this year. It presents what might be called literary moving pictures of a family from about 1850 right down to the present day. As the years pass the changes in thought, in fashions, in life, flash before our eyes. We are amazed at how deftly these changes are reproduced, how well the author has selected just what will make the past most vivid; an old song, an old dress, a long forgotten something, and the reader is flooded with memories. It is a story of how misguided family affection spoiled the life of a son and brother and how he in turn spoiled the life of his family. The Perennial Bachelor never seems quite as real as his sister Maggie, whom the author follows to literally her last gasp. The futility of her sacrifices, the pathetic stupidity of the actions of all the family, leave the reader, in spite of the rare merits of this book, with a feeling of discomfort and a curious depression as to the value of any life.

POSSESSION, by LOUIS BROMFIELD (Stokes. $2.50). In this novel by the author of The Green Bay Tree some of the characters of the former book reappear. It is a remarkable picture of the development into a great artist of a talented girl from a small town in Ohio. She feels hampered by the claims of her family, later by a husband whom she married to get away from home, and again by a man whom she loved. There is, however, a certain ruthlessness about her that enables her to free herself of all that would possess her, as she advances to the position of a famous pianist in the capitals of the world. But this is not a book of one central personality. The whole of the girl's family life is traced. There is a large group of characters, each so important and so distinctly drawn that we realize the author is holding up a mirror to a whole section of American life. Mr. Bromfield writes as a close observer of human nature, omitting no detail, studying carefully, and producing a book of splendid workmanship.

Books of Self-Revelation

THE RIVER OF LIFE, by JOHN ST. LOE STRACHEY (Putnam). Any book by the editor of The Spectator is bound to be rich in interest and instruction but this volume has the additional attraction of a somewhat intimate diary of inner experiences and mental processes during a period of two years. The incentive toward the recording of musings and reflections on places, men, and books came from Mr. Strachey's son, and one is conscious throughout of a delightful atmosphere created by this father and son background of the diary. It is wide and varied in its range, and it takes its title from the fact that it meanders and flashes like a powerfully moving stream, never the same "except for one intangible, incommensurable, furtive instant." The volume moves one to remark upon the deep resources, above and beyond his day's work in journalism, that characterize an English editor of the higher type. It is doubtful whether we have any corresponding type here in America, where an editor's chief business is apt to be editing, whereas for a man like Strachey being seems the primary thing, with editing as incidental. Mr. Strachey is essentially a man with a religious outlook. The specific references to religion are not extensive in the book, but such pages as those on Religion and Ritual are exceedingly important.

SERMONS OF A CHEMIST, by EDWIN E. SLOSSON (Harcourt, Brace. $2.00). It is to our lasting regret that when Dr. Slosson offered The Congregationalist the privilege of publishing some of these sermons before their appearance in book form the pressure upon space was such that we could not take advantage of that offer. Dr. Slosson is Director of Science Service at Washington, and he is as much a man of religion as a man of science. These are actual sermons, preached from time to time in college chapels, or in church pulpits. The many people who are still troubled over the relations between science and religion will find much help in these sermons. Among the chapters of particular interest are, The Chemistry of the Greatest Miracle of the Bible, The Spiritualization of Daily Life, The Duty of Intelligence, The Geometry of Ethics, The Ethics of Evolution, etc. We hope that these sermons of an eminent layman will have a wide reading.

AS A WOMAN THINKS, by CORRA HARRIS (Houghton Mifflin. $2.50). The author of A Circuit Rider's Wife tells us that the idea that God made us "is a gross exaggeration of the functions of the Almighty." He made what we call "mind" and we use it to create ourselves. And so this book of hers tells "how the mind I have, determined my conduct, courage, cowardice, and literally created the life I have lived." Then commencing with her childhood she gives us in the frankest way memories of her life and her thought and opinions. It is not a big book and is rather jumbled, but the whole book is alive with clever, sparkling sentences and thoughts.

Some Important Religious Books

PAUL OF TARSUS, by T. R. GLOVER (Doran. $2.00). Of the making of books on Paul there seems to be no end. Some of the additions to Pauline literature are of little significance, but this study by Dr. Glover will be at once recognized as of foremost importance. His mastery of Greek literature and his accurate scholarship give his opinions authority, and his specific knowledge is well utilized in his conception and portrayal of Paul as "one of the greatest figures in Greek literature." His approach to the great apostle, and his delineation, are in many respects unique. The book abounds in that individuality and vigor of statement that make Dr. Glover so interesting and stimulating both in the spoken and in the written word.

THE MEANING AND VALUE OF MYSTICISM, by E. HERMAN (Doran. $3.00). CREATIVE PRAYER, by E. HERMAN (Doran. $2.00). E. Herman as a devotional writer first came into prominence in Australia, but in recent years has attracted unusual attention in England by the quality of her books and her writings for English religious papers. She shares with Miss Evelyn Underhill a place of distinction held by women writers in the field of mysticism. The present work is the third edition of a book first published in 1915. It has been highly commended by Dean Inge, to whose writings on Mysticism the author attributes her first insight into the subject. In the author's treatment Mysticism is viewed not only as an historical and psychological phenomenon but also "as an active factor in the life and thought of today." We are under the impression that E. Herman's religious development brought her into the Anglo-Catholic circle, or at least a long distance in that direction. In her discussion of Mysticism, however, there will be found a breadth of sympathy and insight not usually associated with Catholic dogmatism. Here, for instance, is a passage that indicates the blending of the practical and broad saint with the mystic, and that incidentally reveals the importance of Mysticism in daily life:

It is not too much to assert that all true social life and effort are grounded in Mysticism. This is true historically. In a certain measure it holds true of Joseph Fels and Prince Kropotkin, as well as of Arnold Toynbee and Josephine Butler. The brotherhood of man, however conceived, is a mystical doctrine. Belief in a unity which is not a mere numerical expression, nor an arbitrary confederation dictated by self-interest, can ultimately be justified only by an appeal to that eternal world in which Christ is the Vine and we the branches. If held on any other grounds it is at the mercy of dry analysis, and will prove too flimsy to subdue the selfish individualist impulse. That is why no secular prophet, however single-minded and impassioned, has ever been able to convert our democracies to any conviction that might fairly be termed brotherhood, to anything more vital and regenerative than trades unionism. Human brotherhood is a beautiful dream, a dazzling mirage, unless it is conceived in terms of conversion. The fact of our membership one with another will remain a burden productive only of chafing and fretting, of mutual distrust and antagonism, until we become conscious of our common life in God. And this consciousness, as distinct from a mere sentimental acceptance of a doctrine of Divine Fatherhood, is essentially mystical.

Creative Prayer is a further fine expression of Mrs. Herman's devotional insight. Prayer, in her conception, is "not a spiritual romance or a psychic dream, but an act of devotion influencing the very depth of the soul, permeating the whole life and shaping every action."

MEN WHO MET JESUS, by F. C. WILLIAMS (Longmans, Green. $1.25). A series of beautiful, imaginative sketches woven into the fabric of Gospel fact and truth. A few titles suggest their range: The Man Who Knew the Carpenter, Nathaniel, The Blind Beggar, The Roman Soldier.

Best Sermons

BEST SERMONS, 1925, edited by JOSEPH FORT NEWTON (Harcourt, Brace & Co. $2.50). Dr. Joseph Fort Newton knows a good sermon. His articles upon American preachers in their power of analysis and interpretation and in their revelation of his own religious outlook are among the best things that he has written. It stands to reason that a volume of sermons selected by such an editor is a notable collection, and the twenty-one contained in this volume are likely to attain the wide recognition that was accorded the first volume in this series, which appeared last year.

The questionings which we raised last year concerning the title seem to us still valid. If that title is legitimately to be attached to a volume of sermons published annually, we have a feeling that without in any way impeaching either the quality of these sermons, or Dr. Newton's judgment in their selection, a group of "Best Sermons" ought to be determined not so much upon the basis of individual taste and one man's judgment, as upon a wider basis of selection. However, there are advantages in both methods, and there is nothing to prevent an author and publisher selecting the title they prefer. The present title is unquestionably a good selling title, but it does have the disadvantage of conveying the impression of a somewhat arbitrary judgment of what is "best," in a widely varied field of conspicuously good sermons.

The present volume is widely representative of the denominations, both the Jewish and the Roman Catholic pulpits being included. Probably no one denomination could claim the monopoly of the best preaching, but one wonders just a little whether the best sermons have actually been distributed denominationally and geographically, corresponding in such an entirely adaptable way with the plans of the editor. This again is criticism not of the book but only of its title.

Three Congregational preachers are represented in the present volume: Dr. Oswald W. S. McCall of the First Congregational Church, Berkeley, Cal., Dr. Charles F. Aked, who is listed as of Wilshire Boulevard Church, Los Angeles, but who has since left that church, and Dr. Albert Parker Fitch. Each sermon is preceded by a brief sketch and characterization of the preacher.

DU BOSE AS A PROPHET OF UNITY, by REV. J. O. F. MURRAY (S. P. C. K. and Macmillan. 4s. 6d.). It is significant that the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge should have brought out in England these lectures by Dr. Murray, Master of Selwyn College, Cambridge, England, delivered to the students of theology at the University of the South, Sewanee, Tenn., on the Du Bose Memorial Foundation. Born in 1836, a South Carolinian of Huguenot extraction, W. P. Du Bose was for thirty-six years associated in various capacities with the University of the South. His contributions to the discussion of fundamental problems in philosophy and theology are contained in seven volumes published between 1892 and 1911 and in various additional articles. Dr. Murray interprets with a thoroughness born of sympathy and admiration the message of a philosopher whom he describes as "one of the few 'voices' in the world, not one of the many 'echoes.'" He finds the key to Du Bose's work in the stress which this teacher laid on "Unity." Hence the title of his volume, which will be found valuable for its statement of modern religious problems, as well as for its introduction to Du Bose.

CONVERSION: CHRISTIAN AND NON-CHRISTIAN, by ALFRED C. UNDERWOOD (Macmillan. $2.00). Dr. Underwood is John Clifford Professor in the History of Religions in Rawdon College, Leeds, and was formerly Professor Serampore College, Bengal. In this compar tive and psychological study of conversion, has written an outstanding book, large in scholarship and outlook, careful and painsta ing in its method, and broad and sane in judgments. Dr. Underwood has drawn large upon his extensive knowledge, and sympathe understanding, of non-Christian religions. H book is divided into three parts: I, Historica II, Psychological; and III, A consideration Conversion in its historical aspects.

SHARING IN CREATION, by W. COSBY BE (Macmillan. $2.00), is not a scientific treati but a popular presentation of the business living. The sympathetic approach to the who question of creation with its modern corolla of evolution makes the book stand out as unique piece of work among the great hol caust of present-day polemics. To those wh are earnestly seeking light on the meaning life in a modern world with its perplexi problems and bothersome questions this volum comes as a true guide. A characteristic qu tation is, "The attempt to reconcile Genes and science—is as though one looked into geography for the far country into which th prodigal son went." The chapters of the boo were originally lectures delivered under th John Bohlen lectureship and the author ha preserved the free style of the class room, thu bringing his personality as well as his thoug to the reader. The book deserves a more e tensive review than we are able to give it our limited space. We have no hesitatio whatever in recommending it to ministers an laymen alike as one of the best pieces of work manship dealing with the difficult question which are before the modern world.

THE KINGDOM OF GOD IN THE APOSTOLI WRITINGS, by ALEX. M. F. MACINNES (Dora $1.60). "Prophets had visions of it. Poet sang of it. But Christ sought to redeem idea of the Kingdom," says Dr. John Douglas Ada in a Foreword to Dr. Macinnes' volume. In careful and sufficiently technical study of thi greatest of all themes, in the Apostolic writing the author has sought to make his work com prehensible and helpful to the average reade About half the volume is devoted to the dis cussion of The Kingdom of God and the Chri tian Church.

EVANGELICAL HUMANISM, by LYNN HAROL HOUGH (Abingdon Press. $1.50). The Fern ley Lecture is an annual event of great signif cance in English Methodism. To Dr. Hough, Detroit, came the honor of that lectureship fo the present year—an honor only once before ac corded an American. The title immediatel suggests Dr. Hough. If one were choosing suc a theme and the man to write upon it almos instinctively he would turn to a preacher lik Dr. Hough, whose whole work and outlook suggest a blending of the humanities with evan gelical vision and fervor. Dr. Hough write with a certain sense of detachment, but such chapter as that on The Points of Contact be tween Humanism and Evangelicalism migh well be regarded as an apologia pro vita sua This is in many respects his best book.

DORAN'S MINISTER'S MANUAL, arranged b REV. G. B. F. HALLOCK (Doran. $2.00).

CYCLOPEDIA OF SERMON OUTLINES FOR SPE CIAL DAYS AND OCCASIONS, compiled and ed ited by REV. G. B. F. HALLOCK (Doran. $3.00) These volumes by Dr. Hallock will make thei own appeal. They lie within the range of ma terial of a sort for which there is a large de mand and which many ministers find helpful For the minister who finds that his best work is done in the slow, difficult, and original proces of digging things out for himself, their value i limited, but even this type of preacher ma find in them much helpful suggestion.

ecent Books on Religious Education

THE CHURCH'S PROGRAM FOR YOUNG PEOPLE, HERBERT CARLETON MAYER (Century Co. 00). This book is written as a college text- ok in religious education. As such it has doubted value. It is a comprehensive review principles, materials, and methods for the ee periods of adolescence and contains much pful information and many suggestions that l provoke thought and discussion. Mr. Mayer serves credit for the courageous frankness th which he has faced the problem of multi- ed agencies competing for the attention of ith. His remedy we believe to be the right : an organized department of religious edu- ion in the church, of which all the young ople's work shall be an integral part. His phasis upon the principle of giving young ople a fair share of real participation in the nagement and the activities of church and hool is also to be commended and his sug- stions for organizing the work are, in the in, sound and practical.

Passing from those sections of the book which al with organization to those which deal with curriculum and teaching method, one feels at the treatment is not so adequate. Professor wer's volume, The Curriculum of Religious ducation, probably was not published in time consideration in this book. It would seem rd to account for its complete omission from e bibliography of the topic on other grounds. ven so, one might expect a little fuller notice the experience theory of the curriculum than given in this book. Again, with reference to e project principle in teaching, a reference, at st, to Mr. Shaver's Project Principle in Re- ious Education might give the reader con- ct with a little more adequate definition of at principle. Mr. Mayer's warnings against e careless use of project teaching as "a fad" e timely, but he seems to leave the impres- on that this is about all there is to it.

One impression made, doubtless inadvertently, lls for correction. The comments on the In- rnational Training School and the Older Boys' d Older Girls' Camp Conferences (pp. 368, 9) would lead the uninformed reader to sup- se that the former are on the decline and that e latter are now being conducted only by the merican Youth Foundation. As a matter of ct, the season just closed marks distinct ad- nce in the quality of leadership and work ne in the International Training Schools and is organization has not discontinued its Camp nferences for boys and girls, but is carrying em on with increased efficiency.

In still another respect we believe that the thor might have improved his statement of important point. It is only too true that e average church comes far short of realiz- g its opportunity and duty in the matter of ligious education. We believe that a frank, ear statement of this once for all, at the out- t, should suffice instead of starting each new pic with reiterated criticism of the shortcom- gs of the church and religious leaders gen- ally. Too much of this produces an impres- on of petulant scolding which weakens a int that really needs to be made.

MANUAL FOR LUTHER LEAGUES, by the AU- STANA LUTHER LEAGUE COUNCIL. Vol. I. Augustana Book Concern. $1.50). The train- g of its children and youth has always been a ominent feature in the work of the Lutheran urches. The Luther Leagues, first organized in cal congregations, have been gradually related one another in conference and finally in syn- lical leagues. In this manual a wide variety methods and materials are suggested to aid cal leaders in making up their programs, in- uding Bible study, historical, literary, and eco- mic studies, missions, plans for socials, ath- letic contests, and other topics. While writ- ten with special reference to the viewpoint and needs of Lutheran churches there is much that would be suggestive to other leaders.

A SUCCESSFUL CRADLE ROLL SYSTEM, by MAUDE H. FLETCHER (Revell. $.75). A book of practical suggestions along familiar lines for the organization and conduct of the cradle roll department, with particular reference to the large Sunday school in an industrial center.

THE ADULT PROGRAM IN THE CHURCH SCHOOL, by CHARLES W. BREWBAKER (Revell. $1.25). A book of general suggestions for the organization and work of the adult department in the church school. The author urges that there should be such a department in every school regardless of the number of classes. We must confess that the idea of calling a single organized class in a church school a department as well as a class seems to be a case of strain- ing the point. It would seem that the simplest organization that will do the necessary work is to be desired. Reference is made to the "Hub- bell Class of Central Presbyterian Church," Rochester, N. Y. This class is connected with the First Baptist Church of that city.

A CURRICULUM OF WORSHIP FOR THE JUNIOR CHURCH SCHOOL, by EDNA M. CRANDALL (Cen- tury Co. $2.00). This is an interesting book and one that will undoubtedly help to call at- tention to a sadly neglected element in our programs of religious education. The author seems to differ from Professor Hartshorne when she says of the service of worship, "It is not a time for instruction of any kind, not even in the elements which go into the program" (p. 6). Professor Hartshorne, in his Worship in the Sunday School (p. 44), says, "Worship must serve for instruction as well as training in order to be effective." The difference of opinion may be more apparent than real. If "instruction" is taken by Miss Crandall to mean drill in technique, doubtless both would agree that this has no place in a true service of wor- ship. But there is an element of learning in Miss Crandall's use of pictures and the Mem- ory Curriculum, although she limits these to the preparatory period rather than to the serv- ice of worship itself. This undoubtedly helps to preserve for the latter more of the atmos- phere of worship as commonly understood. It does not entirely settle the question as to whether true worship must always be a thing apart from other mental and spiritual experi- ence. We suspect that both will gain by a closer acquaintance.

Miss Crandall has given in this volume a complete set of worship programs worked out in detail for the entire year. These will be of great help to the leader whose idea of worship has been hitherto somewhat mechanical. We wonder, however, if more will not be accom- plished by suggesting themes and materials from which leader and pupils, working to- gether, may construct their own programs. The danger of such a book is that it will be used mechanically without giving the pupils enough opportunity for spontaneous expres- sion or for the planning of their own programs.

There is some splendid source material in this book and its thoughtful and discriminat- ing use will be a great benefit to many schools.

For Boy Scouts

THE BOY SCOUT YEAR BOOK. Edited by FRANKLIN K. MATHIEWS (Appleton. $2.50). Like the ten annual Boy Scout Year Books which have gone before this one, this volume will bring unfailing delight to any live Amer- ican boy in his early and middle teens, and especially to every real Boy Scout. Its broad pages are set in large type and bear frequent pictures. Popular writers are the contributors, including Albert Payson Terhune, Rafael Sab- atini, Ralph Henry Barbour, Brewer Corcoran, Dan Beard, and "Grizzly" Smith. One part of the book is made up of "The Stories Boys Like Best"; and the part following, "Things All Boys Want to Know."

THE BOYS' BOOK OF CAMP FIRES, by FRANK H. CHELEY (Wilde). This is a substantial and attractive book of boys' camp activities. Part I is a thoroughgoing guide for the building of camp fires and for camp fire cooking, recipes, and all. Part II is a fine collection of Camp Fire Games, Songs, and Stunts; and a good collection of Camp Fire Stories and Outdoor Verse make up Part III.

THE AMERICAN BOY'S HANDY BOOK, by DAN BEARD (Scribners. $3.00). This is a new edi- tion of a favorite book by a favorite author for boys in general and Boy Scouts in particular. The subjects taken up are classified by seasons, and include kites, fishing, aquariums, boating, birds, trapping, taxidermy, dogs, snow sports, puppet-shows and theatrical shows, and various other sources of wholesome amusement.

DO IT YOURSELF, by DAN BEARD (Lippin- cott. $2.50). A woodcraft book for boys by the skilled and ever popular National Boy Scout Commissioner. The subjects featured are fish- ing, collecting hikes, and canoeing. As usual every page that Mr. Beard writes is fascinat- ing, instructive, and a practical and alluring guide to life in the great out-of-doors. Illus- trated.

General Books

THE EINSTEIN THEORY EXPLAINED AND AN- ALYZED, by SAMUEL H. GUGGENHEIMER (Mac- millan. $2.50). We shall not guarantee that every reader of this book will understand its account of the Einstein theory, but if this ac- count is beyond him the case is hopeless. Mr. Guggenheimer has set out to bring the theory within the ken of any reader of fair education. His treatment is largely philosophic, and it in- volves an effort to relate the Einstein theory to general philosophy.

SYNONYMS AND ANTONYMS, by EDITH B. ORDWAY (Sully Co. $1.00). This little volume of five thousand principal words with their synonyms and antonyms, compiled chiefly with reference to cross-word puzzle work, will be found useful and handy for general reference.

BASKETRY, by MRS. EDWIN LANG (Scrib- ners. $3.50). The author tells in clear and complete instructions how to make baskets and other useful articles. It is a good guide to weaving and design and is fully illustrated. One is impressed with the simplicity and clear- ness of the directions given, and with the dis- tinctive beauty of many of the examples of basketry shown.

A New Edition of Stevenson

A boon to lovers of Robert Louis Stevenson is provided in Scribners' South Seas Edition, recently issued by Stevenson's accredited pub- lishers. This is a popular definitive edition, in thirty-two volumes, truly complete and contain- ing an extensive amount of material never be- fore published in a popular edition. Some letters have never before been published in book form. Not only have Scribners been able to offer this at 90 cents a volume, but they extend to the purchaser the privilege of choosing any volumes he desires. The books are neatly bound, attractive, and excellently printed vol- umes of handy size. In addition to the best known works of Stevenson there are a volume of plays, two volumes of poems, a volume of es- says and juvenilia, and four volumes of letters. The edition includes all of Stevenson's work published during his lifetime or since his death.

End of My Music Box

Lowell, in one of his essays, quotes Keats at the age of only twenty-three as writing to his publishers in the following illustrious words: "Praise or blame has but a momentary effect on the man whose love of beauty in the abstract makes him a severe critic of his own works. . . . I was never afraid of failure; for I would sooner fail than not be among the greatest."

Keats was aiming at a definite goal of achievement, and perhaps also of personality. He had begun to realize, like my neighbor who has discarded cheap jazz in favor of the music of greatness, that it is possible either to blast one's life or to make it splendidly victorious by the influences one puts himself into day by day, the thoughts one chooses to live with. The psychologist of today says that the subconscious mind rather than the conscious is the important factor in personality and intelligence, and that this "furnishes the formative material out of which our judgments, our beliefs, our ideals, and our characters are shaped." But I am not to be the impotent victim of my subconscious mind. It is by the purposed, intelligent use of my conscious mind, day in and day out, year in and year out, that I must learn to make the activities of my subconscious mind wholesome, to counteract whatever of rawness or mischievousness has found lodgment in that subconscious mind, and to store away in it "formative material" out of which right judgments, noble beliefs, immortal character may be shaped. My conscious mind is my constructive faculty.

Freud, studying men and women who suffer from one or another form of hysteria, concludes that their symptoms are the outward symbols of past experiences of a painful nature; they fail to escape from the past. That great abyss of the past! What escapes it calls for if we are not to make a failure of living! The good of the past may be the bad of today. What was progress in my youth would be failure if clung to in my maturity. Emerson's extravagant statement that we transgress through refusing to let go of our angels becomes a deep insight when the next sentence comes to view: "We do not see that they only go out, that archangels may come in." Not in matters of achievement can all of us be among the greatest; but no man has entered into life's real meaning until he has begun to call himself up to the companionship not of angels alone but also of archangels and greater than archangels, to send his spirit ever higher toward the height of the Highest. Life, to be worth the living, must be constantly a greater becoming.

The psychologists are teaching us to use the word sublimation. But the matter was long ago put into short, pithy words, when we were told to fix our minds on no ambition short of that of becoming perfect, even as the heavenly Father is perfect. If the conscious mind is made the contented home of unworthy thoughts —whether of one's own life and its purpose, or of the rest of the world, or of God—how is it to be expected that those ideas and emotions that are ceaselessly and mysteriously working in the subconscious mind, making us what we shall be, shall have in them any savor of greatness?

These things my hidden music box suggests to me.

HEART'S THANKFULNESS

O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good: for his mercy endureth forever.—Ps. 107: 1.

Annihilate not the mercies of God by the oblivion of ingratitude. Let thy diaries stand thick with dutiful mementos and asterisks of acknowledgment. — Thomas Brown.

We must aim at a habit of gratitude which has no relation to present necessities, no eye to the future. Emotional feeling towards a possible benefactor may easily be mistaken for the grateful temper; but the gratitude which fills our heart and guides our conduct when we are well and safe, forgets self, and the interests and prospects of self, in the joy of thankful remembrance. And as this grateful spirit is the source of joy, so, in a sense, it is the source of religion in the soul. The grateful spirit alone believes, because it alone acknowledges the source of its life and being, the Author and Fountainhead. The grateful spirit alone finds out God; to it alone he reveals himself.—J. B. Mozley.

Old and young their music raise,
All things breathing chant thy praise;
Every season, every year
Are thy tender mercies near!
Thou our Hope, our Help forever,
God of Harvest! leave us never,
Till we reach our Father's portal
Bearing homeward sheaves immortal.

Let us give thanks to God upon Thanksgiving Day. Nature is beautiful, and fellow men are dear, and duty is close beside us, and God is over us and in us. We want to trust him with a fuller trust, and so at last to come to that high life where we shall "be careful for nothing, but in everything, by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let our request be made known unto God"; for that, and that alone, is peace.—Phillips Brooks.

We come to meditate on God's loving kindness. That sums up everything: all we would like to do, all we would like to feel. . . . Whether we look back or forward, within or without, is not thanksgiving our appropriate state?—Hugh Black.

God of our fathers, whose mercies have not failed us in any time of need, accept now the tributes of our hearts' thanksgiving for thy guardian care and love. For plenteous harvests gathered in our fields; for the increase of our flocks, and the fruits of our orchards; for joy and comfort in our homes and all kindly social relations; for blessings innumerable which have crowned the year with good; for hopes of the future, sacred memories of the past; for the light of thy word and the teaching of thy Holy Spirit—blessed be thou, O Lord, our God! Let the thoughts and affections of this day lead us through childlike faith to larger light and knowledge of thy will. Hear us, our Father, for thine own love's sake, and, if it please thee, renew our blessings year by year. Amen. Isaac Ogden Rankin.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

Apostles of Friendship to China

Comment on the Prayer Meeting Topic for November 29-December 5

BY HENRY S. LEIPER*

Topic: Victories of Christian Friendliness in China. Acts 2: 38-47.

In the diplomatic dealings of the last 100 years China has always had the worst of the bargain. China cannot understand this son of "Christian nation." But true Christianity has won its victories.

Here are a few examples of Christian efforts

1. Missionaries have usually stood for the rights of the Chinese. The missionary is practically the only foreigner who goes to China seeking the good of that land. They "get next" to the Chinese as no other foreigner does.

2. They have brought good out of evil. It was the suggestion of Dr. Arthur Smith that led to the refund of America's share of the Boxer indemnity to be used for the education of Chinese youth in this country.

3. Missionaries are usually trusted by the Chinese. When the British Government sent recruiting agents to secure laborers for their army, Shantung peasants asked Dr. Charles A. Stanley, one of our missionaries, "Will you guarantee the solvency and honesty of the British? If so, we will go to France for them; otherwise, not."

4. Christian Friendliness, working through education, has produced many of the present leaders of China. For example: C. T. Wang, David Yui, T. T. Lew, Chang Po Ling, Jimmie Yen, Dr. Chaun, James Chuan, and Dr. Cheng Ching Yi. For women, read "Chinese Christians Worth Knowing" (W. B. M.). A recent straw vote selected eight out of 13 of China's most trusted leaders, who were Christians.

5. Christian Friendliness working through hospitals is winning victories for young and old. Read "The One Man Hospital at Tungchow" (A. B. C. F. M.); also the following Here and There Stories: "Saving the Baby," Vol. IV, 10; "The Flapjack that Brought Good Fortune," Vol. III, 18 (Congregational Education Society, 5 cents each).

6. Christian Friendliness plans for greater victories in years to come. These will be realized through the growing co-operation of Chinese leaders. Read "At China's Northern Crossways" (A. B. C. F. M. Envelope Series).

7. Christian Friendliness is leading in the work of building a new and better social order in China. There are many Chinese groups not directly related to any Christian stimulus that are working for moral and social improvement, but most observers agree that the Christian movement is the strongest force in this direction. Non-Christian Chinese have often testified to China's need for the moral power that is found in Christianity.

8. The victories of Christianity are remarkable in view of the comparatively short time during which they have been won. Imagine the five thousand years of China's history compressed into one year of 365 days. On this scale Christian missions have been working in China about one week. Yet, there are today over ten thousand Christian communities and a growing Christian consciousness which is everywhere making itself felt.

In China today, as well as in the days of the early Christian Church, a better order of human society can be created only on the basis of mutual trust and friendliness. The supreme Teacher of these qualities is Christ.

Paul Before Agrippa

Comment on the International Uniform Sunday School Lesson for November 29

Acts 26: 19-32

Whatever the immediate injustice to Paul ising from the action of Felix in leaving him prisoner and turning him over to Festus, the w procurator, Felix conferred a boon upon manity by thus furnishing the occasion of e finest brief biography of Paul that has come us from the ancient world. There can be tle doubt that Paul's address is an accurate cord, so that it has all the authority of an tobiographical sketch. We have, therefore, ne occasion for gratitude to weak and trem- ng Felix.

The passage chosen for our lesson is the very art of this autobiographical statement, and e Golden Text is the one expression from all ul's writings and sayings that predominantly fines his character and attitude. As he de- ibes the experiences that befell him, going as persecutor of Christians on the way to Da- scus, he says, "Whereupon, O King Agrippa, was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision." at is the center and soul of all good living; mplete consecration to the light that one has d to the truth as one sees it. But in Paul it is not merely fidelity to the vision that he d, but a readiness to respond to the higher d better vision when it came. Had Paul en merely a man of narrow sincerity there uld never have come into his life the larger periences of the Christian way.

In our thought of Paul we have not at all equately taken into account the irenical rit, the quest of light, and the warmth of re, that matched his passionate zeal. We ve thought of him too exclusively as a flaming ssionary, and too little as a reflective scholar d a devout saint. We have not adequately re- ed to the philosophy and theology of his istles and to the graphic story of his travels ch profound writings as the 13th chapter of t Corinthians, that reveal the deep back- ound of his Christian life.

Here we find Paul's great sanity. It was in- nceivable to Festus that a man could be so ssionate about religion, and he attributed to ul the madness of fanaticism. But Paul's ply finds its vindication in the whole record his life and thought. He was surely the nest and best balanced of all men whose lives ve been cast in the imperial mold, and whose est has been that of world conquest.

SOME QUESTIONS:

How may "heavenly visions" be distin- ished from mere hallucinations? What was ul's test?

Are the eyes of our souls open to other visions an those that we have had?

What are the marks of sanity in religion?

May we have visions as real as Paul's?

May we be equally obedient?

Would Paul be "orthodox," or "heretic" if were in the modern world?

We cannot cause the wind to blow the way want it to blow, but we can so adjust our ils that they will take us where we want to .—Marion Lawrance.

Support for Washington Church Plans

Additional assurance that Congregational churches in various sections of the United States will co-operate with the First Church of Washington in its undertaking to raise $1,250,000 for a building in which it may function as the representative of the denomination in the national capital was given by two resolutions adopted recently. On Nov. 4, the Connecticut State Conference of Congregational Churches, meeting in South Manchester, adopted a resolution favoring the project and pledging cooperation in carrying it to a successful conclusion. It follows:

The General Conference of the Congregational Churches of Connecticut in session at South Manchester, Nov. 4, 1925, having been informed of the plan of the First Congregational Church of Washington, D. C., to build a new meeting house which shall adequately meet the needs of a varied and growing constituency and which shall worthily represent the spirit and traditions of our denomination in the capital city of the nation, commends the project to the churches and members of our fellowship with the hope that they will respond generously to any appeal for financial assistance which may be made.

On the following day the New York Association of Congregational Churches, meeting at Tompkins Ave. Church in Brooklyn, adopted the following resolution:

The New York Association of Congregational Churches approves the proposal, sanctioned by the resolution of the National Council, for a National Congregational Church in Washington, D. C., and commends the same to the sympathetic interest and assistance of the churches of this association.

The Pastor Says: Prayer for victory in war usually means that a nation, having made its appeal in the first place to Mars, but fearing that his decision is going against it, turns at last to God, imploring him to use any influence he may chance to have with that unjust judge.

The Aged Seer

To Frederick E. Emrich, D.D.

By Harry Elmore Hurd

Like sun that glints upon a mountain top,
Like water gushing clearly from a spring,
His gentle phrases, soft as shadows, drop
Into the hearts of men and seem to bring
High heaven's blazing truth to humble men,
To earthy, sordid, plodding, sinning men.

A light like dawn illumes his saintly face,
A halo hovers o'er his reverend hair
Like moonbeams falling on a wooded place.
Men see his face and read the record there
And learn, though they be earthy, sordid men,
That God still lives incarnated in men.

Peloubet's Uniform Graded Quarterlies

THE tremendous growth of the Sunday Schools of the world for the past fifty years can be in a large measure attributed to the Uniform Lessons.

A Few of the Advantages

They teach the Bible
A common subject
Home and family study and discussion
Make teachers' meetings possible
Fresh texts each year.

The Peloubet Series of Sunday School Quarterlies are used the world around, because they place before the scholar the salient points of the Scripture texts in such a manner that they are quickly comprehended and easily remembered.

We also publish a Series of Teachers' Quarterlies which contain helpful material for the teacher to use in preparing the lesson and which have become very popular during the past years.

We should be glad to send free samples and catalogs giving full detail to all intending purchasers

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

Double Ordination at Brookfield, Mass.

Tuesday, Nov. 3, was rendered memorable in the history of the Congregational Church in Brookfield, Mass., by the ordination and installation of the new pastor, Rev. E. Jerome Johanson, and the ordination of his wife, Mrs. Laura Lane Johanson. A double ordination is unique, and the interest of the town as a whole was shown by the large attendance from other churches, taxing the capacity of the local church. In addition to the churches of the Brookfield Association, the council included Prof. A. C. Purdy and Dr. Charles S. Lane of Hartford Seminary Foundation, the latter the father of Mrs. Johanson; also Rev. Stoddard Lane of Manchester, N. H., and Rev. G. Homer Lane of Milford, N. H., brothers of Mrs. Johanson; and Rev. Sherman Goodwin of Townsend, former pastor of the Brookfield Church. The council elected Rev. C. M. Crooks of Barre moderator and Rev. E. U. Cowles of Spencer scribe. After the usual preliminaries Mr. Johanson and his wife, Mrs. Johanson, presented careful papers describing their religious experience and theological belief, both candidates declaring that they owed much to the early training of their homes. The papers were different, but each was remarkably thoughtful and convincing. The council voted unanimously and most heartily to proceed to the ordination and installation of Mr. Johanson, and the ordination of Mrs. Johanson.

This service, held in the evening, was altogether satisfying and beautiful.

The sermon by Dr. C. S. Lane on "The Glorious Gospel" was introduced by the felicitous statement that he always preached this same sermon at the ordination of any one of his children. The prayer of Professor Purdy was a solemn invocation of the co-operation of the Holy Spirit in the ordination of the two candidates for the Christian ministry. The right hand of fellowship was given by Rev. E. U. Cowles of the neighboring church in Spencer. The charge to the minister and the charge to the people were given appropriately by Rev. Stoddard Lane and Rev. G. H. Lane.

Mr. and Mrs. Johanson were married Sept. 30, and previously were students together of the Hartford Seminary Foundation, where they took distinguished honors. Mrs. Johanson was graduated cum laude from Smith College in 1922, and Mr. Johanson received his M.A. from the University of Wisconsin last June. The new pastorate in Brookfield is beginning most auspiciously.

The New Hampshire Plan

As a result of the study of rural conditions in the State of New Hampshire, carried on since last spring by Dr. Malcolm Dana, Director of the Department of Rural Work of the National Council, the New Hampsire Plan has been launched and the churches of the state have been informally committed to it. The plan will be put forward under the direction of the Committee on the Ministry of the State Conference, in co-operation with a special commission known as the Country Life Commission, with a chairman and a representative from each of the associations of the state.

The plan provides for specific work for each calendar year. These are the five points for 1926: (1) a parish survey; (2) a parish map; (3) a program of activities for a two or three year period; (4) a fifty-five per cent approximation of one or two assigned par-standard church programs; (5) the reading and study of an assigned book by the pastor. The parish application of the reading and a book review will be deposited at the state office and an informal reward of merit given to those who complete the work.

There are several aims in the putting forth of such a program, among them inspiring the rural clergy with the bigness of their work; a minimum training in the technique of rural organization by those whose education did not provide such training; and above all to "secure for the individual church a more continuous service by building programs which will endure irrespective of ministerial changes." is expected that the plan will unite the ru pastors in a new, up-to-date, enthusiastic lowship of service.

The plan was put before the ministers inf mally at the recent conference at Point neva, and has been published fully in the N vember number of the New Hampshire C gregational Record. A 24-page manual is s to be issued from the State Conference of with more details.

Already several of the summer workers h turned in parish maps and card files of th findings, which are of great value. It is pected that the following of this plan will crease the general efficiency of all departme of church work, for, says Dr. Dana in outl ing the project: "Sermons and plans wh grow up out of an actual study of local ne and opportunities will fit because they made on the spot and for the people who the last analysis must use them."

An installation of unusual interest was held Free Church, Andover, on Oct. 15, when Rev. C. Church was formally inducted into the storal office. Rev. Newman Matthews was derator of the council, and Rev. E. W. A. Dkinson was scribe. The sermon, by Dr. P. Huget, was an eloquent and inspiring ssage. There was a large attendance at the ernoon meeting of the council, and also at public installation service in the evening. Mr. Church began his work with Free Church the beginning of the year succeeding Rev. A. Wheelock, who was called to Willimantic, early in the fall. For six years he had n an assistant minister in the Tompkins Ave. urch, Brooklyn, N. Y., where he served h marked acceptance. His ability, enthusin, energy, and valuable experience have aldy yielded cheering results in his new field labor. Seventy-two persons have been reved into church membership, and the Sunday ool has been strengthened in its organizan and teaching force.

rst Church, Haverhill, Organizes nior Choir

A junior choir, under the direction of the urch organist, Frederick Johnson, has been ganized at First Church, Bradford, and sang the first time at the morning service, Nov. 1. er 50 young people are in the choir. They ar cottas made by women of the parish rcle, led by Mrs. Norman Hodgdon. These ys and girls will sing the hymns and reonses, anthems and processionals, and it is pected that this feature will add much to the tractiveness of the services of the First urch, of which Rev. G. E. Cary is minister.

ccepts Call to Maynard

Rev. Victor Kotila, formerly pastor of First nnish Church, Worcester, has accepted a call become pastor of the Finnish Church in aynard. Mr. Kotila came to this country 12 ars ago, after he had completed an eight-year urse in Gymnasium, which is high school d junior college (two-year college course) mbined. In the spring of 1913 he took the trance examination in Helsingfors University d enrolled in the Theological Department. fter coming to this country he worked as a borer in Fitchburg and for 10 months in the ssabet Mills in Maynard, after which in 1915 entered Union Theological College in Chigo, from which he was graduated in 1917. e has held pastorates in Toronto, Ont., Ashbula, O., and Worcester, Mass.

emorial Windows at Village hurch, Dorchester

On the afternoon of Oct. 18, Village Church, orchester, held an appropriate service in conction with the installation of memorial winows in remembrance of Rev. G. Wolcott rooks, pastor from 1890 to 1915, Deacon illiam Tucker, John Atherton Tucker, Henry T. Barnes, Susan A. Barnes, Rebekah Harrington, James Gaskins, Ellen L. Campbell, T. Edwin Ruggles, Sarah F. Whitney, and in honor of Florence T. Swan, at present in missionary service in Madura, India. An impressive and descriptive responsive selection preceded the sermon by Prof. Elmer A. Leslie of the Boston University School of Theology. The pastor, Rev. J. R. Cheney, presided, conducted the special service of dedication, and offered prayer. Others participating were Rev. Messrs. J. C. Wingatt, E. D. Dolloff and F. L. Weis, from neighboring churches. An attractive program interpreted the symbols inserted in the windows. The chairman of the memorial committee was Frederick A. Gaskins, treasurer of the American Board.

Escaping a Tragedy

Prominent Congregationalists in Brockton and vicinity escaped a serious tragedy, Nov. 9, when on their way to Boston they were crashed into by another car. The automobile was thrown with terrific force against a telephone pole and Miss Lorna G. Townsend, director of religious education at South Church, Brockton, sustained a double fracture of her right arm. Rev. R. W. Coe, South Church, and Rev. H. F. Holton of Porter, Brockton, were bruised and severely shaken. Rev. A. M. Parker, Bridgewater, who was at the wheel, appears to have been uninjured.

Recreation Building for Porter, Brockton

As a part of the 75th anniversary building program Porter Church, Brockton, has broken ground for a modern, well-equipped recreation building to cost approximately $20,000. It is to be built on church land adjoining the house of worship. With the restoration of the steeple this will complete the large plans of which the recently renovated and improved interior of the house of worship is an important part. It is expected that the new plant will be ready for use next September. Money for the much needed addition is already in sight.

Essex North Women's Gatherings

The autumn meetings of the Essex North Branch of the Woman's Board of Missions and the Essex North Alliance of the Woman's Home Missionary Association, held at North, Haverhill, Oct. 13, were of unusual interest. There were nearly 200 delegates present. The morning session was devoted to the work of the branch and the afternoon session to the work of the alliance. Informing and inspiring addresses were delivered at the meeting of the branch by Miss Bertha Smith, Arupukottai, India, and Mrs. Frank Gaylord Cook; and at the meeting of the alliance by Mrs. Frank S. Berry and Rev. Bertha Harris. An excellent luncheon was served at noon by the women of North Church.

The outstanding feature of the meeting of the branch—its annual meeting—was the report of the treasurer. During the past year Essex North Branch has been working on a reduced apportionment. This is the result of a meeting held at Center Church, Haverhill, in June, 1924. Some of the churches had been finding it impossible to raise their apportionment since the increase made three years previously, and were feeling discouraged in consequence. At that meeting representatives from the churches were asked to state the sums they were willing to assume. Three of the 22 churches kept to the old apportionment; one added on nearly one per cent, but the remaining 18 accepted cuts ranging from 15 to 61 per cent. The budget was therefore reduced from $3,500—which the churches had accepted the previous year, but had failed to meet—to $2,592.38, the exact amount of the women's share, or 14 per cent of the total pledged by the churches. The women furthermore voted to work for the entire apportionment of their individual churches, instead of limiting their responsibility to the branch and the alliance, which alone had formerly been considered their work. The treasurer reported that the entire amount pledged by the branch for the past year has been raised. Not only that, but because of extra gifts, the pledge has been exceeded by nearly $300. Thirteen churches have met their apportionment in full, and there was much joy at the meeting when these results were announced.

At the meeting of the alliance Rev. Bertha Harris made an eloquent plea for assistance in carrying on the missionary work of the Shauffler School at Cleveland, O. The alliance will open a fund for the school. G. H. C.

When Sunday Comes

Anniversary of Finnish, Quincy

The observance of the 30th anniversary of the Finnish Church of Quincy, with the 29th of the Christian Endeavor Society, was held Oct. 10-12. This church was organized in 1895, when less than 200 Finns had come to Quincy as workers in quarries. At that time the only organization among them was a temperance society. Rev. Andrew Groop, a recent graduate of Chicago Seminary, then residing in Fitchburg, preached and organized the work. Today the church has 158 members, a school as large, and an unusually active Y. P. S. C. E.

The exercises for the anniversary began Saturday night of the 10th, when the first regular pastor, Rev. K. F. Henrikson (1896-1908) made the address. On Sunday morning Mr. Groop preached. The Christian Endeavor Society observed its anniversary in the afternoon, with a crowded house. It began existence with seven members, three of whom were present, including Mr. Henrikson. The speaker was Rev. J. E. Lillback, second pastor (1908-1914). At the evening program both Mr. Groop and Mr. Henrikson preached. Monday was sight-seeing day with a closing night service at which older members gave brief reminiscences. The musical programs added much to the exercises and the anniversary clearly indicated rapid progress from a small dependent group to a self-supporting Congregational church. Dr. F. E. Emrich of the Home Missionary Society, which for nearly 25 years aided the church, brought greetings of the fellowship.

Rev. J. H. Childs Fifty Years a Minister

Rev. James H. Childs, who was obliged by advancing years and failing health to close his work with the Pelham Church last winter and go to Huntington to make his home with his son, Rev. I. H. Childs, pastor of the Federated Church of that town, was ordained to the Christian ministry in the South Byfield Congregational Church in the town of Newbury, Mass., 50 years ago, Oct. 7, 1875. On Nov. 1 Communion Sunday, he preached at Huntington, thus celebrating his 50th anniversary in a most fitting manner. Mention was made of the occasion in the service. His granddaughter Gertrude Childs, wrote a poem in honor of the event.

Becomes Pastor of Church in Morris

Rev. W. L. Sizer has accepted a call to Morris, a rural field situated near beautiful Bantam Lake, which is becoming more and more popular as a summer resort. This is the only church in the town.

Mr. Sizer was born in Wales, Mass., in 1880 and preached for ten years as a local preacher in Methodist churches in Howland, Me., Liberty Church, Springfield, Mass., Waterbury Center and Lyndon, Vt., later serving for five years as pastor of Ellsworth Church, Sharon, Ct., where he was ordained to the Congregational ministry.

He began his pastorate at West Church, Haverhill, April 25, 1921, coming from Federated Hampden Church. In Haverhill he received 26 new members into the church, and

ing to First Church, East Orange

First Church, East Orange, N. J., has ex- ded a unanimous call to Rev. Edwin R. Holden, associate pastor of Second Church, Waterbury, Ct. Mr. Holden has accepted the call.

Rev. E. R. Holden

He is a native of Hackettstown, N. J., where he attended the local schools, graduating from the high school in 1914. After a year at Middlebury College and three years at Wesleyan University, he graduated at the ter college in 1918. During the summer of 18 he served with the Y. M. C. A. and the cket Testament League at Camp Merritt, J., and later was a private in the 31st Ar- ery at Fort Hancock, returning upon his charge from the service to "Y" work at Fort ncock. At its conclusion, he entered Yale vinity School and graduated in 1921. Dur- a large part of the time he was studying at le, he served as student pastor at Munroe, , after graduation accepting a call to the storate of the First Congregational Church, rtsmouth, Virginia, where he was ordained the ministry Nov. 3, 1921. In 1922, Mr. lden was called to Waterbury and served as sociate to Rev. Robert E. Brown until the ter's removal to Oakland, Cal., in May, 24, having together with other duties entire arge of the Sunday school and religious edu- ional activities. When Dr. Brown resigned, . Holden assumed the whole charge and di- tion of the affairs of the Waterbury Church d continued in this capacity until a new pas- was called in March, 1925.

The East Orange Church was organized in 37 and is the fifth largest Congregational Church in New Jersey, with a membership of over 500 and a Sunday school of more than 400.

ILLINOIS

Organ in Memory of James K. Chester

The church at Sterling has just dedicated a new three-manual pipe organ at a total cost of $14,000. The organ was dedicated to the memory of Mr. James K. Chester, who gave long continued, efficient, and faithful service to all the work of the church. He served on the board of deacons for many years, was a long time on the board of trustees, was superintendent of the Sunday school for 27 years, and gave of himself and of his money in a multitude of ways to further the work of the Kingdom through this church. A number of large gifts entered into the memorial; one of $1,200 provided the harp stop which is a part of the new organ. A contribution of $1,000 by Mrs. Nellie H. Martin, a former member of the congregation, was used for ornamental grill, panels, and pipes of the organ front. All the churches of the city and the surrounding country united in the dedicatory services at which former organists as well as those now prominent in the leadership of music in the district played the new instrument. Rev. A. W. Barwick is pastor.

IOWA

Harold L. Michael Ordained

When the Primghar Church wanted to have its young minister, Rev. H. L. Michael, ordained it made use of the regular ecclesiastical council instead of the local association, as has become quite customary. It was a large and representative gathering of the invited churches and ministers, and everyone took a keen interest in this important event.

Mr. Michael graduated from Chicago Seminary last June and began his work at Primghar July 1. The intervening months have demonstrated his capacity for leadership of a high order. Struggling with poverty and other adverse conditions, he worked his way through high school and college. His statement of faith before the council revealed a genuine Christian experience which has deeply colored his religious thinking and out of which his theological convictions have grown. This "statement" gave satisfaction to the council, for it disclosed breadth of vision and depth of insight such as one rarely finds except where men are modernly trained in an up-to-date school of prophets. The council, therefore, gave warm approval to proceeding with the services of ordination.

Dr. J. H. Andress of Sioux City preached the sermon on "The Gospel as the Power of God." The honored pastor emeritus of the Emmetsburg Church, Rev. J. E. Brereton, offered a tender and uplifting prayer of ordination. Rev. Joseph Steele of the Mayflower Church, Sioux City, gave the charge to the pastor; Rev. H. O. Allen of Sheldon extended the right hand of fellowship, and Supt. P. A. Johnson gave the charge to the church. The Primghar Church, with its pastor now properly inducted into the ranks of the Christian ministry, enters upon a new era of promised success.

CALIFORNIA

Rev. J. M. Schaefle Given "Call" for Life

As he came to the end of the 35th year of ministry at Hyde Park Church, Los Angeles, Rev. J. M. Schaefle was bound to his congregation by a call for life. Like Paul's, they are sweet bonds. Years ago he went out into the grain fields to hold services, in a community that has developed into one of the great resident districts of Los Angeles. Pre-eminently a pastor, a rare devotion has enriched the people with a love that will not let him go. The great city recognizes his pastoral helpfulness, calling upon him two or three times every week in funerals, and for nearly as many weddings. For this period, too, he has been the minister of Pico Heights Church. It is great to be a minister like that!

Fire Disaster at Pilgrim, Pomona

A fierce fire swept through the auditorium of Pilgrim Church, Pomona, ruining the interior of the main building. Water did as much damage as the fire. Fortunately the choice organ escaped. The decoration and finishing of the auditorium were notable for grace and beauty. Fortunately insurance covers the injury which is variously estimated at from $40,000 to $75,000. In the excellently proportioned Pilgrim Hall, morning worship will be held pending building. Very likely the Sunday evening service, using motion pictures, will be held in the spacious auditorium of the Y. M. C. A.

Building Completed at Oneonta

During the earnest ministry of Rev. E. A. Waldo, a large church project was begun and carried far at Oneonta. Insufficiency of funds, however, prevented the completion of the building. In the year that Rev. Holland Burr has been pastor, the constructive work has continued. It is a choice community suburban to Pasadena; a community church, with a great group of young people, excellent congregations, a carefully organized church school, and encouraging growth in membership. This permitted another financial campaign, with $25,000 raised with which to complete the building. The auditorium is attractive, there is good equipment of rooms for a varied service, and the exterior has beauty and symmetry.

Dr. Lash of Hollywood Home from Europe

Returning in September from Europe, Rev. J. H. Lash of Hollywood, Los Angeles, shares with his people Sunday evenings some of the inspiring experiences in connection with his travels in the Sherwood Eddy party. Addresses are being given on France, England. Germany, etc., and in connection with them the stereopticon and motion pictures are used.

Sept. 27 and the days of the week following were made a time for rallying in all departments of the church. The men's forum, meeting on Sunday mornings in the club house, is securing choice speakers about the city.

For the church nights, Wednesday evenings, strong programs are arranged. From 5.00 to 6.15 a training course for church-school leaders is provided, with Miss Gertrude Hutton of the University of Southern California as instructor, the subject being "Project Methods." Dinner and social time are at 6.30, in connection with which the minister gives a series of short talks on "The Social Teachings of Jesus." Then for five weeks there is a consideration of community problems, with the following speakers: Dr. W. T. Gilliland on Mexican Work at the Plaza, Los Angeles; Dr. Frederick P. Woellner of the University of California on "Social Attitudes"; Miss Charlotte Davis. General Secretary of the Young Women's Christian Association; Mrs. Charles H. Richmond, member of the Social Service Commission of Los Angeles; Mrs. John Mills of Washington, D. C., an illustrated address on "All Around South America."

This young church has now passed the 700 mark in membership, and is planning for a new building.

Ontario Utilizes Student Help

In its proximity to Pomona College, the Ontario Church is able to enlist student help with mutual advantage. The young men and women provide many an interesting musical program, give addresses, help in the church school, etc. To the young people, also, the training is of great value. Rev. J. B. Toomay was one of the men so fortunate as to be in the Sherwood Eddy party to Europe this summer. Now l people are sharing a feast of good things: fr La Belle France, from Burdened England, fr Conditions in Germany.

Deaths

THARINE MUSSEY HARTWELL SEWALL

Catharine Mussey Hartwell, widow of Rev. Ann Ladd Sewall, died at the home of her daughter in St. Albans, Vt., Oct. 22. Born in Pittleton, Mass., in October, 1862, the third daughter in a family of eight children of Shattuck and Catherine S. Mussey Hartwell, her lines went back to English and Huguenot ancestry. Graduating from Miss Burnham's School, Northampton, Mass., in June, 1883, she was married to Mr. Sewall in October of the same year, joining him in his first parish at Westminster, Vt. Several churches in Vermont, Missouri, Massachusetts, and later in Florida, knew their capable, devoted, and unselfish ministry, and in every case of their home-making Mrs. Sewall was deeply loved. She served as secretary of the Worcester County Branch of the Woman's Board of Missions and as secretary for the Northeast for Home and Foreign Missions, also for the state of Florida on the Foreign Mission-ary Board.

Four children survive her: Mrs. Harry S. Whitbeck, Manasquan, N. J.; Mrs. Roswell M. Martin, St. Albans, Vt.; Miss Carolyn J. Sewall, Pao-ting-fu, China; and William Sewall, Wakefield, Mass. The youngest daughter, Mrs. Donnell Hicks Young, died in 1919. Mr. Sewall served the church at Lake Helen, Fla., for five years in case of failing health, and died at Seabreeze in that state, in June, 1923. During the past year Mrs. Sewall was Dean of Women at Piedmont College, Demorest, Ga., making there, as everywhere, a deep and abiding impression upon the lives touching hers.

"The gospel of a life like hers
Is more than books or scrolls."

Radio Lectures

To Be Given Under Auspices of Yale Divinity School

In response to requests from many sources, e Yale Divinity School will inaugurate a ries of six radio lectures for the benefit of ministers and all who are interested in religion and service. They will be broadcasted from Station WJZ of the Radio Corporation of America. The first lecture will be given on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 22, by President Angell of Yale University, on "Education and Service." The lecture on the following Sunday will be given by Dr. Robert L. Calhoun on "Religion and Science." Dr. Calhoun is one of the more brilliant younger preachers in America. On Dec. 6, Dr. Luther A. Weigle, professor of religious education at Yale Divinity School, will be the speaker. On Dec. 13, Dr. Jerome Davis will speak on the practical application of religion to life. He is known to some through his articles on Russia and was primarily responsible for the adoption of the new Social Creed of the Congregational Churches at the National Council meeting in Washington. The final two addresses, on Dec. 20 and 27, will be given by Dean Charles R. Brown, one of the most popular preachers in America.

The questions of auditors who care to write to Jerome Davis at Yale Divinity School, New Haven, Ct., will be answered either by letter or over the radio on the next Sunday afternoon.

Each lecture will begin promptly at 3.30 on Sunday afternoon, beginning Nov. 22 and ending Dec. 27. Subjects and speakers are as follows:

Nov. 22, President Angell—"Education and Service."
Nov. 29, Dr. R. L. Calhoun—"Religion and Science."
Dec. 6, Dr. Luther A. Weigle—"Religion and the Schools."
Dec. 13, Dr. Jerome Davis—"Religion and Social Science."
Dec. 20, Dean Charles R. Brown—"The Vital and the Trivial in Religion."
Dec. 27, Dean Charles R. Brown—"The Real Test of Christian Life."

RISIBLES

Mr.: Is this piano yours?

Mrs.: We own about an octave of it.—Pitt Panther.

"Two young men, walking from coast to coast, got off the train here Friday morning."—Glen Elder (Kan.) Sentinel.

"I am sorry I married you," sobbed the bride.

"You ought to be," he replied, "you cheated some other girl out of a mighty fine husband."—Bison.

"Mother, this is the fifth time I've asked God f'r a new first-baseman's mitt—and I haven't got it yet! D'ya s'pose my wave-length's wrong?"—Life.

"What's Sambo doin' now?"

"Ain't you heard? He's Africum dodger at de county fair."

"Dat man sure has a head for business."—California Pelican.

Judge (to prospective juryman): So you've formed an opinion of the case?

P. J.: Yes, your honor, one look at that man convinced me he was guilty.

Judge: Heavens, man! that's the prosecuting attorney!—Wabash Caveman.

At a Christmas party the husband of one of the guests arrived very late.

"I have come to take my wife home," he explained.

"Oh, my dear Mr. Blank," said the hostess, "why didn't you come sooner?"

History Prof.—And when Lord Chesterfield saw that death was near he gathered all his friends around him. But before he breathed his last he uttered those last immortal words. Who can tell me what the dying words of Lord Chesterfield were?

Class (in chorus)—They satisfy!—Punch Bowl.

An old colored man was arraigned before a justice on a charge of assault. During the proceedings the judge asked him if he wanted a lawyer appointed to defend him.

"No, no, Judge," he replied; "I don't wan' no lawyer, but I sutinly would like a couple of good witnesses, if you got 'em."

Sammy (eating dinner with his newly married sister)—"Say, Sis, where do you keep your station?"

Sister—"My station, what in the world do you mean?" at the same time giving a wondering look at her newly wedded husband.

Sammy—"Well, I heard Mother say that you married below your station, and I was wondering where you kept it."

A young lady who was returning from the Pacific Coast had met a very affable young man who was explaining different points of interest along the route. "This tunnel we are approaching," said he, "cost over a million dollars."

As they emerged from the opposite end she gave a happy little sigh of satisfaction and said, "It was worth every cent of it."

An "eating competition" was organized in a mining town in the north of England. One competitor, a giant collier six feet in height and broad in proportion, succeeded in disposing of a leg of mutton, a plentiful supply of vegetables, and a plum pudding, washed down with copious draughts of ale. He was unanimously declared the winner, and was being triumphantly escorted home when he turned to his admirers and said:

"Eh lads, say, don't say nowt of this to my old woman, or she won't gie me no dinner!"—Continent.

Your New Year's Resolution!

Resolved:

That beginning the first Sunday in January our adult group shall earnestly study together the questions for consideration in firmly believing that such a study will help us to build intelligently an adequate program of religious education for our church.

The Teaching Church

A Discussion Course for Adults

By BENJAMIN S. WINCHESTER and ERWIN L. SHAVER

A series of discussions designed to awaken the adults of the church to their responsibility for an adequate religious education program, and to provide a thorough and practical course on the program of religious education in the local church.

For Whom Intended

Adult Groups Teachers' Conferences
Community Training Schools
Sunday Evening Forums Midweek Services
Teacher Training Classes

General Plan

The work of the course involves an introductory session followed by twelve sessions for group discussion. The topics suggested for discussion are as follows:

Shall the Church Maintain a School?
What is the Purpose of the Church School?
How Shall the School Recruit Its Members?
What Shall We Teach?
How Shall the School be Organized?
What Equipment is Needed?
What are the Best Methods of Teaching?
How Can We Secure Competent Teachers?
How Can We Test the Work of the School?
How Should the Church School be Supported?

Natural Reaction of Group

If earnest consideration is given this course, the response on the part of the group is sure to lead to action—leading to the practice of making necessary improvements with systematic regularity and to the building of a program in accord with the highest educational standards.

Price of the textbook is 35 cents.

Library Package

In order that every group may secure additional material to enrich the discussion, a Library Package is provided containing pamphlets featuring pertinent, illuminating, and interesting articles. The authors of this course recommend that one package be purchased for each study group, the price of which is $1.50.

John Freeman's New Story

(Beginning in December)

"Kennedy's Second Best"

THE readers of THE CONGREGATIONALIST have a great treat before them in the thrilling and purposeful serial story which will begin in our December issues. Its title is Kennedy's Second Best. Kennedy is an upstanding virile preacher on the way from success to still greater honors, when the crisis of his life comes in the far west of Canada. The story presents frontier life on the broad ranches near Calgary, with a swift-moving succession of dramatic incidents. A gripping romance runs through this narrative. Heroism, love, ambition, conscience,—rise in the struggle of human forces which run their strong current through this remarkable story. The frontier life is vividly shown and some of the scenes carry the reader to Vancouver, to Toronto, and to old Quebec. We are fortunate to be able to give our readers in Kennedy's Second Best what we have long sought,—a worthwhile serial story of sustained interest from beginning to end, having appeal for all ages, true to life and with real religion, as real men and women live it, running like a thread of gold through it all.

The author is a writer and preacher of distinction. John Freeman is a native of Nova Scotia. He was born in Milton, Queens County, near Liverpool. He was graduated from McMaster University, and his degrees include that of Doctor of Divinity. A succession of successful pastorates in New Brunswick and Ontario, included that of Bloor St. Baptist Church, Toronto. During the last 17 years Dr. Freeman has conducted a notable ministry in England, serving the historic Belvoir St. Baptist Church, Leicester, for 15 years; and during the war rendered important service in camps and hospitals. He is much in demand as a preacher and orator. He has come recently to the United States, where he expects to remain, preaching and writing.

Dr. Freeman's religious books include Life on the Uplands, Concerning Christ, and The Edge of the Age. His novels include Fan of Belsey's and This My Son, both New Brunswick stories, Punch and Holy Water (Polish), and God's Infidel (English).

Dr. Freeman knows personally the regions and the types of people that appear in his stories.

The Editorial Outlook

Our Cover Cut

THE cut on the cover, appropriate for our Young Folks' Book Number, and used through the courtesy of the Macmillan Company, is from the end-paper decoration of a book written not so much for children as about child-life. A review of Mr. Poole's book will appear in next week's issue.

The Study of American Citizenship

A RECENT gift of $100,000 is enabling Washburn College, Topeka, Kan., to establish a Department of American Citizenship and Public Affairs, an innovation in college departments. The donor of this gift which has been offered for this specific purpose is a business man whose name, for the present, is withheld. Coincident with this gift has come another of $5,000 from James M. Parker of Kansas City, Mo., which will be used for the purpose of developing an adequate reference library in connection with the new department.

President Womer hopes to raise, in addition to these gifts, a sufficient amount to endow an annual lectureship under the auspices of the department, for which it will be possible to obtain the services of men pre-eminent in public affairs.

The value of such a department will be readily recognized. The prospective curriculum provides for a twelve-hour course in each semester during the four-year college term. In the freshman year emphasis will be laid upon the historical basis and ideals of citizenship, leading up to discussion, in the later years, of the relationship of citizenship to the issues and problems of modern life, and in the final year to a study of these problems in relation to the teachings of Jesus. Such a department, wisely conducted, could do much to establish in the mind of youth that ballast so much needed at the present hour. It could be depended upon to produce a larger, more intelligent conception of patriotism linked around the ideals of freedom, magnanimity, and courage, and, at the same time, it might be expected to bring progressive outlook and movements more into the realm of the outworking of these American ideals rightly interpreted and expressed. Sound conceptions of citizenship will be recognized in coming years as standing over against both reactionary conservatism and reactionary radicalism as a basis of progress and the orderly evolution of American society. Specific study in college directed toward this end may produce valuable results.

A Missionary Deputation to India

FOR the second time during his connection with the American Board Dr. William E. Strong heads a deputation to India. He went, in 1913, to carry the greetings of the Board to the India Missions when they celebrated their 100th anniversary. This present visit is called for by conditions no less important, though of quite a different character. In the years since the Great War many changes—political, economic, social, and religious—have taken place in India. Dr. Strong and his colleague on the deputation, Dr. Rockwell Harmon Potter, the newly chosen president of the Board, expect to study mission work in view of these grave changes on the field, to confer regarding the adjustments necessary and the problems that have developed; to meet the missionaries and their Indian associates, jointly and separately to meet also and to get the viewpoints of Government officials, Indian reformers, educators, and prophets, and thus to get help in shaping new policies for new times.

The party sailed on Oct. 31, just after the closing of the National Council meeting. It had been expected that the Woman's Boards would be represented on the deputation by Mrs. H. Melville Tenney of California, but within a day or two of sailing conditions arose which made it inadvisable for her to take the journey. Dr. Strong is the secretary of the Board in charge of the four China Missions as well as those of India and Ceylon. It is probable that his return from his eight months' absence will be by way of China and Japan which will permit him to become acquainted with the problems of those lands as well as those of India.

The Question of Poison Gas

WE call attention to a letter in this issue from Prof. S. Francis Howard, professor of chemistry in Norwich University, the military college of the State of Vermont, in which he discusses an editorial paragraph, Poison and Profits, that appeared in The Congregationalist of Oct. 29. Professor Howard has for the most part missed the point and purpose of that editorial, which was directed, not to the general question of the need or propriety of considering poison gas as a factor in national defense, but to a more specific matter contained in a dispatch from Washington to the New York Journal of Commerce. Our editorial comment was based entirely upon the statement in that dispatch that the "chemical clans" were "marshalling for a drive in the Senate to prevent ratification of the Geneva anti-poison gas protocol at the next session of Congress." The question whether there should be national preparedness to meet the poison gas of a potential enemy with poison gas, if necessary, whatever may be its inherent merits is, we submit, a very different question from that of the rightness and advisability of promoting an international agreement to prevent the use of poison gas. The figures that Professor Howard quotes regarding the use of poison gas in the World War have little to do with the matter. That war revealed the use of poison gas for the first time, when the possibilities of killing by this method were in their infancy. What is more to the point is the verdict of reputable scientists and military men regarding the possible development of poison gas and the annihilating power of explosives dropped by airplane. If rivalry in destruction with these new possibilities becomes a fact no nation will be surely capable of defense, and it is doubtful whether any nation would be worth defending. If the nations cannot establish moral, legal, and spiritual safeguards against the destructive agencies that modern science can develop to the nth power, there is no hope for a humanity whose life is based upon standards of holiness, intelligence, and culture; we might as well give up the struggle.

But hope does lie in scientific forces allying themselves with spiritual forces to prevent the use of scientific discoveries for wholesale destruction. Professor Howard's reference to carbolic acid is wide of the mark. If any chemist because of the acknowledged benefits of carbolic acid, used for humane ends, is upon that account failing to do all in his power to prevent its use for destructive ends ghoulishness is not too strong a term to apply to his attitude. We invite Professor Howard's attention to the exact point of our comment, which concerned the reference to the opposition of certain commercial interests to agreements outlawing chemical warfare "which might result injuriously to the commercial production of chemicals." We cannot believe that Professor Howard would be a party to the commercial ghoulishness—the term used by a soldier who had been gassed—which would deliberately set the interests of commerce over against the sacredness of human life, to say nothing of the very future and safety of society itself.

Returning to Total Abstinence

TO his large and increasing radio audience, Dr. S Parkes Cadman sent out, on Nov. 1, this message regarding the enforcement of the dry law: "Depend on moral suasion rather than on politics for safeguarding the prohibition movement." Following the report of its Research Department, the Federal Council has issued through the administrative committee a statement embodying what it believes to be the "duty of the moral citizenship of the nation." Its very first utterance is "Magnify the values of the principles of total abstinence and the obligation upon law-abiding citizens to practise the same."

We have then from the American preacher with the largest weekly hearing and from the council representing most of the great Protestant denominations, definite insistence upon stressing temperance teaching and the immediate acceptance of the principle of total abstinence. From many angles all this is as interesting as it is imperative. Not long ago—just prior to the coming of forces dominating morale in the World War, "red-blooded men," men with "wills"—sneered at total abstainers. A relatively small group—they were often called radical in thinking and were regarded as weak in capacity. Now we are proving the necessity of educating youth away from the leading of those who prophesy breakage in character and wreckage for the state through prohibition. Not in the history of the American alcohol problem has such a word been more imperative than now.

Those who believed—and there were many—that with the placing of a prohibitive law on the statute books the curtain would be at once rung down, have seen their serious mistake. Teaching in day and church schools is now fundamental not only to personal habits but to secure respect for the Constitution of the United States. Citizenship, which means orderly living, is involved. Enactment is not enforcement. There can be no armistice in the anti-alcohol war. There can be no satisfactory enforcement of law without a continuous program of education. The problem today is primarily a personal, mental, and moral attitude toward the Amendment. The habits, traditions, customs, and fallacies of a people, deep rooted through three centuries of cultivation, cannot be eradicated merely by the passage of legislation. If the law had had full recognition through several years we should still require teaching for each generation. Such must continue until youth appear not desirous of alcoholic drinks and with established bject for government. Because the field for the foes of w is youth, the task and immediate responsibility for nstruction cannot wait. Total abstinence is a uniform fety sign. It is the only guarantee of prohibition.

For more than one generation the program of personal briety and individual abstinence must be continued. ome day we shall realize that total abstinence is by no eans a River of Doubt but an assured Stream of Life. resident Hopkins of Dartmouth was right and his state- ent holds over from war days, when he said: "The ollege, under new and greater obligations must, to a far reater extent than ever, give attention to the formation f habit." The agencies of the church, we believe, have clear and definite duty today to take up and carry on e neglected task of education for the habit of total bstinence from the beverage use of all intoxicants. We nnot have a sober and law-abiding nation if we com- romise with or condone in any degree drinking habits. eaders and educators must get back to fundamentals in rnest, back to precept and example, back to thorough ducation, in home and school and church, firmly to tablish the principle and the habits of total abstinence.

As Others See Us

T is usually a chastening, if also a challenging and mystifying experience, to see ourselves as others see s, and there is both chastening and challenge, despite e somewhat comforting title, in the scrutiny with hich a "careful observer" in the editorial columns of e Christian Century surveys our recent National ouncil gathering under the heading, Congregationalism dvances.

In the Christian Century's survey there is sufficient jolt any possible tendency of the Congregational fel- wship toward self-complacency. The very index of our dvancement, which our contemporary finds in the doption by the National Council of the Statement of ocial Ideals, derives its significance, we are rather luntly told, from the social conservatism, which our ntemporary thinks has been conspicuously in contrast ith our theological liberalism.

The heart of Congregationalism being in New Eng- nd [says the editorial], its churches have frequently und it difficult to escape a tacit connivance with eco- omic reaction, for the industrial machinery of New Eng- nd is in the possession of the old "yankee" families nd the laborers in these factories are preponderantly uth European, particularly Italian.

It is under these circumstances and against this back- round that our contemporary estimates the vital ad- ancement of adopting "the most radical statement of he social ideals of Christianity ever accepted by a rotestant body in America."

There is much truth in this representation but not s much truth as those who hold this prevalent concep- ion of Congregational New England honestly suppose. t is notable that the championship of two New England aymen had a great deal to do with furthering the doption of the Statement by the Council, as it is equally otable that much of the strongly expressed criticism nd opposition came from the Middle West. New Eng- nd was strongly represented on the Social Service Com- ission that presented to the Council the report em- bodying the Statement. If there is plenty of social conservatism in Congregational New England we have not found its counterpart lacking in other sections of Congregationalism, and it is offset in New England by as much intelligent and progressive social idealism as is found in any other section of our fellowship, and by a great deal more than is found in some sections. None the less Congregationalists everywhere might well take to heart the polite inquiry as to how much the adoption of a progressive set of resolutions by a representative Congregational gathering is going to mean in the actual life and practice of individual Congregationalists. The Christian Century, it should be said, raises this question in no cynical or critical spirit. The Council's action is welcomed for all that it means and its implications are excellently stated.

We reprint elsewhere our contemporary's references to the whole merger issue which will be of particular interest to our readers.

Glory, Tragedy, and Opera Bouffe

ALL three were present in a conspicuous way, and strangely intermingled in the celebration of Armistice Day in Boston. The happenings and issues attending the approach and consummation of that day in the neighborhood of Beacon Hill are of such vital import to the nation as a whole, that we ask our Middle-Western and Far-Western critics who complain occasionally of "too much Boston," to bear with us for a moment, while we talk about these happenings at our very doors.

Religious and other forces in Greater Boston determined some time ago that Boston should have a fitting celebration of Armistice Day—a celebration that should adequately express the meaning of the day as that of the bringing in of peace after warfare, and its larger significance as a symbol of the hope of attaining such international peace for the future, as could alone be the full result of a successful "war to end war."

A committee was appointed, with Rev. G. L. Paine, Secretary of the Greater Boston Federation of Churches, as its Chairman. Mr. Paine, it should be noted, was selected as Chairman by the Committee itself, which was wholly responsible for the arrangements. Beyond the sympathetic co-operation of many who were active in the Federation, that organization had no part in the plans, and was not in any way officially responsible for them. These plans involved the holding of a great parade on Armistice Day, that should express the purposes of peace through international comity and good will. The first serious debate arose over the question whether representatives of the countries of the Central Entente during the war should be allowed to march in the parade and take part in the speaking afterwards. It was decided that inasmuch as it was a celebration of peace, and not a glorification of conflict, such representatives should be invited both to parade and to speak. It was decided also that the flags of all nations should be carried in the parade.

The effect of this decision was almost immediately to stir up the opposition and non-co-operation of those who are more concerned about celebrating conflict and victory than about symbolizing and expressing the great ideals and purposes that conflict and victory were designed to attain. The whole matter became further involved when it was announced that because certain peace organizations had been invited to participate in the parade, particularly the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, the Fellowship of Youth for Peace, and the Fellowship of Reconciliation, three veterans organizations, the American Legion, the World War Veterans, and the Military Order of the World War, had withdrawn from the arrangements and declined to parade. Several other organizations withdrew following this action of the American Legion and the other bodies of veterans.

A perfect tempest of controversy immediately arose in the public press, a portion of which maintained a fair, if somewhat timid, attitude, while another portion took advantage of the occasion to mar its news and editorial columns with vituperation, misrepresentation, and passion. The Committee wisely and firmly stood its ground, pointing out that the celebration and parade seemed a fitting occasion for the expression of the fullest interest in peace, but that participation in the parade did not imply agreement with other participants regarding the best method of working for peace, or the endorsement of the activities of any group. Mayor Curley, of Boston, refused to review the parade or to recognize it in any way; but Governor Fuller, of Massachusetts, made a very sensible statement in which he made it clear that the withdrawal of the military organizations would not in any way affect his purpose to review the parade and to preside at the peace meeting in the Old South Meeting House in the evening. Massachusetts State Commander Good of the American Legion, though his organization did not participate, joined Governor Fuller in reviewing the parade, and had the graciousness to state that he had seen nothing objectionable.

Of course not. Nobody but a sheer chauvinist could have detected in that parade anything contrary to high patriotism and the honoring of the flag. Even those who, as Christians, feel compelled to adopt the law of non-resistance and complete pacifism, may be thought of as under the obligation of a higher patriotism, rather than as actuated by a lack of patriotism. The lives of Penn, and Woolman, and Garrison, ought to enable us to remember that. As a matter of fact, however, the parade was not in any sense a demonstration of ultra-pacifism. It was a gorgeous, glorious conglomeration of various races, groups, and organizations, widely different, but united in the common commemoration of the signing of the Armistice, and in the symbolizing of the hope that the world might yet achieve the basis of permanent peace and good will which America entered the war to secure and maintain. It was an immense parade, nobly conceived and carried out, one of the greatest parades, even as a mere pageant, that we have ever witnessed. We wish we had space to give it adequate description. A distinctive feature of it was the long series of beautiful floats with symbolic groups in beautiful and historically accurate costumes, showing the evolution of the peace movement from earliest times.

Though one regretted the absence of the veterans' organizations, their withdrawal left the significance of the parade in no manner of doubt. It was a parade pledged to the peaceful purposes for the achievement of which many of these veterans themselves had fought. Here entered the tragedy—that men who had fought to maintain freedom and democracy should be so little concerned about the large and magnanimous recognition of these things in practice. As a matter of fact many of those who fought in the war were in the parade, and many members of the organizations that withdrew did not approve of the narrow and ill-advised official action of their bodies.

To the glory of a great demonstration in behalf of peace, and to the tragedy of the fact that some failed to stand magnanimously and gloriously by the ideals that they had fought to uphold, were added elements of opera bouffe. The first was in the action of a young girl on Beacon Hill, who hauled in her flag as the parade went by, and who thereby won wide acclaim as "the new Barbara Frietchie," by a press that seemed entirely oblivious of the ridiculousness of comparing an immature girl who pulled down her flag in the presence of those whom she regarded as its enemies, with the brave old woman who flaunted her flag in the enemy's face.

More serious because of its marring note in an otherwise triumphant occasion was the discrediting of the marshal of the parade—an unknown, whom Chairman Paine, hurried and hard driven, had accepted at the last moment on somebody's recommendation, after the intended marshal, who had, we are informed, previously approved of all the arrangements, had backed down and refused to act.

The "marshal" who had posed as a "Grand Master" of a Masonic body was challenged by Masons who asserted that there was such office in that body. As it turned out the "marshal" claimed rank in some irregular body using the Masonic name. The incident would have been trivial had not the hostile section of the Boston press exploited it in an effort to discredit the whole demonstration. People with a sense of humor found a bit of opera bouffe, not untouched with pathos, in the spectacle of a man, waiting for years with his uniform all ready, realizing at last the childish ambition of a lifetime to lead a great parade. It seemed a pity that anybody should have pricked the bubble of resplendent vanity, but it was more regrettable that even in a minor way any element of the ridiculous should have been trailed across an occasion that quickened a deep feeling of pride in the forces that are seeking permanent peace through interdenominational, inter-racial, and international comity and good will.

In Brief

The best argument for Christianity is some practical manifestation of the Christ-spirit.

If the Gospel is to be applied to the whole of life, all of life should have its interest for the Christian who proclaims it.

It was that eminent scholar, the late Thomas Davidson, who once wrote that a man might be an angel to his own family and a demon to all the rest of the world. "Diamonds for the wife," he added, "often cost the bread of the poor."

From Our Western Editor

The Anti-Saloon League of America has just held its national biennial convention at the Chicago Methodist Temple. The sessions, which lasted over most of five days, brought together ministers, business men, government officials, and women reformers representing every state in the Union. The meetings were characterized by a good deal of emotionalism, by the handling of delicate issues and of prominent personalities without the formality of gloves, and the facing of the prohibition situation with courage and aggressiveness.

The Congregationalist has called attention again and again to the lethargy of our ministers and churches concerning the Volstead Act. We have repeatedly urged that the old time aggressiveness be applied to the present situation. A large number of ministers have turned their attention to other matters and have acted as if the prohibition question were entirely settled. Dr. Frank Crane once said that the Main Street churches put over the Eighteenth Amendment. A great many people, because of the indifference of the churches, thought they were no longer loyal to the Anti-Saloon League. Taking this convention as a basis of judgment, one can readily believe that the rank and file of our church people still believe in the Anti-Saloon League and they are especially loyal to its attitude of no compromise with the liquor traffic and no modification of the Volstead Act.

The difference between the method that the League uses in handling statistics and that used by Mr. Johnson of the Federal Council was made evident in the sessions. The latter took the statistics of five years and looking at them concluded that prohibition was in a very bad way. The leaders of the Anti-Saloon League who attended the convention in Chicago are seasoned campaigners against the liquor traffic. Some of them have been on the job since the organization of the League. They judge progress by the distance they have come. William Allen White of Kansas probably had the same basis of judgment in mind when he said the other day that prohibition was making progress. Judging by his articles on prohibition in Kansas, which appeared in the Saturday Evening Post, some ten years ago, he does not expect the battle against the liquor traffic to be won in five years. He describes in those articles how long it took to get real enforcement in Kansas. The leaders of the Anti-Saloon League again and again in the convention made comparisons of the present situation and that which obtained before the Eighteenth Amendment was adopted.

They were on safe ground in calling to mind the great number of bootleggers, blind pigs, and speak-easies there were when we had the open saloon and they reminded their hearers of the situation made by the combination of the saloon, the gambling den, and the house of ill-fame. They also call to mind that there was a time not so far back when both the great political parties were under the domination of the liquor traffic. The Anti-Saloon League judges that it is making progress because it takes a long view of the situation.

Governor Pinchot of Pennsylvania was the fiery speaker of the convention. He claimed that a defeatist movement is on to secure the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment or at least the modification of the Volstead Act. He charged that certain officials are not sincerely trying to enforce the law and that when prohibition fails under their leadership, they will say that the law can't be enforced and therefore prohibition ought to be abandoned. The Governor threw back upon Secretary Mellon, Commissioners Blair and Haynes the responsibility for releasing alcohol. He said:

Not a drop of alcohol or intoxicating liquor can be legally manufactured, stored, transported, or sold without federal permit. The federal permit is therefore the first line of defense against violations of the law. It is wholly under the control of the Government of the United States. Moreover, the power of the commissioner of internal revenue over permits is complete.

In spite of such abundant power the fact is that the federal permit has not been used as it should have been used to keep known lawbreakers out of the business of breaking the law. With facts in their possession sufficient to arouse the suspicions of a woolly lamb, federal officials have been granting permits for the making and selling of alcohol to companies, officered by known violators of the law, and have refused to cancel these permits, even when the lawbreakers had finally been indicted for their lawbreaking.

It would be easy to accuse Mr. Pinchot of playing politics, but whether he is or not he has placed the issue squarely up to Secretary Mellon. The latter will have to face the issue or the people will go over his head to that "bit of solid Vermont granite in the White House," as Raymond Robins characterized President Coolidge in his address at the convention. Colonel Robins indicated that he believes that President Coolidge will support the Constitution and the people in general seem to share that belief.

Mr. Lincoln C. Andrews, federal director of prohibition enforcement, in his address held that successful enforcement demands a favorable public sentiment. He urged that all the organizations interested in prohibition carry on vigorous campaigns of education that will bring about a state of mind in America that will insist upon enforcement of prohibition. The League voted to set up an educational department, which it is putting under the leadership of some of the best publicity men that the country affords. This is one of its plans for adjustment to the present needs.

Mr. Andrews and others made it evident in the convention that too much is being asked of the Federal Government in the enforcement of the Volstead Act. It was urged that public sentiment be cultivated which would compel local officers to enforce the law. We had a good illustration last week of the difficulty of getting local officers to enforce the law against the liquor traffic. The county commissioners of Cook County, in which Chicago is situated, granted licenses to road houses already under federal injunction for selling liquor. Anton Cermak, a notorious Wet, president of the County Board, frankly said that he would try to keep the road houses clear of vice and gambling, but he did not propose to bother about enforcing the law against selling liquor.

The convention made a number of definite recommendations for strengthening enforcement including, "seizure of liquor, prewar or postwar, wherever and whenever found; placing all prohibition department appointments under civil service; deportation of aliens convicted of liquor violations; a law divesting all liquor, whenever obtained, of its legal status; a law making it a felony to forge or use forged liquor permits; a statute authorizing the President to use designated ships and officers of the navy to prevent smuggling; a nominal tax on cereal beverages and industrial alcohol; continuation of the appropriation for posters for law observance and enforcement."

The Anti-Saloon League has had a magnificent history. It has proven itself the finest and most effective reform force operating in American life in the last fifty years. It must not, however, rest upon its laurels. This is a new day with a new task in fighting the liquor traffic. If the Anti-Saloon League is going to continue to function as the agency of the churches, it will have to make very radical adjustments and cultivate the power to forget much of the past. The Western Editor hopes that it will be able to turn this corner successfully and bring to the new task the intelligence, the aggressiveness and the courage that characterized it in the doing of the old.

Chicago Forum Discusses Prohibition

By Hubert C. Herring

Talk may not save the world, but talking things out is certainly one of the methods by which men are to learn to live together. This is the genius of the forum movement. It gives men a chance violently to disagree under spiritually sanitary auspices.

November 1 marked the inauguration of one of the most hopeful forum enterprises, the Chicago Forum Council. Organized as one of the projects of the Midwest Council, this forum shows every promise of bulking large in the life of Chicago. Fred Atkins Moore is the director and presiding genius. A series of Sunday afternoon programs has been arranged to meet in a large Loop theater, and the speakers announced include such men as Ernest Johnson, Glenn Frank, Raymond Robins, Father Ryan, William E. Sweet, Clarence Darrow, and John Haynes Holmes.

The first session was held Nov. 1, with Ernest Johnson speaking on prohibition.

Ernest Johnson is the man who was largely responsible for the Prohibition Report of the Federal Council. He has done more to convince the man outside of the honesty of the church than almost any other man on the scene. Mr. Johnson on the forum platform strengthened this impression. He is no special pleader, and he does not allow his strong desire for prohibition, and his belief in the principle of prohibition, to blind his judgment.

His address was a fine rebuke to those prohibitionists who believe that it is not safe to concede anything to the enemy. Mr. Johnson believes that the only safe thing is to tell the truth. The audience, which was about fifty-fifty on the prohibition issue, recognized and admired this fairness in the speaker. His analysis was restrained and well balanced. He has facts, and is not afraid of his facts. He was listened to because he did not give the air of being out to prove something. The man on the street —if there is indeed such a creature—is violently weary with the man who is out to prove something, no matter what the facts may happen to be.

The need of the mood for which Mr. Johnson is pleading was emphasized by the character of the short addresses which followed his. A representative of the Anti-Saloon League had been asked to open the discussion for the dry side, and a representative of the Association Opposed to Prohibition for the wets. They opened it—wide. The wet claimed everything, and admitted nothing. The dry champion did the same. Their addresses were filled with the extravagances which have marked most of the debate upon this moist subject. One came away thankful for the fine and even temper of Ernest Johnson. The church can indeed be grateful to the Federal Council for making possible the calm and dispassionate service of a man who loves truth and pursues it. The Department of Research and Information which Mr. Johnson heads deserves the support of every churchman.

Our "Camino Real"

The semi-annual meeting of the Congregational Church Extension Society of Los Angeles revealed a healthy, even enthusiastic condition among the 41 churches of the district. Some 242 were in attendance at its dinner and program in the Mt. Hollywood Church, Oct. 6. An interesting part of the fellowship is the sharing of their story in two-minute reports by the churches. They had been exhorted to tell the truth, if not the whole truth as much of it as possible, and nothing but the truth; and "not to praise their ministers overmuch," as a departure from the usual manner.

With the whole country excited at the munificent gifts of Mr. Lawson to our Congregational institutions, particularly those in Chicago, the subject was bound to infuse itself into the inspiring address of the superintendent. Dr. Kenngott explained what he would do were $4,000,000 in similar manner put into his hands. He would secure for this section the services of a great preacher to be heard in the various localities. He would bring some great teacher for periods of instruction here and there. There would be sought a pastoral evangelist, expert in winning decision, to go from community to community. A financial expert would be added who should help the local church in its problems, and also manage the city and state campaigns. With what gratification he could place funds for the erection of numerous needed church buildings! The corner at 9th and Hope in Los Angeles would be secured, upon which to erect a structure suited to the purposes of First Church, and also for suites of rooms as a denominational headquarters. Very reasonable, and almost necessary enterprises all of them appear to one eager for the advancement of the Kingdom. And now where is the man or woman who will so invest that amount or a tenth of it or one per cent of it?

In a recent article, Secretary Burton, giving an explanation of the reduction in the number of Congregational churches, states that we have come to our frontiers, and that now we must consolidate our gains. That is undoubtedly true in many sections. It is not true for Los Angeles and San Diego, at least. There the frontiers push forward so rapidly that we make little pretense of overtaking them with our churches. Perhaps we have not available sufficient strong leaders. There can be no doubt we are short of money. To meet a city field now requires such an initial investment that we are plainly stumped. After using up the funds in a few such opportunities, the Conference Board are bewildered and saddened at the inability, for lack of funds, to take care of most alluring situations.

The board has concluded that a revolving fund of $100,000 is imperative for church extension. To consider the project, a widely attended council of ministers and laymen was held in Los Angeles, Sept. 22.

They decided that in the fall months preparation be made along the following lines of spiritual deepening and practical approach:

1. That churches and ministers conduct classes in stewardship, grouped by organizations, before the every member canvass in December.

2. That so far as possible all the churches meet the goal recommended by the conference of 20 cents per week per capita for benevolences.

3. That a campaign of pastoral evangelism be inaugurated in the churches by interchange of service among the congregations.

It is determined that after the first of the year there shall be a campaign among the churches, conducted by an expert leader, to secure $100,000 as a revolving fund for new work in Southern California.

So hearty has been the acceptance of the circulating library among ministers, that a similar experiment is being tried among religious education workers. The conference committee has secured the following books to loan or sell to church schools: Method in Teaching, Betts; Religion in the Life of Today, Carl Patton; Modern Use of the Bible, Fosdick; Primary Method in the Church School, Munkres; Organizing the Church School, Cope; What Ails Our Youth, Coe; The Ethical Teaching of Jesus, Scott; The Apostle Paul and the Modern World, Peabody; and Teaching the Youth of the Church, Cynthia Pearl Maus.

It is hoped the general reading of training books may thus be accelerated among our teachers and workers. CHESTER FERRIS.

Parables of Safed the Sage

The Parable of the Glass Partition

I am not a keeper of Fishes, and I know not very much about them. But I am told that those who own and breed them discover some interesting Facts. And I have heard that a man who kept an Aquarium had a large Tank with its sides of Glass, and a Partition of Glass that ran down the middle. And on the one side of the Partition he put a Large and Savage Black Bass. And on the other side he put divers Small Fish.

And the Bass saw the Small Fish, and he rushed at them, but he struck against the Partition.

And he was surprised, but he tried it again with Similar Results.

And after he had bumped his nose Several Times he Desisted for that day.

But on the next day he was at it again bright and early that he might get his meal while the getting was good. But every time he hit the Glass.

And finally he gave it up in Disgust.

Then did the man in the Aquarium remove the Partition. And albeit the Little Fish swam all around the Black Bass, he ate none of them. He had tried that game too many times, and he was sure that between him and any chance of success was an Invisible Wall. So he gave it up, and he and the Small Fish dwelt together happily ever afterward.

Now I have known men who have tried and tried to win Success in life and eventually they have given it up. For they have bumped their noses against the Partition so often that they know it is No Use. Wherefore did they accept the Situation as they found it, and now they sigh with a sense of relief because there is no use or reason for Struggle.

And I am far from advising men to make a useless effort, and to beat out their Ambition against Insuperable Obstacles. But on the other hand, I have known men who have been fooled like the Black Bass. They have retired to the Side Lines while the game was still on, and while they had a chance of making a Base Hit.

Wherefore do I say unto the Discouraged: Oh, my brother, I desire not for thee that thou cherish vain desires. We all have our limitations, and there cometh a time when we are Up Against It, and may as well accept the Situation. But, brother, if thou hast had a season of rest from the disturbing influence of ambition, start at the other end of the Tank, and try it once more. There are fish that ought to be eaten, and it may be that the Partition is no longer there.

It is hard to see how a great man can be an atheist. Without the sustaining influence of faith in a divine power we could have little faith in ourselves. We need to feel that behind us is intelligence and love. Doubters do not achieve; skeptics do not contribute; cynics do not create. Faith is the great motive power and no man realizes his full possibilities unless he has the deep conviction that life is eternally important, and that his work, well done, is a part of the unending plan.—Calvin Coolidge.

Dr. Cadman on Preaching

An Interview

By Edward H. Cotton

YES, Dr. Cadman is registered here. You will find him in number 26." ollowing the clerk's directions, I knocked t 26.

"Come in," came a muffled voice from ıside.

The door refused to give.

"Wait a bit."

I heard a bed creak. Presently a hand ıside unlocked the door, and I was look-ıg at—a Roman Catholic priest? Garb nd feature conveyed that impression. In ıct, as Dr. Cadman later explained, de-ıriptions of him have filled in all the rades from that of preceptor of a Jesuit ollege to infidel.

"Help yourself to a cigar, take a chair, nd make yourself at home." He bounced ack on the bed, adjusted the pillows, and ırned a pair of twinkling eyes, keen and ind, on me.

"Now, my lad, what can I do for you?"

"Haven't you a special message you want o get into print?" I asked, after the manner f interviewers—I should have known better.

"My dear boy, I have been giving out so ıuch that I have nothing left, not an atom. Vhy don't you fire ten or twelve questions : me the way newspaper men do?"

"I'd much rather you would select your wn theme," I replied. "But to give you start: What should preachers be preach-ıg these days?"

"One truth only—the Christian religion, o matter how you interpret it. Roman Catholicism understands a great deal. Do ou know that? It knows human nature; eople go to its church. Why? Because : is the great sacramental religion. Churches hich have eliminated the sacraments in avor of preaching are losing their congre-ations. Our ministers make the mistake of ot opening their mouths and speaking as the pirit gives them utterance. I mean by that here should be spontaneity of speech, not ffort for which no preparation has been ıade. I despise glibness. Fluency is a indrance, not a help, to public speakers, ecause persons who have the gift substitute uency for preparation."

"You are a fluent speaker," I interrupted.

"Am I? Look here, old chap, write this own. I never appear before an audience ithout long and careful preparation. I dopted this practice in the early days of ıy ministry, and now have the habit. I ouldn't do otherwise if I would, but I ouldn't. I write a great deal. Nearly all ıy sermons and addresses are written in ıll beforehand."

"And then learned?"

"Learned! No. I leave that to those hose minds have not been sufficiently rained."

"What is the good of writing, then?"

"To get the subject clearly in mind; to eparate the dross from the pure gold. I've ot to speak tonight, but I don't know what 'm going to speak about."

"Do you mean, Dr. Cadman, that you are going to depend on inspiration? That is not what you have been saying."

"No, sir, don't you believe it. I mean, those who are managing the affair have yet to indicate the subject they wish discussed. I am prepared to speak on a number. Let me tell you another thing." He had become interested, was out of bed, and in a chair in front of me. "Lecturing is one thing, preaching is quite another. Lectures deal with life in broad and informing terms; preaching—well, the Methodists have a good word describing it,—'unction,' meaning a mysterious quality, the power of the spirit. I care not who the preacher is, from the high orthodox to the most liberalized, he must be baptized in the spirit of the Unseen."

He was warming to his theme. When I had entered the room he was tired; anyone could have seen that. "I am overworked," he had said. "The doctor is placing limitations on me." But once started on the subjects of religion and preaching, to which he has dedicated himself body and soul, he lost the tired look, and became the intense, enthusiastic, and alert personality the multitudes know who have sat in his audiences or listened to him over the radio of a Sunday afternoon.

"People should go to church to worship God," he declared, "but they don't. You and I, being of the same profession, can talk this matter over like brothers. People don't go to church, because they don't find the bread of life there. What is the source of all the cults for which your New England is famous? The churches have starved the people. Talk of gathering audiences. It is one thing to get an audience in old conservative New England; it is an entirely different matter to get one in New York. Why, down there, if the people saw heaven in the sky they would say it was a waterspout. That is the place where I have to preach. I've been doing it three times on Sunday for the last seventeen years. No, I'm not doing it this year, only twice—doctor's orders. Don't envy me."

We were getting acquainted, and I felt I might venture a personal question.

"How do you explain your hold on the people?"

He looked at me a moment, a question in his eyes:

"I don't know. How do you explain it? I make careful preparation. Once started, I say what is in my mind to say. But this radio puzzles me. I don't like it. You have to stand in front of the microphone; you can't move; you can't say things you would like to say; they wouldn't go with the radio people."

"I think the personal element has to be reckoned with in your case," I said. "And of course you have a remarkable memory."

"No I haven't. I can't remember words and phrases. I do seem able to keep facts in mind."

"But your language is well selected."

"That, my boy, is due to long training and continuous mental discipline."

"How do you answer the questions that follow your addresses?"

"Precisely the same as I am answering yours. I do have a background of accumulated facts. But why single me, or any other one preacher, for distinction? A short time ago a religious journal which I take and appreciate published a list of the twenty-five greatest preachers. Do you want my opinion of that list? It was a vulgarized one; it was an advertising dodge. I could name over a similar list of ministers just as eloquent, just as useful—stanch, sterling fellows from all the denominations. But several of them have never been heard of."

"You and I have listened to as good preaching on Main Street as on Fifth Avenue."

"Better," he exclaimed. "Fifth Avenue! Talk with Dr. Jowett if you want to know what Fifth Avenue preaching is like.

"I have never sought publicity. All that has come to me has come without seeking. Editors and publishers suspect publicity-seekers. When asked to write be brief; but don't compress so that the average mind cannot follow. Most of the books and articles I read could have proclaimed their message in half the length."

Readers will observe that Dr. Cadman says what he has to say in private conversation as well as in public, yet always back of the direct words was the charitable spirit.

In some way, I don't remember how, the conversation drifted to spiritualism. He knew the subject was in the air, and acknowledged that it had contributions to make to religious interpretation. At the suggestion that some declared it the most progressive of all the religions when it came to an interpretation of the life after death, he ceased to talk and assumed a listening attitude.

"Ministers are afraid of it," I suggested.

"Well, I wouldn't be. I usually say what is in my mind to say."

"Why don't you preach a sermon on it?"

"I am not conversant enough with the facts. I never attended but one séance; that was in London some years ago. My grandmother, who had died when I was seven years old, came, so the medium said. She told me accurately all that had happened to me, and said she would continue to control me."

"Sound spiritualistic doctrine," I replied.

"You have suggested a sermon for me; let me suggest one for you," said Dr. Cadman with quick change of mood. "Take your text from the first verse of the first chapter of Ezekiel: '. . . As I was among the captives by the river of Chebar, . . . the heavens were opened, and I saw visions of God.' There's a subject for you, with the sort of mystical background you appear to crave. Do you want to know what I'm going to preach about next Sunday?—Is Prohibition a Failure?"

"Do you think it is?" I inquired.

"Not at all, but the time has come to say certain things. Well, I must get ready for that lecture." He stepped into an adjoining room, and I went over to the bed where he had been lying. Piled up on either edge were books, tracts, pamphlets, and magazines, some with strange titles. A person's mind, in liberal measure, is what his reading makes it. If ever a man's mental processes should be versatile, Dr. Cadman's should, judging from the variety of that literature. Among the books were, Color, a book of poems by Countee Cullen; Rahmedia, stories of the South Sea Islands, by C. Harold Smith. Among the magazines was the Spectator, which he said—he had now joined me—was the greatest of English weeklies; Inter-America; the Christian Quarterly; Scribner's; a journal on religious education; McClure's; and A Chronicle of the Community of the Resurrection. This last he put in my hand with the injunction to read it with care, for it described the mystic state of mind of Oriental peoples. "Eastern peoples have a depth of spiritual fervor," he exclaimed. "Would that the Eternal Realities meant to us of the West what they mean to the East! Well, there is so much to read, and time presses. I don't read as much as I used to, my eyes get tired."

Dr. Cadman is not at all the grim and solemn ecclesiastic some of his pictures represent him. He is confiding and friendly. His mind is forever alert to accumulate facts. He will listen to a person whoever he is, provided he has anything to say; and his faith in the veracity of that person is captivating in its artlessness.

I had hardly stepped inside the door before I was taken into his embrace, so to speak. But most certainly, the same thing would have happened with any other accredited stranger, for I had never met him before and may never meet him again. Moreover, I was after material for publication. Interviewed persons have a right to be reserved in statement and attitude. We must mark him as one who loves his fellow men.

"What are we going to do in the world to come?" was a last question.

"Carry on as we are carrying on here; and we shall, too, under better conditions."

An "Outside" View of the "Merger"

[From an Editorial in the Christian Century of November 12.]

It must in justice be said that the Congregational Council did not spend all or even half of its time adjusting the religious conscience to the moral problems of our day. Much of its attention was given to matters of denominational machinery. Hours were spent in debate over the merger of all Congregational boards into two great boards for home and foreign missions. One is inclined to wonder whether the same young men and the same Western forces which secured the adoption of the Social Creed did not gain their victory in favor of the big merger of the boards too easily. For it was on the whole Western resentment against what appeared to be "New England oligarchies" and the impatience of the young men with the old traditions of Congregationalism which rolled up the big majority in favor of the merger.

Perhaps the multiplicity of boards was unbusinesslike and perhaps their deeply entrenched power was incompatible with the pure ideals of democracy which Congregationalism cherishes; but if it is more democracy that the young men wanted it is doubtful if they have really secured it. There is a possibility that they have only succeeded in creating a more unwieldy denominational machine than they had before and for this victory they paid the price of destroying the identity of such ancient and honorable organizations as the American Board of Commissioners and the American Missionary Association.

It would seem that the Congregationalists have sacrificed a unique characteristic of their denomination for the sake of doing denominational business in the same business-like way which has become the pride of American churches. Other denominations which have undertaken similar mergers have not yet proved their effectiveness. If the problem is to get money with a minimum of lost motion these mergers may be the thing; but if the problem is to maintain freedom and to guarantee versatility in the various tasks of the denomination, large boards controlling many diverse activities may tend to effect an undesired uniformity and to discourage work in new and unchartered fields. If the Congregationalists had had but one home mission board in the years following the Civil War would they ever have accomplished what they did accomplish in the field of Negro education?

Poems by Sherman Ripley

The Atheist

"There is no God!" cried the atheist,
As he stood in the forest
With crushed violets beneath his feet,
And his head among
The invisible stars of heaven.
"Why so vehement?" I asked.
"Is it to convince Yourself?"

Environment

Environment, say the earth-philosophers,
Has moulded man.
But today civilized man
Moulds his own environment.
It remains to be seen
Whether you can transcend nature
By creating an environment
That will stimulate progress
Through effort.

Life

As the astronomer and I Stood in the open spaces
Gazing at the starry heavens,
He cried in ecstasy,
"What has God created more wonderful
Than these nebulae, the stars, the moon!"
"This," I replied,
As from a tree I plucked
A trembling lunar moth.

Florida: Its Boom and Its Perils

A Timely Word of Warning

By Rev. O. T. Anderson

FLORIDA is at once the oldest and the newest of the states in this country—he first to be discovered, explored, and ettled by the white man; the last to be re-iscovered, re-explored, and settled anew y a cross-section of the population of her ister states.

With its 1800 miles of coast-line from the ortheast corner of the state, reaching down he east coast, by the keys and Cape Sable, p the west coast of the peninsula and west-ard to the southern extremity of Alabama; ith its 9,000 fresh water lakes, its innu-erable bays and rivers and its 10,000, or ore, islands; with its climate ranging from he tropical and semi-tropical of the south the mildly temperate of the north; with s constitutional amendment excl ding state come and inheritance taxes; and last but ot least, the wide publicity given Florida y tourists and the press, it has the setting or the most gigantic increase in population nd the most stupendous building program f any state in the Union.

It is difficult to write of Florida without sing superlatives, and often even they are ot capable of telling the whole truth. What ppears to be a wild dream today is an ccomplished reality tomorrow. Only a ttle while ago, Florida was regarded as land of swamps, alligators, mosquitoes, nd malaria. Then a few daring rich dis-overed it as a delightful winter climate. hen came not only the daring rich, but he social set, the sporting element, the well-o-do, and the invalid or semi-invalid. Vith the beginning and growth of this flood-ide of immigration comes the speculator—nd his name is legion.

But for speculation to be financially re-arding, there must be the promoter, and he promoter calls for the engineer, the rchitect, the capitalist, the organizer, the igh-pressure salesman, the carpenter, the ason, and the common laborer. Given the ntecedents of an ideal climate and a pros-erous North to draw from, together with hat most American of all American traits -the desire to grow rich by speculation—nd you have an explanation of the so-alled "Florida Boom."

City limits are extended, sub-divisions are aid out, new cities are put on the map, lots re sold, and with their re-sale a few onths later profits are made. "Profits"—hat's the conjuring word. "Profits"—that's he big thing which has filled, even in sum-er, the hotels to their uttermost capacity. ime was—and not so long ago—when lorida was dead in summer. Every one ho could went away. It is no longer so. rom every section of the state come au-hentic accounts of a tremendous influx in ransient and permanent population. And ctivity in the real estate and building trades as never been greater than during the ummer months of this year.

Is the Boom a Bubble?

People not familiar with the development f Florida often ask: "Is the boom a bubble?" The answer is "Yes," if another World War comes and diverts the money and the energies of the nation into other channels. The answer is "Yes," if a great financial panic hits the United States, making money timid. The answer is as emphatically "No" in the absence of the above named catastrophes. The boom will continue until—until there are no more people who can, or who will, come to Florida. And even then, well-located property will not decrease in value.

A Note of Warning

A note of caution needs to be sounded for the benefit of out-of-state prospective buyers who do not know the state: "Beware of wild-catters!" By "wild-catters" is meant that class of real estate promoters which corresponds to the promoters of worthless stocks in the Northern and Eastern states. The "wild-catter" is the man or the company which secures acreage and seeks to promote a city or a sub-division too far out from the center of population or too far from water or transportation, and usually without the financial backing, or the will, to carry through to completion his promises to put in all improvements. His sole aim is "to sell out" his lots, secure first payments and procure mortgages bearing eight per cent, running one, two, and three years on unpaid balance. He plays on the stupidity of the uninitiated. Like the promoter of worthless stocks who points out to his prospects what those who got in on the ground floor in the Ford Company made, so the "wild-catter" in Florida real estate plays on the stupidity of the newcomer by pointing out the enormous profits made in many of the most successful developments in Florida. It is here where the small investor is most likely to lose.

Perils of the Boom

It is not enough, for the religious man, to look on the material aspects of Florida's growth. Progress, to be sure, he finds everywhere in its material development. But he does not need to be a pessimist to see also its perils. And perils there are where riches grow like the mushroom. Not a few who in the more even-going communities of other sections maintained their religious affiliations come to Florida and lose touch with the spiritual forces which alone make life worth living. Particularly is this true among men who have a liberal religious background and discover, as they soon do, that Florida churches are mostly Fundamentalist in their point of view, the pulpits predominantly so. Finding no religious community setting forth the intelligently religious ideals of life, the tendency is to drop out altogether. In the average community, those of the liberal mind are so scattered and know each other so slightly that there is little possibility of their getting together and forming a liberal movement. In the meantime, they become more absorbed in the material development of the state and correspondingly less interested in spiritual values.

Whether viewed as a playground or as a field of speculation, and Florida is both, the tendency can hardly be said to be toward the development of spiritual values. These may come later, as it is to be hoped they will; but at present there are literally multitudes who are altogether untouched by any churchly influence whatsoever. And in literal truth it must be said that much which proclaims itself most loudly as "the faith once delivered unto the fathers" is least adapted as a faith for intelligent descendants of the fathers. And there is even a tendency on the part of old-timers in some sections to resent the introduction of new ideas and new methods proposed by newcomers. There are instances where this resentment has become bitter. This situation itself tends to make the newcomer wary of presenting new ideas and new methods to the old and well-established churches.

In many of the fast-growing towns the churches which were there first often resent the coming of other denominations. And there are instances on record where the churches already established have misrepresented the character and faith of other denominations which proposed to establish themselves in these growing communities. It is no uncommon thing for Congregationalists to be dubbed "Unitarians," and the statement made that they do not believe in Christ. Such prejudices are capable of doing no little harm to the cause of a progressive type of Christianity.

What is needed in Florida, and she will one day have, is more and better education. With the growth of population and the creation of the demand for higher education, public and private, many of her problems springing from isolation and prejudice will be solved. In the meantime, the church extension boards of the more progressive denominations ought to see Florida through different lenses than those which they have used in the past to see other states. Florida is unlike other states. The problems here are different and the opportunities are greater. More money is needed for church promotion here than in the more even-going communities in other home mission fields. And greater results can be expected and obtained. Fundamentalism is aggressive. A fight is being made to hold the field against modern ideas in religion. But the churches which have accepted the modern ideas and ideals in religion and have sufficient backing from their extension boards have gained strong foothold and are doing much to enlighten the religious consciousness.

The churches of the North whose people come to Florida either as tourists or as permanent citizens can render an incalculable service to the churches of Florida by urging them to lend every possible aid to the churches of this rapidly growing empire of the "New South."

Social Ideals for Congregationalists

An address delivered before the National Council at Washington, D. C., October 22

By Jerome Davis

EDITORS' NOTE—The Statement of Social Ideals, to which Professor Davis refers, was published in "The Congregationalist" of Nov. 5, page 627, as adopted by the National Council.

OUR honorary Moderator, the President of the United States, speaking before this gathering day before yesterday, said that the purpose of this Council was to "improve the moral and spiritual life of the nation." For that very reason we present for adoption a Statement of Social Ideals. The great test of our age is whether we can be loyal to the spirit of Jesus in our daily community life. It is so easy to pray about our love for God and sing hymns about "My faith looks up to Thee, Thou Lamb of Calvary," but it is hard to adventure with God in the realm of the commonplace seven days a week.

Ever since the days when Congregationalism was first struggling to be born, men have been suffering for their faith. In 1567, Fitz, who tried to start a church in London, was imprisoned and lost his life in the jail. In 1593, Penry and Greenwood were executed for preaching Congregationalism. At that time these leaders saw clearly the need of living their faith. In our modern industrialized world society, the Christ-way of life is often difficult to discover amid the clever disguises of social customs, traditions, and current practices. I was talking recently with a Connecticut business man of great financial power. He said to me: "The churches talk about doing the will of God, but what I want to find out is, what does this involve for me? What must I do in my business, to my employees, and to the public? To translate the faith of our fathers into the concrete terms of daily and hourly living in the twentieth century is the task that confronts every Christian. "Faith without works is dead." Jesus attained this goal by personalizing the abstract in terms of the living with Mary and Martha, the rich young ruler, and all the others. As loyal followers of his we must translate his message to meet the difficulties of a modern mechanized world. This demands social ideals, or a social statement of faith—the name is not important. Neither is such a statement of faith binding on a single member of our Congregational fellowship, but it will be provocative of thought.

The real struggle today is not to make Fundamentalists or Modernists, but to make the actual practices of our everyday life square with our Christian labels. The proposed statement aims to analyze the crucial situations in which we find ourselves and try to see them through the eyes of Jesus. Just how does it happen to be presented to you now?

In 1923 I was a member of the Social Service Commission of the Congregational Churches of New Hampshire. I then wrote to the National Social Service Secretary at Boston, asking that copies of the Social Creed of the Churches adopted by the Congregationalists in 1910 be sent to the state commission for distribution. Much to my surprise, the secretary replied that the old creed was out of date and that a new one should be formulated. Shortly thereafter the National Social Service Commission requested President Butterfield and myself to undertake the preparation of a new social creed. We submitted a preliminary formulation to scores of experts in the fields of religion, business, and teaching. With their criticisms and suggestions, a revision was made which was presented to all the various church denominations by the Federal Council of Churches. It was also submitted to the Christian Associations and to independent Christian fellowships.

The proposals were printed and sent broadcast over America. Scores of churches studied them week by week. They received a great deal of publicity in the religious and secular press. Even the American Federation of Labor devoted two pages of its monthly magazine to their discussion. As a result of all this publicity, additional suggestions came to us in gratifying numbers and we were able to make a further revision. This final statement was then approved by the National Social Service Commission of the Congregational Council and was recommended for presentation at the meeting here in Washington. In order to insure every possible opportunity for criticism, a pre-Council meeting was called to examine thoroughly, to criticize, and to make suggestions on the statement. As a result, it has had infinitely more care taken in its preparation than was given to the industrial creed approved by you in 1910.

IDEALS FOR TODAY

We do not ask that this be adopted and handed down forever as our Congregational Creed. We ask that it be approved now as the best formulation which we have at the present time. We are living in an era which is changing with lightning rapidity, probably faster than any the world has ever known. We believe that no enunciation should be kept longer than from five to ten years. By the end of that time conditions are so changed, knowledge has so increased, that a revision may well be attempted.

Some ask, why make the statement so long? They contrast it with the one adopted in 1910. As a matter of fact, that creed was narrowly concerned with industrial conditions alone and was almost twice as long as our present section on industry. Some have even compared our creed with the Ten Commandments in the matter of length. But we do not wish the present creed to contain commandments at all; neither was it handed down from Jehovah on Mount Sinai. It was wrought out co-operatively, the result of a joint creative discovery of many minds.

Some have felt that we should not adopt a creed which discusses such controversial subjects. The answer is that in the realm of platitudes there is small controversy, but in translating the spirit of Jesus into the concrete practices of contemporary life there always have been and there probably always will be differences. The proposed social creed is controversial, yes—but no more so than Jesus' flaming spirit of love when applied to all human needs. Others have felt that the creed is too radical, while the American Federation of Labor at first attacked it as too conservative. It must be realized that in a concise treatment of such fundamental matters, it is always possible to twist statements into the worst possible construction. In such cases does not the proverb hold: "Evil is to him who evil thinks?" Many of Jesus' own statements sound radical; others seem conservative. It should be the spirit of the entire document which weighs with us.

THE CHURCH AND WAR

In the last section there is one statement which treats of a theme so surcharged with emotion that perhaps we ought to consider it briefly. It is the clause under International Relations which provides "that the Church of Christ as an institution should not be used as an instrument or an agency in the support of war." You will notice that this does not bind the individual in the slightest; he is left to support war whenever his conscience demands. This is not, as some seem to think, a rabid pacifistic utterance. It is rather a statement that the church should continue her great mission of love even in war time. If history has taught us anything, it is that the church in every country has always supported its own nation in the crisis of war. This was true of the churches in the South as well as of the churches in the North in our own Civil War. It was true of England, France, Germany, Russia, Austria, and Roumania in the World War. Does not this inevitably mean that in every conflict a large number of the churches are always "on the wrong side?" It also means that when men's minds are inflamed by the passions of war, when men's hearts are torn by vindictive hatreds and bitter emotions, they cannot look to any institution within their nation for sober, calm, peaceful love.

The highest international good will can never be found in the church during the awful bitterness of a conflict which she is actively supporting. If the business of the church is to spread the good tidings of Jesus Christ, how does she further this process by actively supporting one party in a war? Remember that at one time the church attempted to propagate the gospel of Jesus Christ by means of the sword. All Christendom now knows this to have been a false method. Our former Moderator, Dr. Potter, in his address the other evening admitted: "We have not made love the dominant note of modern Christianity." We are now ask-ng you to take action on the message of Dr. Potter. Is it not conceivable that the oldiers themselves would honor the church o a far higher degree if she remained the spokesman of love and peace even in the onflict, thus helping to bind up the broken vounds and preaching the message of Christ?

Out of loyalty and gratitude to the thousands of men who gave their lives to end ll war, I urge this declaration. But there s a still more weighty reason. Can we be oyal to Christ and do less? Raymond Fosdick says: "The next war will be the cemetery of our civilization." General Tasker H. Bliss says that if another war comes it will be the fault of our churches for having refused to take action in time of peace. What an awful responsibility this places on you who are gathered here as the prophets and ambassadors of God! Surely we must urge our churches to become agencies and instruments for peace and never for war! Is this asking any more of the church than is now expected of a court during industrial conflict? The courts are never supposed to take sides between the parties to an industrial dispute? They are ever ready to condemn wrong committed by either party, but only after the facts have been carefully and scientifically proved at a hearing where both sides are represented. We have abandoned conversion by the sword. Are we not ready now to take a further step, to resolve to keep the House of God free from the hatreds and partisanships of war? How effective her appeal if the church could say: We shall not dictate to the individual, he can do as his conscience demands; but the church as an institution will remain a symbol of peace and good will even in war. It will no longer call for volunteers from its altar, bless one side as over against another, nor pray for victory on behalf of its own nationals. It will continue to minister to men on both sides of the conflict, but in the spirit of Christ. It will have an altar to which both friend and foe can come for prayer and love and peaceful devotion. Is it not time in this twentieth century that one great institution in every land should remain free from hatred and propaganda, even in war time? Is there any other agency which can so effectively do this as the church?

Expressions of Approval

Eminent churchmen of our denomination are in sympathy with this purpose. For example, Dr. Jay T. Stocking of the Union Congregational Church of Montclair says:

As to the statement about war, I wish we could get the churches out of this war business. You do not desire that any more than I do. It is a sickening thing to me to have the church a fighting body. This many of our churches were, it will have to be admitted, during the last war. Most of us sinned in some respect. I do not believe in the church being a recruiting agency, nor an advertising agency, nor an agency for fighting through prayer.

There is a growing conscience on this matter which has swept throughout the entire world, converting ministers, laymen, and church denominations. State Conferences, such as Vermont and New Hampshire, have already gone on record. For us to ignore this overwhelming conviction of the conscience of world humanity is unthinkable.

Since this Statement of Ideals was first printed, written testimonials have come in its favor from India, from Japan, from China, and from South Africa. John R. Mott, known all over the world as a Christian statesman, says of it:

It impressed me most favorably when I first saw it, and this impression is still more deepened by a more careful reading. . . . I repeat that on the whole the statement commands my earnest assent, and I look upon it as a remarkable pronouncement.

Dr. Francis E. Clark, founder of the Christian Endeavor Movement, says, "I believe thoroughly in the withdrawal of the church as an institution from the support of war in every form."

It has been gratifying to find that forward-looking business men of great financial power endorse it. For instance, Roger Babson says: "It is splendid; I heartily endorse every word."

Having the support of progressive business leaders, we wondered what attitude labor would take. Yesterday I talked with President Green of the American Federation of Labor, who gave it his unqualified endorsement. He said that if it is adopted by the Congregationalists they will have taken a more Christian stand than any other religious body in America. Is it not remarkable that Christian leaders representing both capital and labor recognize this as an epoch-making statement and one which, as far as social issues are concerned, would place Congregationalism in the foremost rank of any religious body in the world?

In addition, we have letters of endorsement from over fifty other business men, ministers, and teachers, including Dr. Potter, our former Moderator. Dr. Cadman, President of the Federal Council, says:

I find myself in the heartiest agreement with nearly all these proposals, and have no very serious opposition to the few which do not appeal to me quite as strongly as the majority.

Kagawa, the famous Christian labor leader of Japan, after touring America, said:

Christianity as I find it here has lost courage. It is a Christianity at a reduced price. The reconstruction of hearts is what we need. In the United States every one is contented except the downtrodden. Pastors are contented; and how can we build a new world out of contentment? Your proposed Social Creed, if adopted, would do much to arouse the church to the practice of the religion of Jesus.

Some Congregational History

Go back over the inspiring record of the hand of God working its way through Congregational history and you will find a continual attempt to apply the will of God to burning social issues, all the way from slavery and temperance to racial injustice and war. President Fairchild of Oberlin, speaking at the National Council in 1874, said: "The Gospel is eternal and unchanging, but its application must vary from age to age." It is precisely for that reason that social ideals are necessary. They are an attempt to translate the will of God into the concrete problems of the Twentieth Century. Dr. William E. Barton in The Law of Congregational Usage, in speaking of Congregational creeds, has well said: "These written symbols are of value, each as recording a high water mark of Christian opinion of the age in which it was written." This is just as true of social creeds as of any others. We find that every Congregational Council has been called on to pass social resolutions.

One of the first social creeds was that drawn up by Increase Mather and adopted by the "Reforming Synod" of 1679. Since then nearly every Council has devoted considerable time and space to social issues. At the Portland (Oregon) Council for instance, in 1898, resolutions were adopted on temperance, divorce, gambling, secret societies, race relations, and prison reform. The Springfield Conference of 1923 is still so recent that we can recall the flood of resolutions along social lines which were adopted there. The minutes contain over ten finely printed pages of these resolutions. The present statement of social ideals would have made at least ten unnecessary. What your Social Service Commission here proposes will save your time. Instead of adopting resolutions at each session, we propose that we shall now adopt a carefully thought-out program of our social faith which will cover all of these matters briefly, scientifically, and in the spirit of Jesus.

A Common Mind

The Woman's Board of Missions Meets in Brooklyn

By Harriet Abbott Jordan

EVERY one of the four hundred women who were registered as attending the Fifty-Eighth Annual Meeting of the Woman's Board of Missions, held with the New York State Branch in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, at which Mrs. Franklin Warner presided, was conscious of two underlying thoughts in her mind: the business to be done in considering the proposed merger of foreign Boards and the subject around which the program was built—"Christ our Peace." But the first of the devotional services led by Rev. Raymond A. McConnell of South Church, Brooklyn, on "My Spirit," "My Peace," "Thy Kingdom," awoke a still deeper and perhaps less recognized consciousness of the way in which the business was to be approached and the road which would lead to Peace.

The welcome of the president of the New York State Branch, in which she expressed the hope that the message of love and of liberty which had gone forth from the pulpit of Plymouth Church for more than 75 years might be heard throughout the meeting and the observance of Armistice Day by two minutes of silent prayer followed by the petition that nothing should be said or done which could check the "rising, rising, ever rising tide of the love of God," irradiated the business of the election of the members-at-large and the report of the treasury. This showed a year of encouraging work from the Branches, with contributions of $329,879.07, making a total, with legacies and interest, of $370,371.32. And when at the end of the three days together, the goal committee made its report the acceptance by the delegates of an advance of $5,766 was unanimous. Confidence in present leadership and in its devotion to the work appeared when in a final meeting it was reported that the ballot carried no new name on the list of officers who were unanimously elected by the 212 voters present. Other business included the decision to hold next year's meeting in Worcester, Mass.

The following preamble and motion was given leisurely consideration when it was presented by the chairman of the board of directors:

In view of the desire of the churches, as expressed in the action of the National Council in accepting the report of the Committee of Twelve at its meeting in Washington, Oct. 22, 1925, and in view of the action of the A. B. C. F. M. at its annual meeting on Oct. 23, be it moved:

That the Woman's Board of Missions approves of the unification of its work with that of the American Board.

Be it moved, second: That the Board of Directors be directed to prepare plans for such unification and to report at a future meeting of the Corporation and to this end they may appoint such committees as may seem wise.

In the discussion which accompanied the consideration of the motions, no voice was heard in actual opposition. Advantages to the work among the young people at home, where the emphasis on the feminine had been a handicap with the boys, and to the field, which had been burdened with complex bookkeeping, were brought out. There were some expressions of fear of loss of identity, of reduction in appropriations for women's work in view of the fact that the Woman's Board has always granted to its workers a larger proportion of requests than the American Board has been able to do. There was also some doubt about sharing the responsibilities of "impecunious brothers," but all of these expressions of doubt had a tone of inquiry like that underlying every comment as to how the unification was to be consummated. The three-fold "why" of this move—the gain to the boards, the field, and the churches—was reviewed by Mrs. C. H. Daniels, and her confident assertion that wherever the "why" is compelling the "how" can be found only summed up what was the deepest feeling of the women—faith that in the two years which will be required to make the change the way will be found to "change gears—although with some grinding probably—and to attain full speed." The common mind was expressed by a unanimous vote in favor of both motions and by a prayer of thanksgiving that "we know we are starting on no untried road, for if we walk with God, we may stumble but we cannot fall."

Beside the regular sessions, two teas were hospitably arranged by the Central Church and the Church of the Pilgrims and Wednesday evening was spent at a "birthday party" of the New York State Branch, now 50 years old, held in the beautiful Plymouth Institute. There were also meetings of groups for the discussion of their especial interests, of which the most important were those held by Miss Ruth Seabury, secretary of young people's work. These included the annual supper at the Clinton Avenue Church, which was attended by enthusiastic groups of girls and their leaders, and where there were both an atmosphere of merriment and short, stirring talks by the seven missionaries present who drove home the fact that the girls of our churches have a wonderful part in bringing about world friendship. At another conference, this time for leaders, dramatic presentations of "His Book" and "Our Family" were given by boys and girls of intermediate age. The young people were also represented on the general program by three student volunteers and three foreign students, introduced by Miss Calder as witnesses to what is being done in our schools and colleges to open the minds of youth to a sense of its responsibility for peace in the world.

The Road to Understanding which Miss Ivy Craig was opening up in her field in South Africa is the same road which each of the nine missionaries on the program called upon the Woman's Board to travel in its relation to all peoples, from this primitive one to those of Japan who, as Miss Pedley said, are neither primitive nor asleep. Speakers from China were Miss Nutting of Diongloh, Miss Phelps of Paotingfu, Miss Dickinson of Peking, Miss Ruth Cheng, "one of the four or five greatest women in China, and Dr. Ping-wen Kuo, of the National Southeastern University of Nanking and vice-president of the World Federation of Educational Associations. They all agreed that the Christian Church must be made, as Dr. Kuo said, "indigenous in China," that the world needs more and more the fundamental teachings of Christianity, that more and more the work of missions must be that of leading leaders and teaching teachers, putting the responsibility and the authority upon them.

In Turkey, where Miss Riggs and Miss Greene find there is a place in the hearts of the people, this Road to Understanding is a hard one to travel just now but all the greater is the need to find the way in it. It is easy to say that if Christianity cannot be taught there now, it must be lived, but, they ask, has it ever been adequately lived? Can we expect such a demonstration of our missionaries? Only by traveling this Road of Understanding in the present situation in the new Turkey and by having faith that our missionaries can do it, is the Board at home to be of service, they say.

Dr. T. H. P. Sailer of Columbia University turns the eye to a larger vision even. New movements everywhere are demanding trained intelligence, he says, "Oriental inferiority complex is gone," "self-determination is active." These are the special reasons why missionaries are ambassadors of Peace, Dr. James L. Barton knows through his large personal experience and observation. They are ambassadors of "a good understanding, brotherhood good health, sound education which leads to common thinking and right living," and so to a common platform—the teaching of Jesus Christ. To this, Dr. J. Percival Huget of the Tompkins Avenue Church, reminding his hearers that there is a threat of a racial struggle, added a warning that, knowing this, they will be doubly guilty if they do not work to prevent it and that this can only be accomplished by a common purpose to learn to live together. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, speaking in his own church where the session of Wednesday afternoon was held, also asserted that the Oriental inferiority complex is gone by saying that "nordic superiority ought to be on no intelligent tongue." Declaration of war by the United States revealed that there is such a thing as a common mind. Let it not be said "I nursed the opinion that impelled the steel," but that, I have helped to find the common mind "that mind which was in Christ Jesus."

So the 58th annual meeting of the Woman's Board sent its delegates back to their churches realizing that they had not come to be hearers only but that it was theirs to be doers in directing a purpose to find a way in which, not by might, nor by power, but by spirit, a common mind could be brought to think upon matters of unification and ambassadorship—of methods at home and service abroad—the mind that was in Christ Jesus which alone can bring His Peace.

Indian Summer

By Rev. A. G. Axtell

The early sunshine seeks the inner room,
Refreshing breezes float across the field;
Summer's flowers give place to autumn's bloom,
And summer tints to autumn glories yield.

Jack Frost each morning clothes the earth in white;
The hens go scratching in the withered grass;
Southward the wild geese take their V-shaped flight,
And summer into winter soon will pass.

The corn in fertile fields stands lazily,
Awaiting human hand to pluck its fruit;
The outline of the hills lies hazily
Against a sky most kind to man and brute.

The pastured herds are cropping close-shorn grass,
The mists enveil the brilliance of the sun;
The furrowed fields lie black in mellowing mass:
All Nature rests, content in work well done.

'Tis Indian Summer, ling'ring o'er the land,
Fondly embracing her dear Mother, Earth,
Cherishing her soothingly—mountain, vale, and strand—
Ere autumn's plenty yields to winter's dearth.

Would you like to multiply yourself and become thirty, sixty, or even a hundred men? This was what Phillips Brooks did when he put himself into his hearers. This was what Dr. Eliot of St. Louis did when he had his hands in the pockets of his parishioners up to the elbows. Here is the immense advantage of being a minister. You multiply yourself by as many men as you can influence. If you can inspire twenty business men, you are worth to the world twenty times as much as if you were a business man yourself. Here is the challenge to young men who can qualify for a position of such great influence.

The W. B. M. I. Meeting at Detroit

By Eleanor Hinman

Editorial Secretary, W. B. M. I.

A VOTE to unite with the other women's foreign missionary boards and the American Board, in accordance with the plan adopted by the National Council in Washington, was the outstanding feature of the 57th annual meeting of the Woman's Board of Missions of the Interior, held Nov. 3-5 at the North Woodward Congregational Church, Detroit, Mich. This action means that inside of two years this historic board, which is among the earliest women's organizations in America, will cease to function separately and will merge its activities in the general missionary effort of the denomination. The changes, however, will be mainly in the national organization and it is intended to keep up the work of the local church and auxiliary much as it exists at present. The resolution adopted at Detroit is:

Resolved that in accordance with the desire of the churches, expressed through the vote of the National Council, the Woman's Board of Missions of the Interior declares its readiness to take steps toward unification with the American Board into one organization, and toward the complete unification of the work on the mission fields with the expectation that the unification will be effected by January 1, 1928.

It is understood that in the working out of the plans of unification especial care will be taken, in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee of Twelve, to conserve the effectiveness of the Women's Boards as collecting and educational agencies.

The treasurer's report showed the W. B. M. I. closing its year with a debt of $33,000, of which $10,300 is carried over from the deficit of the preceding year. Receipts on apportionment from the churches were $7,628 less this year than last, and fell some $47,600 short of reaching the accepted apportionment. If the churches would meet their apportionment, the work of the board could be carried without debt.

A circumstance which has made it peculiarly hard for the W. B. M. I. to raise its budget this year has been the extraordinary effort made in the Branches for Kobe College Building Fund Campaign, among the constituency which supports the W. B. M. I. Toward Kobe there has been $43,680 paid into the W. B. M. I. treasury during 1925, and more is being held in the Branch treasuries waiting for the completion of the state quotas. The report made by Mrs. Lydia Lord Davis, field worker, showed $95,959 raised toward a goal of $150,000, accepted by the Branches as their responsibility in the Kobe campaign. Kansas and Indiana have surpassed their quotas in this respect, while Michigan, on approaching its goal of $15,000, raised it to $20,000, and is continuing the effort.

Special recognition and honor were paid to Mrs. S. E. Hurlbut, retiring treasurer of the W. B. M. I., who is resigning on account of ill health after 26 years of devoted and unremunerated service in this capacity. Miss Elizabeth J. Hurlbut, for two years the capable assistant treasurer of the board, was elected to the vacant office. The responsibilities of assistant treasurer were assigned to Miss Margaret Lyman.

The report of Mrs. Lucius O. Lee, foreign secretary, upon the work abroad, emphasized two things: First, the problem of keeping the work properly staffed, because of ill health among the missionaries or because of family conditions which recall them to their homes; second, the statesmanship required of the missionaries in dealing with delicate international situations on several of our mission fields. In China and Turkey the friction comes from excessive nationalism among the people, and especially among the young people; in Japan from a comprehensible resentment against excessive nationalism and race prejudice shown by America; in Portuguese West Africa by suspicion on the part of the ruling Portuguese that the missionaries are somehow agents of American imperialistic ambitions and by the fact that the missionaries cannot approve of the Portuguese policy toward the natives. Among all these difficulties the Congregational missionaries have been able so far to steer their way with tact and skill. It is a cause for congratulation, said the report, that in the midst of a tension in China far greater than that caused by the overthrow of the Manchu dynasty in 1910, all the institutions in which the W. B. M. I. has a share were able to keep on friendly terms with their students and were crowded at their opening this autumn.

Turkey and the opportunity opening there of working among the Moslems for the first time in a century of Christian missions was emphasized heavily throughout the program. Ernest W. Riggs, secretary of the American Board, made one of the principal addresses of the session upon "The Old Gospel for a New Turkey." He described the astounding transformation which in a few years is changing Turkey from a fanatical Oriental despotism to a rationalistic Occidental democracy, spoke of the welcome given to the American Board schools by the new government and the way in which Turkish students are crowding into them now that the subject Christian peoples are gone. True, the word "Christian" has an unpleasant sound in Turkish ears; it connotes the Crusades, the centuries of struggle on the part of Europe to crush or confine the Ottoman power; the Great War of 1914; and the subject "ghaiour" to whom the born Turk has always considered himself infinitely superior. But when brought face to face with the life and ideals of Jesus of Nazareth he finds himself in the presence of something which claims his allegiance, even though he feels he cannot take the name of Christian without becoming a traitor.

Miss Charlotte R. Willard of Marsovan was present, and just ten years after her heroic journey across the mountains to rescue her Armenian schoolgirls who were being deported by the Turks, she told a new story of working with the Turks themselves, of winning their confidence and friendship, and of their quick response to the practical living of Christianity. What the Turks say about the missionaries was rehearsed by Miss Edith Cold of Marash. Miss Lillian Brauer and Miss Jessie Martin of Adana described social service in a Turkish city. Miss Helen Crockett and Miss Mabel E. Long of the Samokov Schools in Bulgaria presented needs and opportunities in that corner of the Near East, where their institutions are setting a standard of Christian education and character vastly appreciated by the country.

Glimpses of educational work in China were offered by Miss Frances K. Bement, Shaowu; Miss Elizabeth Waddell, Ingtai; Miss Louise Meebold, Kienning; and Miss Laura B. Cross, Peking. The needs of our women's hospitals in that land were recalled by Dr. Lois Pendleton of Tehchow and Miss Helen Dizney, nurse, of Taiku. Miss Eleanor Burnett of Kobe College was the sole representative of the Japanese Mission, while Miss Bertha K. Smith of Aruppukottai spoke for India.

The closing address was delivered by Dr. Albert W. Palmer of Oak Park, Ill. It was a brilliant review of the services of missions to the cause of international friendship, which drew an added authority from Dr. Palmer's seven years in the Philippines and his travels and experiences throughout the Orient.

The next meeting will be held at Oak Park, Illinois.

Paul's Voyage and Shipwreck

Comment on the International Uniform Sunday School Lesson for December 6

Acts 27:30-40

Good authorities tell us that this account of Paul's shipwreck in the 27th chapter of Acts is the finest record that has come down to us of navigation in ancient times. It is said that it has thrown more light upon the methods of handling a ship in those days than any other source. For that reason and because of its human interest as a story, the whole chapter is notable. But as a Sunday school lesson its importance lies somewhat deeper.

The lesson may be studied in relation to three wills that are found involved in it. First of all there is self-will; secondly, there is the will of others; and thirdly, there is the will of God. In the master of the ship, in the Roman captain, and particularly in the soldiers, self-will was selfish will. It took no real account of moral obligation or values. In Paul self-will was unselfish will. He was not actuated by primary consideration of what was going to happen to him, but in all his action in the incident and in the midst of danger there was uppermost in his mind his sense of his duty toward others, and self-will in him became a strong firm will through this devotion to love and duty.

Paul's life was very seriously affected by the wills of others. All our lives are, in fact, seriously affected by the wills of others. We live in an environment of human life which we cannot control. Paul could not determine his own course; it was shaped by persecutions. Here he was in this danger upon the ship, not because of any wrong that he had done, but in defense of his own character. He was there, in fact, because of grave injustice. To that extent he could not determine the course of his own life, and in many respects no more can we determine the course of our lives.

What Paul did determine was that no matter what his environment the wills of others would not determine his destiny. He linked his destiny firmly and securely in the will of God, and he found that will and power emphasized in many circumstances. He had come to the great conviction that there was nothing of peril, or trial, or experience, that could separate a man from the love of God that was in Christ. Note the result in the life and experience of a man in whom self-will and the will of others had become thoroughly dominated by submission to the will of God. He was in every sense the real master of the situation. It is amazing to see the way in which the prisoner through the sheer moral and spiritual loftiness of his character should stand forth above both the master of the ship and the Roman captain, accustomed to command, as Paul unquestionably stands in this narrative. It is one of the most sublime revelations of the supreme dignity and grandeur of moral worth and spiritual strength. There can never be any shipwreck in a life like that. Seeming wreck and disaster are simply the occasions of spiritual triumph.

So though the outward circumstances of life, its horizon and its incident, may be largely determined for us by the action of others, through linking our own wills with the will of God we can make the spiritual horizon as illimitable as God himself, and we can attain that spiritual mastery which constitutes true character, success, and largeness of life in God's plan.

The Young Folks' Library

Some of the books illustrated were noticed during Children's Book Week in The Congregationalist of Nov. 12.

From When We Were Very Young, by A. A. Milne (Dutton)

Fine Editions of Well-Known Books

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS, by JOHN BUNYAN (Nelson.) A beautiful edition, in excellent type and with 16 full-page illustrations in color by Byam Shaw.

TREASURE ISLAND, by ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON (Crowell. $1.50). Exactly what the publishers call it, "a good, generous type edition with illustrations to match." There are 12 full-page color illustrations by Stephen Reid.

THE OREGON TRAIL, by FRANCIS PARKMAN (Little, Brown. $2.00). A valuable addition to The Beacon Hill Bookshelf is this unsurpassed story of Parkman's trip across the continent in 1846. It is illustrated by N. C. Wyeth.

JO'S BOYS, by LOUISA M. ALCOTT (Little, Brown. $2.00). In the same series, and with eight illustrations in color by C. M. Burd, is this less adventurous story for both boys and girls, a sequel to Miss Alcott's Little Men and Little Women. It will appeal to quieter moods than The Oregon Trail, but boys and girls need both types of books.

THE DEERSLAYER, by JAMES FENNIMORE COOPER (Scribners. $2.50). A gorgeous edition, illustrated by N. C. Wyeth, in Scribners' series of Illustrated Classics for Younger Readers.

TWENTY THOUSAND LEAGUES UNDER THE SEA, by JULES VERNE (Scribners. $2.00). In the same series, illustrated by W. J. Aylward, is this great classic of adventure and imagination.

THE SWISS FAMILY ROBINSON, by WYSS ($1.75) and THE PRINCE AND THE PAGE, by CHARLOTTE M. YONGE ($1.75), are notable additions to Macmillan's well-known Children's Classics. As with all books in this series the volumes are finely illustrated. IRVING'S famous RIP VAN WINKLE and THE LEGEND OF SLEEPY HOLLOW are available in one volume in the same series ($1.75), illustrated by Eric Pape. A later addition to the series, less known, but an excellent story for children of from eight to ten is THE BEARS OF BLUE RIVER, by CHARLES MAJOR ($1.75). It is illustrated by A. B. Frost and others.

DAVID COPPERFIELD, by CHARLES DICKENS (Macmillan. $2.00). An attractive edition for younger readers, abridged by Edith Freelove Smith and illustrated by Harriet Savage Smith.

From Dr. Dolittle's Zoo (Stokes)

French Classics

LITTLE ROBINSON CRUSOE OF PARIS, by EUGENIE FOA (Lippincott. $1.50). This story, translated from the French by Julia Olcott, was first published in 1840. It is the charming tale of a boy of ten, abandoned in Paris. It will appeal to the heart of any imaginative child who will delight to read how the little waif secured a house of his own and eventually a home.

NOBODY'S BOY (Sans Famille), by HECTOR MALOT, translated by FLORENCE CREWE-JONES (Cupples and Leon. $1.50). This also is the story of a homeless French boy, famous as one of the world's great juvenile stories. It was crowned by the French Academy as a masterpiece. Perhaps more to the point, however, is the fact that it is fascinating and inspiring reading, a book in which true friendship is inculcated along with high ideals of honesty and nobility.

From The Sly Giraffe (Dutton)

Plays for Children

EIGHT LITTLE PLAYS FOR CHILDREN, by ROSE FYLEMAN (Doran. $1.25). Varied in design and abounding in bright humor, these plays are of the type to appeal to the imaginative child. Both fairies and real folks are introduced. One of the plays, while adapted to dramatization by children, can be used in a toy theater, with dolls as the actors. Children will enjoy the game of acting when they can have such delightful vehicles of expression as these plays by Miss Fyleman.

FATHER AND BABY PLAYS, by EMILIE POULSON (Lothrop, Lee & Shepard. $1.50). A new and improved edition of a book which is designed to make the father a real companion to his child. These might be called "games," for they really suggest ways in which a father may play with his baby. There are "Tossing Plays," "Jumping Plays," "Pickaback Plays," "Shadow Plays," etc., all suggested in verse form and some of the verses set to music. Many illustrations increase the value of the book.

Nature Books and Animal Stories

THE STORY NATURAL HISTORY, by E. TALBO (Nelson. $3.00). A big, beautiful book, a tractively bound and boxed. It has been writ ten specially for young people and contain much well-authenticated fact and incident r lated to adventures with nearly fifty differen animals. It is finely illustrated with twenty four colored plates and many drawings.

A WILD ANIMAL ROUND-UP, by WILLIAM T HORNADAY (Scribners. $5.00). Few men ar more competent to write about animals tha the Director of the New York Zoological Gar dens. In this book Dr. Hornaday writes ou of the richness of years of world-wide experi ence in studying and capturing wild animals Such a book, besides its scientific value, offer the thrill of the unusual and adventurous. I will interest everybody.

HOW ANIMALS WORK, by F. MARTIN DUN CAN (Nelson. $2.00). This book, in th Romance of Reality Series, aims to presen sound science along with fascinating reading It is illustrated with colored frontispiece an sixteen black and white plates.

ANIMAL TALES OF THE ROCKIES, by ALBER BENJAMIN CUNNINGHAM (Abingdon Press $1.00). An account of the animals of th Rockies by one who writes from close-up ob servation of their habits and habitations an from many thrilling experiences.

TIGER TRAILS IN BURMA, by WARREN H MILLER (Harper. $1.75). The boy explorer on tiger trails get plenty of excitement in thi book, which combines adventure with scientifi interest.

THE DISAPPOINTED SQUIRREL AND OTHE STORIES, by W. H. HUDSON (Doran. $2.50) These stories are taken from the author's Th Book of a Naturalist and are sympathetic pic tures of animal life from the pen of a man who knew and loved our dumb friends. Illustrations in color, and in black and white, add to the attractiveness of the book.

BONNIE PRINCE FETLAR, by MARSHALL SAUNDERS (Doran. $1.50). The story of a pony and his friends will delight the hearts of that vast company of children who have been entranced with the author's Beautiful Joe.

LITTLE JOE OTTER, by THORNTON W. BURGESS (Little, Brown. $1.50). A young critic remarked sometime ago regarding a thrilling episode where one of Mr. Burgess' menagerie seemed in hopeless peril, "He'll get out of it all right; they always do." Perhaps part of the charm of Mr. Burgess' books for little folks and their unweakened popularity lie in the fact that everything does turn out so happily. Children need romance; realism will come soon enough.

A YEAR IN THE WONDERLAND OF BIRDS, by HALLAM HAWKSWORTH (Scribners. $1.60). A delightful book in which scientific knowledge is blended with the most interesting things concerning birds and unusual skill in relating them.

THE HEART OF A DOG, by ALBERT PAYSON TERHUNE (Doran. $3.00). Some of Mr. Terhune's best-known dog stories are here, together with others specially written for this volume. It is a book for those of all ages, which Marguerite Kirmse has illustrated with the same sympathetic interest in dog-life which characterizes the text.

A New Book of Golden Deeds

THE ROLL CALL OF HONOR, by ARTHUR QUILLER-COUCH (Nelson. $2.00). This "new book of golden deeds" deserves the highest commendation. It deals with nine heroic types, not all equally great, but all disinterestedly noble. It treats of Bolivar, John Brown, Lincoln. Garibaldi, David Livingstone, Florence Nightingale, Pasteur, General Gordon, and Father Damien.

Famous Writers

YOUNGER DAYS OF FAMOUS WRITERS, by KATHERINE DUNLAP CATHER (Century. $1.75). Sixteen stories of the youth of famous authors, told not in the form of ordinary biography but in the form of miniature historical novels, and in such a way as to arouse and hold the interest of young readers. Among those dealt with are Defoe, Dickens, Stevenson, Kipling, Johanna Spyri, Louisa M. Alcott, Mark Twain, Lewis Carroll, James Fennimore Cooper, Mary Mapes Dodge, Horatio Alger, etc.

Any book mentioned in these columns may be obtained through the Pilgrim Press Book Stores, 14 Beacon Street, Boston, or 19 So. La Salle Street, Chicago.

Books for Little Children

Though possibly not entirely from a disinterested motive, book publishers so well fulfill in their sphere the Master's injunction, See that ye despise not one of these little ones, that churches might well learn from the world of modern bookdom the need and value of giving to children the best that can be produced. Books even for the tiniest children present such lavish display in text, printing, and decoration, that just as books they are alluring to those of every age. It is good to see that the production of children's books is engaging the activities of the most outstanding of authors and illustrators.

Among the most attractive and unique of the season's books, a book for small children that will appeal to all, is The Adventures of Pinocchio, by C. Collodi, translated from the Italian by Carol Della Chiesa, and with a veritable revelry of illustration by Attilio Mussino (Macmillan. $5.00). This book has been printed in Italy by the original publishers, who have been working on it for over a year in collaboration with the Macmillan Co. It has been beautifully bound by American binders. The book itself is so wonderful that the story of the wooden boy, Pinocchio, and his amazing adventures, becomes almost incidental to its elaborate setting.

From The Children's Bible (Scribners)

Over the Hill Stories, by Robert Gordon Anderson (Putnam), illustrated by Nina Ralston Jordon, is the fantastic and humorous story of the adventures of Merrybell, 9, Teddyenks, 7, and two-year-old Baby Dorothy, who set out to "see the world."

Sweet Times and The Blue Policeman, by Stark Young (Holt. $2.00), is a book of plays to be acted, or read, by children. There are 13 in all, followed by a chapter of suggestions for the producer.

From The Flying Carpet (Scribners)

Poor Cecco, by Margery Williams Bianco (Doran. $3.00), tells the adventures of a wonderful wooden dog who goes out to explore the world. A bright story, with large type and several colored illustrations, it is an excellent book for the younger readers.

Shen of the Sea, by Arthur Bowie Chrisman (Dutton. $2.50), is a charming book of Chinese stories for children, uniquely illustrated by many drawings in silhouette, by Miss Else Hasselriis, of Copenhagen, the Danish artist who has revived this art in Europe. A book of distinction.

Twilight Stories (Houghton Mifflin. $1.75) has been written in part by the late Kate Douglas Wiggin, though the greater part of the stories are by her sister, Nora Archibald Smith. The stories are picturesque and vivid.

The collaboration of most English writers of foremost distinction, and the illustrations by a similarly distinguished group of artists, make The Flying Carpet (Scribners. $2.50) a most unusual book. Thomas Hardy, A. A. Milne, J. M. Barrie, G. K. Chesterton, and others of equal or of lesser note, are among the contributors. The children will find it difficult to keep this book from the older people.

The immense success of A. A. Milne's book of verses for children, When We Were Very Young, which now leads in the list of best-selling non-fiction, has led the publishers to issue a special holiday edition (Dutton. $3.00). It is almost twice the size of the regular edition, is finely illustrated and attractively bound and boxed, ready for Christmas.

From The King's Breakfast, by A. A. Milne (Dutton)

John Martin's Big Book for Little Folk, No. 9 (Dodd, Mead. $2.50), is among the notables. Its author is editor of the Child's Magazine, and of him it is said that "he is probably known and loved by more children than any one man in this country." His Big Book will appeal equally to older children.

Uncle Lubin (Stokes. $2.50) has the distinction of being told and illustrated by the celebrated English artist, W. Heath Robinson. The illustrations, extravagant and funny, accompany a series of stories telling of the hunt by Uncle Lubin for his baby nephew, carried off by a bag-bird.

Nelsons publish a gorgeous, small-folio edition of The Old Mother Goose Nursery Rhyme Book ($2.00), a real aristocrat among the commonality of Mother Goose stories.

Dr. Dolittle's Zoo, by Hugh Lofting (Stokes. $2.50), the newest of the "Dr. Dolittle" books, will be sure to fascinate with its grotesque imaginings in the same way that its predecessors have fascinated both children and grown-ups.

Told Beneath the Northern Lights, by Roy J. Snell (Little, Brown. $2.00). A fascinating collection of Esquimo folk and fairy tales, for boys and girls of from eight to twelve years. Numerous illustrations.

The author of the "Betty Wales" books, Margaret Warde, has written The Holiday Book (Little, Brown. $2.00) for boys and girls from 8 to 12, though we should classify it for children somewhat younger. It is the story of how two country children, with their mother's help, found a way of having real holiday celebrations—an event for every month in the year.

A Treasury of Verse for Little Children, edited by M. G. Edgar, and illustrated by Willy Pogany (Crowell. $1.50), is offered in a revised and enlarged edition.

An unusually interesting book is Letters to Katie (Macmillan. 10s. 6d.), by Sir Edward Burne-Jones. They are the letters of the artist to a little child, wonderfully illustrated by sketches and drawings, apparently done on the impulse of the moment, some full of whimsical humor, others real masterpieces of an artist concerning whom W. Graham Robertson says in his introduction that "on that Great Day when all sketch-books shall be opened, I am inclined to back those of Burne-Jones and Leonardo da Vinci against the world."

The Talkative Table, by James Woodward Sherman (Little, Brown. $1.00), is by a member of the educational staff of this well-known firm of publishers. The things of the kitchen, known alike to John in the city and Betty in the country, are utilized for simply-written, easily-read stories.

Among the Farmyard People, by Clara D. Pierson (Dutton. $1.60), tells the little folks a great deal that they ought to know about the farm and its animals. It is really quite exciting, too.

Farm life also is drawn upon for the adventures of The Little Lost Pigs, by Helen Fuller Orton (Stokes. $1.25). A simple story in big print, for children who have just learned, or are learning, to read.

About Ellie at Sandacre, by Eleanor Verdery (Dutton. $2.00). The story of a happy family at the seashore. A little girl and her little brother, a nurse, a dog, and a canary all enter into a story that manages to give to realism a touch of romance.

The Wonderful Voyage of Little Pierre, and other stories from the French, by Julia R. Foley (Christopher. $1.00). Six tales of fine literary quality, with predominantly Roman Catholic setting.

From Told Beneath the Northern Lights (Little, Brown)

Piccolo Pomi, by Antonio Beltramelli (Dutton. $2.00), translated from the Italian by Leo Ongley, is the story of a little Italian boy who has an adventurous time when he is thrown on the world while still very young. It has the charm of the Italian atmosphere.

The Adventures of Bonzo (Dutton. $1.50 per set). Six attractive little booklets, in transparent wrapper, which present the "puppy of the comics" in various adventures.

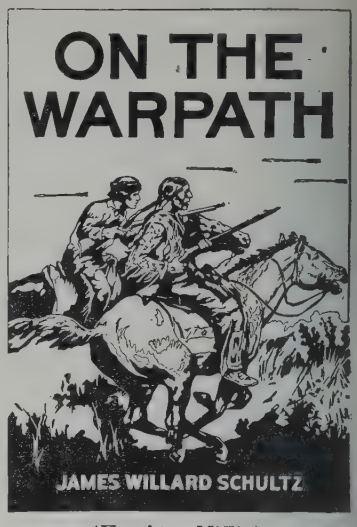
Story and History

A Nursery History of England, by Elizabeth O'Neill (Nelson. $3.00). A gorgeous and fascinating book, with ninety-five plates in color and many other pictures by George Morrow.

The First Days of History, by Frederic Arnold Kummer (Doran. $2.00). This is the third volume of The Earth's Story as narrated for young readers, the preceding volumes being The First Days of Man and The First Days of Knowledge. It is a most attractive account of early history which will do much to quicken in the young reader the passion to know the story of mankind. It has a valuable preface for parents, containing much sound sense on the proper way to study history.



(Houghton Mifflin)

Mythology for Young Readers, by Jane Black (Scribners. $.60). A very handy little book, which older people also will find convenient as a ready reference for mythological characters and events.

Joan of Arc, by C. M. Stevens (Cupples & Leon. $1.75). The wonderful story of Joan of Arc, told in a book of three hundred and fifty-two pages, with the meaning of her life specially interpreted for Americans. A book of loyalty and inspiration.

Joan of Arc, by Andrew Lang (Dutton. $1.00). The story of the Maid of France told in very much briefer form, by an eminent writer. The book is one of the Children's Heroes Series.

Robin Hood and His Merry Men, by Escott Lynn (Lippincott). A substantial story of nearly four hundred pages of an historical figure who has become half-legendary, but of whose doings neither youth nor age ever seems to weary of hearing. There is much about Magna Charta in the story, and a note tells of its meaning and significance.

Tonty of the Iron Hand, by Everett McNeil (Dutton. $2.00). Mr. McNeil's story is from an old French manuscript which he has recently discovered, translated, and edited. It is the account of a boy's adventure with De La Salle and Henri Tonty when they explored the Mississippi River. The book is the first of a series of six, each of which will deal with early exploration in the United States and Canada. The adventurous, story aspect is incidental to the main purpose of bringing to the young an adequate impression of the great figures and events of the early days of exploration in America.

THE AMERICAN TWINS OF 1812, by LUCY FITCH PERKINS (Houghton Mifflin. $1.75). A lively story of a pair of orphans, a boy and girl, and their experiences in war time. The boy, Jonathan, ran away to sea, and had some exciting adventures when his ship was captured. The story follows the authentic history—a rather important factor of historical stories are not to create false impressions.

MIGHTY MEN FROM ACHILLES TO JULIUS CAESAR.

MIGHTY MEN FROM BEOWULF TO WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR, both by Eleanor Farjeon (Appleton. Each $1.00). Admirable stories of "mighty men," told in such a way as to hold the attention, with an appropriate poem added to each sketch. The stories are in chronological order, so that they give the child the proper impression of historic sequence.

NOW AND THEN, by EMILIE BENSON KNIPE and ALDEN ARTHUR KNIPE (Century. $1.50). A little novel for younger boys and girls, the scene of which is laid in old Dutch days in New York. In addition to this story of how a little girl saved her father's life the book contains another story which centers around an incident in Benjamin Franklin's life.

NORTHWARD HO! by V. STEFANSSON and JULIA AUGUSTA SCHWARTZ (Macmillan. 80 cents). An acount of the Far North and Its People, selected from the writings of Vilhjahmur Stefansson, and adapted for children.

Discovery, Exploration, Adventure

THE YOUNG FOLKS' BOOK OF DISCOVERY, by T. C. BRIDGES (Little, Brown. $2.00). Quite a wonderful book, well illustrated, in which the author has recounted the most interesting things in exploration and discovery, from the days of the ancient Phœnicians to the present time, taking in the tragic voyages of Scott and Shackleton, and the discovery of the North and South Poles by Peary and Amundsen, respectively.

THE BOYS' BOOK OF ARCTIC EXPLORATION, by IRVING CRUMP (Dodd, Mead. $1.75). The long thrilling story of tragic quests in the Arctic, from the days of Hudson to the present, accurately related in a way that thrills from the first page to the last.

OG—BOY OF BATTLE, by IRVING CRUMP (Dodd, Mead. $2.00). This book by the same author as the above is a similarly thrilling story of the beginnings of things. It tells the adventures of Og, who mastered fire, and who was the first of his tribe to cook meat, who tamed wolf cubs and did many other wonderful things.

GOLD SEEKING ON THE DALTON TRAIL, by ARTHUR R. THOMPSON (Little, Brown. $2.00). This addition to The Beacon Hill Bookshelf is a tale full of adventure, which contains likewise much information concerning Alaska. The experiences of two boys who go gold-seeking with their father and their uncle give an added note of appeal to boys.

IN SEARCH OF GOLD, by W. D. FORDYCE (Nelson. $2.00). The same quest of gold is the moving spirit of this fine book which is the story, not of the quest in one field, but of the whole alluring passion from the days of the Pharoahs until now. It is an excellent survey, full of historic value for the young reader, but none the less appropriately in the Real Adventure Series.

QUESTERS OF THE DESERT, by JAMES WILLARD SCHULTZ (Houghton Mifflin. $1.75). The author of this book, an old-time frontiersman, himself an Indian by adoption, has written a fine story of adventure among the Hopi Indians of Arizona. It is one of many Indian stories by him that are great favorites for boys and girls.

HURRYING DOWN THE SHORE, CRAIG POURED THE MOLTEN WAX INTO ONE PRINT OF THE MAN'S FOOT

From Boy Scouts (Harper)

SETTLERS OF THE WILDERNESS, by ALINE HAVARD (Scribners. $1.60). This book in The Young Pioneer Series continues the story of Dick Ernshaw, and of Ruth and Dave Henry, in their adventures across the plains to Oregon and California in the days of the gold rush. The same characters have appeared in the author's former books, Where the Trail Divides, and Fighting Westward.

THE CONQUEST OF THE POLES, by ALFRED JUDD (Nelson. $2.00), in the same series, is an equally fine survey in its field. We do not know whether it will appeal more to the young than to the old. It is about as full an account of Arctic and Antarctic discovery as the average reader will desire.

The Lure of the Sea and Ships

DAVID GOES VOYAGING, by DAVID BINNEY PUTNAM (PUTNAM). The twelve-year-old son of the publisher was surely a lucky boy when he got a chance to go on the expedition of the Arcturus with William Beebe. This is David's own account of what he saw during three months on the Pacific, and it is a mighty fine story, despite the fact that the young author says very naively, that the writing took quite a long time, and that he thinks being a naturalist would be more fun than being a writer. The illustrations add very greatly to the wonder and excitement of the book.

HUNTERS OF OCEAN DEPTHS, by FRANCIS ROLT-WHEELER (Lothrop, Lee & Shepard. $1.75). The 66 illustrations from photographs and prints help to make this a book of useful knowledge as well as one of alluring adventure. It answers many questions regarding the way in which the teeming millions of ocean inhabitants live and find their food, as well as innumerable other matters.

THE BOYS' BOOK OF SHIPS, by CHARLES E. CARTWRIGHT (Dutton. $2.00). The story of ships most interestingly and illustratively told,

"I BELIEVE WE ARE OFF ON A VOYAGE TO THE SKY

beginning at an earlier date than Ussher's chronology assigned to Creation, and coming down to the wonderful sailing, steam, and motor ships of modern days. There is even a chapter on the ships and sailors of the future.

SALT-WATER STORIES: RE-TOLD FROM ST. NICHOLAS (Century Co. $1.25). Seventeen good sea stories, by almost as many authors. The cream of the St. Nicholas sea stories.

THE BOOK OF PIRATES, by HENRY GILBERT (Crowell. $2.75).

PIRATES OF THE DELAWARE, by RUPERT SARGENT HOLLAND (Lippincott. $2.00).

Shall we encourage the young to read about pirates? Are "pirate" books good books? There will be difference of opinion, but the publishers at least find a demand for them, and "pirate" books seem to have an unusual run this year, appearing on the lists of most of the outstanding publishers. For our own part we should not hesitate to put a well-written pirate story in the hands of an up-standing boy, though we confess having observed a youngster having bad dreams who was introduced too young to Treasure Island. After all, adventure, fighting, and rascality have been rather intimately blended in history, and we should have a difficult time if we sought to discriminate too closely. There is profound truth in the saying of a character in The Buccaneer, in which William Farnum is now appearing in New York, to the effect that the difference between war and piracy has been more legal than actual. We should have considerable difficulty in eliminating from children's reading the interest in war and fighting, and if we could do so we should probably establish a very distorted view of life and history. It is better to develop the moral sense alongside wide knowledge and observation.

In The Book of Pirates, Henry Gilbert has written an interesting historical account beginning with the pirates who captured Caesar, and coming down through early Saxon and mediaeval times to the modern phases of piracy on the Spanish Main, and "the last of the pirates." The book is well illustrated by Stephen Reid. Mr. Holland's Pirates of the Delaware brings us nearer our own time, to the days a century ago when piracy still lingered rather actively on the American coast.

An old hunter tells his adventures
From Northward Ho! (Macmillan)

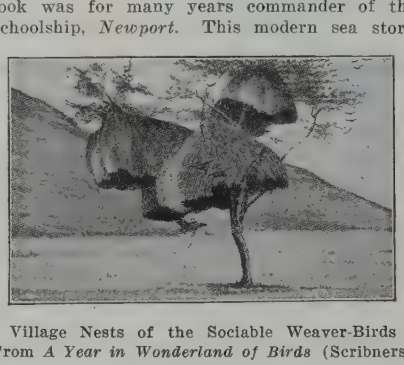
BOB GRAHAM AT SEA, by FELIX RIESENBERG (Harcourt, Brace. $2.50). The author of this book was for many years commander of the Schoolship, Newport. This modern sea story in which he has drawn freely upon the backgrounds of this experience will rank among the season's notable books for boys.



Village Nests of the Sociable Weaver-Birds
From A Year in Wonderland of Birds (Scribners)

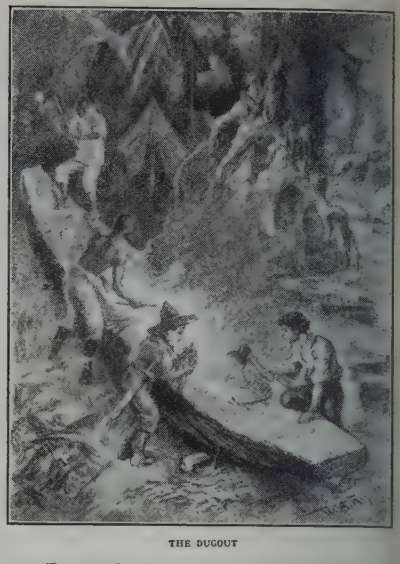
CHARLIE AND HIS COAST GUARDS, by HELEN HILL and VIOLET MAXWELL (Macmillan. $1.25). "For any boy of six who lives near the water," but inland boys may like also to have all the interesting things this book tells about the coast and the sea.

Two Stories of Mines

THE MIRACLE MINE, by W. A. ROGERS (Harper. $1.75.) Anything about a mine seems to interest a boy, and in addition to a great deal about a mine and its fortunes this story has a revolution in Honduras thrown in.

OCEAN GOLD, by EDISON MARSHALL (Harper. $1.75). A story of the quest of gold in Alaska, full of thrill and suspense, of battling with blizzards and hardships, and of the triumph of endurance and honest standards.



THE DUGOUT

From The Miracle Mine (Harpers)

Feasting the Imagination

THE MERRY PIPER, by HAROLD GAGE (Little, Brown. $2.00). The story of the adventures in the fairy wonderland of Ruth, Norman, and Uncle Hal. The beautiful color illustrations by the author help to show the little folks exactly what fairies are like.

THE KATHARINE PYLE BOOK OF FAIRY TALES, collected and illustrated by KATHARINE PYLE (Dutton. $2.50). Miss Pyle, whose genius for producing imaginative stories is pre-eminent, in this book has re-told in her own way the favorite stories of her childhood, selecting them without regard to their origin. The result is a book of fairy tales of great variety and interest.

SANTA CLAUS IN SUMMER, by COMPTON MACKENZIE (Stokes. $2.00). A famous English writer has here turned his literary skill to the concocting of the story of what might happen if all the nursery-rhyme and fairy-tale people should meet and have their adventures together in one book. It is an ingenious tale, very appropriately illustrated.

THE GOLDEN PORCH, by W. M. L. HUTCHIN-ON (Longmans. $2.00). A new edition of reek fairy tales from Pindar, illustrated by ugald Stewart Walker. A most attractive ook, of real literary interest.

GRANNY'S WONDERFUL CHAIR, by FRANCES BOWNE (Dutton. $2.00). A new edition of book of wonderful fairy tales, which were ritten by a blind poet. Granny's Wonderful hair was first published in 1856. The present olume is illustrated by Katharine Pyle, who so contributes a preface.

THE FAT OF THE CAT, and other stories, by OTTFRIED KELLER (Harcourt, Brace. $3.00). volume of Swiss stories, freely adapted by ouis Untermeyer and illustrated by Albert allak. These stories, combining fable, fairy le, and legend, are said to be as well known Europe as Grimm's Fairy Tales. They ould not have found a better interpreter for merica than Louis Untermeyer, who imparts the book something of his own genius.

FAIRY TALES FROM BRENTANO, told into nglish by KATE FREILIGRATH KROEKER Stokes. $2.50). Clemens Brentano was a illiant member of the German Romantic chool, which flourished at the beginning of st century. The present volume of fairy les has been selected from two volumes pub-shed some years ago. The book is illustrated the famous English cartoonist, Sir Francis arruthers Gould.

THE GOBLINS OF HAUBECK, by ALBERTA ANCROFT (McBride. $1.50). The goblins of ie story were very good goblins, who all un-en helped the housewives in their daily task. But one little goblin rebelled against his monotonous task, and his experiences supply the theme of the story.

FOLK TALES FROM MANY LANDS, by LILIAN GASK (Crowell. $2.50). A very fine collection of folk tales, illustrated with eight full-page color illustrations, and numerous line drawings by Willy Pogany. These legends, though mostly of the fairy-tale type, have been so exceptionally well selected they will prove of interest to many besides little folk.

ROUND THE WORLD IN FOLK TALES, by RACHEL M. FLEMING (Harcourt, Brace). Sixteen stories from various lands, with a chapter on their meaning. The care with which these stories have been chosen gives them great value in suggestion and instruction. The author, for instance, calls attention to the refining influences of Christianity even upon the nature of folk tales, the giant, trolls, and dwarfs of older belief giving way to children's fairy tales. A very interesting book.

THE LITTLE LADY IN GREEN, by EVA MARCH TAPPAN (Houghton Mifflin. $1.75). This book is based upon a collection of stories from different countries, made by Richard Bergstrom and published in Sweden some years ago. The author has not made a translation, but has used this material out of which to write the present tales with much freedom in the treatment of characters and incidents. There are twelve tales in all, and they are all delightful and fanciful.

THE CUCKOO CLOCK AND THE TAPESTRY ROOM, by MRS. MOLESWORTH (Macmillan.

From The Enchanted Children, by Vivian T. Pomeroy (Houghton Mifflin)

$1.75). An edition in The Children's Classics, for ages eight to ten, of a book first published in Edinburgh in 1897. It is now re-issued with the quaint, original illustrations by Walter Crane. The two stories in the book are both long fairy tales woven out of the dreamland of two real little girls.

WONDER CLOCK PLAYS, adapted from HOWARD PYLE'S The Wonder Clock, by SOPHIE L. GOLDSMITH (Harpers. $2.00). This series of five plays is illustrated by photographs of actual performances, and by drawings by Howard Pyle. Extensive costume suggestions are given. The plays are designed for production by young people between the ages of eight and fourteen.

THE ENCHANTED CHRISTMAS TREE: A YULETIDE PLAY, by PERCIVAL WILDE (Appleton. $1.00). A simple play dealing with the old theme of the transforming power of the Christmas spirit, which has been very popular for actual production and which may be easily produced without elaborate costumes or scenery.

THE SLY GIRAFFE, by LEE WILSON DODD (Dutton. $2.00). A book of pure fantasy and fun written by the author for his children, his friend's children, and their mothers and fathers, and particularly, as he confesses, for his own amusement. The drawings by Clarence Day, Jr., catch the spirit of the book.

Mainly for Boys

TUNING IN AT LINCOLN HIGH, by JOSEPH GOLLOMB (Macmillan. $1.75). A story of life at "the biggest public high school in New York City," but mainly the story of Tim, a plucky little fellow who sticks it out against bullying schoolmates, refusing to accept the mother's sacrifices by which alone he could have had the more sheltered life of a private school.

BUNNY PLAYS THE GAME, by A. A. KNIPE (Harpers. $1.75). One could hardly believe that as much real adventure hunting pirate treasure as this book contains could attend a summer-camping expedition of three preparatory school boys on a Connecticut mountain. It is a stirring tale with an igenious plot.

CLEARPORT BOYS, by JOSEPH B. AMES (Century. $1.75). A story of the adventures of a group of boys, mostly Boy Scouts, in a Scout camp in the mountains on the site of an old iron mine that had been worked during the American Revolution. The book is officially approved by the Boy Scouts of America.

ON THE SIDE LINES, by A. MAY HOLADAY (Century. $1.75). A breezy college story of the Pacific Coast. Its scene is Stanford University. It is a book about college life, not for college students but for boys in their teens, and possibly for girls in their teens also.

TONY AND THE BIG TOP, by ALLEN CHAFFEE (Century. $1.75). A thrilling story of circus life, which girls may be as interested in reading as boys, considering the fact that Tony of its title is really Antonia, a girl of 17, born to the life of the circus.

COIN AND CROSSBONES, by T. MORRIS LONGSTRETH (Century. $1.75). The title at once suggests much adventure in the search for treasure, and the one who follows the suggestion will not be disappointed. Though complete in itself it is also a sequel to a former book, The Silent Five.

THE BOYS' LIFE OF GENERAL GRANT, by WILLIAM O. STEVENS (Harper. $1.75). Every boy ought to know the life-story of General Grant, who, in addition to being a great general, was a great father. It would be very helpful if along with this Boys' Life boys and their fathers could read at the same time a book also recently published by Harper, In the Days of My Father, General Grant. It is by Jesse R. Grant and is a charming narrative ($2.50).

THE SHAMAN'S REVENGE, by VIOLET IRWIN and V. STEFANSSON (Macmillan. $2.00). Mystery, thrills, and adventure in a story of the Far North. Kak, the Copper Eskimo, the hero of a book by the same authors, very popular last year, appears again in this story, now older and almost a man. The shaman is an Eskimo medicine man.

HOLD 'EM, WYNDHAM! by RALPH HENRY BARBOUR (Appleton. $1.75). A third lively story for boys in the Wyndham School Series. It is full of the stirring incidents of boarding-school life but largely relates to football and three boys, "the Triumvirate." A race on the trail of a suspected spy from a rival school, a smash-up, and a triumphant ending round out a wholesome and breezy story that will appeal to wide-awake boys.

THE BOY SCIENTIST, by A. FREDERICK COLLINS (Lothrop, Lee & Shepard. $2.50). An entertaining survey of many departments of science, described and explained in simple language with many illustrations. It takes up space, time, matter, force, and motion; explains the Einstein Theory, gives lessons in astronomy, chemistry, photography, radio, flying, and surveying. A good introduction to scientific studies and a helpful aid to understanding of the wonders which surround us and which we enjoy today.

THE PRACTICAL BOOK OF HOME REPAIRS, by CHELSEA FRASER (Crowell. $2.50 net.) An instructive book for young people, telling how to do all kinds of repairing around the house—carpentry, painting, plumbing, electrical work, shoe and glove repairs, and upholstering. All the work is fully explained and well illustrated.

THE BOY WITH THE RED CROSS, by FRANCIS ROLT-WHEELER (Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Co. $1.75). Here is a vivid, thrilling book which begins with Red Cross relief in a region ruined by tornado and running through the wonderful heroic relief work of the Red Cross around the world. Illustrated. An inspiring and instructive book for young people.

THE GOLD ROCK OF THE CHIPPEWA, by D. LANGE (Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Co. $1.50). A boys' story of the days near the Revolutionary War but not a war story. The scenes are laid around Lake Superior. Dangers, hardships, and friendship with a Chippewa Indian, Ganawa, are features of this good story of frontier adventure.

QUIMBY AND SON, by WILLIAM HEYLIGER (Appleton. $1.75). This is a good father and son book as well as a good story—exciting, instructive, and showing the way to comradeship between a boy and his father.

SCOUTING ON LAKE CHAMPLAIN, by EVERETT T. TOMLINSON (Appleton. $1.75). A thrilling story of the days near the close of the French and Indian War. Under General Amherst, the hero of the story, the boy, Peter Van de Bogert, takes part in the campaign against Forts Crown Point and Ticonderoga. He and his old friend Sam the Scout and his boy friend John do scout duty for the General whom their exciting adventures serve.

BARRY LOCKE, HALF-BACK, by RALPH HENRY BARBOUR (Century Co. $1.75). Like most Barbour books, here is another boys' preparatory school story, true to life and full of action. Barry has his part in meeting the problem of snobbishness—Barry likes the "strugglers" regardless of wealth.

Mainly for Girls

PATRICIA FROM NEW YORK, by MARGUERITE MURPHY (Lothrop, Lee & Shepard. $1.50). A wealthy, but spoiled, girl of 16, from New York is left with her grandparents in a Minnesota village for a year, where high school life in that different environment brought out the best in her character.

FOLLOWING THE TRAILS AT CAMP ALGONQUIN, by JANE HAXTON (Wilde). A story of girl camp life. It shows the pleasures of camp and trail and emphasizes the opportunities for character-building in organized camp activities. The author is an experienced camper and counselor. The girl campers are a fine group and a lively one.

ANN'S FAMILY, by JANET FIELD HEATH (Lothrop, Lee & Shepard. 50 cents). Aunts and uncles took turns in caring for an orphan of 10 and she longed for a "steady family." Like every good story for girls it has a happy ending.

ROMEE ANN, SOPHOMORE, by ISABEL HORNBROOK (David McKay. $1.50). The fifteen-year-old sophomore of the story, an attractive child of foster-parents, has enough happen to her in a year of school life to make a pleasant narrative full of incident with an occasional thrill.

EMILY CLIMBS, by L. M. MONTGOMERY (Stokes. $2.00). If Anne of Green Gables could have a rival for the place she won as one of the most appealing girl heroines in fiction it would be "Emily," whom the same author has created. By the time the story closes Emily finishes her high school days and is already having manuscripts accepted and returned. She is climbing not only the ladder of life and fame, but into the affections of her many readers.

LITTLE TEXAS, by DIXIE WILLSON (Appleton. $1.75). This is the story of a child of the circus and of the many kind-hearted peo in it who are her friends. Written by one w was once a performer, the life of the cir people is made very real and the little hero is a most delightful child character.

THE CHIMES OF DASKAM HIGH, by AGN MILLER (Lothrop, Lee & Shepard. $1.50). typical American high school, the boys a girls attending it, with their problems, and t school gift of a bell towards the communi chimes,—all have a part in the making of t interesting story.

Ear and Eye

The Way of the Child to the Printed Page

By A. W. Burr

Beloit College, Beloit, Wisconsin

THREE small children were wont to stand about their mother as she read to them om a story book on her lap. The two older ildren were always at her side, the youngest ways in front. As the mother kept her eyes on the book, the children unconsciously did kewise. As some stories were read again and gain, the children of their own motion began put together the words they heard and the rms they saw in the book. One day, to the rprise of the mother, she found that all three ildren could read the stories from the book, it the youngest could read only with the book side down.

How easily and naturally these children had arned to read, had given to printed words the eaning of the heard words. There was no ng, tedious drill on the alphabet, nor on eaningless syllables, nor on isolated words. or was there any phonetic drill, nor any awling out, A—cat—sat—on—a—box.

Those children before had learned to talk by ding that certain sounds always went with seen object or action, as, boy, the boy runs. fter a time it dawned upon them that the unds meant the object seen, and next they ere trying on the sounds for the object themlves, and they were talking. So the natural ay for the child to learn to read is to give m occasions for transferring interesting ought in spoken words to printed words. he child will do it of his own accord, and raply, if he can both hear and see at the same me. He will do it far easier than he will arn the letters of the alphabet. A child does ot need to think or say "see-oh-double-you," efore he can read with the understanding the ord cow. He learns to talk and talks for years before he ever first gives a word its separate sounds. Letters and phonetics have their place when the child tries to express himself in writing and effective speech. They become then a necessary means to him and not a meaningless task.

Another experience has the same lesson. A girl six years of age was at the summer home of her grandfather. Almost daily he read to her, sitting in his lap, the doings of Mr. Crow, Mr. Coon, Mr. Rabbit, and other forest denizens, in Albert Bigelow Paine's interesting book, The Hollow Tree Inn. After a time she was seen reading other books that seemed beyond her ability. When she went home she took from the library shelves a translation of Virgil's Aeneid, began to read it and tell about it at the table. That was a leap in reading ability in six weeks from the First Reader to the enjoyment of the tale of Aeneas.

That advancement was more than the grandfather, a teacher of psychology and education, could account for, and he turned it over many times in the next few months. One day—for he had not then heard the story of the three children—the solution came in a flash. Sitting in her grandfather's lap, the child both heard and saw the words as she followed the reading. She pushed his hand away when she could not see. Some words she knew, and the words she heard gave meaning to the new printed words. She had both ear symbol and eye symbol at once with every word, and learning to read is but transferring spoken to printed language. Thus she built up rapidly a reading vocabulary, and reading speedily became a pleasure to her.

The child had three important helps commonly ignored in learning to read. The words came to ear and eye with the rapidity of conversation, a necessary condition of any flash of thought. The sense was not lost by a pause at a strange word.

The thought of the spoken words helped to keep the meaning of the new, printed words. Words are held best in thought form.

The tones of the voice which mean so much to children gave a clew to the meaning of new spoken and printed words.

Under these conditions and by the words known, the child got both meaning and form of words not known. So we all have learned ninety-nine hundredths of the words we speak and write. Why is not that the way for the child?

If fathers and mothers would plan to have their children read with them one half the time that they take to read to their children, there is no reason why a child five years old should not begin school with a second year ability in reading. Two books, one for the reader and one for the child, will often be well worth while. The old custom of having each of the family read a verse in turn at family worship did much to give the children a reading vocabulary. What a blessing it would be for the child to have the pleasure of entering in his home upon the path to all knowledge.

NATIONAL COUNCIL COMMITTEE AT THE TOMB OF THE UNKNOWN SOLDIER

In behalf of the National Council, a committee of which Rev. Charles W. Legge of Swanton, Vt., was chairman, and attended by the Moderator of the Council, Mr. Frank J. Harwood, went from Washington to the Arlington National Cemetery the noon of Oct. 28, and placed a wreath upon the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier. This picture shows the scene as the wreath was being placed upon the tomb. At the tomb are Mr. Harwood and Mr. Legge. Around them, left to right, are: Dr. Albert F. Pierce, Mrs. Pierce, Rev. Oscar W. Peterson, Chief Chaplain Evan W. Scott of the Navy, Chief Chaplain John T. Axton of the Army, Rev. O. A. Smith, Rev. Stephen C. Lang, Dr. Jason Noble Pierce, and Rev. James G. Graham

Unknown But Known

By Melville Arthur Shafer

(Written at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier, Arlington, Virginia, October 27, 1925)

Unknown to us,
But known to God,
Who knoweth all:
Serf's cry he hears,
And marketh well
The sparrow's fall.

Unknown to us
The hour of death,
The place of birth;
We only know,
And here record,
The deeds and worth.

Unknown to us
Love's sacrifice
For truth and right;
But all is known
O God to thee:
Send peace and light.

Briggs-Evans Wedding

The marriage of Miss Ona A. Evans, of Malden, and Rev. Howard A. M. Briggs, of Northfield, Mass., occurred at the Hotel Vendome in Boston on Oct. 27. The ceremony was conducted by Dr. Frederick E. Emrich, of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society, assisted by Rev. Frederick T. Persons of the Boston Congregational Library. It was a simple but impressive wedding, followed by a sumptuous wedding breakfast. The setting was beautiful in a profusion of flowers.

Mrs. Briggs is the popular field secretary of the Woman's Home Missionary Union of Massachusetts, and is a graduate of Radcliffe College. Mr. Briggs has many friends North and South. He has served in field work for Piedmont and Northland Colleges, and as president of Straight College. His pastorates have been in New Jersey and Massachusetts. For a number of years he has conducted Camp Quinneh Tuk for boys at Northfield, Mass., summers.

Earthworm Philosophy

"Dedicated suffering" is the suggestive phrase that came to me from a correspondent a few days ago. It is with this one as with so many: the feet which are restless to take the path and forge ahead are hobbled with fetters that keep saying, Wait! Wait! You cannot do what you are longing to. What, then, shall it be? And here is what this correspondent is resolved that it shall be: "I am sure to have the larger, more helpful message to live and to proclaim." Suffering is to be made to yield a deeper knowledge of truth, more gripping relations with Reality.

Because it fits the mood of my correspondent's letter, and because it is called A Thanksgiving and is particularly appropriate for the days that are now upon us, I am going to quote a poem that appeared in The Congregationalist a few years ago. Margaret Cable Brewster was dying of tuberculosis when she wrote it, so sick that within a few days of its publication she was gone.

"The year has brought me many shining days,
For which my heart would offer perfect praise.
(The shadow of my days of stormy pain
Has seemed to render my Thanksgiving vain.)

"And yet—I thank Thee for the stress of life,
For cataclysmic days of inner strife,
The rending conflict in my soul's profound,
Which brought my spirit to its glad rebound.

"These bow my head in thanks, great God of all;
For out of these as from a secret pall
My spirit has climbed up unto these days
Of tranquil joy for which I now give praise."

It is again that always stimulating thought that usefulness and value do not depend upon life's outward show. The earthworm, for instance. He is not a thing of beauty. There is nothing inspiring about him to the casual eye. His life is spent below ground, toilsomely burrowing and boring. When he shows his grimy, slimy inches above ground, the very susceptible like to avert their eyes. Yet in the earthworm I find frequently renewed inspiration.

For his is the subterranean plough which, blind, unhearing, slow, dull, unbeautiful, inglorious, bruising in his insides the particles of earth that he eats, liberates elements without which vegetable life cannot flourish, opens the way for raindrops and rootlets to travel, and keeps the soil well aerated. So much needed is the earthworm that in a single acre of garden you might count (so the scientist tells us) upwards of fifty-three thousand of his kind, doing their dingy work in the dark, making possible the life of plant and beast and man, and rewarded only by a glance of disgust or by being impaled upon a fish hook.

It is like that with us men and women. Once in generations comes a great genius among men, but even with him life is usually a matter of struggle and suffering and disappointment; and for the most part the transformation of the world must be brought about by the mere rank and file, doing unspectacular and interrupted work, with suffering not seldom. But for the opportunity to do our bit let us be thankful; also for the opportunity to learn through suffering that with which to make life full of glorious meaning for ourselves and our fellows.

HAPPY LIVING

Be of good cheer; I have overcome the world.—John 16: 33.

Christianity entered into human life as the religion of happiness. The New Testament, with all its sin and tragedy, is the gladdest of books. Christmas dawns amidst the singing of the exultant angels. The black sky is aflame, new stars shine out in it. Christ comes declaring the "gospel," that is, the good news. And wherever the gospel touches the hearts of men new joy springs into life, as the water of the Nile awakens the seed sleeping in the sand. The most tragic day which our faith ever saw, when black night came in between the sun and the cross of Jesus Christ, is called Good Friday.—George Hodges.

Singularly beautiful is the cheerfulness of work-wearied and worried folk. The cruelty and carelessness of loved ones have weighted their lives with crushing crosses, or sheer misfortune has smitten them pitilessly, stroke upon stroke. The beauty of their cheerfulness assumes the form of a patience which is little less than divine.—Author Unknown.

Not on the towering mountain-peak
Crest-crowned with fiery glow
Do men the earth's rich harvests seek,
But in deep vales below.
Not for some glaring high emprise
Seek thou far-soaring wings;
That faith is noblest in God's eyes
That bears a cross—and sings.

There is always song and merriment in the Father's house. The Christian—the son who knows he is a son—is so deeply conscious of his Father's goodness that he is "always rejoicing." He gives thanks in everything. He carries within his breast a merry heart.—J. D. Jones.

The Christian attitude towards the ills of life is something more triumphant than acceptance. It has an exultant note that resignation lacks. It is acceptance with a song in it. It is such a reaction on experience as suggests the certainty of victory—the victory that overcomes the world. —George H. Morrison.

Have you ever said: "I wish I had a more cheerful disposition"? How much do you wish it? Enough to dispose yourself so as to be in the way of getting it? Your words are idle and sinful unless you will to have it instead of wishing to have it. You are not responsible for the disposition you were born with, but you are responsible for the one you die with.—Maltbie D. Babcock.

O God, animate us to cheerfulness. May we have a joyful sense of our blessings, learn to look on the bright circumstances of our lot, and maintain a perpetual contentedness under thy allotments. Fortify our minds against disappointment and calamity. Preserve us from despondency, from yielding to dejection. Teach us that no evil is intolerable but a guilty conscience; and that nothing can hurt us if, with true loyalty of affection, we keep thy commandments, and take refuge in thee. Amen.

William Ellery Channing.

A Needful Christmas Note

Comment on the Prayer Meeting Topic for December 6-12

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: How Can We Translate Christm Into Service? 1 John 4: 7-14. (Consecrati Meeting.)

Light from the Bible Passage

Christmas is the season of love. By no mea is it love of self. Its crowning glory is the d interestedness of the love that marks it. Go love had its finest expression at the first Chri mas in the gift of his son to the world. Th too, was a disinterested love. It was not f what God could get out of the world for himse Christmas is a revelation of the nature of G If we would be Godlike we, too, must be ge erous and disinterested in our love. The mo we realize how great was God's love, the mo we shall desire to love others, those whom loves.

Leads for Leaders

This is really the Advent season of t church. Read and comment on a few passag that show how eagerly men looked for the co ing of Christ. Isaiah 9: 2-7; 52: 13-15; Lu 1: 67-79. If possible have a good soprano si as a special number the aria from Haydn Messiah, "He shall feed his flock."

Jesus' mission is to be one of help for needy world. We best exemplify his coming our spirit of helpfulness.

Another note sounded at the birth of Jes is loving service. Is our service for others b grudged or eagerly and gladly given?

Still another note is unselfish service. Jes did not consider himself. Are we actuated thoughts of the gratitude we shall get or praise for our good deeds?

Thoughts for Members

Smile upon the troubled pilgrims
Whom you pass and meet;
Frowns are thorns, and smiles are blosson
Oft for weary feet.

Do not make the way seem harder
By a sullen face,
Smile a little, smile a little,
Brighten up the place.

—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

Joy is the tingling sense of being fully aliv and that cannot come to narrow minds, a sorbed by selfish concerns.—Harry Emerso Fosdick.

Small service is true service while it lasts;
Of humblest friends, bright creature, scor not one;
The daisy, by the shadow that it casts,
Protects the lingering dewdrop from the sun.

—Wordsworth.

Must it always be only a visit? For it a departs so soon. The music dies away and th skies are still again. The glory fades—only th light of the common day remains. Things a so much as they were before that we wonde twice: first, that it had even been at all an once, that having passed so soon, why it shoul have been at all. And yet it does not whol pass—this "day-spring from on high." It h at least visited us and something is left—as a guests leave behind them some memory added joy. Each Christmas leaves an adde measure of good will, some enduring sense the nearness of God, some clearer vision of wh the world would be if only the Christm spirit came "not to sojourn but to abide wit us."—Gaius Glenn Atkins.

WITH THE CHILDREN

he Twins' Topsy-Turvy Gifts

By Daisy D. Stephenson

I am going to begin with Binkie and Bunty, e Vernon twins, and I may perhaps end up th them. But all they have to do with the ddle of the story is the big fact that they rted the balls rolling. Only, in this case, the lls would be eggs and pumpkins. But dear , we're getting our pies mixed too soon, so 's back up to a proper beginning.

Goodness only knows what the twins' Sun-y-best names were. Probably they had one iece when they were "weenty," red-faced bies in a basket and had their mother. Now erybody called them Binkie and Bunty and t it go at that.

They lived in a tiny gray house on the edge a city, and the neighbors were sorry for them cause they had no parents, only a "smiley" tle white-haired granny who looked as if she ght have been a fairy godmother once on a ne. And Binkie and Bunty weren't a bit rry for themselves. They were happy every inute of every day, though they had next nothing that most of you children have to glad about.

Granny Vernon had a flock of snowy hens at laid the most eggs, and scratched and ckled hen tunes, because they were happy, o. Even Bingo, the yellow dog, seemed to gh all the time. The only time Granny and e twins felt sorry was because they had so tle money to help other folks that were truly lucky. Then they put their heads together, anning soberly; and though it reminded black-ed Bunty of those horrid problems at school, ey always got the answer.

It was November and, of course, from the ry first day till the important last Thursday, ople think of giving—giving thanks and other ings besides. Binkie was a brand-new Scout, d his troop was to help a very poor family t by the Stockyards. Bunty's class of girls as to fix up gifts for the friendless tykes at the hildren's Hospital. And last, the twins anted to do their share in the school thank-fering.

It was such fun to stagger along with the eighbor children with arms full of packages, even a big basket of things like the Youngs wn the street. Some of Bunty's friends even ove to school in beautiful cars, with mothers hand out package after package of clothing d food to add to the big pile in the hall near e principal's office.

"It's a funny thing to turn old, old rules psy-turvy, and you must never try it at hool. The teachers wouldn't like it." ranny's eyes twinkled on the twins over their eakfast that gray November morning. "But ng ago you learned that a kind heart is as od as a fairy wand. And my mother used tell the thirteen of us youngsters, 'Divide ur blessings and you'll multiply them.'"

Granny said this after Bunty reported that e Youngs were giving away their good, last inter's coats, besides money and canned fruit nd such things.

"I guess nobody's going to sneeze at our fresh gs and milk and pumpkins," spoke up Binkie. he didn't up and sneeze that minute, and so ud Bunty nearly jumped out of her shoes!

"Well, here we go with out topsy-turvy uff!" Bunty laughed, as they loaded up and arted to school. Binkie carried the milk and gs because, odd as it seems, he was more areful than Bunty, who was a lovable, "lickety-cut" sort. And even Bunty thought how terrible it would be to stub your toe with such a particular package. And eggs so high just then!

Now here is where we get to the middle.

That afternoon the big boys of the sixth grade started lugging the heaped-up offerings outside and packing them into waiting cars. It was something like that old story that goes, "And another locust flew in and carried off another grain of corn. And another locust"—and so on till you go to sleep. But this was no endless tale, for by and by the boys had carried out the whole pile and the cars drove away to certain addresses to spread thanksgiving and good cheer.

But close to the principal's door stood a pail of milk, two fine pumpkins, and a box labeled, "Handle with care." The boys had kept hands off those things as if they might bite, and the youngest teacher was to deliver them herself.

The youngest teacher was thin and pale and shabby, which, perhaps, is why she was so kind and warm-hearted. She borrowed a basket from Mrs. Janitor after school, and putting the things in, went down the avenue, carrying the twins' topsy-turvy gifts very gently.

On a side street, sandwiched by vacant lots, stood a wee white cottage. Here lived Dicky and Ruth Fielding and their mother. Dicky was in the youngest teacher's room at school, and that is how she knew about them. Ruth had been sick, and as she was only a quarter to six anyway, she had not started to school.

"I brought your mother some extra work," smiled the teacher as Dicky greeted her with sparkling eyes.

"Mother's out sewing," explained Dicky politely. "But Ruth and I want you to come in. And get warm," he added.

"I'll just carry this basket to the kitchen," said the teacher, "because it's full of things that you can't step on, or bang around without getting all squishy."

She had a long cold walk ahead of her, but she stayed ten minutes and talked to Dicky and showed Ruth how to make paper chains.

When Mrs. Fielding came home it was blowing and snowing. But Dicky had the jolliest fire going, and the beans simmered in an iron pot on the back of the range, smelling so good. Dicky's mother opened her eyes wide when she took the things from the basket.

"Oh, how nice! Two dozen lovely eggs!" she cried. "Ruth will be round and rosy and ready to cackle when she gets through with them. And milk! You children will have some to drink for supper in two jumps of a little jack rabbit. And pumpkins!"

Then being a born cook, Mrs. Fielding quickly put one and one and one together. Only it was eggs and milk and pumpkins this time, and she could hardly wait to cook the pumpkins first thing in the morning. She had whisked two beautiful gold-brown pies with crinkly crust out of the oven when Ruth ran out to say there was a man at the door.

Mrs. Fielding's heart dived to her shoe soles. She remembered it was past rent day and this must be that frosty-eyed, grumpy agent who looked so cross if she didn't hand over the money sping-spang. Well, she drew a long breath, she had it saved.

But a surprise awaited her. This was no grumpy, frosty-eyed agent, but a beaming, twinkly man who made your lips quirk at sight of him. Dicky had invited him inside by the stove, and in the two and a half minutes it took Mrs. Fielding to wipe off her hands and whisk off her apron and get the money, the children had made friends with this genial stranger. Ruth was perched on his knee and had confided, "We've got punk'n pies."

The man was sniffing when Mrs. Fielding first saw him.

"I'd know that smell in Timbuctoo," he was saying. "I haven't tasted a sure-enough, old-fashioned pumpkin pie like my Hoosier grandmother used to make for me—why, how-de-do, ma'am!"

Queer how friendly folks can make you feel, as if you had always lived next door, and Mr. Thompson was that kind. The agent was sick, he explained, so as he had to drive out this way—Why, he was the owner of the tiny white cottage! And he had a young lady daughter, all the family he had, and he hoped she would learn to make pies like this. He was having his second slice when he said that. And that wasn't the last of Mr. Thompson, either.

He came back one day after Thanksgiving with a wonderful scheme. At least, he and Dicky and Ruth liked it a lot and could hardly wait till Mother Fielding agreed with them. She came home earlier than usual, pale because she had a headache from using her eyes so steadily.

To make it short (for I hear Binkie and Bunty coming), Mr. Thompson had a nice little fruit ranch a few miles south of the city, and his old tenants had moved away. Would Mrs. Fielding and Dicky and Ruth consider taking charge for him and looking after things? There would be a cow and chickens, and—in answer to Dicky's breathless query, yes indeed, a collie puppy, and—thoughtfully he added, an eye on little Ruth, he was almost sure there would be a pony, small enough so that Ruth would not be afraid to boss it around.

Mr. Thompson would run out once in a while to beg for pie; and his daughter, Mary, would come out vacations and pick cherries and be a big playmate to Dicky and Ruth. And learn to cook like Mrs. Fielding, he hoped. Well, Mrs. Fielding's cheeks were pink as peach blossoms, and she tried to say something and couldn't.

They were all out on the steps when Mr. Thompson left, just as Binkie and Bunty raced by on an errand for Granny.

"That's Dicky Fielding. I know him at school," said Binkie.

"Don't they all look happy?" exclaimed Bunty. "I just love to see folks jolly. Listen to that cunning little girl laugh! Something awfully nice must have happened to them."

Waiting for Dinner

When one is very hungry,
It's hard to wait, I know,
For minutes seem like hours
And the clock is always slow.

There isn't time to play a game
You must sit down and wait,
While mother says, "Be patient,
Our cook is never late."

It's best, when one is hungry,
To think of other things,
For then, before you know it,
The bell for dinner rings.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

From West to East

WASHINGTON

Conference Meets at Seattle

More than 800 people attended the meeting of the Washington State Conference which was held at Pilgrim and Prospect Churches, Seattle, Oct. 6-9. This unusually large attendance was accomplished by extending the time to four days and featuring different groups on different days. On Tuesday the ministers had an institute at which the principal speaker was Pres. H. F. Swartz of the Pacific School of Religion who deeply stirred us all by his presentation of "Evangelism" and "Recruiting for the Ministry." Wednesday was Laymen's Day, the program having been prepared by the laymen, and was the result of a year's study by a competent committee of laymen who have been surveying the needs of the churches of our state. "The Financial Support of the Church," "The Service of Our Men's Clubs," "The Needs of Our State," were their topics. More than 300 men sat down to the banquet in the evening.

On Thursday the women had their meeting, bringing more than 200 for their luncheon and joining with the ministers in the afternoon in a spirited presentation and discussion of the "Merger." One of the delightful features of the program was the presentation of papers by four of the younger ministers of the state. Each was given his own choice of subject and an hour for its presentation and discussion. "What Must the Church Do to Be Saved?," by H. N. Dukes, "Innoculating Against Christianity," by Paul Van Horn, "What Should a Christian Church Be Like," by Clay Palmer and "The Last Migration," by T. K. Vogler; these papers, placed different days on the program, gave us a touch of what the youngest of our ministers are thinking.

The conference sermon was given by Wilfred Withington. His subject was "Dawn." On Thursday evening J. E. Crowther of the University Methodist Church stirred us with a brilliant account of the Peace Conference at Honolulu.

The conference closed with the young people's banquet and program Friday, which was attended by about 250 young people coming from places as far away as Tacoma, Everett, Arlington, Bellingham, and Carnation.

The greatest impression the conference made on us was that the people of our churches will take a deep interest in these meetings and will get a great inspiration from them if we but give them a place in the planning of the program and the carrying out of the work. Instead of planning different new organizations to interest our young people, men, and women in our church work, we are studying how the regular association and conference meetings and organizations may be made to mean more to them and become the organizations through which they can best serve the Kingdom.

CALIFORNIA

Tenth Anniversary of Rev. E. E. Lightner

It is some distinction for Rev. E. E. Ligh ner, a young man who came from the Sou ten years ago, to become pastor of Lincoln M morial, Los Angeles, to have constructed a wo so fruitfully in our only Negro church west the Rocky Mountains. The little feeble chur has grown to sizeable dimensions in both co gregation and property. Recently next do to the church a house has been secured f a parsonage. There are other congregatio among the large colored population of Los A geles much larger than ours, but it can be d tinctly shown that this church serves its peo effectively in the real Congregational way.

New Parsonage at Wasco

A new six-room parsonage, modern in all r spects, has been completed at Wasco. Bo house and garage are finished in stucco. T old church property has been sold and a ne choice location has been obtained opposite t large Union Grammar School. There a ne edifice is soon to be erected which will be Spanish-California type of architecture. T cost of the parsonage was $5,000, besides la and some contributed materials and labor. T cost of the church will be $25,000. Rev. J. Enman is the pastor.

Fall Activities at First, Los Angeles

The School of Missions, which began Sept. 27 and continued to Nov. 18, at First Church, Los Angeles, was fortunate in its leadership this year. Dr. Gilliland, who took charge of the adult group, is the son of missionary par- ents, was born in Peru, knows Spanish as a second mother tongue, and has charge of the Plaza Community Church (Methodist) for the Mexicans. Dr. Osgood Hardy, professor of history in Occidental College, went while at Yale on two expeditions to South America. He led the Baraca-Philathea group.

At the midweek meeting for several weeks, Dr. Carl Patton led in the discussion of the characters of David and Solomon. Rev. J. Challen Smith has charge of the Crucible Club, which meets Sunday mornings, and they are using for three months Fiske's Through Na- ture to God. The women are hard at work in securing 500 women to contribute $10 each toward the new church fund. In furnishing the inspiration they are equally competent. Thus at their opening fall meeting they had some great missionary addresses: reports from Asilomar and talks by those live missionaries, Miss Jean Loomis of Western China and Dr. Lois Pendleton.

Dr. Aked at Plymouth, Los Angeles

The trial of a Sunday morning service at West Coast Theater, with Dr. Charles F. Aked as the preacher, has proved so effective that it is made a policy of Plymouth Church, Los An- geles, where Dr. Aked is co-pastor with Dr. W. H. Hopkins. The morning effort is massed at the theater with splendid congregations, 700 to 1,800. There is the large Plymouth Chorus, and Dr. Aked attracts people from all over the city, with his addresses of marked literary quality and strong moral urgency. The eve- ning service of the church is at old Olivet, where Rev. W. H. Hopkins has charge. His work is of distinct evangelical emphasis, with a rich Biblical flavor. Much stress is laid upon prayer, the sermons in September being devoted to that subject. He urges the necessity of re- generate spiritual character as the basis for success in church work. Great possibilities are before this church, to meet which it is pressing two earnest campaigns: one for membership in a constituency of thousands of people. The other is for the new church building. Until recently they had hoped to use the present site of old Olivet; but they are concluding that more ground space is needed for a suitable structure.

Gratitude Beyond Words

From a veteran nearly ninety years of age: "I am not sure that I can acknowledge re- receipt of your check in a proper and or- derly manner, for it has gone to my head and heart. It is Christmas in the nth degree."

The Christmas Fund

FOR a score of years the Christmas Fund has com- manded a multitude of willing gifts, but each year its volume rises far beyond any previous record.

In 1924, 4,000 donors gave $50,642, a gain of approx- imately $7,000 over 1923.

This provided a Christmas remembrance for each pensioner averaging $40 and a noble Christmas Emer- gency Fund helping to cover critical needs throughout the year, for which the meager grants were utterly inadequate.

Even with these generous gifts the standard of pen- sions is still far too low.

Shall we not lift our giving in such measure that our pensioners may share with us in the abounding pros- perity of the year?

Splendid Progress at Bowman

Notable service has been rendered in and around Bowman by Rev. Peter Cooper. Going to the church with the expectation of supplying for three months at one point only, his stay has lengthened to two years and a half, and the field has grown to eight preaching points. A Ford car makes it possible for him to reach the outlying points. During the summer vacation schools were held, with a total enrollment of 175 pupils.

SOUTH DAKOTA

Week-Day Religious Instruction at Hill City

Week-day religious instruction has been started at Hill City by the pastor, Rev. H. E. Johnson, with 115 pupils enrolled from the third to the eighth grades. This is a consolidated school district, consequently pupils come from a distance who do not get an opportunity to attend Sunday school. The Home Missionary Car is helping the pastor greatly in his work in the outlying districts.

COLORADO

A Students' Club at Fort Collins

A Congregational Club of Students has been formed at Fort Collins. The Sunday evening program consists of music and the discussion of current topics of religious interest. Some prominent speakers have been scheduled, including Judge Lindsay, Ex-Governor Sweet, Rabbi Friedman, Dean Johnson of the college, and Dr. S. L. Joshi, a distinguished Indian.

TEXAS

Fort Worth's Fine Progress

During the 16 months since the coming of Rev. S. T. McKinney, the attendance at public services at First Church, Fort Worth, has increased from 30 to 75 per cent, and the enrollment of the church school has doubled. Thirty-eight members have been added to the church. A parsonage near the church building has been purchased at a cost of $7,000.

IOWA

Becomes Dean of Men at Grinnell

Rev. J. F. Findley, for two years pastor at Cherokee, has accepted the position of Dean of Men at Grinnell College. He is a native of Iowa and had his training at Grinnell and Chicago Seminary. He is only 25 years of age and is probably the youngest officer serving in a similar position.

Enlargement for Council Bluffs Building

The corner stone for the extensive alterations in the present building of Dodge Memorial, Council Bluffs, was laid last month. The new equipment will provide adequately for the religious education program. Rev. T. M. Higginbotham is pastor.

Serves University Students

The church at Iowa City is strategically located for ministering to University students, and the new $15,000 addition added last spring makes the equipment more adequate to the needs. Rev. I. J. Houston, the pastor, is just completing ten years' service with the church.

NEBRASKA

Calling Campaign at Newcastle

Newcastle, Rev. S. J. T. Sloan, pastor, has just had a two weeks' calling campaign in which the pastor, assisted by 12 members of the church, visited the whole constituency and also those whom it sought to interest in the work of the church. As a result of this visitation 21 new members were received. This makes a total of 52 new members admitted in less than two years.

rth Church, Columbus, at Fiftieth Milestone

'he 50th anniversary of North Church, Co-bus, was celebrated Oct. 24-25, starting h a banquet on Saturday evening at which e former ministers were present: Rev. W. Bovey, Rev. P. C. Curtis, and Rev. T. D. vards. Local ministers and other friends e guests. Papers of reminiscences by older nbers, and the history of the church given Mr. A. H. Mitchell were features of the ning. A birthday cake was cut by the oldest ng member, Mrs. Elizabeth McClintock, o is 84 years old. Former ministers took t in the services on Sunday, Rev. W. E. ey giving the sermon prelude and Rev. P. C. rtis preaching the sermon. Rev. T. D. Ed-rds was baptized with the pilgrim spirit in evening and preached a real old time New gland sermon, one hour and 15 minutes in gth. An interesting moment occurred when pastor presented Miss Susan Grim, who sung in the choir for over 33 years. The vice closed with everyone present standing und the walls of the auditorium. The lights e dimmed and Mrs. W. H. McClintock read emarkable poem, "The Old Church Speaks," ompanied by the tolling of the bell. The dience then joined hands and sang "Blessed the Tie that Binds," Mr. Bovey making the sing prayer.

lebrate Union of Churches

The Cincinnati Congregational Union, on v. 10, celebrated the merger of the German angelical Protestant Churches with the Con-gational Churches. There are ten Protes-t Evangelical Churches in and about Cin-nati, and their members as well as the mem-s of the Congregational Churches turned out large numbers. The service was held in St. rk's Church and was addressed by Rev. O. Kiplinger, pastor of First Church, Mansfield, l moderator of the State Conference, who ke on "The Leadership of the Church." The ponse from the Protestant Evangelical urches was made by Rev. C. F. O. Schmidt. ers on the program were Rev. H. K. Ever-l, pastor of Walnut Hills Church and moder-r of the Miami Association, and Rev. Paul keschur, pastor of St. Paul's Church. Rev. R. W. Steiner, pastor of York Street Church, Newport, Ky., presided. It was a rousing meeting, and every one felt that it was good for brethren to dwell together in unity.

A Varied Program at Shenandoah

The Rally Day program of First Church, Shenandoah, was an interesting one. Instead of the prayer by the pastor, there were brief prayers by the children and a prayer in Welsh by a member of the trustees' board. The Scripture was read by a representative of the woman's association, and some memory Scripture passages were given by a member of the Senior Endeavor Society. There was singing by the choir composed of the intermediate department of the Sunday school. Everyone truly caught the Rally Day spirit. Rev. Barbara Slavinskie is pastor.

CONNECTICUT

Called to Second, Manchester

Second Church, Manchester, has called Rev. Frederick C. Allen to succeed Rev. R. A. Beardslee, who resigned last July. This action was taken by unanimous vote of the church on the report of the committee. Mr. Allen is a graduate of Amherst College and Yale Divinity School, and since 1920 has been pastor in Middlebury. Mrs. Allen is the daughter of Rev. L. H. Dorchester, pastor of the First Methodist Episcopal Church, Hartford.

Commissioned at Hartford

At Immanuel Church, Hartford, of which Dr. C. F. Carter is pastor, the service Sunday, Nov. 1, took on the character of a Commissioning Service. Mr. and Mrs. Norman L. Rice were set apart for mission work in South Africa. Rev. Ernest W. Riggs of the American Board delivered the address.

HYMNS for the LIVING AGE

Edited by H. AUGUSTINE SMITH
Director of Fine Arts in Religion, Boston University
Director of Music, Chautauqua, N. Y.

Important features of this book:

All words are between the staffs, making it possible to read and sing with ease.

The reinforced binding protects the book against the hard, if devout usage of over-zealous members of the choir.

The responsive readings, which mark a new epoch in Biblical literature for public worship are in the front pages where they can be used without throwing the book out of balance.

The index, which is so rarely used, is in the back of the book.

The musical settings constitute a rich and varied feast throughout and are fitted to the text with great care.

The music is within the range of the average voice and creates no unwilling sopranos and bassos.

No section of the book is over-populated; there are a number of social service hymns, but not at the expense of hymns of devotion.

The price of HYMNS FOR THE LIVING AGE is $1.75. The introductory rate is $1.35 with transportation additional, from New York or Chicago.

blet in Memory of Dr. James H. Means

On Sunday, Nov. 22, at the morning service Second Church, Dorchester, a tablet was unled to the memory of Rev. James H. Means, D. The first pastor of this church was the loubtable Dr. John Codman, whom Dr. ans succeeded, holding the pulpit for a period 30 years, until he resigned in 1878.

Dr. Means left a daughter, Miss Miriam gden Means, and three sons: James Means, arles Johnson Means, and Frederick Howard ans, of whom only the daughter is now liv-. Miss Means still occupies with grace l generous hospitality the old home of her rents near the church which through her levolent spirit has become widely known to host of returning missionaries and other ends as a haven of rest from hard years of l and service.

Five grandsons of Dr. Means are living: . James Howard Means, Philip Ainsworth ans, Dr. Paul Howard Means, Gardiner Coit ans, and Winthrop Johnson Means. The veiling was by the hand of a great-grandson, nes Means by name, son of Dr. Howard ans. The tablet, which is given by Miss ans and her nephews, bears the following cription:

enty-Fifth Anniversary at Auburndale

The Auburndale Church, Newton, celebrated 75th anniversary by exercises covering a ek beginning on Thursday, Nov. 12.

The young people's part in the celebration s the presentation of the "Pageant of the urfold Life," by Miss Elizabeth H. Nutting Boston University, who is religious educa- assistant in the church school. This geant sets forth through a series of tableaux l episodes the development of a young girl o womanhood and the larger life of service.

Sunday morning a special service of wor- and praise and on Sunday afternoon a per service were largely attended. At the rning service the choir and assisting chorus g the anthem, "Thou Shalt Remember," itten by Horatio W. Parker, a resident of burndale, for the 50th anniversary of the urch. In the afternoon there was a beauti- rendering of the cantata, "Song of Thanksing," by J. H. Maunder, under the direction Mr. Waldo W. Cole, the chorister. The pas- of the church, Dr. Edward P. Drew, was to e preached the anniversary sermon but was vented by illness. In the emergency the ssage was given by Rev. William C. Gordon, D., of Howard University, Washington, C., pastor of the church from 1908 to 1917. Gordon was scheduled to speak at the ves- service and by unanimous request repeated sermon in the afternoon. It was a sermon rthy of many hearings and with increasing fit to the audience as it reviewed the salient tures of the life of the Auburndale Church held up high ideals for future endeavors. e splendid cordiality, ready sympathy, and gressive thinking of the members, the willness to adopt new methods of religious edution, and the spirit of sacrifice as evinced by devotion of so many young lives to the se during the World War were all emphaed in telling fashion.

Perhaps the most popular event was the banquet on the following Tuesday evening, when nearly 300 guests were seated around the tables which filled the vestry. Rev. R. L. Rae of North Church, Newton, offered grace. Mr. Waldo M. Cole acted as toastmaster. The pastor, Dr. Drew, had sufficiently recovered from his illness to be able to give some introductory greetings, which were received with great satisfaction. Mr. Arthur W. Kelly, the church clerk, gave an interesting and informing account of the growth of the church from its beginning. A new "Hymn for Our Church," written for the occasion by Prof. Amos R. Wells, was sung. The Auburndale Church sprang from the church in West Newton, which in turn came from the grandmother church in Newton Centre. It was fitting, therefore, that greetings were given by Rev. J. Edgar Park of the mother church and by Rev. Edward M. Noyes, of Newton Centre. Mrs. F. F. Davidson spoke for the "Growth of Women's Work" in the church, and Mr. George M. Fiske, one of the oldest members, reviewed "Church-Going in the Old Days." Dr. Francis E. Clark of Christian Endeavor fame, who has honored the Auburndale Church by his membership for many years, gave a "World Outlook." The fine fellowship of the Auburndale churches was shown in the remarks by Rev. E. E. Harper of the Methodist Church, and the closing benediction by Rev. P. M. Wood of the Episcopal Church. Messages from absent members were to be read at a later meeting showing the loyalty of the distant members to the home church. This church has the names of a goodly number of missionaries of the American Board on its rolls who are necessarily absent on mission duty. One and all rejoice in the achievements of the 75 years but anticipate still greater things in the years which stretch into the far-reaching future. H. E. B. C.

gational Church in Fisherville, organized in 1849, and the North Congregational Church in Concord, organized in March, 1850. George W. Sumner acted as toastmaster and introduced the speakers. The pastor, Rev. O. W. Peterson, gave a minute, historical sketch of the church; Dr. Mary L. R. Freeman, in speaking of the "Woman's Work in the Church" brought out the human side; and Dr. G. H. Reed, of First Church, Concord, in speaking of "Our Concord Congregational Inheritance," was in fine reminiscent and interpretative mood. The celebration, which was attended by 75 persons, was an impressive and long-to-be-remembered occasion.

OSBORNE, REV. E. C., AND MRS. OSBORNE, Pembroke, N. H., were given a reception at the Pembroke church in honor of their recent marriage. An interesting program was presented, and then Arthur F. Cheney presented the young couple with a purse of money. Mr. Osborne responded fittingly. Mr. and Mrs. Osborne were married in Bennington, Oct. 15, where the groom was a former pastor, and the former home of the bride. Following a wedding trip by automobile to New York and Boston, Mr. and Mrs. Osborne are living at the Pembroke parsonage.

REYNOLDS, REV. LAURISTON, has just completed 50 years of service in the ministry, the last 13 years having been spent with the church at Belle Fourche, S. D. He now retires with the love and esteem of the whole community. The story of Dr. Reynolds' life would be a strong one if it could be written. A quiet, unassuming man, he has been an effective leader, always building his churches up and leaving them stronger than when he found them. It is no small achievement for a man 66 years of age to undertake the work of a church in a frontier town and carry it for nearly a decade and a half as he has done.

The Melody of the Pine

By Harriet R. H. Sears

When birds, all mute,
No longer flute,
When flowers, bright,
Have said, "Good Night,"
When leaves, so red,
Away have fled,
When gentians, blue,
Have sighed: "Adieu,"
When skies are gray
Through all the day,
'Tis then, O tall, O stately Pine,
I hear thy melody divine.

"Though birds sing not,
Though flowers bloom not,
Though trees, all gold,
No longer hold
And gladly wave
Their banners brave;
Though blue has fled
From skies o'erhead.
I neither murmur nor repine,
But sing my melody divine."

"When north winds roar,
I sing the more,
When snow lies deep,
Good cheer I keep,
All, all is well,
My song doth tell,
Thou bidd'st me sing,
With cheery ring,
My melody,
My Lord, to thee;
And so though skies may frown or shin
I'll sing my melody divine."

Appreciation

Poets, sweet,
Move me to know the joy complete
Suffering, conquering,
Poets, sweet.

Poets, deep,
Let me grasp the thoughts that seep
Through the years with the tears,
Poets deep.

Poets, great,
Show me the light of truth and fate
In sowing and growing
Poets, great.

"Amo."

The Christ Child Table

By Frances Kendall

Christmas begins early in our Sunday ool—it begins the very first Sunday in ember. Then we spread a white cover over table in the primary room, and a tall white dle in a shining candlestick is placed at center of the table. And around the tall dle we set tiny white tapers, also in shin- candlesticks, one for each child in the Sun- school circle. This is the Christ Child's ple and for him we shall light the birthday dle and to him we bring our birthday gifts. o the children come trooping in on Decem- Sundays with their shining pennies. Only ght ones are allowed on the table. And the children crowd eagerly around, counting the new pennies as they spread over the white cover. "These are mine," exclaims prim little Ruth, pointing to a bright row. John puts down a shining nickle. "See, Grandma gave me this to bring!" Jimmie's penny is the dearest. "We didn't have a bright one," he says, "but Father shined this up for me." And Jimmie's face is brighter than his penny.

Happy Sundays, those December ones, but the last Sunday is the best of all, the real Christmas Sunday. Candles for birthday children are a part of the regular Sunday school program, but on this Sunday the birthday table is for Him, and the circle becomes suddenly quiet, restless hands and feet are still—the tall candle is being lighted. We think back to the birthday in Bethlehem and to the first birthday gifts borne by the Wise Men as they followed the star. Our gifts are shining, too, like the gold among the frankincense and myrrh. We sing the Christmas hymn, "Away in a manger," and even the smallest beginners join in singing "Jesus loves me."

Around the lighted candle we remember that Jesus said, "I am the Light of the World." What did he want us to be, Mary? Yes, he wanted us to be little lights making some place brighter. Let us think about it while the tapers are being lighted. How can we really give to him as the Wise Men did on his birthday? What did he say?

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these—ye have done it unto me."

Let us count the pennies now. One—two—three—four—the happy voices count on and on and the pennies grow to dollars—fifteen dollars. And fifteen dollars will surely make some place brighter. Yes, Christmas begins early in our Sunday school, and it lasts long.

We sent the money to China and it saved three starved and forsaken children and put them in the sheltering care of a home for orphans. The next year, too, the bright pennies went to China, making room for four little children in a kindergarten. How quietly the boys and girls in the Sunday school circle listened to the missionary's letter and how eagerly they looked at the pictures the missionary sent of the kindergarten children so happily at play! Again last summer they listened to another letter. This time it was from a missionary in Japan, telling of the comfortable mattress their pennies had bought for a little boy injured in the earthquake and found by the missionary on a cold floor where he lay without food or shelter. So long does Christmas last in the Sunday school circle—Christmas and the blessing of the Christ Child Table.

Miss Slattery has called the Sunday school the little thread that ties the child, and often a whole family, to the church. We like to think that Jimmie's penny helped to make Christmas brighter and longer, for perhaps as Father shined up the dull penny for Jimmie his own faith brightened a little.

Would you make a long, long Christmas for little children? Set the Christ Child Table in your Sunday school at the Christmas season.

What is Christianity?

In the home—it is kindness.
In business—it is honesty.
In society—it is courtesy.
In work—it is fairness.
Toward the unfortunate—it is pity.
Toward the weak—it is help.
Toward wickedness—it is resistance.
Toward the strong—it is trust.
Toward the penitent—it is forgiveness.
Toward the fortunate—it is congratulation.
Toward God—it is reverence and love.

What Tolerance Is

By Samuel McCrea Cavert

General Secretary, Federal Council of Churches

Long ago Dr. Johnson remarked in his famous dictionary that tolerance was a good word, but not used. What would he say if he were to see, in the 20th century, the disheartening spectacle of organizations whose very corner stone rests on religious and racial intolerance?

The prevalence of intolerance in our own country is especially difficult to understand when one realizes, first, that intolerance is un-American, and, second, that it is un-Christian.

So inseparable was tolerance felt to be from the true genius of America that freedom of worship and freedom of conscience were guaranteed in the Constitution itself. Our fathers saw clearly that in a democracy made up of diverse groups an ordered society is virtually impossible without the practice of toleration.

How incompatible the intolerant mind is with the true genius of the Christian religion is indicated unmistakably in a revealing incident in the life of its Founder. When a group of Samaritan villagers was unfriendly the angry disciples wanted to call down fire upon these people of another race and another religious tradition. But Jesus pointedly rebuked his followers, declaring, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of."

There is, unfortunately, a kind of easy-going, spineless indifference, bereft of any positive convictions, which sometimes passes as tolerance, but which is worse even than intolerance. It is the attitude of a Montaigne, outwardly patronizing all religions, but inwardly believing none. If tolerance really meant absence of clear-cut opinions, or irresoluten in standing out for what one believes to be truth, it would be indeed a doubtful virt Lack of strong convictions is an even grea evil of our day than lack of tolerance. I true tolerance is an utterly different thing fr this. What it involves is no complacent shi shallying about my views of the truth, but recognition of the other man's right to do own thinking as I do mine, to reach his o conclusions, and then to hold his o honest convictions as frankly as I hold mi It makes me ready to say with Voltaire, disagree with everything you say, but will fend to the death your right to say it." means that I have so much confidence in truth that I can trust it to win its way with any other compulsion than that of its own trinsic worth. I shall reason with the m who differs from me and seek to persuade h by showing him why I believe as I do—but to coerce him—never.

True tolerance means, in a word, earne ness of conviction combined with respect the convictions of others. It is, as Phill Brooks once pointed out, a fusion of love truth with love of men. Strong love of tr without love of one's fellows makes the big It is this which has lighted the fires of per cution in every age. Love of one's fellows, the other hand, without devotion to the tr makes the sloppy sentimentalist. The blend of the two makes the ardent and tolerant spi

As long ago as the time of the Peloponnesi War, Aristophanes wrote certain lines that as modern as if penned yesterday and ne more needed than today:

"From the murmur and the subtlety of s picion,
With which we vex one another,
Give us rest.
Make a new beginning
And mingle again the kindred of the nations
In the alchemy of love,
And with some finer essence of forbearance
Temper our mind."

The Better Way

By Harold L. Irving

A man lay prone across the bed in a room one of the city's large hotels. The uncer- in light of retreating day straggled through e window, giving shape in a half-hearted anner to the various articles about the room. he noise of the street far below, rendered eaningless by distance, drifted in on a de- pairing breeze that had struggled unequally ith the intense heat of the day. The dark indow hangings fluttered wearily.

The man on the bed lay face down, seemingly lifeless, his body huddled in such manner as to convey an impression of having been crushed by a relentless force. An occasional groan alone spoke of life but a groan of such anguish that it suggested death rather than life —the death cry of a soul from which all hope had fled. Black despair filled heart and mind. He could not go on. He was broken on the wheel of life.

A Voice said, "Why are you here?"

The man said, "I have sinned and now I must pay."

The Voice said, "Where do you go?"

The man said, "I go to destroy myself."

The clang of an ambulance rushing to a scene of agony or death drifted in through the open window.

The Voice said, "I will help you. Your sins are forgiven. Come live with Me. Work for Me. I need you as you need Me."

The man looked up, his eyes full of hope. "What work would You have me do?"

The Voice answered, "Help the sick, the needy, the sore oppressed, the fallen. Tell them of Me."

The man arose, his face radiant, his load cast from him. "I will, Lord, now," and started from the room.

"Wait," said the Voice gently, "Where do you go?"

The man replied, "I go to destroy my self."

The Peril

By Melville Arthur Shafer

We hear a great deal in this country about the yellow peril, but in Japan they talk of the white peril. They have been exploited by the white races until the white peril has become extremely real to them. They have seen the white races conquer the red race, the brown race, and the black race, and feel sure that there is now a definite movement on foot by the white people to subdue the yellow people of the world.—Bishop Herbert Welch of Korea.

The perils of red and black and brown
Have caused our Pharisaical frown
For races of men we poorly know,
Because their lives are less a show,
Because their pace is, too, more slow;
But they all have dwelt so near the sun
Light's tints of beauty they each have won!

The peril of yellow now beware!
The phantoms of strife are riding there,
As they rode in red and black and brown,
To cheat and mock our fair renown,
To seize and wear our haughty crown!
But, who will warn of the peril, white,
That threatens all with its selfish rite?

There never was made a race of man,
Ever since this world of ours began,
That perfectly showed the good or ill!
Each must its law of growth fulfill,
To best express the higher will;
And yellow and brown, and black, red, white
Are each of them now a hue of light!

Know that South is South, and North is North,
And that each must strive to prove its worth,
And each of the other learn love's ways
To bring to men the better days,
For which each in his own tongue prays!
For the East is East, and West is West,
And thus will each meet the judgment test!

Two novels that readers of all types may read and enjoy

Ernestine Sophie

by Sophia Cleugh

Author of "Matilda"

Here is another story as delightful as "Matilda, Governess of the English," which made such a success last year.

Ernestine Sophie is every whit as charming a person as her predecessor, and the theme of the book just as original and genuinely amusing.

Without a doubt with Mrs. Cleugh there arrived a novelist of power and individuality whose wholesome novels anyone may read and enjoy.

Price $2.00

Matilda, Governess of the English

"A joyous, romantic, engaging tale." —The Outlook.

"A sheer delight." —The Spur.

"More delight to the page than any book we have read in 1924." —N. Y. Evening World.

"Barely a page that does not ripple with gentle pleasantry." —N. Y. Times.

"Not one novel on the Autumn list which can touch it." —Woman's Home Companion.

A TALE OF WESTERN CHINA

The Laughing Buddha

By James Livingstone Stewart

"It seems to me a most amazing piece of work. One does not compare first novels to such a masterpiece as Victor Hugo's 'Les Miserables,' but never since reading that great masterpiece have I found anything that makes one so reminiscent of its pages as this deeply moving narrative of West China."—The Congregationalist. Illustrated, $2.00

MERTON L. HARRIS

The Golden Mirage

A Romance of the Great South-West.

"A vivid and thrilling picture of an oil boom in Texas. The surprises along the way are sometimes really startling. All in all, the kind of book you pick up, idly, after lunch to rest your mind a bit, and finish at midnight."—Christian Evangelist. $2.00

ANNIE M. BARNES

Hartford Seminary Foundation

The fall meeting of the board of trustees of the Hartford Seminary Foundation was made the occasion for breaking ground for the new building of Hartford Seminary as a part of the splendid group of buildings now being erected for the three schools of the Foundation. Prof. Waldo S. Pratt, who has been longer connected with the institution than any other member of the faculty or the board of trustees, coming to the service of the seminary in 1882, turned the first sod for the new building.

Of the proposed new buildings on the Girard Ave. campus, Mackenzie Hall, the women's dormitory, is completed and has been in use for nearly two years; Knight Hall, the gift of Dean E. H. Knight and his daughters supplemented by the gifts of the alumni and friends of the School of Religious Education, is practically completed and will probably be used for classes in the second semester; Avery Hall, the new library building which will house the Case Memorial Library, and the men's dormitory, which may be called the "New Hosmer Hall," are well under way, roofed in, and will be completed in the spring; in addition, work is advancing on the Tower and a portion of the Administration Building, which will house the heating plant for all the buildings. The Theological Building, for which ground has just been broken, will be completed in the summer and will provide classrooms for the work of the Theological Seminary. It is almost certain that by the beginning of the next academic year the three schools of the Foundation will be in their new home, comfortably housed and well equipped for their expanding work.

Yale Divinity School

The Yale Divinity School opened its doors for the 103d year of service to the chorus of hammers and chisels, trowels and saws. Taylor Hall was piled high with stones and building materials, while the Quadrangle was full of masons and carpenters, trying to make room for the ever-increasing throng of students who are turning their faces toward Yale. Among the many needs of the school one was imperative. If students were to use the library, there must be adequate space. Accordingly the Corporation voted the funds to make a commodious addition extending into the Quadrangle. Classes are taxing the capacity of the lecture rooms, a cheering but perplexing situation.

Preliminary figures with regard to the enrollment are as follows: Graduates, 50; seniors, 49; middlers, 62; juniors, 61; students not candidates for a degree, 15; total, 237. Thirty-five states and eight foreign countries are represented. Of the 17 students coming from abroad Canada sent five, China, Japan, and Brazil each two, Korea three, and Hungary, Czecho-Slovakia, and the Philippine Islands each one. Sixteen denominations are represented as follows: Methodists, 73; Disciples, 32; Baptists, 28; Congregationalists, 27; Presbyterians, 17; Christians, 11; Lutherans, 7; Evangelicals, 7; Church of the Brethren, 5; United Brethren, 4; Episcopalians, 3; Church of God, 3; Adventists, 2; Friends, 1; Dutch Reformed, 1; Mennonites, 1.

Approximately 120 universities and colleges have contributed to the student body.

The faculty has been enlarged by the coming of Rev. Robert Seneca Smith, M.A., formerly professor of Biblical Literature in Smith College, who now enters upon his work as Horace Bushnell Professor of Christian Nurture, Dr. Weigle having been elected Sterling Professor of Religious Education. During the first semester Professor Smith is offering the Course in Methods of Religious Education in the Divinity School and a Course in Christian Fundamentals in the College. Prof. Wilfred E. Powell, of the Class of 1921 of Phillips University, is visiting professor of Religious Education, and is offering two courses, one in Week-Day Religious Education, and the other a seminar in the Project Principle in Religious Education.

A revision of the curriculum is meeting with the hearty approval of both faculty and students. The credits required for graduation are now based upon the unit system, a unit being three hours of work each week for one semester. Most of the courses which used to run two hours a week for the year are now arranged to run for three hours a week for one semester, while other one and two hour courses have been so grouped as to make appropriate units. As a result, students are enabled to concentrate their attention upon five courses, more than that requiring special permission from the faculty, whereas formerly they were often carrying eight and even nine.

The formal opening of the School was held on Monday evening, Oct. 5, in Marquand Chapel, with President Angell presiding. Prof. F. C. Porter, who has just returned from a trip around the world, made the address. The critical situation in which our missionaries and educational institutions in China find themselves was clearly analyzed and sympathetically treated. Professor Porter emphasized the truth which all students of the problem have come to recognize—that the religious spirit of China cannot be run into the ecclesiastical forms and theological creeds of occidental Christendom, but that our great task is to interpret and impart to them the mind of Jesus, leaving their leaders, just as Jesus left his followers, to work out the appropriate forms and creeds for themselves. At the close of the address the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was celebrated.

The annual outing at the shore was held at Double Beach the following Thursday. Addresses by representatives from the various classes were given, Professor Weigle acting as arbiter loquendi. Robert T. Beck spoke for the juniors, J. Emerson Ford for the middlers, N. G. Long for the seniors, and Lavens M. Thomas for the graduates. The closing address—which struck the key-note for the year—was given, as usual, by Dean Brown. H. H. T.

Pomona's Group Plan

Just recently that staunch friend of Pomona College, Miss Ellen Scripps, made a gift of a half million dollars. This, added to her previous gift for the purpose, makes three quarter million dollars of resources to be devoted to the establishment of a Women's College at Pomona. Thus in accordance with its plan of expansion, a new unit is shaping as a group which will be aggregated about Pomona as a center. As last year, 225 students make up the freshman class, with hundreds turned away. Adhering to the original conception of a college of moderate size, enlargement will continue in the form of a group of colleges in a unitary establishment. Thus the student retains the value of individual touch in smaller groups.

nbined with the advantages of large common raries, museums, assemblages, etc.

To make a study of educational institutions road, with a view to the shaping of Pomona's ure, the trustees have granted President aisdell a year of absence. En route to rope he attended the National Council. The ire student body went to the station to bid n bon voyage. Their esteem found expres- n in the gift of a medallion. During the sence of Dr. Blaisdell, Dean Jaqua will be in arge. This is the 15th year of Dr. Blais- l's presidency, during which the college, ogressing as Southern California has grown, s increased its faculty from 41 to 81, its mpus from 82 to nearly 500 acres, the value buildings and grounds from a quarter mil- n to a million and a half, and the endowment m less than half a million to over two mil- ns.

In opening the college term, an interesting novation was made in the preparation of the shmen for college. To render entirely un- cessary any perpetuation of college custom the rough usage of new men by older class- n, a Freshmen Week was established, pre- ding the regular term, which freshmen were uired to attend. In these days, by means student-faculty dinners, assemblages ad- ssed by members of the faculty or elder stu- nts, college traditions and customs were pre- nted, and mutual acquaintance encouraged. like manner the old Kangaroo Court, with rough and ready manner of administering ident discipline, has been replaced by the nior Men's Court. Its jurisdiction extends er student discipline and all serious infrac- ns of regulations; and recommendations will made to the faculty by the court as occasion mands.

Some 1,833 alumni celebrated Founders' Day, t. 14, in some 18 centers. An annual event s now is, and known as "Universal Pomona y." Naturally the largest assemblages were Los Angeles, which were addressed by Dean rnest Jaqua and Coach Colvin Heath; and the Claremont Inn Commons, which was ad- ssed by Judge Charles G. Neely. The pur- se is the retaining of the interest of the dely scattered alumni, and of the 3,300 ex- dents, in the welfare of the college.

This year the Harvard Exchange Professor William Morris Davis, department of geol- y, and an authority in his subject, being the author with Prof. W. H. Snyder of the first xtbook on the origin of the earth's surface. Frank Woodruff, Pomona sends its fourth an to the faculty of the International Col- ge at Smyrna, where Cass Reed, another of graduates, is president. Professor Wood- ff will have charge of college athletics for ree years.

To meet the desire for research in radio, a w department has been created to study that bject and to make practical applications. It under the direction of Dr. R. R. Tileston, ad of the department of physics. C. F.

Our Readers' Forum

Preventing War

To the Editor of The Congregationalist:

A striking presentation of some of the horrors of war is being made in New York City. Channing Pollock in The Enemy depicts war as it is and shows some of its effects. The enemy of mankind is hate, according to this playwright.

In John 13:34, we read, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another." If we followed that injunction fear, suspicion, jealousy, greed, ill will, and the other things that develop into hate would find no fertile soil in which to grow.

We are elated over the news of the peace pact agreed upon by France, Germany, and Belgium at Locarno, in which Great Britain and Italy join as guarantors. There is danger, however, that people and nations will place too much faith in this agreement and settle into a false state of security.

"Peace is not the product of documents. Peace is the product of good will among men" (Herbert Hoover).

The old saying, "In time of peace prepare for war," should be replaced by this: 'In time of peace organize to make war impossible. We must stop "the next war" now. If the minds of men are free from the causes of hate, war will not come. "Peace," writes one editor, "is something more than a mere cessation of fighting; it is a state of mind in which there is no war-purpose."

War has been outlawed and abolished between cities and between states. We have outlawed dueling, piracy, and slavery. Why do civilized (?) nations continue to use a large percentage of their income to maintain military preparedness for war, when a small part of the sum would promote a mental preparedness for peace that would make war not only unnecessary but unthinkable?

"Whatsoever ye would that men should do

THE TREATISE TO THEOPHILUS

NOTES ON THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. LUKE

By the Rev. T. L. Aborn, B.A., B.Sc., London; B.D. Trinity College, Toronto. In two volumes, 8vo. xvi+748 pages, $3.00. Postage about 25 cts. per set. An incredibly inexpensive set—through somebody's generosity.

This work is something entirely new in religious literature. The writer of the third Gospel, as it is called, set it forth "in order"—in other words, with its several topics arranged, connected, and developed according to a definite plan—so as to give Christian teachers of his day the certainty which all such teachers need. The plan, according to this author, was soon lost, and with it much of the value of the Gospel as Christian evidence. Labelled "Synoptic," it came to be treated as a kind of collection of anecdotes. Now, for the first time in the history of Christendom, as the author believes, St. Luke's own plan is given and followed; opening up for Bible students a new field of knowledge, for preachers a new mine of wealth; and, above all, enabling men like Theophilus to know the certainty of those things in which they ought to have been instructed. It is a work which should be in the hands of all truth-seekers, whether Fundamentalists, Modernists, or others.

lding ill will toward us, let our own minds free from these things.

The only thing that stands in the way of iking this a world of peaceful, prosperous people is the spirit of selfishness. The greatest present-day need is the spirit of love, faith, and unselfish service. When we make up our minds to solve our problems in the spirit of good will we shall have a worthwhile world. We must co-operate to change the war-thought to the thought of peace and good will.

The path to freedom is open. The pathway is clear. It is for us to enter, if we have the spirit of unselfishness and love for humanity.

Chemical Warfare

To the Editor of The Congregationalist:

Your editorial on "Poison and Profits" in the Oct. 29 issue of The Congregationalist was so strongly against chemical warfare that I desire to state a few indisputable facts.

1. The League of Nations Committee on Chemical Warfare in 1923 reported favorably on its use in war and declared it more humane and less dangerous than any other method of combat.

2. The gas casualties of the World War were about 74,600 or 27 per cent of the total battle casualties. Of other than gas casualties the deaths were 24 per cent. Gas deaths were only 1.87 per cent.

3. Seventy-five per cent of the men blinded in that first gas attack at Ypres were fit for duty in three months.

4. In the Great War lack of knowledge of procurement cost this country close to five billion dollars—unpreparedness.

5. The nation having airplanes and gas has at its mercy those nations destitute of these weapons. Should the United States be in the former or latter category?

6. Carbolic acid is a valuable disinfectant and has probably saved more lives than any other chemical. It is used extensively in making Bakelite, phonograph records, etc., but it can be "nitrated" to picric acid, an explosive used very extensively before the World War. Should not the true pacifist condemn the manufacture of carbolic acid as "commercial ghoulishness" because of a possible use in warfare?

In view of the above facts can you not show tolerance for some of us who would prefer to meet a Quaker armed to the teeth in preference to meeting an unarmed bandit?

The Congregationalist has been in our family for more than 60 years, and is always so fair and correct in its statements that I am sure that the above will be welcomed.

S. FRANCIS HOWARD.

Ten minutes later the foreman came down. He also was hungry.

"Where's my lunch?" he demanded.

The boy gazed at him in amazement.

"You told me to eat it up and I eat it."

Christmas Programs

"Good Will Among Men"

A Christmas Service for Churches and Church Schools

Arranged by MARSHALL N. GOOLD

Author of "Saint Claudia" awarded the first prize in the 1924 Religious Drama Contest held by the Drama League of America

The charm of this Christmas service lies in its simplicity and the human appeal of its message. It is built around an almost literal interpretation of the angel's song, "Peace on Earth, Good Will Among Men," calling us "to supplant war with co-operation and peace among the nations, and suspicion with sympathy towards all men." But one rehearsal necessary for presentation. So arranged that the congregation may share in service. Good reader essential for the success of the service. Pantomime features most simple, requiring no elaborate stage setting nor trained dramatic cast. Few lines for memorization generally from Bible.

A special charm of this service is the smoothness of its development, each step blending naturally into the next step with no choppy nor ragged breaks between. There is perfect synchronization of music, the reading, and pantomime effects. Equally effective in small or large churches.

Single copies 8 cents; 12 copies 85c.; 50 copies $3.25; 100 copies $6.00.

The Adoration of the Kings and Shepherds

A Pageant of the Nativity

By MILDRED EMILY COOK

One of the simplest and most beautiful of Christmas pageants. It is suitable for any denomination and for the smallest as well as the largest church. Only two or three copies are needed for the rehearsals and the production. Use this wonderful service this year, and in your church, as in others where it has been tried, it will become an annual Christmas event.

"We are happy to say that the pageant was a great success. Several people have told us that the emphasis we placed on reverence and quiet was unnecessary, the pageant itself demanded it, and created the right atmosphere for it."—Mrs. F. E. Carlson, Plymouth Congregational Church, Milford, Ct.

"This service . . . seemed to me excellent in every respect, fulfilling in simplicity and dignity the true idea of a Christmas mystery."—Bishop James DeWolf Perry, of Rhode Island.

Decorated Castilian Paper. Price 75 cents

Why the Chimes Rang

A Pantomime

By MARTHA RACE

Arranged from Raymond MacDonald Alden's great story

There could be no more effective and appealing preparation for the gift-bringing service now used in an increasing number of church schools in celebration of the great Birthday than this surprisingly simple pantomime representation of Mr. Alden's great story. Only a few copies needed for a presentation.

Paper, price 35 cents

Note: Price of the story book, "Why the Chimes Rang" by Raymond MacDonald Alden $1.00.

The Prophetic Child

A Christmas Pageant

By LANGLEY SEARS

An effective interpretation of the Christmas story, using the old Christmas hymns and Biblical text for many of the speaking parts. In rehearsal and presentation this pageant should be considered an act of worship. It may be used as the program for a white gift Christmas.

Price, 15 cents per copy; $1.50 per dozen; $12.00 per hundred.

At the Door of the Inn

A Christmas Pantomime

By MARTHA RACE

A vivid, sympathetic portrayal of the scene before the crowded inn which would not shelter Mary and Joseph during the late afternoon and night of the Nativity, and of the selfish, motley crowd which came to Bethlehem in answer to the decree of Caesar Augustus.

"How often to the crowded heart there comes
A would-be guest, who brings with him, unseen,
A kindly presence who would glorify
The humblest life, and fill with quiet peace
The days now tortured by discordant strife."

Interspersed through this most charming and appealing pantomime are many of the oldest and best beloved Christmas hymns and carols.

Requires a good reader with a clear, strong, sympathetic voice, and a cast of thirty or more characters. Complete directions for simple setting, lighting, and costuming. Time required for presentation one and one-half hours. But one or two copies needed for a presentation.

Price, 20 cents per copy

A Christmas Mystery

By JANE JUDGE and LINWOOD TAFT

To be used as Part of a Community Christmas Sing

This pageant may well prove just what is needed for a community Christmas observance. Some of the finest Christmas songs and carols are sung by the audience while the Christmas story is presented in pantomime, culminating in the final tableau.

Dr. Taft is Chairman of the Department of Pageants and Festivals of the Drama League of America, and author of "The Technique of Pageantry." This pageant has had the test of experience.

Price, 15 cents; 12 copies $1.44; 50 copies $5.50; 100 copies $10.00.

The Children's Christmas Tree

By FRANCES WELD DANIELSON

Charming Christmas entertainments to be given by the children themselves. It is a delightful feature of these plays that preparation for them is as great fun as giving them, and they are free from the dreariness of rehearsal.

Price 25 cents

The Pilgrim Elementary Teacher

The Great Enterprise

ALL the sense of vision, expectancy, adventure, investment and possible realization that this term ever meant to you does not match the real thing. Our missionary enterprise more than fills your superlatives. It is a modest statement to say that it is far greater than the sum total of all that any one person knows about it. In itself it is alluringly attractive when we come to close grips with even one integral part of it. It comes nearer being the Simon pure expression of our fairest Christian profession than practically anything else we do. Knowledge of its achievements stirs our noblest impulses, and impels us to new ideals and sacrificial service.

Spasmodic effort, interest and support are wholly inadequate from every point of view. They defeat the work and workers of course, but even the greater pity is that they defeat your church and every individual member of it. They mean an irreparable loss to human souls from center to circumference.

What an incomparable service we would render the members of our churches if we carried the knowledge and its vision to them. Nothing competes with it. Nothing approaches it. There it waits, borne to us on the shield of devotion and sacrifice. A presentation of our missionary work in every church by pastor, secretary or missionary at least once a quarter will make a splendid beginning. Will you plan your church's program of Sunday morning services to include such periodic presentation? There is not a church in America that will not thank its pastor for such a privilege.

It will enrich and deepen the knowledge, appreciation and interest of your people in the vast Christian enterprise at home and abroad. It will give them vision and heart for the more homely routine of ever pressing local tasks. It will give them faith and assurance to apply themselves with something of enthusiasm to the constantly exacting duties of church life and service. It will lighten the burden which you as a pastor will otherwise be putting on your own personality in your effort at leadership limited to an interpretation of the Gospel with merely local application. It will generate in the minds and hearts of your people new impulses to share adequately in its work and its sacrifice. It will release undreamed-of powers in some of your members who have been apparently indifferent to the usual approach. It will give horizon and vision that will reveal meaning and unity and add compelling power to the appeal of the whole vast undertaking to which the church is committed under the leadership of Christ.

KENNEDY'S SECOND BEST

BY JOHN FREEMAN

t was a steaming afternoon towards the end of June and that Chinese puzzle, by irtesy called the Toronto Union Station, s in its normal state of clamorous con- ion, when an enthusiastic company of ople elbowed their way through the wded entrance hall, down the winding n-shod stairway and over the deadly level ssings to track Number Nine. They had sembled to say "God Speed" to the Rev- nd Gordon Kennedy, minister of Rose- unt Memorial Church, who was leaving a three months' holiday in the West.

A troop of smart looking girls fluttered o the platform and scurried about in rch of the car, "Columbia." Presently re were shrieks of delight indicative of joyous discovery. The girls, most of om belonged to Kennedy's choir, were fol- ved by a number of young men, members the Memorial Tennis Club. After these ne a promiscuous stream of people, Sun- school teachers, church officials, and mbers of the Rosemount congregation.

'Looks like a bottle of mixed pickles," re- rked an amused bystander.

'Exactly," replied his companion; "he's 'em bottled all right. Nicely pickled, Fifty-seven varieties, eh?"

'Something like that. Well, I guess he's a ker."

'Sure he is! Cork and corker. That's w he keeps 'em together. Inserts himself ll into the bottle neck. Great art, that!" 'Ever hear him?"

A time or two. He's got the goods. Just stuff the people like. Knows how to dis- y it, too. First class window dresser." All his stock in the window?"

I should say, no. Plenty in reserve. rming chap socially. Have you met ?"

Only once. Had a game of golf with him ently. Interesting player. Keeps you ssing. Gets a long drive, not always ight; but he's a daisy with the putter." Same in the pulpit. Wins out with his strokes. He knows how to put the ball n all right."

Kennedy had been three years at Rose- nt. It was his first charge. He was ty, unmarried, and not yet engaged, pite the fact that his church assembled oodly number of desirable girls, daugh- of wealthy families. He had walked ily. His church officials approved this tious demeanor. They were in no hurry their minister to marry. Marriage ht possibly impair his popularity. It worth something to have an attractive ng bachelor in the pulpit. It invested situation with a certain liveliness and ancy.

t the present time Kennedy was "drawing capacity houses," rapidly increasing the membership, and substantially augmenting the revenues of the church. The girls adored him because he was "such a darling." Young fellows rallied about him, finding him a manly sort, a genial companion, and a good sport; church officials esteemed him a precious possession on account of the prosperity attending his ministry. To them he was a "live wire," with "nothing to match him between the two oceans."

II

As he stood beside the Pullman car in which he was to travel for the next few days and nights, Gordon Kennedy looked more like a prosperous young business man than a minister. He was well over six feet in height, broad shouldered, and straight. His square chin, firm jaw, wide humorous mouth, and deep-set, dark brown eyes spoke of forcefulness and leadership. As usual, he was in unclerical garb. Just now he was wearing an elegantly cut suit of soft gray material, white silk shirt and collar, a flowing black silk tie, panama hat, and highly polished tan shoes.

The charm of Kennedy's social ways constituted a big factor in his popularity. He was a first class "mixer." He became quickly interested in the people he met. He had the knack of putting them at their ease and making them feel they were appreciated. He could move among a group of persons in such a way that each individual felt singled out for special attention.

On this occasion he was working well up to his record for general and particular socialness, as he patted the young fellows on their shoulders, squeezed the hands of the older men in a confidential grip and hailed the girls by their Christian names.

The Negro porter of the "Columbia" brushed past, sweating and smiling. He was carrying an armload of parcels.

"It's well youse has got a section to you self, Boss, else we wouldn't find storage," he remarked.

Presently the circle pressing close around Kennedy opened up to make way for a man with a field camera. He was photographer for the Echo, wishing to get a picture of the "send off" for the next illustrated weekly edition. Would Mr. Kennedy be good enough to stand on the steps of the Pullman for a moment, while he grouped the friends on the platform?

"Blow your picture!" exclaimed Kennedy. "I don't want to turn this little family affair into a publicity stunt."

"No escape, Mr. Kennedy, I assure you! I've taken a couple of shots already. There'll be a picture, in any case, but it may not be satisfactory unless you pose for me."

"Oh, Mr. Kennedy, please!" shouted half a dozen girls together. "It will be a lovely little souvenir. We all want to be in it."

He felt forced to yield and a few moments later the photographer bowed his thanks, smiled, and wished him a happy holiday.

III

As Kennedy stepped down again onto the platform, a middle-aged lady came forward, asking if she might speak with him a moment.

"You don't know me," she said, "though I've been an occasional attendant at your Sunday evening services of late. I'm staying in Toronto for a while, but my home is in Vancouver. My name is Mrs. Silcox."

Kennedy smiled and lifted his hat.

"I believe I saw you last Sunday evening. Did you sit just on my right, the third or fourth row from the front?"

"Yes, I did. I wanted to say that I have a niece here, lately out from England, who is leaving for Vancouver by this train. She'll be in the "Columbia." Her name is Margaret Pearson. May I introduce her?"

"I shall be delighted to meet her," said Kennedy briskly. "I'm going as far as Calgary on the main line, and I'll see she's well looked after up to that point."

"Thank you so much! It is kind of you. She's going out to join her father. We were intending to make the trip together, but I shall be detained in Toronto for another fortnight and her father is urging her to hurry out.

Presently Kennedy found himself looking into a pair of clear, hazel eyes and listening to a voice of pure music.

"I begged Aunt not to trouble you, but she would have her own way. Please don't let me keep you from your friends!"

"Mrs. Silcox has done me a real favor, I can assure you," replied Kennedy. "Were you not at church along with Mrs. Silcox last Sunday evening?"

"Yes."

He noted the pleasing oval of well browned cheek which she presented for her aunt's kiss, and the delicately curved lips with which she gave her response. He marked how neat her figure looked, dressed for traveling comfort in a costume of navy blue. He felt convinced that he would not be bored on the way to Calgary.

As Margaret Pearson entered the "Columbia" she was the subject of many critical glances.

The conductor was now calling out, "Board! Board!" and warning non-passengers to stand clear. Kennedy mounted the steps of the Pullman, and there was a lusty outbreak of voices singing, "For he's a jolly good fellow," accompanied by the waving of half a hundred handkerchiefs. Kennedy waved his own handkerchief for a moment, then thrusting it into his pocket, touched his fingers to his lips and extended his arms in all-inclusive adieus until the train swept him from sight.

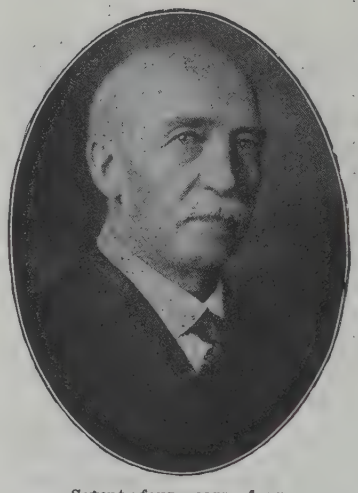
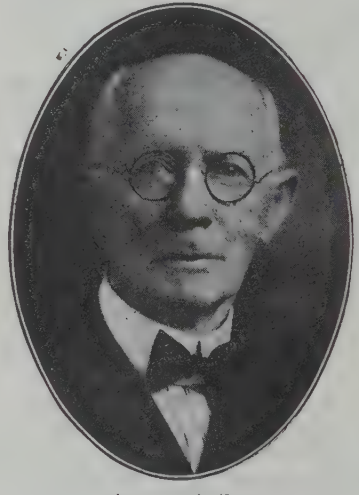
Searching for the Right Christmas Gift



Seventy-four years of age.
Forty years in the ministry. A noble example of Christian manhood; greatly beloved; caring for an invalid wife; seeking to make the ends meet by keeping bees and chickens.



Age seventy-three.
Health shattered by an accident while helping to build a church. Compelled to leave the ministry and support himself by manual labor.

OFTEN we look long to find a gift for some loved one and then wonder if what we choose is really wanted. You never need doubt that your gift to the Christmas Fund will bring happiness to the recipient.

—"We could scarcely believe we read the figures aright. The check will provide for many pressing necessities. We are having a very cold winter. The last two days it has been between twenty and thirty degrees below zero and the coal melts away like snow."

—"The generous Christmas check paid the doctor's bill and some other debts and provided what I have not had for fifteen years, a new, warm coat. May our Father bless the givers!"

Your Christmas Remembrance is the quickest way to lift the meager pensions. For several years the gift has averaged $40. We would like to make it $50. It would take $7,500 to make the increase.

A noble Christmas Emergency Fund came from the overflowing gifts last year. It carried the spirit of Christmas through 1925, eased the burden of households stricken with sickness or death and gave a lift over other hard places for which the pensions were utterly inadequate. It can be maintained next year only as gifts at this Christmastide match those of 1924.

The Editorial Outlook

ilgrim Place in Claremont, California

THE National Council did wisely in endorsing the organization in Claremont, California, which is providing homes for our ministers and workers, both home and oreign, who are in need of a place for recuperation, or omfortable retirement. In these days of expensive living and very modest incomes for Christian workers, Pilrim Place seems destined to give a much needed service.

piritual Adventures of Modern Youth

WHILE some of us are worried or alarmed over the swift-moving adventurous youth of our times, it may e a comfort to note that youth is seeking new adventures in idealism. Mr. Harrison's article in this isue gives us some glimpses of adventures in co-operative ood will and international friendship among the young eople of many nations around the world. Are not hese youthful idealists leading the way in the right irections? We believe they are, and that they deserve ncouragement and help. It was a great night at the ord Hall Forum in Boston, Nov. 22, when Mr. Harison told his story with eloquent earnestness, and when, he same night, young James Waterman Wise, son of abbi Stephen S. Wise, and himself soon to be a rabbi, poke on "The Religious Spirit and Modern Youth." hristian and Jew, these young men were one in spirit nd purpose and revealed the essential unity of the eligion which each seeks to express. Mr. Wise said hat modern youth, as he knows it, has a deeply religious pirit, but that it is less dogmatic, less interested in ect and forms than in the spiritual force applied to he problems of life, the problems of social welfare, industrial relations, peace and international brotherhood. Mr. Wise is a remarkable personality, earnest, eloquent, and brotherly.

"Kennedy's Second Best"

JOHN FREEMAN'S remarkable story, Kennedy's Second Best, starts in this issue and will continue every week until it is finished. Our readers will find it a story of absorbing interest and well worth while. After seeking for many years a story good enough to satisfy the readers of The Congregationalist which we could publish as a serial, we are pleased indeed that at last our quest has been successful. In Honor of William Tyndale

THE example of New York ministers and laymen in planning to emphasize upon Bible Sunday, Dec. 6, the great work of William Tyndale, and the four hundredth anniversary of his translation of the New Testament into English, might well be emulated everywhere throughout the country. At a representative gathering held recently under the auspices of the New York Bible Society resolutions to this effect were unanimously adopted.

These resolutions also commended a proposal of the New York Bible Society to circulate one hundred thousand English New Testaments as a tribute to the memory of William Tyndale and recommended that through public spirited individuals a statue or suitable monument to William Tyndale be erected in New York.

Some Clear Conclusions

IN view of the fact that certain misunderstandings and conflicts that arose in the Boston area in connection with the Armistice Day celebration are typical of misunderstandings that may occur in other parts of the country, it seems fitting that a few outstanding conclusions that have been enforced by these happenings near at hand should be stated in The Congregationalist. The first is that no group of men more deeply and sincerely honors those who have served and suffered or is more truly concerned about the fulfillment of the nation's full obligation to them and to their families than are the various groups earnestly working for the establishment of peaceful ideals and of international peace through the promotion of good will. In the second place, there must be the clearest recognition that the purposes for which the war was fought, as they overshadowed every personal consideration during the days of actual conflict, must continue to be regarded as larger than the interests of any group or organization. We must truly honor those who suffered and died by carrying on the ideals and institutions that they suffered to maintain. And the last clear consideration is that no group, especially in the thoughtless disparagement of the peace movement by any of its leaders or members, can presume to speak for the entire company of those who served and suffered in the great war. All the veterans' organizations in their combined membership, it should be remembered, represent a minority of the men who served, and it should further be remembered that many of those who gave the most signal service and who made the greatest sacrifices are now strongly in support of peace organizations of every type. Even the ultra-Pacifist organizations include in their membership many who gave military service in army and navy during the war.

In a letter to the Boston Herald, following the Armistice Day parade and the dissensions in connection with it, Albion R. King, Post Chaplain of Post 61, American Legion, states an important fact very effectively:

> And I want to add my word as a member of the American Legion in protest against the impression that the opposition exhibited was representative of the general feeling among service men. I believe it to be only the result of an emotional complex on the part of a few, who refused to face the logic of facts, which has always been a part of the insanity of war.

Nothing could be more unfortunte than that there should arise any extensive or permanent cleavage in this country between those who fought to secure peace and those who, according to their reasonable convictions, are concerned with the great task of fulfilling by peace methods the purposes for which the war was fought; namely, the ending of war and the establishing of permanent comity of good will between nations.

A recognition of these three considerations, all of them amply established by recent events, will do much to prevent misunderstandings and to create the mutual respect which every group of sincere and earnest men, no matter what their opinions and convictions, ought to have for every other group of similar sincerity. And it becomes more and more the profound duty of men who believe in largeness of view and in magnanimity of spirit to safeguard our organizations and institutions, and above all to safeguard the sacredness of patriotism itself against the narrowness and possibly the selfis designs of those who have not been unwilling, as histor amply has shown in every age, to exploit the most sacre institutions and causes for ends of personal ambitio

"Ruth" and the New Youth

WE shall be surprised if wide attention is not at tracted to a little book just issued by th Macmillan Company, which, in its 130 pages discusse with great frankness the extent, nature, and effec of the general letting down of moral standards on th part of young women and particularly of young colleg women. The book is entitled Ruth Talks It Over, an it is by "Junius Vincent"; but both "Ruth" and "Juniu Vincent" are admittedly mere names to conceal th identity of the author and of the young woman, the con versations with whom provide the material of the book

The whole discussion is from a somewhat unusua standpoint in the freedom and frankness of its approac to all the issues and in the suggestion of underlying con fidence between the young woman and her mentor. Th author is evidently some one active and prominent i the field of American education, possibly a teacher o psychology. "Ruth" is a somewhat unusual young woma intended manifestly to typify the group or "gang" t to which she belongs. It is a little difficult to believ that one girl should so completely combine in her per sonality such typical things, and especially that so muc apparent sagacity and good spirit should be combine with such feebleness of vision. At least one might expec a sagacious girl to see for herself some of the thing that her friend and instructor is at pains to point out One has a feeling that possibly "Ruth" may be a sor of composite character, but there can be little doubt tha she is fairly typical. Some months ago we should hav questioned this fact very seriously, but the revelations o the mother of a senior in one of the most notable o women's colleges confirms the fact that "Ruth" typifie a great section of young American college women.

The general attitude toward life of "Ruth" and he "gang" is founded on the assumption that to get "thrills" is the chief aim of existence. The conventions and re straints that have safeguarded young people in the mat ter of thrills are regarded as old-fogy things, and th young women who still in some measure recognize suc conventions and restraints are looked upon as "sad eggs" who are deriving little pleasure or satisfaction fro life. The thrills which "Ruth's" "gang" seeks are asso ciated with rather a general letting down in relation with their boy friends, with unusual adventures wit osculation, "necking," and "petting," and even mor serious moral laxity. In fact it is suggested that in th "gang's" outlook there is no such thing as a rigid, de fensible standard of sexual morality. Associated wit this general moral laxity is indulgence in alcohol t which a chapter is devoted under the title, "I am Quee of the World," an expression which "Ruth" herself ha used to describe an experience of intoxication. A cha ter also is devoted to smoking among women.

The interest in this book centers very largely in th standpoint from which the man of the conversation, ev dently a middle-aged teacher, very sensible, very sym pathetic, very free and frank, and unready to be shocke ut likewise with plenty of good moral ballast, discusses hese things. The discussions come quickly to this ques- ion of "thrills," whether lawless emotion can be a safe uide in life, and whether there is anything necessarily ither dangerous or disadvantageous in the repressing f emotion. The discussion is exceedingly sane, and here is a suggestion that "Ruth" has been deeply and favorably influenced by the conversations. "Ruth's" mentor meets her very largely upon her own ground. He challenges the assumption upon which the letting down f moral standards rests. He speaks, for instance, upon he Freudian psychology and remarks upon the way it as been applied. He points out that "if the popular Freudian conception were true, there would be hardly a ane man or woman in the world today among civilized eoples." From the standpoint of good psychology and good biology, he further challenges the assumption of the oung woman who is determined to live life in her own way regardless of higher standards and deeper obliga- ions, and he cites some very telling facts and arguments o indicate how different are the actual consequences rom the goal of satisfaction that lax standards are sup- osed to make attainable.

Ruth Talks it Over might very safely and wisely be laced in the hands of young college women or of any oung women. It would provide very interesting sub- ect matter for discussion between mothers and daughters, nd might be used advantageously in class discussions.

The one defect of the book from our standpoint is hat it does not seem to strike quite deep enough in the natter of moral foundations. It may be correct to point ut that sound psychology and sound biology are largely pon the side of Christian morality and even uphold in arge measure the conventions that have become socially stablished out of practical experience. But suppose a oung person should become convinced that the dictates f science point otherwise, is the matter necessarily settled? We question it. There will be found to be in all human relationships factors that go beyond mere scientific adjustment and the right of an individual to live his own life as he wishes. There are obligations that root deeply in moral and spiritual instincts that cannot always be carefully defined, and that possibly cannot always be specifically defended but that, none the less, have an overwhelming sanction for the thoughtful man or woman and that are not lightly to be set aside by a young man or woman of character and courage. Such instances could be cited again and again. There is the young man or young woman bound by family obligations that could be flouted only through weakness and cowardice. The sacrificial factor in a true life under such circumstances is unavoidable. In other relationships of home and married life also there are problems that cannot be settled on the basis of mere scientific adjustment. Psychology and biology must often be disregarded under the imperative demand of moral, spiritual, and social obligation. The writer of the book probably recognizes this fully, though the ultimately sacrificial basis of true character is not emphasized quite as vitally in the book as it might be. Has not this factor in history been of the deepest moral effect in the life of youth? Youth has passionately responded to the appeal to cast everything aside in the service of great causes and in loyalty to lofty ideals. This proverbially, notoriously, is the spirit of youth. Coolness of argument and the creation of an atmosphere of sanity may do much to stem the tide of moral laxity and set the feet of youth along saner, safer, nobler paths, but, after all, the hope of the full and ultimate salvation of youth lies largely along the line of developing fire and inspiration.

To the lofty, able, and largely convincing conversations of this book, one would like to add that great penetrative saying of Sir John Seeley in Ecce Homo that "no virtue is safe that is not passionate."

Failures of Liberalism

A Contributed Editorial by Irving Maurer, LL.D.

President of Beloit College

ONE of the rules of homiletical strategy which is most often violated is the rule of the hard word. We preachers are more successful in our priestly function of interpreting people to God and to themselves than we are in our prophetic function of interpreting God to them. It is with the desire to observe this rule of the hard word, that I, a liberal, say a word about the failures of liberalism.

One of the failures of liberalism is the failure to say the positive word. We are adepts at restatement and negation. We are often more expert in showing why Fundamentalism is unvital than we are in showing what is vital. We have had a lot of restating to do. It has taken us some fifty years to restate the value of the Bible. But we have done this so unskillfully that unlearned, plain people gain from what we say the idea that we do not believe the Bible at all. Shall we simply blame them for their dullness or shall we not, rather, search in our own hearts for the poor pedagogy employed? We have had some fifty years of the New Theology, but where is there the quadrilateral of liberal faith to compare in definiteness and clarity with the quadrilateral of Fundamentalism? We have just as definite things to state, but we have spent most of our time showing why we do not believe the things which an orthodox body deems essential.

Another of our failures as liberals is the failure to develop the technique of a devotional life. Please do not understand me to say that liberals are not devotional. But rational procedure is inhibitive of sensational experience. The flush of a religious experience becomes sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought. For many of us an excursion into the newer psychology has the effect on the beauty of a devotional life that a botanical analysis of a flower has on its beauty. We are apt to become careless in our personal meditation and prayer life. Daily Bible readings, which can be like daily walks in a flower garden, are easily dropped away. And we ignore the time element in our literature. Representatives of a restless quarrel with form and ritual, we lose contact with phrases and forms of religious devotion which have been mellowed with the ages. Instead of continuing the aggressive attack upon older, fixed, crystallized forms, we ought to be developing a devotional literature of our own, a literature which itself bears a stamp of maturity. But to do this there must be reverence, a touch of mystical insight, a hunger for God, a longing for immediate communion with God. This is very important, for out of this will come to us the positive faith which will help us recreate Christianity for its destined task of leadership in modern life.

There has been an attempt to furnish literature for worship, but much of it is crude and unlettered in the devotional amenities. There is one book of responsive readings which asks that worshipers read together as a vehicle of religious experience words uttered by contemporary personalities, men who have been centers of bitterness and controversy. If liberal hymn books and prayer books and worship forms are to be secured they must be written with a better understanding of the psychology of worship than this. And what an opportunity for our liberal Christians, to phrase our vital, deeply-felt convictions about Jesus and his Saviorhood and God and human life in prayer and hymn and anthem and a Scriptural ritual!

Another failure which these words just written suggest is the failure of liberals in Biblical preaching. Many liberal preachers will use a text, but they seldom develop it. I believe profoundly that liberal Christianity has in its hands the task of a redevelopment of the prophet in religion. But such a prophetic task will have to be performed in a church which in its orthodoxy has a wrongly-emphasized but, none the less, a vital and true sense of the importance of the Bible. The thing for modern liberal preachers to do, above all other things, is to become Biblical preachers. For a liberal approach to the Bible strips it of the unreal claims made for it as a text book in science or history and reveals its true worth as the literature of humanity's experience of a righteous God, whom to know involves commitment to a definite moral endeavor to make the world his Kingdom. The greatest failure, I believe, in liberal preaching, is the over-emphasis of the topical sermon, wherein we preachers have displayed our ignorance of modern fields of knowledge, neglecting all the while to emphasize an authoritative command of Bible literature. It is not that such topics as those we preach about should be ignored, but that we preachers could best approach them from the standpoint of a knowledge of the moral problems involved and of the moral principles on the basis of which these problems have been solved in the Bible.

Biblical preaching, on the part of a literalist, becomes intellectually offensive to thinking men. But Biblical preaching on the part of a trained Bible student (and who that cannot claim to be a Bible student has a right to preach?) can be the greatest spiritual leverage which liberal Christianity can use to call the world back to God.

Another failure of a modern liberalism in many of its professed adherents is the failure to be thoroughly and completely liberal. Liberalism, as I understand it, is the effort to center in the spiritual realities of Jesus, to approach life from his point of view, to live life with his spirit. The trouble with us is that, to find out about Jesus, to discover the heart of his teaching, we have had to clear away a lot of unrealities which have grown up about him. Many of us are content, now that this more or less intellectual task is done. There are hosts of intellectual liberals who are glad that orthodox Christianity is restated, yet who wish the social, economic, political structure which an orthodox Christianity helped to form to be untouched. These fail to see that it was our sense of the unreality of much of our established life which led to our interest in a revitalizing of the essential truth of Jesus' teaching. They fail to see that the quarrel with orthodox Christianity was that it emphasized unethical theories of personal salvation and neglected the ethical implications of the social salvation of Jesus. And yet we have thousands of so-called liberals today who, having effected an intellectual unity between modern science and Christianity, are not in the least interested in a closer application of the spirit of Jesus to life in a modern world.

And this is the most disheartening of failures for liberal Christianity. It was a searching protagonist of Fundamentalism who stated that a liberal Christianity would inevitably mean a new social order. I think he was absolutely right and I prophesy that we shall face a realignment, and that many so-called liberal Christians realizing at last that liberal Christianity can never rest content simply with intellectual restatement of Christian dogma, but must press on to a reincarnation, in modern industry and politics, of Jesus' spirit of life, will go back to a more intellectually orthodox and ethically complacent type of religious faith. I hope that this realignment will come, for only when it will come, will liberalism finally arrive. Fundamentalism and social conservatism are twin-brothers; liberalism and social and political progressivism walk together.

Well, I might go on. I close with a suggestion which I shall treat of in a later paper, namely, that we liberals are failing in Christian saintliness. Do not conclude that such failure is solely our portion as liberals. But we are trying with all our might, we liberals, to understand a modern world—we see its lack but we believe in it tremendously. Sometimes I think that we believe in it too much. There ought, for genuine religious leadership, to be an element of isolation, of detachedness, so that we can see things objectively. Here we liberals are losing out. We speak the latest language, and wear the latest cut of clothes. We must learn to suffer, we must bear the stigmata of a personal commitment, but like Fleur Forsyte, in The White Monkey, we hesitate taking up the cross because we wish to be kept free.

I close here. Let no orthodox Christian take too much comfort. Despite this confession of things undone and wrong things done, I am a liberal—it is liberalism which bears the hope of religion for the future. Our task is to change our intellectual analyses of humanity into a pulsing, passionate religion, so that our amazing enlargement of knowledge of an actual world will ever be played upon with the roseate light of the better world of the spirit that is to be.

The Author of In His Steps

Dr. Charles M. Sheldon Tells His Life Story *

A Review by the Editor

T would have been fitting if I had asked some intimate friend of Charles M. Shel-n to review his autobiography, but I have elcomed an opportunity to pay a just debt tribute and obligation. I have known n only as the author of In His Steps, but that capacity I came to know him early d under unusual circumstances.

When that famous book, which has now ained a circulation of twenty-two mil-n copies, first appeared, I had just left lege to begin my ministry far off in the ckwoods, forty miles from the nearest rail-y and with a territory of some two hun-ed square miles all my own in that neck of nd, a sort of inverted Italy, that stretches as a great boot between the Georgian Bay d Lake Huron. It was here among the ckwoodsmen, fisher folk, lumbering, and v-milling people, away back in 1897, that re came to me a little paper-bound copy Dr. Sheldon's story. I shall never forget thrill with which I read its first chapter. read through to the end and I can re-mber few things that have ever affected more deeply. It shook all thought of monizing for the following Sunday out my mind. I could do nothing but share h my people the thrill and enthusiasm ckened by that dramatic chapter. I took with me Sunday morning and read it to people. I read it again at the afternoon vice to a little group of farmers in a way-e school house, and in the evening to a npany of mill hands in the saw-milling mmunity of Pine Tree Harbor. The effect each of these meetings was electric; one ld feel a thrill of interest and emotion ving in the hearts of these little groups, I I attributed much of the influence of s year of backwoods preaching to the way which Dr. Sheldon's story, of which I er secured a number of copies for cir-ation, had centered the thoughts of my ple upon the underlying question of the aning of religion in daily life, and the lowing of the example of the Master.

confess that I have never read In His ps since that year. I have always been aid lest, with the development of critical lgment, I might find that chapter, which ved me so greatly, lessened in its literary ect. Not that I question Dr. Sheldon's rary power, but simply from a feeling t possibly I had read in a mood of un-al exaltation, and I feared to have any pression that might in any way minimize memory of that high experience. But v, in taking up Dr. Sheldon's autobi-aphy, however, I have been interested discover that his opening pages produce ch the same impression made years ago the first chapter of In His Steps. The ture, with which he begins, of his home ssionary father at the bottom of a fifty-e foot well, and of the rejoicing when he and his brother had pulled up the first bucket of blue clay, moist and heavy, is a piece of vivid writing, rich in its immediate interest and in its symbolism, and never to be forgotten. The exultation of these boys, who for more than two years had hauled all the water for the household needs for two miles over the Dakota prairie, is graphically portrayed, and there is a thrill of tragedy in the story of the breaking of the bucket's bale and its falling the long distance into the well while joy turned to terror in the boys' sudden realization, "Father is killed." Fortunately the sixty pound bucket with its burden had simply knocked off the hat of the noble missionary. But there is a touch of quiet power in the description of how they drew their father up from the well, and how in response to the question of the mother, who had sensed something unusual, "What is the matter?", he had remarked, "There is nothing the matter, Sarah, but I think the boys are a little shaken and we will stop work for a while." Then as they retired to the house and the father told of the accident, the mother's voice broke the stillness as she said softly, "Stewart, I feel like thanking the Father." The prayer of father and mother in that hour of subdued thankfulness was typical of the atmosphere in which Charles M. Sheldon was brought up. There could be few more thrilling representations of the environment of a pioneer Congregational missionary, which to the eye that lacked faith and vision might have seemed only deadly dull and drab.

In the midst of the gloomy accounts that men who have come to larger and broader ways of thinking have often given of their early religious environment and training, it is worth while to read Dr. Sheldon's powerful description of his early home life, and of the influences upon him of the family altar. In a day when the sense of family religion is weakening and when there is little of the sense of holiness, or of sanctuary, in the deep relationships of home life, of joy and sorrow, it is worth while to read these words of Dr. Sheldon:

> As time went on, that end of the log house called the "parlor," where we had family prayers, became to my boyish mind a holy of holies. It is yet. It always will be. It was the one period of the day on that homestead farm out on that solitary prairie that seemed set part for communion with the mysterious and the divine side of life. It was the consecrated end of the house where we met in times of trouble or danger, where the little sister lay in the coffin we had made with our own hands before we carried it out to the grave under the small cottonwoods which we had planted, remote from doctors and undertakers, our family circle and two neighbors from a distance the only mourners present. And I am quite certain that the passage of the years has not dimmed nor lessened my faith in the power of that family altar, for it has been the source of whatever inspiration for divine and mysterious other world visions I have ever since entertained.

I dwell upon this early portion of the book because in a sense it is a key to the whole, and because, though the entire autobiography is readable and full of interest, there is nothing that quite touches the glory of these early pages.

There is throughout the privilege of contact with a genial, lovable, modest, and thoroughly consecrated man. There is a touch of naivété about Dr. Sheldon that is delightful, and the immense success of his books has not in any way affected either the disinterestedness of his outlook or the simplicity of his ideals. His book is the record of the gracious ministry of a man who seems almost unconscious of his own uniqueness and originality. If we are not mistaken some pages of Dr. Sheldon's record will prove suggestive for the pastor of today. Much of the secret of his success and influence seems to us to lie in the evidences of his resourcefulness.

In addition to his descriptions of his ministries in Vermont and in Kansas, Dr. Sheldon has interesting chapters on his week's experiment in conducting a Christian daily, and his larger ministry in the Christian Church, and in the service of progressive causes.

A most interesting chapter tells the story of the Flying Squadron, and of Dr. Sheldon's service with that group in the cause of national prohibition. There is much in that chapter that one would like to quote. He gives a damning picture of the waste of good grain in the making of beer in Britain at the very time when that nation was in the thick of the war and hard pressed for food. When men talk about interference with personal liberty in America it is worth while to turn to Dr. Sheldon's statement on page 191 regarding a prohibition farmer in Northumberland who was arrested and fined for feeding his barley to his pigs instead of selling it to the brewers. The farmer declared that the army needed pork more than beer, but he was none the less penalized under the English law which compelled the English farmer to sell the first grade barley to the brewers and keep out the second grade for bread.

Dr. Sheldon tells of the strong representations which he was urged to make to the American authorities by Sir George Hunter, the great ship builder of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and he suggests that possibly these representations may have had something to do with the fact that much of the grain that later in the war was sent to Great Britain from America was sent in the form of flour.

One recalls in connection with this portion of Dr. Sheldon's story the fact that Arthur Mee's book, The Fiddlers, which set forth the simple facts in connection with this matter, was prohibited in Canada during the war, a penalty of $5,000 being attached to the possession of a copy. When criticism is expressed concerning prohibition it is well to bear in mind the tyranny of which the

Grace from the Infinite

A Sermon by George A. Gordon, D.D.

Minister of Old South Church, Boston

"But ye shall receive power, when the Holy Spirit is come upon you."—Acts 1: 8.

WATCHING the tidal river near which I have passed my summers for many years, I have observed that the river gets its increase, its swollen volume, its breadth, depth, magnificence, and beauty from the sea, the infinite sea. The tidal return upon the river which of itself is a mere thread is the source of the river's greatness. The Apostle says, "By grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God." Our equipment for character, service, moral struggle, moral victory, patience, and hope comes from beyond ourselves; it is the invading power of God that qualifies for life. "Ye shall receive power when the Holy Spirit is come upon you." That is Christianity.

Epicurism, always a popular faith whether in its refined form or its unrefined forms, is the religion of self-indulgence, in thought, in feeling, and in purpose; it is ignoble. Stoicism, stern and grand, is the religion of man standing in the strength of his humanity against the whole adversity of the world. Stoicism is the religion of self-deliverance, heroic always, but, as we know, tragically unavailing. Christianity is the religion of life's salvation, life's glorification through the grace of the Infinite. Man by himself is like that tidal river, a mere thread. As the poet Samuel Daniel said,

> Unless above himself he can
> Erect himself, how poor a thing is man.

Christianity and Judaism are at one here. Judaism sings:

> God is our refuge and strength.
> The eternal God is thy dwelling-place,
> And underneath are the everlasting arms.

That is Judaism at its highest; it is Christianity as represented by the text, "Ye shall receive power, when the Holy Spirit is come upón you"; the transfusion of God through human experience; that is Judaism; that is Christianity, at a different level.

1. Our first problem is the problem of personal character; until that is settled we cannot move in the kingdom of freedom or the kingdom of worth. To attain, or to preserve, or to increase and conservate personal integrity, that is our first problem; a righteous life inside and outside, that comes first. How can this be achieved in an environment crowded with base appeal? Every young person who goes out is the target for a thousand arrows. Every man at every period of life is in jeopardy of his character every hour. How shall we maintain, supposing we have it, our integrity in such an environment? Follow the Master who had to go through his trial, and who was led by the Spirit of God into his trial. He must first pass through his temptation, in order to understand man's world, for it is shot through and through with the reality of trial, and he must have his integrity tested and vindicated before he can take a step in the moral service of the world; and in order that he may gain a universal message to mankind, he must not only enter temptation but must pass through it triumphantly. This he did because he was led and accompanied by the Spirit and because he was the instrument of the Spirit at every stage of the trial.

There was the appeal to the appetites of Jesus. "Command that these stones become bread"; there was the economic temptation. No man can measure the amount of evil that comes into the world on the economic level of life and through economic pressure. Then there was the appeal subtler, less coarse, to audacity in a good cause, to recklessness, to sensationalism, "Cast thyself down: for it is written, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee,"—your God will take care of you; violate all the law that you choose, he will take care of you. The subtlety of that temptation you can see, and if it succeeds, the fatality. And finally, subtler still and more tremendous to a great soul, there was the appeal to the love of power, which passes so easily into love of unmoral power,—"Worship me," the symbol of unmoral power, of ruthlessness, "and all the kingdoms of the world shall be thine." Jesus went in the power, the illumination, the motivity, the guidance, the power of the Spirit, to his trial; he went through it, and he came out of it singing, every fiber of his being the mouth of a song, his whole manhood organized through personal victory, a vindicated moral being, prepared for a divine service to the world.

How shall you go? Follow the Master. Temptations cannot touch you if you go in the power of the Spirit of God. No man ever lost his soul,—or his integrity, if you prefer that word,—when he went forth as the instrument of the Mind and Heart of God.

2. Our second problem is that of our duty toward our fellowmen. We see vice everywhere, crime rampant everywhere, every form of wrong, life misdirected, life wasted, the youth of the world largely immolated to a Moloch, and we ask what is our duty, what contribution can we make to avert that and to heal the terrible wound that evil has made in the life of human society. And we may well ask with the Apostle, "Who is sufficient for these things," who can hope to do any good in a world so vice-ridden and crime-ridden? And with the same Apostle we may reply, "Our sufficiency is of God." Heroic old Luther, world-shaker that he was, looking upon the world of his time, described it as "with demons filled." We are not so badly off as that. To him this world was filled with demons; did that bring dismay to his courageous Teutonic heart? Not in the least. His faith broke into lyrics, and here is one of the greatest of them:

> A mighty fortress is our God,
> A bulwark never failing;
> Our helper He, amid the flood
> Of mortal ills prevailing.
> For still our ancient foe
> Doth seek to work us woe;
> His craft and pow'r are great,
> And, arm'd with cruel hate,
> On earth is not his equal.
> Did we in our own strength confide,
> Our striving would be losing;
> Were not the right man on our side,
> The man of God's own choosing.
> Dost ask who that may be?
> Christ Jesus, it is He;
> Lord Sabaoth is His name,
> From age to age the same,
> And He must win the battle.

There is the faith that made Luther invincible, that put the lightning and th thunder of truth into every word that h spoke and left him calm in any and ever apparent defeat. Paul looked upon th Roman Empire of his time and saw that i was a world lying in wickedness. Did tha dismay him? Not at all. His cry was, " am not ashamed of the gospel: for it is th power of God unto salvation to every one who opens his life to it.

If we have no message from the Heart o the Universe, no authentic tidings from th Being who made us, of course we shall des pair; but if we have the right man and th right God on our side, the immemorial invin cibility of the prophets of Christianity an of the disciples and servants of the Lor may be ours. Greater is He that is wit you than he that is against you. That i Christianity. The moment you say, Greate is he that is against me than He that i with me, you have sold your faith, if yo ever had any. There is the turning poin

3. Our third problem is the problem o human suffering. Some have less of this others have more of it, all must pass thi way before the day is done. How shall w meet this perhaps sorest of all human trials suffering, bodily suffering, mental, mora any kind of suffering? It has often seeme to me that pain of any kind is the weighties of all the mysteries in the life of man, an of course we cannot meet it in our ow strength; that has never been successfull done in the history of man; if our Christ anity is merely nominal, if it is merely ec clesiastical, dogmatic, external, howeve honorable, it will be of no avail face t face with the acute and tremendous prob lem of suffering. Only as the God of a Comfort and the Father of all Mercies, ou refuge and our strength, only as he is tran fused with human experience and become our illumination, our love, our purpose, ou peace, can we overcome this tremendou form of human trial. Then indeed, whe there is a perpetual transfusion of God hin self into the storm of our human exper ence, into thought, affection, and purpos then only do we rise, like the migrati bird, above all the obstacles in the way roads, rivers, hills, and mountains, abo clouds and storms, and go in light, in safet and in peace to our goal. It was a gre sufferer who said:

> I reckon that the sufferings of this prese time are not worthy to be compared wi the glory that shall be revealed in us.
> While we look not at the things whi are seen, but at the things which are n seen: for the things which are seen are tem poral: but the things which are not seen a eternal.

When Eternity becomes the infinite good, t nfinite God and home of all souls, and when hat is pressed into the life-blood of the uman spirit, time becomes, as it became vith Plato four hundred years before Christ, trivial affair and even at its worst is hen easily discounted.

4. Consider now our last problem, the nd. To you who are young the end seems long way off, but like the feet of a pur-uer, a ruthless pursuer, it is steadily, teadily gaining upon you. Hear the words poken at the end by an old Scottish jester, amous in the generation before mine for is wit, his humor, notwithstanding the act that he was intellectually undeveloped; sten to his last confession and prayer. ooking up in that last hour, he said, "I m a Christian. Do not bury me like a east." He left no money for the realiza-ion of his prayer, he had no relatives who ould pay any attention to it, but the con-ession and the prayer ran like lightning hrough the whole County of Aberdeen; a ubscription was started, and one of the nest monuments in the parish graveyard here he was buried was raised to this umble man, in recognition of his confes-ion, "I am a Christian," and in answer to is prayer, "Do not bury me like a beast." here is human nature analyzed in its ulti-ate weakness as accountability to God, as pirit, as the capacity for a life of perfect delity and a life of sovereign love; man is pirit capable of everlasting fellowship with he Absolute Spirit.

From the Greek philosophers down, all houghtful men have emphasized what was istinctive and indestructible in the human-y of man, his spirit speaking to the ulti-ate Reality in the Universe, spoken to y that ultimate Reality, and able to join ands in an eternal fellowship with that ltimate Reality. I recall that Dr. Munger New Haven was on one occasion met by group of young ministers and this ques-on was put to him, "Now that you are earing the end, do you believe in the im-ortality of the human soul as you did hen you were young?" He turned to his uestioner, and with the utmost solemnity id with glory in his countenance, said, believe with all my heart in God, the finite Lover of men, and I rest my destiny his hands." There were no more words poken. There was the grace of the Infinite. How many of us have been trying to hittle ourselves into shape, or to reach at end by any tool that came along. That ethod may be laudable but it is not Chris-anity. Christianity brings to bear upon e individual life the grace of the eternal od, and this grace from the Infinite is ost impressive, most moving and most eautiful at life's end. I have seen in my tive country a day of wind and cloud, st masses of cloud driven by the hurri-ne force of wind, and against this deep lume of darkness the light of the sun one almost in vain, the day was almost the shadow of night; but when evening me the persistent, undiscouraged, invin-ble sun made gain, and before he left the orld he burned those massive black clouds to ineffable splendor and glorified the hole blackness with his character before he went his way. That is a symbol of Christianity. Our goodness, our faith, our peace, our spiritual moods, the light in the clouds, the splendor in the darkness of our life are not of ourselves but are from the Being of the Eternal God who, at our weakest, when we can only lie and wait for the last breath to be drawn, transforms our whole dark life into beauty and infinite peace.

May I ask you to remember one thought from this discourse,—that Christianity is grace from the Infinite? "The Lord is my light and my salvation." So said the Jew at his highest; I hope he says it today. And Jesus said before he departed, "Ye shall receive power, when the Holy Spirit is come upon you," that is, when God by his Spirit invades your human life.

PRAYER AT CLOSE OF SERVICE

Infinite Father, we pray for thy blessing upon us before we go our several ways back into the world with its care, its trial, its evil, and its good; and our prayer above all things else is for this attitude of mind toward thee, —that all saving grace, all transforming power, all might, comes by the path of thy Spirit into our spirit. Make thy Spirit moral insight, moral illumination, moral judgment in our thought, make thy Spirit high and sacred affection in our feeling, through love for everything which thou hast made. Grant us a benedictive heart, a heart that insistently invokes upon all thy children the grace and protection of the Most High. Let thy Spirit become the sovereign purpose in us so that henceforth we shall not be broken and trod underfoot by a wicked order, by a wicked world, but that henceforth we shall come off conquerors and more than conquerors through him that loved us.

And may the grace of Our Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God and the communion of the Holy Spirit be with us all evermore. Amen.

friends of the liquor traffic are capable, in defense of their selfish interests.

Is not Dr. Sheldon right also in his statement of the underlying explanation of the passing of the national prohibitory law? He says concerning those who wondered that a nation could in such a short time by popular vote and by deliberate act adopt such a measure:

They did not realize the deep and passionate conviction in the breast of the common people of this country that the liquor traffic had traded away its right to be a part of the business life of the nation on account of its record as a crime and sorrow-producing thing, unworthy to live.

In connection with Dr. Sheldon's prohibition advocacy he tells a very amusing story, an experience with the Flying Squadron in Rochester, N. Y. And with this we close, strongly commending Dr. Sheldon's volume for its interest and for its wholesome record of Christian faith and service. Here is the Rochester incident:

Our meeting [he writes] was in a Baptist church. Dr. D. V. Poling, the uncle of Dan A. Poling, my colleague as speaker in the first division, was our singer. He was late that afternoon in coming on the platform, and when the chairman announced his number he was just entering the church. To avoid passing in front of the people who were seated on the platform Dr. Poling opened a door at the rear of the platform which he supposed opened on a rear platform passage, and stepped into the baptistry which had been left full of water. The chairman being deaf did not hear the splash as Dr. Poling went under, and announced his name again as the singer of the day. But Dan Poling rose to the occasion and announced with great gravity, "Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen, I regret to say that my uncle has joined the 'Wets'!" It should be said for Dr. Poling's reputation for being a "good sport" that after he emerged from his plunge he ran back to the hotel, made a rapid change of garments and appeared again in time to take his place on the program to the delight of the audience.

Dr. Day on Stockholm

Dr. William Horace Day of Bridgeport, Ct., who has achieved added fame of late as chairman of the Committee of Twelve on Missionary Reorganization, stirred the Boston Congregational Club on Nov. 23 with an inspiring address on the recent international Christian conference on life and work. Dr. Day showed how the desire for catholicity was realized in the conference, how the sense of universality was attained, and how the Christians of many lands and many sects came into a common religious experience. They found liberty in Christ with unity under the authority of a common Lord. And thus the subjects of personal religion, prohibition, industrial justice, social welfare, and war were frankly, often heatedly, discussed, and light came with increased understanding. Singing together in five languages, all addresses repeated or printed in the three languages,—English, French, and German,—friendly personal acquaintance also served to make the Stockholm meeting an advance toward Christian understanding, unity, and reform.

A pleasing musical feature of the evening was the singing by Rev. Alfred W. Stone and his sister, Miss Mildred Stone, of Concord Junction.

The next meeting of the Boston Club will be held on Forefathers' Night, Dec. 21, with an address by Dr. Dan F. Bradley of Cleveland, the Associate Moderator of the National Council.

Peking Sunshine

By Susan Bartlett

I love the evening time, reflection, rest,
Caresses soft and loving words,
Dreams of sweet years to come
When painted ships are real
And the harbor glows with quiet charm.
Contentment, yes, but over all a shadow falls,
I hear without my gate a beggar's moan,
The struggling vender's cry,
Strange feelings stir my breast.
They stagger on, to fail and die
Without one ray of light from year to year.
I cannot sit contentedly and dream. Those sounds
Take off the tinge of joy. Again the Why
Sticks at my heart; belief and zeal are tried.
I gaze through time and pondering go to sleep.

'Tis morn, the sun shines bright and warm,
Who could doubt the world is good!
Laughter's in my heart and I am glad,
For dawn and rested eyes are precious gifts
To bring us hope for each new day.
The tears of yester eve are gone
And faith more strong than was despair
Rules in my soul, I know not why;
I only know the sun is shining.

Gang or Fellowship?

The Youth Movement for Peace

By Thomas Que Harrison

National Field Secretary of the Fellowship of Youth for Peace

THE dramatization of the ideal of peace was attempted in Boston on Armistice Day this year through the means of a pageant and parade. The Red Cross marched, the Salvation Army, the Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A., the League of Jewish Women, and some forty other organizations. Scare headlines in some of the newspapers two days before the parade denounced it as a "red plot." The American Legion and other military organizations (with the exception of the disabled service men, of whom about 100 rode in automobiles) refused to enter the parade. The beauty, dignity, and sincerity of the parade held many thousands of watchers in silent attention, but at the mass meeting on Boston Common afterward, several hundred boys and men, who were (one does the ex-soldiers the justice to believe) mostly street rowdies, attempted to disturb the addresses of the various nationals by disorderly singing and shouting, especially while the German representative spoke, "hailing" themselves boisterously as "the gang." "If we must have peace," their attitude implied, "let it not be with Germany."

Compare with this the story of Heinrich Wetzel, related to me this summer among the dim aisles of Frankfurt Cathedral—Heinrich, being the sole survivor, by virtue of an early wound, of his company: The Germans advancing, Heinrich going over the top, with a hand grenade aimed at a French soldier twenty paces distant. The Frenchman on his knees, pointing to his wedding ring, crying "Kamerad." Heinrich, shaken with swift emotion, tossing the grenade aside, embracing the French boy. The two soldiers crouching together in a shell hole while the advance swept by. "That is how it came to me," said Heinrich, now a doctor of philosophy, "that I must not kill. And ever since the war I have been working for peace."

At the Swarthmore conference of the American Fellowship of Youth for Peace last September a letter was received from the Weltjugendliga in Berlin. "In the name of 3,000 young Germans," it read, "we offer to co-operate with you and the youth of all countries in the abolishment of hate and misunderstanding, and to work for friendship and understanding between the nations."

Eleven German youth movements, eleven English, four French, and twenty-one in the Netherlands joined during the past summer in the creation of a World League of Youth whose purpose is the federation of youth the world over for the establishment of a peace so firmly founded in mutual trust and friendship that no diplomatic intrigue or nationalistic lust can set its members at one another's throats. At first, when I discussed the possibilities of such a league with the European youth leaders, they shook their heads with the pity of an older and more disillusioned society than ours west of the Atlantic. The avenues of approach were too different; the difficulties were too great; there was no money. But before the summer was over the atmosphere had somehow changed.

At any rate, the League was begun, labor youth, non-resistants, socialists, Catholics, and Quakers all finding a common bond in the work of establishing peace. Let them make the beginning, we Americans told them, and America would see them through; America—"one of the few nations in history," as Dhan Mukerji expresses it, "which possesses great material power and also great spiritual power."

Then I came home—to Boston and Armistice Day. As a local incident, perhaps, it is scarcely worth dwelling upon; but in view of the light it throws on the temper of America today, it has sinister significance. Is America the one country which cannot bury dead hatreds and lift its eyes to the future? With the youth of other countries grasping at world fellowship, are American youth unable to rise above the "gang" level?

The Christian churches are on the side of peace. At the Congregational conference in Washington this fall, the National Council went on record as being in favor of "the abolition of military armaments by all nations except for an internal police force," and as believing that "the Church of Christ as an institution should not be used as an instrument or an agency in the support of war." Recent conventions of the Universalist, Unitarian, Episcopal, and Methodist Churches have taken similar stands.

On the individual Christian, however, rests a responsibility too heavy to be discharged through group resolutions alone. As the recent Boston affair shows, the forces of reaction are powerful, unscrupulous, well-organized. The "gang" would have been non-existent except for the incitement of the press. The press was fair and friendly until anonymous "investigators" offered them a dubious sensation. The peace movement needs the active support of every person who wants peace to prevail.

The Fellowship of Youth for Peace is only one of many such movements, but it is the one of which I can best speak. It is, first of all, entirely in harmony with the best ideals of loyalty to America. It exists to fulfill the purpose for which so many of our youth died in France—the ending of the war system, which it regards as treason to humanity. The ex-service men among our members, including myself, believe that only by making future wars impossible can we be true to our dead comrades.

Three lines of development are being followed by the Fellowship this year. First, co-operation with other peace agencies in arousing and directing public opinion concerning international mechanisms for settlement of disputes and the outlawry of war. In New England, for instance, the Fellowship is joining with the Council of Christian Associations and the various student organizations in sponsoring a Student Conference on the World Court, to be held in Boston, Dec. 4, 5, and 6. This conference will attempt to work out a concerted program of action for the colleges both for the period of the World Court campaign in the Senate and for later peace plans. Another conference in March will include all youth organizations in Greater Boston, student and labor groups as well as colleges.

The second field of activity for the Fellowship lies in creating and strengthening bonds of international friendship between individuals and between whole youth movements, as for instance in the formation of the World League of Youth last summer.

The third chief aim this winter is to check the militarization of education in the United States, and here again the Fellowship is acting in closest co-operation with other peace organizations. This is taking the form of a national campaign in the colleges and schools to abolish compulsory military training.

The Fellowship takes the further stand that world friendship must be interpreted in terms of racial, political, and economic justice. It opposes every denial of such friendship in the form of imperialistic practices whether on the part of its own or any other government.

Representatives of the Fellowship will be in Europe again next summer. What message will they have from America, for Europe, it must be remembered, which has already taken one definite step toward peace in the Locarno treaties?

In Holland in the summer of 1928 the League of Youth will meet for its first World Congress. America will be needed at that conference as she has been needed in Europe ever since the war; more, for this conference will be tied by no governmental policies and secret treaties, but will be free to accept the highest, the most far-sighted leadership available. America can supply such leadership—if she will.

The Immortals

By Charles Poole Cleaves

What if the soul have higher forms in mortal
Than we have pictured here?
Have you a heart to fashion for the future
A faith that has no fear?
Have you a purpose to promote undaunted
The larger life of man?
To set souls free, relieve, release, inspire,
Watch the dead live again?
To turn the children's faces, glad and eager
To flowered mountain paths and smiling stars,
Beauty for ashes give and joy for mourning
Garments of praise for rancor, hate and wars?
O how more real is that unselfish Heaven
Than any dreamed in forms and gowns and gold.
How wider is the life of Love eternal
Than any gates unfold!

The Wonderment of a Layman

Noting Certain Human Frailties in the Churches

By Jefferson L. Harbour
Fall River, Massachusetts

WONDER by what peculiar mental processes one finds a radio church ser- as satisfying as a church service in the use of God. The fact that the radio ser- is likely to be followed by something ng the line of jazz at its worst sends me rking back to the days of my vanished uth when I was a cub reporter in the nous mining camp of Leadville, Colorado, l our Saturday paper announced a "Grand ered Concert and Free Dance" at the eon Variety Theater on Sunday evenings. ssibly the radio church service worship- find a secret satisfaction in the fact it there "aint no collection" at their vice.

Money Wonderments

As a church treasurer for thirty-seven ars I have had reason for wonderment er the fact that those who contribute least the church and are most spasmodic in eir giving have most to say about the lack "business principles" in the management the church finances and the "loose way" which its business affairs are carried for- rd. I have also had occasion to wonder the attitude of mind of the church mem- r who is serenely confident that the church ll "get along" in some magical way nether he or she contributes anything at to its support or not. I wonder also at e lapse of memory and obligation on the rt of the member who pledges a certain nount per week and who "skips" an en- lope every now and then without feeling y obligation to "make them up." This is "weak" way of meeting a weekly pledge. wonder at the church member who inveighs gainst foreign missions because of the cry- g need of the "heathen at home" and who ves twenty-five cents a year to help lead e "heathen at home" from darkness into ght.

Every church treasurer should have a en and abundant sense of humor to keep m from becoming a soured cynic because his experiences as a treasurer, or for her reasons. I wonder at the loudly testi- d willingness of some people to lay down eir lives for the good of the cause but who ever lay anything on the collection plate. wonder at the kind of religion that never uches the purse and that causes the owner this kind of spirituality to sing with great y hen a member of the church known to ive an income of ten thousand dollars a ar gives fifty cents a week to the church ie Biblical information about it being easier r a camel to project itself through the eye a needle than for some men of money to ter the kingdom looms up big and causes ie treasurer to hope that it is true. Men f this type are often most prone to discourse libly on the bad example the church sets y getting into debt. I never run afoul of ne of these garrulous contributors that I o not recall the words of homely wisdom alling from the lips of the old woman of the Great Smoky Mountains who said in one of Miss Murfree's stories: "There aint nothin' so becomin' to some folks as a shet mouth." A "shet mouth" would be eminently "becomin'" to many of the most nimble-tongued critics of the church.

"Salvation is free for you and me."

Church Attendance

I am filled with wonderment over the way in which slight premonitions of rain are sufficient to keep people home from church when nothing less than fire and floods and earthquakes can keep them at home from a thriller in the way of a movie or the powerful lure of the chicken pie church supper. Discretion keeps them from saying anything about it, but I am confident that ministers wonder why three hundred people come rejoicing to the church supper while only thirty show up with a kind of a "I am doing my duty" look on their faces at the midweek meeting of the church. Ears keenly attuned to the call to the church supper are often strangely deaf when it comes to calls to service most helpful to the church. How is this to be accounted for? I wonder.

I wonder at the state of mind of the church member who comes to church spasmodically on Sunday morning only and "lets it go at that" so far as any other obligation to the church is concerned. It is this "let George do it" spirit that sometimes makes it possible for pastors to count on the fingers of their two hands (omitting their thumbs), all of the men members of the church upon whom he can depend for actual service when it comes to "standing by the stuffs," as I once heard a minister elegantly put it. I sometimes wonder whether the utterly indifferent member is a liability or an asset, even though he "counts one" when it comes to sending the number of members to state conventions and other meetings at which quantity seems to be a valuable possession.

It is with wonder and a stirring of my sense of humor that I see and hear the performances of the "he-man" type of minister or evangelist to whom the word "pep" is a synonym for performance better suited to the circus ring than to the pulpit. They leave me with an increased sense of gratitude because of the fact that there is no law, human or divine, compelling me to believe all that I hear. Vociferous, emotionable, hysterical, and illogical, I marvel at the following the "he-man" often has and hope (but don't believe) that he fills a useful place in the plan of salvation and the growing good of the world.

I wonder at the lazy, easy-going, placidly indifferent member of the church who has no interest in its larger life and who always gives it second or even third or fourth place in his or her thought. Sometimes it does not get even the "leavings" of the time remaining when business, social, domestic, or other affairs have been attended to. There must be a very loose screw somewhere when ball games, movies, bridge whist, dances, and other social pleasures must all take their toll of time before any can be given to the church. And it is sometimes this very type of member who is most prone to ask, "What is the matter with the church?"

The Critics

I sometimes wonder why it is that some of those who know least about the church and its work from personal contact with it are most severely critical of it. Men who have not seen the inside of a church in forty years have wonderful nimbleness of tongue when setting forth its shortcomings. One listens to their denunciations with a feeling of gratitude that so much of what one sometimes hears simply "aint so." It is futile to argue with a man of this type, since crass ignorance never yields to any kind of argument, pigheadedness being so largely his portion. I am now and then given to wondering why some people who are critical of the church and who never give it a dollar or a word of commendation feel perfectly free to call upon its ministers for service at times when ministerial services are needed. I commend a certain poem entitled "I Sat Alone With My Conscience" to these and other critics of the church who do not appreciate the certain fact that the world would go to the "demnition bow-wows" in six months if all the churches in it were to go out of existence. I have heard critics of the church stoutly maintaining that there are just as many good men and women out of the church as in it. There is no way of "counting noses" to determine this question. Here's hoping it is true, since, if it is, it lessens the large number of persons the church is honestly and earnestly trying to make better because they surely are in crying need of such effort. I wonder if some of these critics of the church are not, in the secret recesses of their hearts, like the man who compelled his children to attend church and Sunday school because he wanted them to be "better than their dad." I sometimes wonder about that. I have known personally several men of the type who prate loftily about worshiping God by mooning around alone in the woods or sitting by the running brooks listening to the songs of the birds and the whispering wind in the trees. Worship of this kind adds about as much to the growing good of the world as Thoreau added to it by sitting on the shores of Lake Walden watching ant fights. How one is to help the church in its desperate conflict with all the forces of evil by confining one's worship and effort to "God's first temples" is a matter of amused wonderment to me. This kind of worship has at least one potent power of appeal. It doesn't cost anything. But a religion that doesn't cost anything is a kind of a prize package hardly worth having. I have never yet known one of these singing bird, murmuring brook, sighing wind and wild flower church worshipers who had distinguished himself along any line of human helpfulness. I wonder what they really get out of that sort of church going.

THE DECLINE OF HYMNOLOGY

I sometimes find myself wondering how some of our churches and Sunday schools can discard so many of the noble and splendid hymns for the jazzy doggerel and sloppy sentimentality of our so-called "revival hymns," of which "Tell Mother I'll Be There" and "Oh, to Be Nothing" are distressing examples. Some of the church members who sing the last named song have their desire easily gratified so far as being of any real value to the church is concerned. The cushions of the church pews suffer but little wear and tear because of their attendance. Like the vast majority of our modern fiction, church and Sunday school songs have fallen to a low estate of banal mediocrity in many of our modern song books. Many of them bear about as much relation to real sacred hymnology as most of our free verse bears to real poetry. Some of our "revival" songs are as banal as that pious fib in a way of a song that we who are in the sunset years of life sang in our childhood: "I Want to Be an Angel."

Within a short time I read in one of the newspapers the announcement that "peppy singing" would be one of the features of an evening church service. There is to that which I am pleased to call my mind something ghastly in applying the word "pep" to any part of a sacred service. "Piffle" is a harsh word to apply to church songs, but that is what some present-day songs seem to be when compared to "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God," "Guide Me O Thou Great Jehovah," and kindred songs. Contrasting some of the "popular" church songs of today to these fine old hymns is like comparing Pollyanna to the choicest work of Victor Hugo.

INTEREST IN THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

When it is admitted that the Sunday school supplies about eighty-five per cent. of the additions to the church, I wonder why it is that such large numbers of church members seem wholly to ignore the existence of this institution. Admitting its lack of perfection, the fact remains that it must be a patent and subtle power for good when it is the open door through which such countless numbers of young people pass into the church. Some of the weaknesses of the Sunday school are due to the fact that it lacks in such a marked and sorrowful degree the full and sympathetic support it has a right to expect from the church. Within a few days the supervisor of a city Sunday school told me that she did not know "where on earth" she was to get teachers with which to re-open the Sunday school in the autumn. If her high note of despair reached the heavenly places there must be wonderment in heaven over the obstacles that hinder the Sunday school from taking on its divinely appointed honor and glory. Some of these hindrances it is easily within the power of the church to overcome. Although there are now thousands of men and women in the organized Bible classes of the Sunday school, thus giving it a greater power of appeal to the boys and girls, there are far more thousands of men and women of the church whose attitude toward the Sunday school is one of such indifference that they could hardly tell the name of the superintendent of the school of their own church. It is still the butt of some cheap newspaper wit, and its sharpest critics within and without the church might well take to heart the truism that it is always easier to criticize than it is to do better. Called the "child of the church" it would soon starve to death if it had to depend upon some of the members of the church to fill its nursing bottle. It is, in many instances, a neglected and sadly undernourished child that would wax strong and be a great power for good if all churches did their full duty by it. Why are not more members (or all members) of the church more interested in the promising "child of the church? I wonder.

Confessions of an Ancient Mariner

By Alice Freeman Firman

"Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." If I had the pen of my good friend, Safed the Sage, I should make this a parable, but as I haven't I will relate my latest seafaring experience in plain language, just as it happened without any touches of imagination.

It was well into October when I took my last boat ride from northern Michigan to Chicago. I speak advisedly when I say my "last," for if I have my reason spared to me I shall not pass that way again, if there remains a rail or automobile road. My friends in many countries know how prone I have been to boast about being a 100 per cent sailor—I, the daughter of a New England sea captain whose gait even on land has often been called that of an old tar. Well, Lake Michigan evidently decided to take the wind out of my sails, and some of the braggadocia out of my pride and before the Missouri was half way on her journey, the waves, which were only little measley ones, compared with what I am used to, began to go criss-cross from the boat's course.

I paid no attention to the fact and in the evening after a big dinner in the dining room, which I had almost to myself, I was practically alone in the saloon. A polite gentleman said to me, in passing, "You must be a good sailor." Whereupon I said with all the assurance in the world, "O, I never give a thought to seasickness." However, just then I heard chairs, dishes, water bottles, salts, peppers, and cruets take a grand tumble in the dining room and go bang from one side of the floor to the other,—and as there was no one else for me to "show off" to, I arose and started for my cabin. But for the merciful intervention of one of the ship's officials, I should have lost my bearings and become like one of the salt shakers. He kindly piloted me to my stateroom, and even then when I thanked him, I made bold to say, "I never have to think of being seasick." Before I had fairly shut my door one of those criss-cross sensations attacked the steamer and—"tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Ashkelon"—I felt my perfectly good dinner rising to the occasion, followed by the perfectly good lunch I had eaten earlier in the day. If I had been a whale instead of an ancient mariner, I am sure I could have brought up not only Jonah but all the rest of the minor prophets with him.

Oh-h-h-h! How I loathed Lake Michigan, so choppy! so fresh! I harked back to my three crossings of the Pacific, never losing a meal. Likewise the Bay of Bengal in a monsoon, the Indian Ocean, the north Atlantic, in fearful storms, and the Mediterranean and Arabian and Red Seas! I felt like apologizing to my dear Captain father, who so many years ago made his last Port. Suddenly I had a feeling that I had been through this experience before and I recalled that over twenty-five years ago I met the same fate going from Saugatuck to Chicago! I groaned to myself: "Me for the great seas and big oceans! and mountains of waves that break over the upper deck and splash salt spray in my face! No more of this impudent, fresh, choppy lake travel for me!" —Then a la Safed I began to moralize. How many a person (alas! I may be one myself!) can bravely meet the big upheavals in life better than the fresh water difficulties which go "agin the grain" of one's disposition?

Haven't you met, for instance, some worthy divine who can spellbind large audiences, write deep and soulful books, marry and bury folks, who gets all upset if the janitor fails in his duty to the furnace and the study gets so chilly he (the dominee not the janitor) gets cold feet just before he gets his next Sunday's sermon finished? Or who just can't bear it if a bill comes in Monday morning's mail for something he expected to get for nothing, being a minister? —Or, if a puncture occurs in his tire, or word comes that his mother-in-law has decided to spend the winter in the parsonage? I once heard a worldly minded man say he never wanted to know a minister out of the pulpit. Now what remedy can we suggest for the above mentioned weaknesses? In the first place, don't be too cocksure of yourself, as to stomach or disposition. Remember you are human and watch your step. I once heard an old deacon tell the Lord in prayer that "we are all infallible and liable to err." When necessary be a good sport and confess, as I have. It has been good for my soul.

But in closing I wish to say that I still consider myself a remarkable sailor,—when the waves, no matter how high, go the way I want them to, and are salt.

Deathless

By Thomas Curtis Clark

They say that Beauty dies: as roses fade
And are no more; as summer, now so bright,
Must lose its glory with November's blight;
As autumn's song must by the winds be stayed.
But they speak falsely: Beauty lives,
And shall live ever; only she eludes
The sure decay of time. When autumn broods, Funereal, she mourns the leaves, but gives
No hint of Beauty's death: for she has passed
Into the great world's life; a million hearts
Possess her now; supreme, above all arts,
She reigns; as first, she also shall be last.
The roses fall, but Beauty liveth on;
The sunset fades, preparing for the dawn.

Safeguarding the Ministry

A Layman's Address to the National Council

By Clarence S. Pellet

WO years ago there came to my desk an attractive booklet published by the Chi-o Theological Seminary. I happened to n it at a page with this caption: "The urch is the Backlog of our Present Civ-ation." I had never thought of it in just se terms and I was interested. But was rue?

knew well one community and I used it test the statement. I catalogued the up-lding institutions and I listed the people intaining them. As a result I found that only was the statement true in the case that community, but it was true to a rtling degree! Since then, as opportunity s offered, I have made other tests, and far as I am concerned I join myself defi-ely to those who believe that the church the backlog of our present civilization. Having reached that conclusion I am ghty interested in the success of the urch. Show me a successful bank, man-acturing or merchandising establishment, cial, educational, or political institution, d I will show you an instance of capable dership. It was Fiske, was it not, who id that "If Virginia had cast her lot with e North and Robert E. Lee and Stonewall ckson had led the Union Armies the vil War would not have lasted one year"? id Abraham Lincoln was not the first, and ll not be the last, to cry out in agony, "Oh, r a man!" No wonder then that we are terested in the kind of young men enter-g the ministry and particularly concerned th the causes which keep some of them out the ministry.

I have been making inquiries of well in-rmed people as to why young men possess-g manifest qualities of leadership do not ter the ministry in larger numbers. The an of a theological seminary gives me ur reasons. His first three fairly resolve emselves into the underlying economic ason. The fundamental cause was stated a state superintendent and concurred in a college president to be the "lack of ancial independence"—present and future. My own experience with men leads me to lieve that most men are haunted by the ead of a dependent old age. Such fear ay indicate a lack of faith but at least it idences intelligence. Investment organi-tions, insurance institutions, and trust mpanies trade upon this fear continuously d with increasing success. I do not im-ine that the time will ever come when the eaching and the teaching professions will tract selfish men. But I look forward to e day when men in these professions will better paid and when better provision will made for their unproductive years.

The Backlog of Civilization

I am trying to make this point: 1st, that e church is the backlog of our civilization, d 2d, that the church will succeed in pro-rtion to the quality of its leadersip, and , that to make the ministry attractive to ung men of first quality we must remove minimize this dread of a dependent old ge.

How can we minimize, perhaps ultimately remove, this fear of a dependent old age? Well, we have made a most hopeful beginning in our Annuity Fund. Since 1918 the total assets of the Annuity Fund (including its foundation in the Pilgrim Memorial Fund) have grown from $350,000 to more than $7,000,000! The Annuity Fund alone, exclusive of the Pilgrim Memorial Fund, in four years has increased from less than $500,000 to nearly $2,000,000! That is a lot of money. Well, that depends on what you are going to do with it. A ten-dollar bill is a lot of money to pay car fares, but it will not buy a railroad ticket to Chicago—much less two tickets.

If our Annuity Fund is made strong enough to carry the increasing burden as the annuitants grow in number and the annuities increase in size, the desired result will be accomplished. We have made a most hopeful beginning, it is true, but that is the most we can say and there is some danger in a good beginning. The Annuity Fund is an insurance institution. Such institutions must build up reserves today for the payments to be made tomorrow. Reserves are fundamental in any plan of insurance which is to meet its obligations. Rather build a house on insecure foundations, than a scheme of annuities on inadequate reserves. The elements may be kind to the house, but time is relentless. Reserves cannot be financed with loose change. In the nature of things when you deal with annuities to be paid to many people for many years you are dealing in large figures.

May I offer here a word of commendation for the management of our Annuity Fund. The test of an insurance management is its expense ratio. The expense ratio of the Annuity Fund is 5-8/10 per cent, which is just one-third the average expense ratio of ten leading life insurance companies and less than one-half of the lowest expense ratio of which I have knowledge.

Working the Annuity Fund

The Annuity Fund does for us these things: It has a direct, important and helpful influence on the men in active service, and it conserves our ministerial material. It fulfills in part our sense of obligation and justice to our ministers. It enables them to help themselves as they could not do otherwise. It tends to encourage young men to enter the ministry.

We ought to do these things for the Annuity Fund: First, get a membership for our pastor on the new plan. To do this we should pay at least one half of his dues and put the amount in the budget as a regular item of expense. When we do this nobody need die of enlargement of the heart, for the church is then treating its minister less generously than some business corporations treat their employees. Next, we ought to build up the Pilgrim Memorial Fund to the $8,000,000 figure established by the National Council in 1921. The Pilgrim Memorial Fund is the "heart" of the Annuity Fund. Then, let us not wait until the dawn of the millennium brightens the horizon to form the habit of meeting our apportionments in full. In the meantime, here is a glorious chance! We may, some of us, have the happy privilege of supplying $200 to make up the $500 per annum to go to some aged minister. This will be a blessing to him, a joy to us, and a help to the Annuity Fund.

It sounds like the same old cry, does it not? Money! More money!! Still more money!!! Well, there is lots of it. I am out of patience with the way we raise money. The way we go at it reminds me of a certain town in Old Mexico which I visited years ago when it was healthier traveling down there: One half of the male population was engaged in pumping and distributing water by the most antiquated methods, to keep the other half alive. One day some Yankees drove an artesian well into an abundant underground supply of water, which had been there since the world began, and the town "went wet." Most of you are used to parables; here is one—"There was a certain man who had great need of water and he took him a pail and went out to draw. But, lo, he had neglected to dig the well."

The Wherewithal

Money may be the root of evil but evil is not the only thing money is the root of. Money is a powerful instrument for good or evil. You will not misunderstand me. I do not consider money the greatest thing in the world; neither is gasoline the greatest thing about an airplane, yet Commander Rodgers testified that the plane he used on his Hawaiian flight was a perfectly good plane but the flight failed for lack of gasoline.

When I was a boy if a man had money all went well with him. It was a case of "no questions asked." Then, I remember when courageous people began to cry at the man of money, "How did you get it?" And now people are asking insistently, "What are you doing with it?" It is no longer an honorable distinction to have money unless it was decently acquired and is being helpfully used.

Now is the time to preach stewardship. All of the signs of the time are in conjunction. The United States Government has put its official O. K. on 15 per cent as a reasonable amount of an income to be given away. Men of means are in a responsive mood. Proportionate giving is the painless method of extracting coin. I never knew a person to give the plan a fair trial and give it up. If we adopted the plan generally all this fine talent, now exhausting itself in never-ending effort to secure funds, would be working overtime to expend the provided funds wisely.

Converted Financially

When we are converted financially, as well as intellectually and emotionally, we will pay our ministers adequate salaries. Then we will build up our Pilgrim Memorial Fund to proportions where our veteran preachers will be treated at least as well as the Carnegie Foundation treats our veteran teachers. When that day comes, and I have faith to believe that it is coming, young men of independent spirit will have less hesitation in following a call to the ministry and ministers with a pardonable ambition for their families need not abandon a useful career because of economic pressure. Best of all, those grand old ministers who have made a sacrifice of their lives that others might live more fully, whose wives command my admiration to the point that I cannot trust myself to do them justice; these splendid veterans of the church, as they face their sunset years, will not be asked to live on less than some of us spend annually for club dues, but will be provided for justly, even generously I hope, from funds which they have helped to create but which have been enlarged many fold by those of us who are proud to be partners with them in a great undertaking.

Parables of Safed the Sage

The Parable of the Taj Mahal

When we were Cruising among the Continents, and Bumping over the Boisterous Waves, we came unto the land which Christopher Columbus set out for to discover when he bumped into America by mistake. And Keturah said, Now shall we see the Taj Mahal, which I have always wanted to see since I saw the pictures of it in the Geography book.

And we saw if in the dawn, and we saw it in the blazing noon, and we saw it yet again when the sun was nigh its setting. And we sat before it and beheld its Perfect Image in the Reflecting Pool, as the Light faded and the Stars crept out.

And Keturah said, It is all that I expected, yea and more.

And I said, Keturah, consider if it be not too good to be true, the thing that thou seest. Peradventure thou art still the Little Country School-ma'am I married nigh unto Forty years ago. Peradventure thou art dreaming at recess over the pictures in the Geography book, and imagining the time when thou shalt have a Rich Lover who will bear thee away to Distant Lands, to behold Palaces and Temples and Places of Great Renown. Peradventure thou shalt presently awake, and find it is time to Ring the Bell, and listen to the recitation of the class in Geography.

And she said, Oh, my husband, when I was a School Teacher, I never had a dream so fair as this. Nay, I had no dream of life so happy as the years that I have lived.

And I said, Keturah, there be innumerable women with ten times thine income and fifteen times thine outgo who are Restless and Unhappy, and who think that they are having an hard time. And behold, thy husband is unknown to Dun and Bradstreet even in these days of thy Great Wealth. Thou hast never owned an Automobile, and thou hast not a Fur Coat to thy back? Thou hast scrubbed thine own Kitchen floor, and worn dresses that had twice been turned and Hats that had been made over thrice. Thou hast practiced Economies and Frugalities and Self-denials in abundance. Yet what is this foolish talk I hear, when thou sayest that there had been no dream of thine so happy as the years of thy life?

But she said, All these things are true, but they were sweet for love's sake, and we have always been rich.

And I said, Keturah, the Glorious Vision thou now holdest that was beautiful by day and is even more lovely in the twilight, is no mere triumph of an Architect, though it is that, but the work of an Husband, erected in the affection he had for the Wife he loved.

And Keturah said, I wonder after all, for I have a woman's curiosity, whether she was just an ordinary little woman, but Transfigured by a Great Love.

And I said, The woman who could inspire such love in the heart of a Strong man must have had a Noble Soul.

And we sat for a time in silence, and I said, Keturah, if it were in my power I would not build thee a tomb like that. But I would rear to Heaven a memorial of thy Living Deeds and Words more beautiful and lasting than even this Noble Shrine. Humble and obscure must be any tribute that I shall ever pay to thy goodness and thy love, but in the heart of thy husband is a Taj Mahal.

And now from the lower steps of that shrine I speak unto all husbands and all wives, saying, Let not your love grow commonplace. Speak often of it each to the other. Do constantly little deeds that tell of it. For this sacred and mysterious tie that bindeth hearts together in that union which is the continual spring and foundation of new life through the generations, is earth's holiest temple, and God's best gift to us through each other.

The Taj Mahal

When Dr. William E. Barton was spe ing to the Young People's Pilgrimage Washington on the Lincoln Memorial, said that there was only one other memor in the world that could be compared to and that was in India, and it was not tribute of a nation, but the tribute of a m to the wife whom he dearly and devote loved—the Taj Mahal. Dr. Barton's fi message to the public after the death of dearly-beloved and devoted wife is entit "The Taj Mahal."

Shah Jehan, the grandson of Akbar Great, the first Mogul emperor, while Prince Royal, married the beautiful Persi Arjmand Banu. She died in giving bi to her eighth child. Her husband vov to give her the loveliest tomb in the wo Twenty years and more it was in the bui ing and was finished in 1647. It stands Agra, on the banks of the Jumna, a monum in marble, a memorial to love. From low step to topmost dome it is a wealth of sp less marble. It lies four square 187 fe only the corners being cut off to preve harshness. Marble is not enough for lavish splendor of the tribute. Jade, aga carnelian, amethyst—all the Eastern worl precious stones are laid under the trib of love. Moulding, sculpture, inlaid fr scrolls of colored marbles help to make gem of architecture. It stands there "in chaste majesty as though magic had cal it forth," a miracle in marble. On the m sive walls of white like "frozen music" ro lotus flowers, and hyacinths are liter turned stone. Art, architecture, wealth, imagination in profusion and power spe of a man's love for his wife.

The Soul's Dark Night

He who enters the experience which the mys- s call "the dark night of the soul" has his nfort in this: other souls have found that ary darkness the path to a fairer day. Very ely, in course of time, he may even find him- able to say with George Fox, "I saw that it s good that I had gone through that exercise." George Fox thinks and feels in his usual matic way when he grapples with that ex- ience, and compresses into one brief hour t which with some people lasts for months, h some perhaps for years. He who was lding all his life on confidence in God, who s making it the one business of his days to ect other people to an Inner Light which uld surely shine in them and lead them on if y would but look within,—for him that Inner ht went out. He lost God. Doubt—denial ppeared where faith had been triumphant. his case not for long. Even while he sat in same seat before the fire, "the cloud and nptation vanished away, and life rose over ; my heart was glad, and I praised the liv- God." The darkness went, apparently not return; not, at any rate, to be again men- ned in his remarkable Journal. In the years t were to follow he could go through perse- ions, betrayals, imprisonments, apparently h unbroken joy in the nearness of the divine iend.

The dark night experience is not uncommon h souls that long, with an aching longing, daily assurance of God, for evidence of his ding when they have put their trust in him. alth, success, prosperity, the ordinary pleas- s their fellows enjoy—these things life has ten away, and they have not complained. ese things they can do without, since they ve a gripping confidence in God, and are suaded that their sufferings will be made him to contribute toward a satisfying out- ne finally. But now that persuasion grows n, that confidence in God fades away; suf- ing seems futile and life a progressive dis- isionment. Not alone is the sun gone; the y stars are blotted out. The soul gropes blackness. "My God! My God!" it cries out, aging on even in its despair. "I cannot feel e," it cries, "I cannot understand thee, I ow not if I even believe in thee any longer; t I need thee! and I long for thee, and I will p on clinging to my unquenchable hope of e."

And the experience of other days is repeated lay. After darkness comes light—a clearer d steadier and more lasting light. What elyn Underhill has written is verified by the w struggler, who has been resolved that he ll not abandon his belief in the goodness of nor give up the struggle to get into the ht. "You will find," she says, "an inward se of security which will never cease." Per- xed by the mysteries of life in this world d by the vast Mystery of the universe, the l finds, nevertheless, a new peace. It finds stery transfused with a Light that turns rkness to gladness. It rejoices with St. John the Cross, whom Arthur Symons has trans- ed into rapturous English:

night that didst lead thus,
O night more lovely than the dawn of light;
night that broughtest us,
Lover to lover's sight,
Lover to loved, in marriage of delight!

For it has come out into a new and firmer surance of God: not the God of easy cant, t the great Must-be who comes out of life's rker hours, and whom the soul is resolved trust while life lasts.

JOY IN TROUBLE

In the night his song shall be with me. —Psalm 42: 8.

We do not understand that the earth-music is hushed that we may catch some echo of the song that the morning stars sang together, and may hear the sons of God shouting for joy. We do not understand that the naphtha lights of an hour's pleasure burn dim that we may see beyond them the sunrise of the soul's eternal gladness, the dawn of the heavenly joy. The vision of the kingdom of heaven has ever been seen through men's tears.—Percy C. Ainsworth.

In Christian life sorrow is always attended by joy. The text does not say that joy is always attended by sorrow—the apostle knew better than that; he realized that in every true life are large spaces of pure enjoyment: what he does say is, that sorrow is ever attended by gladness.—W. L. Watkinson.

Not where the Hanging Gardens
Gleamed over Babylon,
But in the den of lions
The wings of the Angel shone.

Far from the feast where princes
In gold and scarlet trod;
Through the burning fiery furnace
Men walked with the Son of God.

Katharine Lee Bates.

It is not a question of compensations at all. The truth is not that when we lose at one point we can turn to another and get on with little inconvenience. It is rather this: that our losses, when we accept them gently and manfully and believingly, are transfigured; they are themselves transmuted into precious possessions, and we win by means of them undreamed of enlargement and enrichment such as we could never have known without them. Your affliction is more than a natural process of decay. It is the last stage in God's discipline of your soul for eternity; and it will not fail of its purpose if you abide, with a quiet heart, in his faith and hope.—David Smith.

The sun meets not the spring bud that stretches toward him with half that certainty, as God, the source of all good, communicates himself to the soul that longs to partake of him.—William Law.

That flower which follows the sun, doth so even on cloudy days when it doth not shine forth. Yet it follows the hidden course and motion of it. So the soul that moves after God keeps that course when he hides his face, is content, yea, is glad at his will in all estates or conditions or events.—Robert Leighton.

Almighty God, who alone canst order the unruly wills and affections of sinful men, grant unto thy people that they may love the thing which thou commandest and desire that which thou dost promise, that so, among the sundry and manifold changes of the world our hearts may surely there be fixed where true joys are to be found, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen

The Gospel of Giving

Comment on the Prayer Meeting Topic for December 13-19

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: Bible Principles of Giving. Leviticus 27: 30; I Corinthians 16: 1-4, 14.

Light from the Bible Passages

The tenth of a man's income belongs to God, and must be reserved for his sole use according to the Old Testament thought. The reasoning behind this is that everything primarily belongs to him, and that he always has a prior claim to any that we may set up. Paul does not urge any mathematical division but he does insist on a systematic saving for the Lord. Only by such a regular method can there be a steady source for the Lord's work. To do this from any other motive than love for him takes the heart from it. To love is to give.

Leads for Leaders

Note that from the very first God has given things to men to use and not to possess. Think of the evils that have come into the world through the passion for possession,—in nations, in classes, in individuals. Did God give Adam the garden to have as a land-owner, or as a tenant, to use it and enjoy it? Study Genesis 2: 8-17; 3: 6-9.

Is giving a pain or a pleasure,—something to which we look forward with joyful anticipations or resentful dread? Is the offering envelope or plate a bugbear or a blessing? Study II Corinthians 9: 6, 7 ("cheerful" is hilarious in the original).

Do we give God the first claim on what we earn or have? Or do we turn over to him what we have left after we have spent what we wish? Study Proverbs 3: 9.

Would we ever dare to test God's providence over us by giving away all that we have? Study Luke 21: 1, 2. Would it have been foolish for the rich young man to have followed Christ's advice in Matthew 20: 21?

Thoughts for Members

Is thy cruse of comfort wasting?
Rise and share it with another,
And through all the years of famine
It shall serve thee and thy brother.
Is thy burden hard and heavy?
Do thy steps drag heavily?
Help to bear thy brother's burden;
God will bear both it and thee.

—Elizabeth Charles.

Only one more revival—only one more—is needed: the revival of Christian stewardship, the dedication of the money power to God.—Horace Bushnell.

"Draw if thou canst, the mystic line,
Severing rightly his from thine,
Which is human, which divine."

The world asks, What can I get? Love asks, What can I give?—Ralph S. Cushman.

One thing is yours you may not spend:
Your very inmost self of all—
You may not bind it, may not bend,
Nor stem the river of your call.
To make for ocean is its end.

—Ibsen.

A Moment of Prayer

Lord of the great sacrifice, restrain our eagerness for the things that are seen. Thy cross is our rebuke. Increase our spending for the things eternal. Lord of the holiest joy—the joy of boundless giving—teach us the grace of losing, that our joy may indeed be full. Amen.

—Bishop Birney.

Beautiful Gift Books

THE KNAVE OF HEARTS, by LOUISE SAUNDERS, with pictures by MAXFIELD PARRISH (Scribners. $10.00). This is among the most beautiful gift books of the year, and it has had an interesting origin. The text is a play of satire and fantasy woven around the nursery rhyme about "the knave of hearts, who stole some tarts." Mr. Parrish saw this play produced by amateurs in Windsor, Vt., and was so impressed with it that he requested the privilege of illustrating it. In addition to the 14 full-page illustrations, he has executed designs for the lining paper, cover inlay, and eight page headings, which reproduced in full color give to the book not only artistic distinction but the unity of an artistic whole. It is Mr. Parrish's finest achievement in the art of illustration. The book is one of large pages, 11½" x 14," and is attractively boxed.

A BOOK OF CLOUDS, by WILLIAM A. QUAYLE (Abingdon Press. $2.50). The late Bishop Quayle was a true lover of nature. "From a child," he says, "I loved the clouds and neighbored with them." This love he has expressed in this last message, a book of literary beauty, enriched with some fifty full-page illustrations.

THE HOLLY HEDGE, by TEMPLE BAILEY (Penn. $2.00). A Christmas edition, neatly boxed and decorated, with a colored frontispiece by Nat Little. In addition to the title story it has four other Christmas stories by Temple Bailey.

LONDON, by SIDNEY DARK, with illustrations by JOSEPH PENNELL (Macmillan. $5.00). A new and cheaper edition of a notable book. It is the 55 illustrations by Pennell that give the book its unusual distinction, and Mr. Dark modestly claims only to have been in much the same position as a dramatist writing a play around a poster. None the less his text is a substantial and sympathetic interpretation of old London worthy in every way to accompany Pennell's great drawings.

WHEN AMERICA WAS YOUNG, by JOHN T. FARIS (Harper. $6.00). Mr. Faris' Romance of Forgotten Towns was among the notable books dealing with American life published last year. In this volume he has gone farther back along much the same trails, describing with the sympathetic understanding and eye for the significant and symbolic, revealed in his former volumes, the first century and a half of American beginnings. He begins with The Checkered Story of Manufacturers and Commerce, devotes a chapter to Glimpses of Houses and Home Life, devotes another to Ye Colonial Editor, and another to Educational Beginnings. Further chapters on Travel, George Washington, Cities, Pirates, etc., such as one might expect, are interspersed with unexpected chapters such as that on Lotteries in America. We are apt to forget that such things were once prevalent and that a dormitory at Harvard was built by the proceeds of a successful lottery. Mr. Faris' book is copiously illustrated.

GREEN TRAILS AND UPLAND PASTURES, by WALTER PRICHARD EATON (W. A. Wilde). A revised and gift edition (boxed) of an attractive book in which a real lover of nature has brought together his appreciations of trails and pastures from Massachusetts to Montana, but chiefly of those among the Berkshires. There are eight full-page illustrations.

BEAUTIFUL CANADA, by VERNON QUINN (Stokes. $4.00). The author of Beautiful America and Beautiful Mexico has found a great theme in the wealth of legend and romance, natural grandeur, and scenic beauty of the vast Dominion that stretches from sea to sea and from the Great Lakes to the Arctic circle. He has produced a charming book, with 65 illustrations, and strikingly up to date, with a closing chapter on Scenic Roads for Motorists.

The Abingdon Press

Poets and Poetry

JOHN KEATS, by AMY LOWELL, 2 vols. (Houghton Mifflin).

WHAT'S O'CLOCK, by AMY LOWELL.

These two large volumes of biography and the slender volume of verse have an essential relationship. The volume, What's O'Clock, named from King Richard's query, Ay, What's o'clock?, in Shakespeare's King Richard III, contains 64 poems written during the last four years of Miss Lowell's life when she was engaged in writing the biography of Keats. Her work as poet is extricably woven with her work as biographer. Not only is the biographical work reflected in the poetry, in its general backgrounds as well as in such specific poems as View of Teignmouth in Devonshire, but it is Miss Lowell's poetical vision and attainments that give her biography distinction. We turned to this great biography of over thirteen hundred pages—now in its fifth impression—after having read a long dry-as-dust review of that adversely critical type which was said (I hope without truth) to have hastened Miss Lowell's death—though this particular review appeared after that sad event. The reviewer asserted that he had read every word of every page. He recounted the number of errors that he had found. Dogmatically and pedantically he asserted that she was unqualified for her task and that she lacked knowledge of the literary backgrounds, and he quoted things to show her lack of taste only to display his own blindness.

It has been a pleasure to turn from the pedant counting motes and specks to the real glow of these noble volumes. It may well be that in her anxiety to write of Keats from a twentieth century point of view, in distinction from the books on Keats which, as she says, have belonged, without exception, to the nineteenth century in attitude if not in fact," Miss Lowell has overstated her case, and has seen the poet too exclusively in the light of her own very original and individualistic theories of poetry. What is to the point, however, is that she has seen a great poet with a poet's eye and with a penetration into the life and imagery of which the poetry is the outward form. That any poet thus needed interpreting it was the poet Keats. Fortunately the greatness of Miss Lowell's work has not gone unrecognized, and successive printings have been necessary to meet the demand for these books. Miss Lowell has had the advantage of owning one of the finest collections of books and manuscripts relating to Keats. The volumes have constant reference to treasures in her own collection, and include nine hitherto unpublished letters of Keats, five unpublished poems, and many other matters that are interesting and illuminating.

THE COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS OF EDNA DEAN PROCTOR (Houghton Mifflin. $3.00). Miss Proctor was born in 1829 and she lived to be over 90. Her poems are now for the first time brought together in a complete edition. The poems cover a wide range of interest in territory and theme. Pre-eminently American in setting and historic reference, there are none the less sections that express the far vision and eclectic soul of the poet. A large section is devoted to Russian Poems. Admiration for England is breathed in several poems, especially in those of the war period. These especially reveal the strength of form and vigor of spirit that characterized Miss Proctor's work even when she was well into her eighties.

SELECTED POEMS, by EDGAR LEE MASTERS (Macmillan. $2.50). A substantial volume of over 400 pages. To those who have known Mr. Masters chiefly through the brief and clever sketches of the Spoon River Anthology the many longer poems in this collection will be welcome for their revelation of his sustained power as a literary craftsman. One derives also the impression of a deep sincerity beneath the bitter irony and cynicism that mark much of his work—a sincerity, however, that is mainly that of criticism and negation and protest. Such poems as At Sagamore Hill, in which Roosevelt figures, reveal the larger kindlier mood of Mr. Masters, but they are exceptional. Other poems, like The Negro Ward reveal a soul capable of great and noble feeling. Masters seems at times a mocking, cyni defiant anti-Christ, and at other times the of a prophet whose iconoclasm is chiefly nst the shams and hypocrisies that have n to themselves the cover of sanctity.

OLLECTED POEMS, by VACHEL LINDSAY cmillan. $3.50). Poets, like preachers, tested ultimately by their response to the me. How will Edgar Lee Masters and iel Lindsay rank in the verdict of the fu-
? Both are unquestionably men of excepl genius. Present-day radical criticism
d probably assign the higher place to Mas-but there is a sense of sublimity in Lindthat may give to his work a greater perma-
e. The two men have much in common in , method, and independence. They are individualists in the realm of poetry, but say has a note of praise and a rhythmic onse to life and the universe in strong rast with the rebellious rumblings and the tual dyspepsia of Masters. The Collected ns of Lindsay were announced for publi-on last year but they have only recently come ugh. Their appearance is a real literary
t. The volume is dedicated to "Sara Teas-Poet," and its illustrations by Mr. Lind-himself are a notable part of the work.
recently the poem, General William Booth
ers Heaven, was set to music by Sydney ier, and was sung at Carnegie Hall, New k, by Louise Homer, when Mr. Lindsay and General's daughter, Commander Eva th, were both in the audience.

EW POEMS, by JOHN DRINKWATER (Hough-Mifflin. $1.25). THE MUSE IN COUNCIL, JOHN DRINKWATER (Houghton Mifflin.
0). This volume of verse, and the volume essays, display John Drinkwater's recent k, though the essays represent the gathering ther and revision of things written at vari-times during the last fifteen years. Of the as about one half are translations from the nan, introduced by interesting comment on man poetry and an explanation of the na-and purpose of the translations. The es-in The Muse in Council are all devoted oets and poetry. They are in three secs: the first discussing theories, the second, r the title Ancient Altars, dealing with ey, Milton, Gray, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Shelley, and the third, under Modern Inces, discussing more recent poets, including hapter on Edwin Arlington Robinson, in h Mr. Drinkwater has said some very plain gs to his fellow countrymen concerning the quality of certain phases of present-day of Life, Jesus in Every-Day Life, etc. A most distinctive and valuable collection that apparently has come not through an impulse of artificial construction, but rather as a transcription and record of the vital contacts of a Christian in communion with the best.

Biography and Autobiography

WIVES, by GAMALIEL BRADFORD (Harpers. $3.50). In a previous volume, Portraits of American Women, Mr. Bradford discussed a group of women notable for their own achievements, but of those in this book all would probably have remained unknown except for their husbands, save Theodosia Burr, who is recalled because of her father. He tells us that the women analyzed in these pages would assist the assertion of Henry Adams that the American woman is distinctly superior to the American man. One exception to this he admits is Mrs. Abraham Lincoln. His comparison of her to Queen Victoria, as Mr. Strachey saw her, is interesting. He sees "the same dignified yet dumpy figure, the same round, hard, positive, dominating face." Again, when discussing her power to relieve the melancholy of Lincoln, he says, "when I think of that concise, hard, unsympathetic face, I wonder." Other wives to whom Mr. Bradford applies his well-known method of biographical analysis are Mrs. Benedict Arnold, Theodosia Burr, Mrs. James Madison, Mrs. Jefferson Davis, Mrs. Benjamin F. Butler, and Mrs. James Gillespie Blaine.

THE EARL BISHOP: THE LIFE OF FREDERICK HERVEY, BISHOP OF DERRY, EARL OF BRISTOL, by WILLIAM S. CHILDE-PEMBERTON, 2 vols., with 45 illustrations (Dutton. $12.00 the set). Visitors to the Continent of Europe may have remarked upon the fact that almost every chief city has its "Hotel Bristol." The explanation is in the remarkable and eccentric eighteenth-century character whose intimate life-story is told in these two fine volumes. An Irish bishop and an English earl, drawing rich revenues from both offices, Frederick Hervey spent most of his life in Italy and on the Continent. One pictures him as an absentee bishop, more concerned with worldly culture and political intrigue than with spiritual interests and affairs. Yet that is not the whole of the picture, for the striking characterization by Goethe, published as a foreword, presents a character that cannot so lightly be dismissed. Goethe describes him as "quick in his speech, blunt, sometimes even rude; in more than one respect narrow and one-sided; as a Briton, unbending; as an individual, obstinate; as a divine, stiff; as a scholar, pedantic." He accords him honesty, zeal for the good, and specifies many other admirable qualities.

The Earl Bishop was a patron of the arts and a builder with grandiose conceptions. He was a strange mixture of munificence and meanness. He built three palaces, and spent not less than £20,000 a year on works of art, yet he treated his family niggardly and his wife with scant consideration. He essayed a part in international politics and intrigues with his friend Frederick William of Prussia for the dividing of France into two countries.

Mr. Childe-Pemberton, who died before his volumes were published, has written a memoir so well documented that in addition to the interest of the chief figure his volumes have great value for the intimate picture of the times which they reveal. Whatever one may think of the Earl Bishop, it is good to recall the statement in his epitaph that "hostile sects which had long entertained feelings of deep animosity towards each other were gradually softened and reconciled by his influence and example," and that the Roman Catholic Bishop and the Dissenting Minister resident at Derry both contributed toward the erection of the obelisk upon which that epitaph was inscribed.

BETWEEN BLACK AND WHITE, by HENRY HUGH PROCTOR (Pilgrim Press. $1.50). Dr. Proctor is pastor of the Nazarene Congregational Church in Brooklyn, N. Y., and previously achieved wide attention in his notable pastorate of First Church, Atlanta. He is an outstanding preacher, writer, and leader among the colored people. Chapters of his autobiography were published in The Congregationalist in 1924. Now we have the whole story of the life and philosophy of this remarkable man. It is a story of absorbing interest. It is inspiring and constructive. It carries its convincing lessons of faith, courage, optimism, the will to achieve and devotion to service.

Dr. Proctor helps his white readers to understand the race problem and, we trust, may stir them to strive more earnestly to solve it righteously. The story of his rise from poverty in a backwoods cabin, up over the obstacles that confront the poor colored youth, to success, should be an inspiration to other colored boys and girls. Most inspiring to all are Dr. Proctor's irresistible good cheer, his resolute purpose, and his constant Christian faith.

NOTES AND ANECDOTES OF MANY YEARS, by JOSEPH BUCKLIN BISHOP (Scribners. $2.50). Mr. Bishop has touched American life and some of its leaders in a very intimate way and he writes of his contacts and experiences with a journalistic skill that has the background of a life's experience. The most interesting chapter for us has been that on The Tribune and Horace Greeley. Mr. Bishop began his journalistic work on the Tribune in 1870, and his portrayal of Greeley and of the conditions in the Tribune office is delightfully entertaining. Here he became acquainted with John Hay, to whom he devotes a chapter. Others who figure in the reminiscences are Henry Ward Beecher, E. L. Godkin, William Winter, and Theodore Roosevelt. Mr. Bishop was secretary of the Panama Canal Commission for seven years, and he has an intimate and inspiring chapter on General Goethals.

Norman Peasants in America

William Beebe, author of Jungle Days (Putnam)

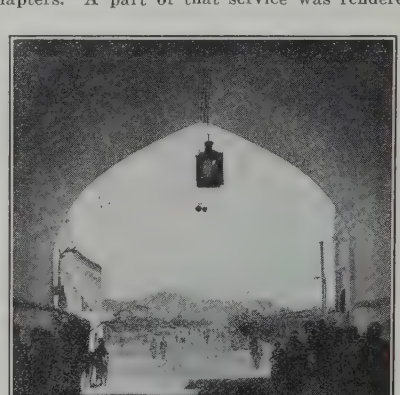
LETTERS OF ROSA LUXEMBOURG TO KARL AND LOUISE KAUTSKY, edited by LOUISE KAUTSKY (McBride. $2.50). Rosa Luxembourg, whose death occurred early in the revolutionary troubles following the closing of the War in Germany, is here revealed in her brilliance and human quality. The letters are interesting for the light that they throw upon the inner nature and underlying ideals of the German socialist movement. From this standpoint the volume is indispensable to the student, but it is likewise of intense interest for the average reader. The letters display in Rosa Luxembourg and in her circle of friends the blending of gentle, lovable qualities with the intense and uncompromising passion of the revolutionary zealot. One cannot read without great admiration for so earnest and self-sacrificing a figure, but the admiration is tempered with a feeling of the futility and danger of a fanaticism that led Rosa Luxembourg to break with even such friends as the Kautskys, where their political ideals and methods did not coincide. Intense honesty and fervor do not atone for the lack of tolerance and ballast.

AN OLD FASHIONED SENATOR: A STORY-BIOGRAPHY OF JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, by HARRIS DICKSON (Stokes. $2.00). Senator Williams, of Mississippi, is an interesting figure, and one doesn't need to agree with his politics or approve of his actions to find the story of his life delightfully entertaining. Mr. Dickson writes from the standpoint of something akin to hero-worship, which does not lessen the interest of his book, no matter how much it may affect it as a critical estimate of its subject. He has known Senator Williams with intimacy, and he makes him in these pages a live, resourceful, energetic, and striking figure. It is a picture that is essential in any estimate of the fiery Senator from Mississippi.

IN THE DAYS OF MY FATHER, GENERAL GRANT, by JESSE R. GRANT, in collaboration with HENRY FRANCIS GRANGER (Harper. $3.50). We assume that Mr. Grant has supplied the reminiscences which Mr. Granger has beaten into shape. At any rate, whatever the basis of collaboration, they have prepared between them a most interesting book, very intimate and illuminating in its picture of Grant. Jesse Grant was born in 1858, the last of four children. He was, therefore, a child in the days when his father commanded the army of the North, and during the occupancy of the White House, but he was his father's companion to an almost incredible degree at headquarters and in office. He was manifestly something of a spoiled child, but he was a youngster of spirit, and the picture he gives of contacts with Lincoln and others is highly entertaining. He reveals the narrowness with which Grant missed sharing the fate of Lincoln in the plot of assassination. The General Grant of these pages is a very human and lovable figure. He was a hero to his small son even before he was the triumphant commander of the North, and in these delightful pages he becomes a very real figure, unpretentious, but sincerely noble in his simple devotion to duty and in his unselfishness.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF WILLIAM REED HUNTINGTON, by JOHN WALLACE SUTER (Century. $5.00). As the rector of Grace Church, New York, William Reed Huntington occupied a prominent place in Episcopal circles and in the general religious life of America. In a subtitle to this volume he is hailed as A Champion of Unity. His vision of church unity and his service in that cause are set forth in several chapters. A part of that service was rendered



The Gate of the Trumpet and Drums
From Beyond Khyber Pass (Century)

in the completeness with which Dr. Huntington gave himself to the task of the revision of the Prayer Book. In that work he had ever in view its relation to the possibilities of unity. As pastor, preacher, statesman, poet, he occupied a far larger place than that of the rector of one parish, even a notable New York parish. A section of the present biography, following each chapter, is devoted to the publication of Dr. Huntington's letters. In these the man is revealed at his noblest. Not many seem to have been addressed to Congregationalists, but there are letters that indicate that Dr. Huntington was on terms of Christian intimacy with Dr. T. T. Munger and Dr. Newman Smythe. The chapters and the letters that follow touch at so many points the problems and developments of American church life that it is impossible to summarize even slightly the variety and interest of this biography. Its wealth of interest is greatly enhanced by an adequate index.

KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN AS HER SISTER KNEW HER, by NORA ARCHIBALD SMITH (Houghton Mifflin. $4.00). The nature of this volume is well indicated in its title. It is an intimate picture through much detailed incident and reminiscence of a gifted author as her development and achievement were witnessed by one of her own family. Mrs. Wigg had already written her own autobiograph My Garden of Memory, but Miss Smith h filled in many omissions in that record, a from her wealth of material has supplement the picture and thrown much interesting lig upon the stories that made their author mous, notably, The Old Peabody Pew and becca of Sunnybrook Farm.

THE DREAMER: A ROMANTIC RENDERING THE LIFE STORY OF EDGAR ALLAN POE, MARY NEWTON STANARD (Lippincott. $3.5 Poe will always be such a tragic and intere ing figure in American letters, that despite that has been written about him, and the wa fare of the critics over many matters of ch acter and incident, a new book about him th is in the least vital will always be notab Mrs. Stanard's book is very vital. The fa that Poe's poem to Helen was written to member of the Stanard family whom the po knew and loved has given the author an int esting point of contact. She writes from t standpoint of a deep and sympathetic unde standing and the book is embellished wi eight fine illustrations, including the famo painting from the Charleston Museum of P on the shore of Sullivan's Island. Is it n unforgivable that a volume of such essential critical, as well as of romantic, interest shou have no index? We wish that authors and pu lishers might display a more workmanlike i stinct in this respect.

Travel and Adventure

BEYOND KHYBER PASS, by LOWELL THOM (Century. $4.00). Khyber Pass is the ga way between India and Afghanistan and it to two years for Mr. Thomas to obtain permissi for himself and his camera-colleague to pa through. Few travelers have returned to t of Afghanistan, that wild mountainous count whose people dislike foreigners. The auth tells among many interesting things about t country and its people, of his reception at t court of the Amir of Afghanistan, and of so of the attempts to introduce Western ways a customs there. Lowell Thomas, a former new paper man, was with Colonel Lawrence Arabia during the World War, and wrote t interesting book, With Lawrence in Arabi published last year. The present book, Beyo Khyber Pass, is profusely illustrated.

JUNGLE DAYS, by WILLIAM BEEBE (Pu nam). Mr. Beebe, of whose voyage in t Arcturus much has been heard lately, and wh is the author of that fascinating book, Gal pogas, has already, in two volumes, describ his life and work in the British Guiana jungl Jungle Days is a collection of essays whi have resulted from his years of scientific o servation there. Written with all the charm style, the love of nature, and the precision scientific knowledge for which he is so w known, an amazing mass of information is pr sented by Mr. Beebe. For example, he writ one essay entitled "Falling Leaves," and v learn of orchid spiders so brilliant that th hide till some particular blossom appears, th their colors and patterns are so exact th might have been fashioned at the same time the flower, of caterpillars that gnaw out bi of leaf and fill up the space with their ow bodies, of lizards that change from green brown as they crawl from green leaf to twi and of countless other wonders.

THE "TEDDY EXPEDITION," by KAI R. DAH translated by GRACE ISABEL COLBRON (Appl ton. $3.00). After some years Hans Ludv Jensen, who had been one of the members of t Denmark Expedition of exploration to Gree land, succeeded in arousing interest in enou people in Denmark to form a company to expl the fur trapping on the northeastern coast Greenland. This company had established se eral stations and each year a vessel was sent with supplies, to return laden with furs. The schooner Teddy made three trips, and this exciting narrative of her last voyage, begun in June, 1923, and her loss in the Polar Sea, is written by a member of the expedition. Much of interest will be found in the chapters dealing with life at the stations, with fox trapping, and hunting. On the return voyage the Teddy was wrecked in the ice. Her crew sought refuge upon an ice floe and drifted down the Arctic Ocean for two months and for 790 miles. The author, a journalist, has written a thrilling and enthralling book full of Arctic adventure and with many illustrations from photographs taken by himself.

THE MAP THAT IS HALF UNROLLED, by ALEXANDER POWELL (Century. $3.50). The recollection of that most fascinating travel book, Beyond the Utmost Purple Rim, will cause its many readers to welcome this second of a trilogy of travel books in which Colonel Powell recounts his journeyings in Africa. In this new book he tells how he went from Dar-es-Salaam on the East Coast of Africa in Tanganyika Territory to Boma on the West Coast. He traveled as far as Lake Tanganyika by what was once a German-owned road, the only railroad in the world which has been compelled to increase the height of its telegraph-poles to prevent the wires from being broken by giraffes. At Ujiji he halted under an ancient mango-tree where took place the famous meeting of Livingstone and Stanley in 1871. He has a good word to say for the missionaries, believing them much maligned by their critics. Mr. Powell has viewed many strange scenes and has had many unique experiences, out of which he has written a most alluring book.

MESA CANYON AND PUEBLO, by CHARLES F. LUMMIS (Century. $4.50). Mr. Lummis says, "I originated this slogan: 'See America First,' and I gave good reason for the seeing." With this statement every reader of Mr. Lummis' book will agree, for the things he has to tell about the Southwest, that area including principally New Mexico and Arizona, are most interesting and altogether too little known to most Americans. Forty years ago Mr. Lummis, just out of Harvard, walked to California for fun, passing through the Southwest, and he has returned to it often and studied it continuously. His chapters on the Penitentes or Self-Crucifiers, the Snake dancers, the camels brought over by Jefferson Davis for transportation purposes across the desert, the Petrified Forest of Arizona, and many other things, abound with unusual information. He is an authority on the manners and customs of the Indians, and writes of the beauties and natural wonders of the Southwest with great vividness. There are in the volume nearly a hundred illustrations made from rare photographs.

ARGONAUTS OF THE SOUTH, by CAPTAIN FRANK HURLEY (Putnam). Among the most fascinating books of last year was Captain Hurley's Pearls and Savages, remarkable as much for its story of sheer adventure as for its wealth of wonderful illustrations, mostly the reproduction of actual photographs. It is a somewhat different theme that has invited Captain Hurley in this volume, but the book displays the same qualities of interest for mind and eye. It is not so gorgeous as Pearls and Savages, for exploration in ice fields does not offer the alluring color of South Sea islands; but in addition to being an intrepid explorer and adventurer Captain Hurley is a master in the art of making books and his eye for photographic effects makes his pictures unique. For instance, when he would indicate the difficulties under which his photographs were taken, he has sensed the pictorial value of reproducing a photograph of his face so covered with a mask of ice and snow that it looks more like a mountain crag than a human face. Everywhere, both in text and illustration, he has the art of making things vivid. The book is based largely on Captain Hurley's experiences as official photograper, accompanying both Sir Ernest Shackleton and Sir Douglas Mawson on their Antarctic expeditions.

From The Little World (Macmillan)

ON NEW SHORES, by KONRAD BERCOVICI (Century. $4.00). Last year Mr. Bercovici brought out through the Century Co. a most unique volume, Around the World in New York. It presented in a vivid way the kaleidoscopic picture of the foreign peoples in New York. In this book Mr. Bercovici extends his observations and his sympathetic interpretation of the life of immigrant peoples to the country at large, or at least to a large part of the country. He writes of the Danish community in Askov, Minn., of the Bohemian settlement in this country, of German Russians in North Dakota, and of French people in the same state. Italians, Finns, Poles, Jugoslavs, Rumanians, Dutch, Germans, Jews, Lithuanians, Swedes, Japanese, Chinese, Spaniards, and "other nations" are all treated in respective chapters which deal either with specially localized groups or with the respective group throughout the country. It is primarily a book of travel but it contains much important sociological data. There are a number of illustrations by Norman Borchardt.

FLANDERS AND HAINAULT, by CLIVE HOLLAND (The Medici Society. $2.50). A graphic account of the western section of Belgium, including descriptions of the notable cities of Bruges, Brussels, Ghent, Ypres, and Mons. The 150 fine photogravure illustrations add greatly to the charm of the volume.

THE OLD FRANCISCAN MISSIONS OF CALIFORNIA, by GEORGE WHARTON JAMES (Little, Brown. $2.00). A new edition of a popular hand-book of the old California missions. Indispensable for the visitor who would understand the history and significance of these famous shrines.

RIDER'S CALIFORNIA (Macmillan. $5.00). This Guide-Book for Travelers, with 28 maps and plans, has been compiled by Frederic Taber Cooper under the general editorship of Fremont Rider. It is convenient in size, but is exhaustive in its detail, and so far as we are aware the most adequate guide-book available.

INDIANS OF THE ENCHANTED DESERT, by LEO CRANE (Little, Brown. $5.00). Few are better qualified to write of the American Indian than Mr. Crane. For seven years he worked in the Indian Bureau in Washington, and since then he has ruled four different Indian reservations. He tells of the charm of the desert country of the Southwest, of its spell that can never be broken. But it is chiefly of the Indians that he writes. The great Snake Dance of the Hopis is described at length and he discusses why the Indians are not killed by the poison of the rattlesnakes. There is much concerning the mysterious rites, psycology, and folk-lore of the desert Indians. The illustrations are many and are a valuable part of the book.

MY DITTY BAG, by CHARLES W. BROWN (Small Maynard. $2.00). "In every sailor's chest was to be found a 'ditty bag' containing their more valued and portable treasures, and from it they could produce a most curious collection of articles." So Mr. Brown tells us from his mental "ditty bag" he is producing recollections from many years at sea that may be of interest to the present generation. He had many interesting adventures and has witnessed some striking incidents which he describes entertainingly.

The Enchanted East

It is a great satisfaction that these days of increasing travel and contact are producing along with the new problems of international relationship and diplomacy in relation to the Far East, a valuable literature of description and interpretation of Eastern lands and peoples. In view of this it has seemed fitting to list together books dealing with various phases of Eastern life, and especially with China, India, and Japan.

RED BLOSSOMS: A STORY OF WESTERN INDIA, by ISABEL BROWN ROSE (Revell. $175). Recently we commended James Livingstone Stewart's The Laughing Buddha as the greatest missionary novel that we had ever read. Revell is fortunate in issuing during the same year this novel by a member of the Marathi Mission of the American Board, which has, like Dr. Stewart's book, the qualities that make it an exceptionally good novel apart from its missionary interest. That really is the test of a truly great missionary novel—will it pass muster in the critical field as a story which anybody would read with interest? Here is a book with a vital plot in which romance is interwoven through the labyrinth of duty, love, and conflict. It is a book of contrasts and of strong character drawing, in which two very different types of missionary women appear—the one a moral machine in whom all softness and emotionalism has disappeared under the rigors of devotion and self-discipline, the other a very human, lovable type, who does win the love of an honorable English army officer, but who proves as heroic and devoted as the more rigorous older woman in the time of testing. We commend this book unhesitatingly. It is first of all a good story, which makes it a good missionary book, and the fact that it is by one of our own missionaries ought to make it of special interest to Congregationalists.

WEST OF THE PACIFIC, by ELLSWORTH HUNTINGTON (Scribners. $4.50). Mr. Huntington is research associate in geography in Yale University. This volume recounts his recent travels in Japan, Corea, China, Java, and Australia. Its scientific backgrounds of anthropological and geographical interest give it an importance beyond that of an entertaining story of travel, though it is this also. The author's contacts were intimate and were directed toward getting the native viewpoint and toward seeing and estimating the things beneath the surface. There is about the book an atmosphere of human sympathy and hope, and while it is largely a book of impressions it throws much valuable light on the political, economic, and racial problems associated with the East. It is illustrated by many fine photographs.

A Cannibal of the Congo
From The Map that is Half Unrolled (Century)

ROVING THROUGH SOUTHERN CHINA, by HARRY A. FRANCK (Century. $5.00). This successor to the author's Wanderings in Northern China completes Mr. Franck's account of travels in the vast country covered by the old Chinese Empire. The primary interest of Mr. Franck's book is that of a book of travel, but the pure realism of his writing, with its wealth of incident and detail, makes it a valuable background against which to consider the whole problem of present tasks and future development. Mr. Franck's own freedom from scientific, political, or religious bias makes his record all the more noteworthy. It is, of course, far too large and varied a book to attempt to summarize even its most important facts and observations. It is the story of a leisurely traveler who walked during much of his journey. He remarks upon his unusual freedom from adventure, and upon the safety with which he journeyed through the interior, but his book is full of the most striking revelations of conditions, habits, customs, and characteristics. In view of the wide discussion going on at present over "birth-control," and the tendency to make this theme an important one for discussion at church conferences, especially in England and on the Continent, these remarks of Mr. Franck are striking: "The missionaries," he says, "cannot take up what from the earthly point of view at least is China's most crying need, a reduction in the birth rate, and suggest the wisdom of keeping each family within reasonable limits, because it is unholy to interfere with the processes of nature." Yet, from his point of view, he remarks upon the inconsistency of those who hold such convictions in interfering incontinently with the processes of nature in other respects. The book is very thoroughly illustrated.

TEMPLE BELLS AND SILVER SAILS, by ELIZABETH C. ENDERS (Appleton. $3.00). A book on China, of travel and impressions, based on Mrs. Enders' journeyings into the interior, as well as upon life in Shanghai. The author traveled up the Ch'ien Tang River to the Dragon Gorge at Easter time, and her description of the mountains aflame with red azaleas and white with bridal wreath is alluring. Her book lacks the variety and the highway-and-by-way quality of Mr. Franck's large volume, but it has a woman's touch of delicacy and power of description. It has many illustrations.

CHINESE FANTASTICS, by THOMAS STEEP (Century. $2.00). A delightfully entertaining book in which the author has brought together glimpses and sketches of all manner of odd phases of Chinese life. He writes of superstitions and realities, of personalities and peculiarities. Almost every page has something unusual. There is, for instance, the story of the magistrate, a lover of nature, who used to sentence first offenders to produce so many butterflies, with wings uninjured, which the court released and counted as they flew out the window. The offender was then dismissed. The magistrate defended his practice, saying: "The beauties of nature should be an antidote to crime. He who obtains his liberty through the intercession of the beautiful butterflies, and then commits another crime, must be incorrigible. I never have mercy on a second offender." There is also the story of the Empress Dowager Tzu Hsi, "the woman that henpecked a nation," who liberated ten thousand birds on her birthday with a prayer that they might never be recaptured. And the book is replete with similar oddities.

SOME CHINESE FRIENDS OF MINE, by MARY FRANCES E. KELLY (Powell & White, Cincinnati, O.). Miss Kelly is a missionary of whom it is said: "For twenty-seven years she has made her "house by the side of the road" at South Gate, Nanking. She has lived in a Chinese house, eaten Chinese food, traveled in Chinese fashion, put up in Chinese inns." In these sketches she writes from inner knowledge and sympathy, and from the standpoint of one who has made friendship an effective method of Christian service.

PEACOCKS AND PAGODAS, by PAUL EDMONDS (Dutton. $5.00). Mr. Edmonds has spent much time in Burma, entering very intimately into the life of the people of that picturesque country. In this volume he presents a thorough study of Burma and the Burmese in their economic, political, social, and religious life. It is a strange land where life is cheap and tragedy and gaiety intermingle. In addition to the descriptions of the life and habits of the people the author tells many interesting stories illustrating the social backgrounds and the psychology of the people. The book has 45 attractive illustrations done in a sort of semi-silhouette manner.

The Near East: Present and Past

THE VANISHED CITIES OF ARABIA, by MRS. STEWART ERSKINE (Dutton. $6.00). The subject matter of this volume, Mrs. Erskine's vivid descriptions, and Major Benton Fletcher's superb illustrations, a number of them in rich color, combine to make this a most entrancing book. In these vanished cities of rocky cliff and desert is symbolized a vanished history through which moved such figures as Alexander, Herod, and Cleopatra, and in which were staged the struggles of ancient empires. Here is the story of massive ruined temples, fortresses, and castles—an ancient glory of civilization that passed in war and conflict. Several chapters deal with Petra and its history in sunccessive periods. Other chapters are devoted to Kerak, the Cities of the Plain, Madeba, Ammon, Philadelphia, and Jerash. There is much on the literary, religious, and philosophical backgrounds associated with these ancient places and their history.

A HISTORY OF THE PHARAOHS, by ARTHUR WEIGALL (Dutton. $6.00). Mr. Weigall is late Inspector-General of Antiquities, Government of Egpyt. In this volume, which is Vol. I, he treats of the first eleven dynasties. His purpose has been to write a history which will deal with the problems of interest to the student, but which will at the same time make these problems and matters of controversy intelligible for the average reader. In his preface Mr. Weigall gives a very frank estimate and characterization of the work of the most outstanding writers upon Egyptology, in which he ranks Professor Breasted of Chicago as the leading Egyptologist of the day, but rather summarily dismisses other well-known writers in this field as either of secondary importance or as untrustworthy. He speaks of Sir E. A. Wallis Budge's voluminous works, for instance, as revealing "his industry rather than his reliability." Mr. Weigall regards Dr. Reisner of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, and Mr. Winlock, of the Metropolitan Museum, New York, as the two best excavators of the modern school. The history has many illustrations, and a map and diagram.

THE AMERICAN TASK IN PERSIA, by A. C. MILLSPAUGH (Century. $3.00). Mr. Millspaugh, a native of Michigan, and a graduate of Albion college, the University of Illinois, and Johns Hopkins, has been in the employ of the Persian Government in the task of reconstruction of an ancient country. His work as Administrator General of the Finances of Persia began in 1922, and he states that the present volume is only an introduction to the story, as he has recently engaged a dozen more Americans to go back with him to Persia to assist that country in working out a policy of reform. He writes from the standpoint of genuine sympathy and affection for the Persian people, who, he believes, have a sincere desire and a real capacity for progress. He gives a fine account of Reza Khan Pahlevi, the Prime Minister, and his vigorous activities in reorganization. If Mr. Millspaugh writes with optimism he has not ignored the difficulties. His book bears the marks of trained judgment and accuracy, and it is probably the best source available for up-to-date knowledge concerning conditions and the prospective future in Persia.

OSMAN PASHA, by WILLIAM JOURDAN RAPP (Century. $1.25). In this four-act play the author has sought to set forth the drama of the New Turkey. No man can write, even a play, upon Turkey without inviting challenge and controversy. Mr. Charles V. Vickery of the Near East Relief refers to some of these controversial matters in his introduction. Mr. Rapp sees the hope of the East in a regenerated Turkey, and he associates with this regeneration a non-dogmatic and non-theological appreciation of the essential teaching of Jesus.

Various Titles and Themes

LETTERS TO A LADY IN THE COUNTRY, edited by STUART P. SHERMAN (Scribners. $2.00). Though "Paul and Caroline" are credited with the authorship of these letters, one suspects that Mr. Sherman has had a larger hand than that of editing and introducing. They bear the ear-marks of the brilliant Letters to Cornelia. If "Paul and Caroline" do not exist it is fortunate that they were invented, for they supply a most interesting motif for the letters. "Paul," a young man of thirty, from Kentucky, who has come to New York to "break into the writing game," proposes to an editor an ingenious scheme for getting things read west of the Hudson, beyond which, he says, the "widest-eyed of the literary editors can see nothing." He himself is to be the link, between city and provinces, writing once a week for publication a letter to a New York girl married to a friend of his out in Kentucky. The lady, naturally, replied, and her husband also, though "a bit slow and real blue grass," took an occasional hand in the correspondence. Out of this tripartite letter-writing develops a discussion of books and of life that has all the charm and originality that one associates with the author of the Letters to Cornelia.

THE HIDDEN YEARS, by JOHN OXENHAM (Longmans. $1.75). Mr. Oxenham has written a very beautiful story of the boyhood, youth, and early manhood of Jesus. Naturally, such a tale is somewhat imaginative, but it affords opportunity for a setting and incidents that give much reality to the backgrounds of the hidden years of Jesus. The tale is told by one who came as a boy to live next door to Jesus, and who was his companion and partner in play and work. Mr. Oxenham has written with great delicacy and reverence, and his book will help to make vivid the beauty of the human life of Jesus. It is already finding a wide circulation.

THE DRIFTING COWBOY, by WILL JAMES (Scribners. $3.50). Illustrated by the author. Mr. James was a real cowboy who took up writing and drawing when an accident ended his days in the saddle. His drawings are full of intensity, and his text, written in cowboy lingo, the appropriate medium of expression, is fine descriptive writing, spontaneous and vividly realistic. This book is a worthy successor to Cowboys, North and South, which appeared last year.

TWENTY MILES OUT, by HERSELF (Little, Brown. $1.25), is anonymously written. It is a fascinating tale of adventure and misadventure on the part of newly-weds who decide to live "twenty miles out." The husband commutes to his business. From the time the bride pokes her broom handle through the sagging ceiling paper, releasing a miniature Niagara that hits her in the eye, to the Christmas eve spent in the attic, this little volume is full of vivid flashes and snapshots. The tale can be read at one sitting.

THE CREATIVE SPIRIT: AN INQUIRY INTO AMERICAN LIFE, by ROLLO WALTER BROWN (Harper. $2.50). Mr. Brown believes that the creative spirit is being stifled in the United States today by the standardizing tendencies in education, art, religion, and industry. His volume is saved from pessimism by the wholesomeness of its outlook on human nature, and by its freedom from the exotic nonsense of the literary and artistic poseur, which the author himself hits off with fine scorn in his discussion of "the cult of degradation." It is a volume marked by much sanity and clear vision. We recently referred editorially to the challenge of Mr. Brown's chapter on The Church.

PSYCHOLOGY AND MORALS, by J. H. HADFIELD (McBride. $2.00). This Analysis of Character, by an eminent practising English psychiatrist, Lecturer in Psychology in King's College, London, was given in substance as the Dale Lectures at Mansfield College, Oxford, in 1920. Dr. Hadfield's work ought to be known by every preacher, but this book will have equal attraction for the layman and student. He is a man of the very highest standing and his work not only speaks with a measure of authority but it will be found a wholesome corrective for much of the moral nonsense being exploited in the name of psychology. Such chapters as those on Libertinism and Self-Expression, "Nervous" Disease, Moral Disease and Sin, and Biology and Morality are especially significant, but the entire book is important. We hope to see it attain a wide circulation in this first American edition. It is the sort of book that one cannot commend too strongly.

ALMOST HUMAN, by ROBERT M. YERKES (Century. $3.00). How many people know that apes have been taught to speak? The author of this book, Prof. Robert M. Yerkes, of the Institute of Psychology, Yale University, has written an account of his study of a colony of apes and monkeys established by Senora Rosalia Abreu, on her estate in Cuba. His conclusions regarding their intelligence, speech, emotions, etc., are recorded in this most unusual and interesting volume and have caused him to use the title Almost Human. One of the most interesting chapters deals with anthropoid speech. The successful experiments of several scientists in teaching these animals to speak a word or two of our language are described, and he records his conviction that while these primates have ideas and understand much that is said to them, and even communicate with each other, these communications are primarily innate emotional expressions and do not constitute true language. He thinks they have plenty to talk about but have failed to develop speech because of the absence of a tendency to imitate sounds.

Some Holiday Fiction

MR. PETRE, by HILAIRE BELLOC, with illustrations by G. K. CHESTERTON (McBride. $2.50). This is the story of a man who lost his memory and the only name that suggested itself to him as familiar was Petre. Registering under that name, which was that of an American multi-millionaire, he is mistaken for him. This innocent assumption of an identity brings many uncalculating results. It is interesting to notice just how different are the stories hinging on the loss of memory, that various authors have written. This is a humorously satirical tale of high finance. Enjoyable too are the illustrations by G. K. Chesterton, who naturally quite enters into the spirit of a book by his friend Hilaire Belloc.

GABRIEL SAMARA PEACEMAKER, by E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM (Little, Brown. $2.00). Gabriel Samara is the name chosen by Mr. Oppenheim for the great character he creates who has freed Russia from the thrall of the Bolsheviki and made her again a prosperous nation. The task on which he is engaged as peacemaker in this novel of international intrigue is the disbanding of the Russian armies which is interrupted by a plot to restore—Tzardom. Mr. Oppenheim is a master hand in this particular field of writing.

THE DAUGHTER OF THE HOUSE, by CAROLYN WELLS (Lippincott. $2.00). A new mystery story concerning the disappearance of a bride and the man she was to marry, a few hours before the wedding. The suspense of the story is maintanied till the arrival of the noted detective, Fleming Stone, for whom every puzzle means instant solution.

THE PEACOCK'S TAIL, by MRS. ROMILLY FEDDEN (Houghton Mifflin. $2.00). As the Moorish Proverb, "The earth is a Peacock; Morocco is the tail of it," will suggest, the scene of the story is Morocco. It is a tale of intrigue and adventure during the world war, of Germans endeavoring to make use of the Spanish to invade French territory and of Moors rising against the Spaniards. An unusually well-told story.

THE EMIGRANTS, by JOHAN BOJER (Century. $2.00). If it be true that there are as many Scandinavians in America as are left in Scandinavia itself, the importance of a book, dealing with a people destined to play such a large part in American life, and which gives a very complete picture of these people at home and their struggles after reaching America, can scarcely be overestimated. In The Emigrants, Johan Bojer has in the first part of his novel, Book I, shown us a parish in Norway and the home life of a small group who decide to leave for America. In Book II the same group are shown crossing the prairies in a caravan of wagons and selecting their homes in North Dakota. The incredible hardships of their first winter in rude sod-huts, their poverty, their bravery, their conquest of the land, the building of real homes, and the younger generation becoming real Americans, is told simply and with restraint, but powerfully. In Book III some of the group have become affluent, and all have struggled out of dire poverty. All through the years of toil the hope of going home "rich" has been the incentive of many. Bojer gives a remarkable picture of their hearts torn by longing for the land of their birth. Some return to Norway only to find that they can no longer be happy. America, where they have poured out the last efforts of their toiling manhood, has claimed them at last. Mr. Bojer spent a year among the Norwegian settlers in Dakota in preparation for writing this book.

THE HUNTER'S MOON, by ERNEST POOLE (Macmillan). To make real a little boy's world, to interpret for grown-ups his dreams, his imaginings, and his reactions to an unhappy home life, is the difficult task Mr. Poole has attempted in his story, The Hunter's Moon. Amory had a mother who lacked most of the domestic virtues, a father engrossed in business, and a domineering grandmother. His home was full of strife, a mother and daughter-in-law quarreling, a father and mother on the point of separation. A sensitive child, to escape such an atmosphere, takes refuge at times on the roof of the apartment house. Here it is his grandfather, who is a wanderer and a collector of folk-songs, comes to sing to him while the Hunter's Moon is rising. Together they plan and dream—mostly of escape to a ranch in Texas. It is a simple story beautifully told. There are certainly many things in life that might well be viewed from a child's standpoint.

JOHN MACNAB, by JOHN BUCHAN (Houghton Mifflin. $2.00). If a man becomes so bored with life that he fancies his health is affected, and if his doctor as a friend advises him to steal a horse in some part of the world where a horse thief is usually hanged, and he then finds two other men, Englishmen like himself, of high position, suffering in the same way, it may be they would agree to try poaching as a remedy. At any rate this is the foundation of Mr. Buchan's good story of following the deer and fishing for salmon in the rugged Scottish Highlands with ever the danger of being nabbed as poachers to add zest to adventure.

NAVAHO TALES RETOLD, by WILLIAM WHITMAN, 3RD (Houghton Mifflin. $1.75). Many old legends and myths that were handed down from one generation to another among the Navaho Indians, who inhabit the dry plains and mountains of New Mexico and Arizona, were originally translated from the Navaho by Dr. Washington Matthews. These have been retold by Mr. Whitman for boys and girls, though grown-ups will enjoy them also. They are strange tales of gods and wizards and giants, and the illustrations by John E. Hein are also strange and very striking.

MAY FAIR, by MICHAEL ARLEN (Doran. $2.50). The immense success of The Green Hat has led to a demand for all of Arlen's books. This differs from The Green Hat in being a series of short stories, or "episodes," some strangely whimsical and fantastic, but all told with rare skill, and in a style that belongs to Michael Arlen himself. There are 11 sketches in the present volume, all "purporting to reveal to gentlefolk the real state of affairs existing in the very heart of London during the fifteenth and sixteenth years of the reign of His Majesty George the Fifth."

BELSHAZZAR, by WILLIAM STEARNS DAVIS (Macmillan. $2.00). This is a re-issue of a book first published early in the present century. It is a tale of the fall of Babylon, in which this able and well-known author has interwoven thrilling plot and incident with historic fact. THE WHITE QUEEN, same author, publisher, and price, is also a reprint of another notable historical novel, first published over 20 years ago. It is a story of the youth of St. Louis, King of France, and was originally published under the title of Falaise of the Blessed Voice. Both books are to be highly commended.

STRAWS AND PRAYER BOOKS, by JAMES BRANCH CABELL (McBride. $2.50). The second edition of a somewhat strange and varied book which displays Mr. Cabell's somewhat sagacious and sometimes rapacious irony. We have always felt that the suppression of one of Mr. Cabell's books was unfortunate. He is of the school that sneers at religion, but it is always possible to make religion less capable of being sneered at. When Mr. Cabell remarks, for instance (a typical bit of his irony), that the Mussulmans of Mohammed "have waged religious wars with a malignity not often surpassed by the servitors of Christ," is he not making a very justifiable thrust at a religion of professed love and peace, which has not found it incompatible with its professions to sanctify the most cruel and unjust of wars?

THE CHICKEN-WAGON FAMILY, by BARRY BENEFIELD (Century. $2.00). The "chicken-wagon family," after driving by mule-team about the Southern states, bartering tinware and other articles for chickens, decided to settle down in New York. A young man just out of college, who had joined them in their wanderings, shared their lot in the great city, and among their many unusual experiences there develops a beautiful idyll between himself and the young daughter of the chicken-wagon man. Across this idyllic life, charmingly described by the author, there comes the trail of an evil woman, and the story takes on a sordid and evil aspect. Out of the mire of this sex episode the author succeeds in bringing back something of the lost radiance of hopes and ideals, and pictures a love once more as honest and pure as that in the early part of the story. It is an unusual story both in theme and treatment, so beautiful that one feels deeply the tragedy of the marring of a life which in some measure has marred the story.

A BUSH THAT BURNED, by MARJORIE BARKLEY MCCLURE (Minton, Balch. $2.00). The story of a young woman's struggle to maintain the ideals of sound, early training against the laxity and self-indulgence of an environment of weakened standards. Much of the scene of the story is laid in Cleveland, but its trails run into the war and Europe. The heroine's love for a man whose moral standards are discovered to be somewhat different from her own involves a difficult situation, but it finds an honorable and happy solution for them both.

P. A. L., by FELIX REISENBEET (McBride. $2.00). In reading this story we had remarked several times upon its resemblance to H. G. Well's story, Tono Bungay, before discovering upon the back page of the "jacket" the publishers' statement that "P. A. L." is an American "Tono Bungay." As a story of a masterful business fakir, strangely blending real ability and sheer trickery it is not as convincig as Well's portrayal of the patent-medicine magnate. One recalls Robertson Nicoll's saying, when Tono Bungay appeared, that it reminded him of a cablegram that had once come from India, "There is a new god on the frontier, but the police are after him." "P. A. L." lacks the magnitude of the hero of Tono Bungay. We confess having found him rather uninteresting. What we have found interesting, and somewhat remarkable, in Mr. Riesenberg's story is its prologue—a fine piece of writing—and its powerful delineation of the minor characters. The picture of the Seattle boarding-house and its motley guests is memorable.

THE HARPER PRIZE SHORT STORIES (Harper. $2.00). This book contains the 12 prize-winning short stories in the 1924-1925 contest conducted by Harper's Magazine. The stories were selected by Zona Gale, Meredith Nicholson, and Bliss Perry, the last of whom contributes an introduction to the volume.

A SON OF HIS FATHER, by HAROLD BELL WRIGHT (Appleton. $2.00). One of the best of Mr. Wright's novels. It is a story of Arizona and the Mexican border. It is a love story with a heroic hero, a beautiful heroine and bad villains, and thrills run all the way through it.

THE THOUSAND AND SECOND NIGHT, by FRANK HELLER (Crowell. $2.00). Like the princess in the Arabian Nights an Arab wife averts death for herself, and for an Englishman and a Frenchman who are in the Sahara seeking fortunes, by telling tales to her jealous lord. A companion, a third adventurer, after hectic episodes in a salt lake in the desert, arrives loaded with treasure in time to arrange their escape. Excitement and mystery fill the pages of this book, which is a translation from the Swedish by Edwin Bjorkman.

HALF-TOLD TALES, by HENRY VAN DYKE (Scribners. $1.50). This is a small volume of one hundred and fifty pages, yet it contanis thirty tales. The author tells us his idea in writing them was "to leave the insignificant things out of the picture altogether." He also adds this way of writing "has no relation to the moving-picture theatre. Its only reward is in itself." So completely has he carried out this idea that some stories are told on one page. One might speak of the tales as fables, but a more correct way of characterizing them would be to say each is a searchlight flashing for an instant on some aspect of life.

VIKING'S REST, by FRANCES FENWICK WILLIAMS (Century. $2.00). A brightly written story of two girls who live in New York, one of whom after considerable struggle writes and sells a play which gives her a comfortable income. The two then go to Acadia, the land of Evangeline, and buy an attractive country cottage. There they find interesting neighbors.

For Children

MADE-TO-ORDER STORIES, by DOROTHY CANFIELD (Harcourt, Brace. $2.50). Not all boys like fairy stories, and Jimmy, aged ten, revolted and wanted something real. So Jimmy "ordered up" the stories his mother told, giving the ingredients about which she wove the most joyous and ingenious tales. Jimmy liked them and so will other children. There are twelve of them in the book.

THE MAKE-IT-UP STORY BOOK, by CORNELIA ADAMS (McBride. $1.00). Stories that are begun and not finished, but to which are added blank pages for the young reader to "make it up" in his own way, illustrating it also, if he so desires. An ingenious and stimulating sort of book, which will appeal to children of active minds.

HEIDI, by JOHANNA SPYRI, translated by ELIZABETH P. STORK (Lippincott. $1.00). A new version of this well-known children's book which makes the life of little Heidi in the Alps as real to children as life in their own environment.

How Christmas Came to Hope House

By Daisy D. Stephenson

PART I

It had all happened so unexpectedly that the three young Hopes were still blinking as they counted suitcases and bundles and prepared to climb off the cañon train whenever it stopped bucking like a broncho. "Elk Creek!" the friendly brakeman had shouted at them; for after forty miles of twisting and climbing until they felt as wound up as tops, Mary Dale and Theo and little Chris were the only passengers left.

"Keen, going on a trip all by ourselves," Theo had expressed the queer thrilled feeling shared by his sister, two years older but not so wise. "Nothing to it. Guess we could go clear to Wyoming or even Mexico easy as not."

Small Chris yawned, then tried to look like an old globe-trotter. "Huh! Guess we could go clear to Washin' City, and sleep and eat on the train and everything—if we had lots of money."

"Do you s'pose Dad and Mummy are nearly to Salt Lake City? Don't you wish we could have gone to cousin Alice's wedding?" queried Theo just before the train whistled for Elk Creek. Mary Dale's nose was flattened against the window as she peered into the gathering dusk a bit apprehensively. For the first time she wondered whether Uncle Jed would meet them.

When cousin Alice's special delivery had come announcing the sudden change in plans, "a Christmas wedding, as Dick must go to the Western coast at once," there had been a great deal of discussion over the subject "To go or not to go." It was Daddy who had suggested shipping the youngsters up Elk Creek in care of Uncle Jed and Aunt Lucy.

"You know how they wanted to keep the children when we were there last summer," he reminded Mummy. "They'll be tickled to pieces to have them now. I'll drop them a line at the office and tell them to look out for a surprise party. Let's see. When do we start?"

"Wednesday morning if we go," replied Mummy in painful indecision. "But maybe it won't be convenient for them just now, or they might have other holiday plans"—

"That's rich!" laughed Mr. Hope heartily. "You know Aunt Lucy won't even leave home to come to the Stock Show with Uncle Jed in January. I bet she hasn't left the old ranch since her boy graduated from college, and I'd hate to say how long ago that was. He and I were classmates."

"Well, but"—protested Mummy, eyeing the three hopeless-looking young hopefuls who were momentarily speechless over this unheard-of emergency. Then wise Mary Dale stepped bravely on the scales of Mummy's decision.

"Cousin Alice says it won't be a wedding unless you are there," she reminded soberly, "and we won't be a bit afraid to go on the train, will we, boys?"

Her eyes held Theo's, prompting him what to say. From his former dazed belief, along with Chicken Little, that the sky was falling, Theo was beginning to think an adventure had dropped down through the roof. Which shows how quickly one gets used to the wildest ideas.

"Sure, I mean, course not," he rallied stoutly to the cause. "You go right ahead and don't bother about us," he told his mother grown-uppishly.

"Do we eat 'n' sleep on the train?" round-eyed little Chris had inquired. That was the main thing now. To go somewhere on the train! As long as Mary Dale was anywhere within shouting distance, Chris felt no misgivings as to the happy ending. Daddy rumpled the yellow head gayly.

"No, young Tousle-head. You get on the toy train after breakfast and you get to Elk Creek before supper."

"But you take lunch to eat on the way," explained wise Mummy.

That's how it come about; and now, in the shivery December dusk, Mary Dale feared that Daddy had been too sure. For away up the deep cañon cut chugged the train, and the three travelers stood among their luggage, unhailed, unhugged—unmet!

A pleasant-looking young fellow in boots and corduroys came whistling out of the one big building, which was store and post office in partnership.

"Well, look who's here!" The young man grinned as he picked up the mail bag. Theo eyed him suspiciously, but Mary Dale greeted him as the sole beacon in a strange sea.

"We came to visit Uncle Jed Hope," she confided frankly, "and we thought he would meet us. Have you seen him?"

The young man's smile and whistle vanished. He studied the solemn trio perplexedly. "Seems to me Dad said"—he began. Then added, "But jingo! it couldn't be so. Come right inside till I wind up work and lock up, and if Mr. Hope isn't here by then, I'll take you to his place myself."

The children obeyed silently, Mary Dale avoiding Theo's roving, significant eye, and squeezing Chris's fat little hand reassuringly.

"Course it's all right, but it looks funny," Theo told the odd, drum-shaped stove. And that's about what Billy Weston, the postmaster's son, was telling himself as he tidied up for the night.

"Wish I'd paid more attention to the neighborhood news. Or that the folks hadn't had to hot-foot it to the county seat as soon as I got home." He stood at the back window drumming thoughtfully and sizing up the situation. "Shucks, it's only two miles or so up to Hope House, and I can stop at Dr. Webster's and find out. But why shouldn't the Hopes be on deck," he asked himself impatiently.

Then he locked the front door, blew out the big lamp, and sang out cheerfully, "All aboard,

'How did you happen to be turned loose to America?" he asked as he loaded his three es in the wood into the small truck and ded up the creek. "Crawl under that old fort if your teeth start playing a tune."

'Well, Dad and Mummy are going to a wed- g out in Salt Lake City where Mummy grew It's her cousin," and Mary Dale explained ly between sucks of a delectable lollypop. The children thought it would seem funny to to school or Sunday school where only a en attended.

back window from which vague outlines of machine shed and stables might be seen. "But there's no light out there. You don't s'pose they'd go to bed this early. Maybe they didn't even get Dad's message!"

Whatever Mary Dale meant to say died on her tongue, for her bright, investigating glance that instant fell upon a letter unopened, resting against one of Aunt Lucy's geraniums on the window sill. Before she could think, light footsteps drew all eyes to the door opening on the back stairs. Mary Dale protectingly grabbed for Chris as Theo cried, "Here's Aunt Lucy now!" But it was not Aunt Lucy.

Paul in Melita and Rome

Comment on the International Uniform Sunday School Lesson for December 13

Acts 28: 16-24, 30, 31

With Paul's arrival in Rome a new and important era of his life began. He may have felt, as various expressions in his farewell addresses would indicate, that he had entered upon the closing and less important stage of his career, but, as a matter of fact, the depth and permanency of his influence are associated very much with these later years. It is true that Paul was in Rome as a prisoner, and we associate all manner of hardships and cruelties with imprisonment in the ancient world. But Paul for some reason was permitted many privileges. He had the opportunity of living in his own house, and, though he was guarded by a soldier, he had the privilege of seeing his friends. H had time and opportunity also for writing, an the Epistles of the imprisonment, particularl the Epistles to the Philippians and to th Ephesians, mark the climax of his philosoph of Christian experience. One can detect grea growth in Paul's thought and outlook if he com pares these Epistles with the writings of earlie years. The circumstances of Paul's life hav led him to reflect far more deeply upon worldl institutions and personages. He sees the King dom of God more definitely as a spiritual real ity, and in his conception of the church an its growth he is less concerned with the out ward form and with outward observances an more deeply concerned with the spiritual real ity of Christian fellowship and service.

In addition to this permanent contributio of these years to the future thought and life o the Christian Church, Paul continued more im mediately the power of his mission of evangel ism and instruction. Though he could not g about from place to place he could invite man to come and see him. Apparently his own "hired dwelling" where he "abode for two whol years" was the center of a continuous proces sion of visitors, and the statement of the clos ing two verses of our lesson is one that may b interpreted in a large way.

Tradition also says that Paul exerted a pro found influence upon the Roman soldiers wh guarded him, and that the legion to which the belonged became known as the "Thundering Le gion." It would be almost impossible for an man to remain long with Paul without catch ing something of his spirit, and it would be in teresting if we could know and trace the pro found influences that came from that house i Rome occupied by this prisoner, obscure in hi own day but now foremost among the world' immortals.

The Golden Text for this lesson, though i comes out of a time when Paul was still fa from Rome and had only in remote prospec his visit there, finely expresses the whole spiri of Paul's deepening convictions. In a worldl sense he has been proud of Rome's imperi splendor. He has taken great pride in hi free-born citizenship in a world-wide empir but the vision of Rome and its splendor ha never dulled his conception of the empire o Christ and the power of the gospel. So it i these earlier words that must have been ringin through his soul day after day in the month and years of his contact with Rome. "So, a much as in me is, I am ready to preach th gospel to you that are at Rome also. For am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ: for i is the power of God unto salvation to every on that believeth."

It is easy to ask, Why should one have bee ashamed of the gospel? But the gospel in thos days must have appeared to those who believe in Rome a very insignificant and futile thin Yet how marvelously even in a formal and ou ward way history has vindicated Paul! On looks today from the ruins of the Colosseu toward the ruins of the ancient city, where ar left only mere remnants of the ancient founda tions of fora, temples, and palaces, and in th ruined walls of the Colosseum one finds a litt white tablet inscribed to the sacred memory o the martyrs who perished in the arena within Nothing could better symbolize the triumph o faith and the vindication of Paul's confidenc in the power of the gospel.

Youth's Atonement

HYMNS for the LIVING AGE

Edited by H. AUGUSTINE SMITH

Director of Fine Arts in Religion, Boston University
Director of Music, Chautauqua, N. Y.

Important features of this book:

All words are between the staffs, making it possible to read and sing with ease.

The reinforced binding protects the book against the hard, if devout usage of over-zealous members of the choir.

The responsive readings, which mark a new epoch in Biblical literature for public worship are in the front pages where they can be used without throwing the book out of balance.

The index, which is so rarely used, is in the back of the book.

The musical settings constitute a rich and varied feast throughout and are fitted to the text with great care.

The music is within the range of the average voice and creates no unwilling sopranos and bassos.

No section of the book is over-populated; there are a number of social service hymns, but not at the expense of hymns of devotion.

The price of HYMNS FOR THE LIVING AGE is $1.75. The introductory rate is $1.35 with transportation additional, from New York or Chicago

The Class of 1872 at Andover

To the Editor of The Congregationalist:

The regular graduates of the Class of 1872 f Andover Theological Seminary numbered wenty-five. I have endeavored to keep informed as to the class. To my knowledge, welve of the class are still living, eight of hom have passed the eightieth birthday, all ut one of this number still living. It is probble that two more of the class will attain that ge. The record of classes immediately preeding or succeeding this class does not comare with this as to longevity. The Class of 872 has an honorable record. I would not be onsidered as offending in the way of invidious omparisons in not mentioning other members f the class. Of this class I mention Rev. John . Browne, many years missionary in Turkey; ev. James D. Eaton, missionary for many ears in Mexico; Dr. William H. Cobb, so many ears Librarian of the Congregational Library, oston; Rev. Charles F. Dole, of Jamaica lain, Mass.; Prof. Frederic Palmer of Harvard niversity; Prof. Archibald Duff, of Scotland; ev. Edward K. Rawson, Chaplain of the . S. Navy; Rev. Rufus C. Flagg, at one time resident of a Western college; Prof. M. Stuart helps, who died young.

Montana, My Montana

By F. E. Henry

"Land of the Shining Mountains,"
And home of the lowing herds!
he flocks are afield on thy hilltops—
Thy forests are vocal with birds.
Iere gold and silver were hidden,
The lead and copper and coal;
Iere cataracts, canyons, and snowpeaks
Stun to silence the talkative soul.

land of the mile-long furrow,
In the slant of the northern sun!
n the bench where the gophers burrow
On the flats where the rivers run—
Iontana, their name is legion,
Thou hast beckoned to thy breast,
Vhere toiling is endless, sleep certain
When the flowers and birds are at rest.

nd whether the sunbeams are beating
On wheat fields all flaming with gold, nd the flax flies its morning greeting
Like a lake with its blue wavelets bold;
r the gray-plumed horsemen of heaven
Fling down the pitiless hail,
r the skies above us are brazen
And the fields and gardens all fail—

Ve love thee, Montana, our Mother.
Mighty mother of men strong and free;
he lost fountain of youth is discovered,
Gray hairs find a welcome with thee.
nd young men and maidens so hopeful,
Make a home on thy beauteous breast—
Iear the cry of an empire aborning,
The call of the beckoning West.

nd now in the dawn of the morning
Of a new day of plenty and peace,
Ve will consecrate what God has left us,
Of children, of money—nor cease
Till our all is laid on his altar
Who has led us and blessed us of old—
Iontana, Montana, our Mother,
From thee, not a whit we withhold.

Effort is worth more than the external results of effort. Effort is within our control; he results of our efforts may not be. Therefore it is important that we should not relax ffort in any direction to which duty points, o matter how small the prospect of the desired result, nor how many times we have lready tried and failed of that result.

His Audience Now Includes A Million Families~ Should not Yours be One of Them?

A Great Leader of the Church Calls to You thru a Great Magazine of the Home

Dr. Allen A. Stockdale

Whose Inspiring Messages are Yours for the Asking in PEOPLE'S HOME JOURNAL

WE ARE hearing on every hand the cry: "Religion must become a yet more vital force in home life, if this country is to free itself from evils of lawlessness and laxness that beset it now."

President Coolidge said as much in his recent address to the annual council of Congregational Churches at Washington.

Not sectarian discussion, but the spirit and power of Religion itself—its message of cheer and guidance in every crisis of life—these are the influences that Dr. Allen A. Stockdale is putting into his new editorials for PEOPLE'S HOME JOURNAL.

Dr. Stockdale, pastor of the great First Congregational Church of Toledo, Ohio, has made his church a unique power in the community. As a consequence, he has won national distinction, and has been called upon to exert the magnetism of his winning personality from hundreds of lecture platforms throughout the country.

Through PEOPLE'S HOME JOURNAL, Dr. Stockdale's audience is now widened still further, to take in all who wish to hear his inspiring messages.

Beginning with the November issue, PEOPLE'S HOME JOURNAL will publish a series of editorials by Dr. Stockdale. We are anxious that none who can appreciate his words shall miss them. Therefore we want to send you free a sample copy of the magazine. You will find it unique among periodicals because of its clean, wholesome, charming stories.

Dr. Stockdale's editorial in PEOPLE'S HOME JOURNAL is only one feature amid a whole Thanksgiving harvest of inspiring fiction and helpful articles.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

MAINE

Active Men's Class at Dixfield

The series of Community Welfare Talks being conducted under the auspices of the men's class of the Dixfield Church, of which Rev. T. B. Hatt is pastor, is meeting with notable success.

At the opening service a large audience listened to U. S. Sen. Bert M. Fernald, of Maine. In speaking on "The Community and Its Relation to Law," Mr. Fernald did not confine himself to conditions within the community alone, but referred to many things that are happening in state and nation.

On Nov. 8, another large gathering greeted the second speaker in the series, Mrs. Chestina Gilkey, who delighted the people with an inspiring address on "The Community and the Home." Mrs. Gilkey has been requested to repeat this paper before the women of Rumford.

Each talk of the series is preceded by a musical program, consisting of instrumental and vocal talent. In making up the program, Mr. Hatt endeavored to secure a layman to deal with each topic, and in that particular has been fortunate, thus strengthening the co-operative spirit along all lines of community welfare.

Subjects and speakers for this series are as follows:

The Community and Its Relation to Law—U. S. Sen. Burt M. Fernald.
The Community and the Home—Mrs. Chestina Gilkey.
The Community and the State—Mr. Vernon Rand, Traveling Salesman.
The Community and Health—Thomas S. Burr, M.D., Rumford.
The Community and Business—Mr. Frederick Smith, Superintendent, Foster Mills.
The Community and Education—Mr. E. L. Toner, Superintendent of Schools.
The Community and Thrift—Mr. E. L. Ste son, Cashier of Bank.
The Community and Citizenship—Mr. R Fowler, Principal of Dixfield High School.
The Community and the Church—Mr. Lero Williams, Superintendent of Schools, Rur ford.

While these services are in progress, t same class of aggressive laymen arranged f the second annual "Father and Son" banque which took place on the evening of Nov. 2 On that occasion the speaker was Mr. Je Smith, of Waterville, State Secretary of t Y. M. C. A.

s pastorate, the church had a membership 560. During the last 10 years 670 members ve been received. After deductions through aths and removals to other places, the pres-t membership is 1,002, a net gain of 442. any changes have taken place during these years. The old time system of a Society, rrying on the finances, and the church, which anaged the spiritual work, has been replaced the church, which has been incorporated der the state law. The system of raising cessary funds through pew rental or taxa-on of privately-owned pews, has been replaced that of free pews, and the obtaining of oney through the every member canvass. A ore formal, ritualistic order of worship has en adopted. The interior of the church has en made much brighter by the redecorating restful cream-colored tint. A new and autiful chancel has been finished, to provide hich an addition was built. The old organ hich, as with most of the old-time churches, as at the end of the church opposite the pul-t, was removed and sold, and the new, splen-d instrument was built into the chancel, here are also the choir seats. The architect as Allen & Collens of Boston. The new three-anual organ was installed by Hook and Has-ngs. The chancel itself cost $70,000. Three autiful stained glass windows, executed by eynolds, Francis & Rohnstock of Boston, e in memory of Harrison Parker, for 20 ars a deacon of the church, in memory of the Founders of the church, and in memory of Eugenia Parker Palmer, a former devoted member, whose interest in the church extended over many years. The iconographical scheme of subjects represented in the choice windows embraces the cycle of Christ's life. Those in the left-hand lancet are devoted to the childhood of Christ and include the Annunciation, the Nativity, and the Adoration of the Magi. These subjects are in the form of medallions, that is, they are enclosed within geometrical shapes, or quatrefoils. The medallions are in turn placed on a geometrical background composed of circles and interlacing strapwork. The figures, in full color and white, are silhouetted against a ground of blue. The subjects in the right-hand lancet are important incidents in the life of Christ—the Baptism, the First Miracle, and the Triumphal Entry into Jerusalem. The subjects in the central lancet are devoted to the Passion of Christ, namely, Gethsemane, the Crucifixion, and the Ascension. These windows are among the best stained glass ever made in America.

Many faithful helpers in the past are memorialized in the chancel.

Sunday, Nov. 1, will be remembered as a notable day in the history of the church. The throng of worshipers completely filled the beautiful auditorium both morning and afternoon. The church is fortunate in having as its organist Mr. G. Wallace Woodworth, whose work in drilling the recently organized vested choir, and whose mastery of the fine organ are seen in the renewed interest of the people in the services. The sermon of Dr. Chidley on "Love's Last Appeal," and the reception of new members were followed by the administration of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, in which Dr. Chidley was assisted by Rev. L. B. Swenson, assistant pastor, and by Rev. S. W. Adriance.

As a fit climax of the day's events, at four o'clock came the dedication service of the new organ. Mr. William Lester Bates, organist of Second Church, West Newton, rendered the music, which revealed the beauty and power of the instrument. In connection with the service were the special dedication of the chimes, the memorial gift for Mrs. Ellen Louise Lane, and the harp, a gift in memory of Mrs. Daniel Kelley. The beautiful organ case was likewise a gift in memory of Mr. Handel Pond.

Dr. Chidley is an earnest preacher, and prepares his message with great care. He says for himself:

I came to the firm conviction that my duty as a preacher in this generation was to preach a gospel that would help my congregation in the difficult task of living and suffering from week to week. To do that I believed that there were three fundamental facts of our gospel that must be kept in the foreground of preaching, namely, the existence of a God of love, who is at our side as the Great Companion, the fact of human immortality and the adequacy of Christ as our guide, and the only adequate Guide through life. If you give men a vivid reality of a sufficient God, who is interested in them, they can weather all the ills of life.

These words were said to his people in his tenth anniversary sermon. He believes in the old-time pastoral calling, and many of his brief sermons to the children have been printed in book form. The children are excused early in the service. In the Lenten season, he conducts a communicant's class as a preparation for intelligent church membership. The benevolences of the church are five times what they were in 1915. Besides his regular work as pastor of this church, he is greatly interested in the cause of Negro education and in the Florence Crittenton League. He is president of the latter organization, and until recently was chairman of the board of trustees of North Carolina College for Negroes, Durham, N. C.

Chain Suppers at South Deerfield

South Deerfield is planning to hold chain suppers in the homes of parishioners during the coming year in order to raise $3,000 for necessary repairs on the church building.

Rev. J. W. Moulton Resigns

The church at Worthington, in the western part of the state, recently took action on the resignation of its pastor, Rev. J. W. Moulton, who has been ordered by his physicians to a lower altitude. The following tribute from one of Mr. Moulton's parishioners bears testimony to the far-reaching influence a minister in a rural community may have:

"In accepting the resignation of our pastor, Rev. James Wilbur Moulton, we, as a church society, do so with deepest regret. Mr. Moulton came to us three years ago, and during that time has discharged every duty pertaining to his pastorate with extreme faithfulness.

"Besides being a teacher and a preacher he has gone into the homes of his parish and there talked with the indwellers and prayed with them, making every household to feel itself a part of the church, though many of these never attended a service in the church building. These visits to parishioners meant the walking of many miles. He knew by name every person in the parish, from the oldest to the very youngest. 'He comes to our school,' said one child, 'and calls us all by name.' Thus was he the true shepherd.

"Never content to use an old sermon, for his was an alert mind eager for the new, he each week prepared his Sunday morning talk to which many looked forward with enjoyment. This same sermon he would give with some variation, perhaps, at South or at West Worthington later in the day.

"A voice of rare beauty and well cultivated has made him the natural leader of our congregational singing, and here also he will be sadly missed.

"We feel we have been greatly blessed in the ministrations of Mr. Moulton and that we shall always have deep affection for him and of the series of anniversary gatherings. The church has had but three or four pastorates of more than three years, and much of the time the pulpit has been supplied by Oberlin students, so it has come to bear the name of "Oberlin's calf pasture." Four "pastors" in one year is about the best record. The present pastor, Rev. S. C. Dickinson, is the 49th and has been on the field two years.

Called to First, Toledo

The Toledo association met Nov. 6 at Plain, where the church is one of the oldest in the association. It was a fitting place to review the early history of Congregationalism in that part of Ohio. This was done in an interesting manner by Rev. V. G. Hostetter, minister at Plain, who traced the early expansion of Congregationalism under the leadership of Rev. Benjamin Woodbury. Resolutions were adopted at the close of the meeting advocating the erection of some suitable memorial to Mr. Woodbury, buried in the cemetery at Plain.

When Sunday Comes

By John Andrew Holmes

In the eighteenth century clergymen in France were sent to the gallows for venturing to preach to their congregations. At the same period, American ministers preached six hours a Sunday, yet remained at large.

The churches of the Toledo and adjacent associations are in a flourishing condition, all served by energetic pastors. The work of the coming year is faced with confidence and preparations by means of the every member canvass and definite winter programs are being made. The spirit of the churches is well illustrated by Pilgrim Church, Toledo, Rev. John Keedy, pastor, where a study course in stewardship is being conducted under the direction of the pastor.

First Church, Toledo, is continuing to present a high standard in activity and service. Its budget contains an item of $2,000 for the aid of other Toledo churches. Since the middle of September Dr. A. A. Stockdale has been carrying the whole burden of ministry and leadership of this church. This will be shared soon by the coming of Rev. R. O. Ficken of Cincinnati, who has accepted a call to become associate minister of First Church.

Around the State

[The following excerpt is taken from the November report of General Secretary Ernest M. Halliday, of the Church Extension Boards]

Beginning on Nov. 3, I made a ten-day promotional trip through Ohio. Two association meetings—the Medina at Amherst, O., and the Central Ohio at Radnor—were on the itinerary. Both showed excellent attendance and interest.

Speaking appointments with Drs. Smith at Sandusky, Recard at Wellington, Campbell at Youngstown, and Rankin at Conneaut, revealed substantial churches with forward-looking pastoral leadership. At Sandusky, the Wednesday evening "church night" is an occasion for a six o'clock dinner followed by a meeting of the men of the congregation who engage in the consideration of some live topic. The women of the church are divided into three groups, which serve as the respective hostesses for the first three Wednesday evenings of the month. The fourth Wednesday is taken by the young people, and when there is a fifth, the men serve the dinner.

Dr. Recard, at Wellington, has seen a large increase in membership under his pastorate. Although physically incapacitated during several months of his initial year, his people stood by him most loyally and "carried on" with marked success.

Youngstown is a great steel center, with all the soot and smoke and problems which such a situation implies. Under Dr. Campbell, now in his fourth year of service, the plant has been greatly improved. Of outstanding interest is the up-to-date Sunday school, unusually well provided with class and assembly rooms, and boasting an instructional force largely recruited from the teachers of the public schools.

Dr. Rankin, at Conneaut, is the dean of Congregational pastors in the state. For 23 years he has fruitfully labored there. He has a substantial church plant, unusual in its interior finish of white marble.

The regular luncheon of the women of Euclid Avenue, Cleveland, to which the Congregational pastors of the city and their wives had been invited, gave opportunity for a discussion of merger plans, while the subsequent missionary meeting of the women of the local church revealed just such a group of devoted workers as are responsible in so many places for a large share of the missionary interest of the denomination.

The joint state meeting of the Ohio Union and Branch in the historic Painesville Church, of which Dr. W. A. Warren is pastor, was indicative in its three-day program and large attendance of the tremendous force which Ohio women are exercising in benevolent endeavors both within and without the state. Lake Erie College girls furnished Old World music for one of the evening programs.

A visit in company with Director H. M. Kingsley, of the Department of Negro Work in the North, to Mt. Zion Church, Cleveland, disclosed Dr. R. S. Brown, recently called to this work from Atlanta, Ga., getting into action to meet the challenge which the presence of so many thousands of his race in Cleveland is putting up to him and his congregation.

From another angle and with equal energy, Dr. R. G. Clapp and his wife and helpers are working in Schauffler Training Institute, Cleveland, to prepare young women for positions as special workers and pastors' assistants, particularly among foreign-speaking peoples. All who are interested in Schauffler are looking forward hopefully to the erection of a fine new dormitory, greatly needed, for which plans have already been approved and funds are partly in hand.

An occasion of unusual interest was the jubilee celebration of the 80th anniversary of St. Paul's Evangelical Protestant Church, Cincinnati, on Nov. 8. This is one of the 25 congregations that have recently united with us.

The pastor, Dr. P. C. Bekeschus, had planned the program, which occupied morning and afternoon sessions. with dinner and supper served by the women of the church. At the morning service Dr. Herman Obenhaus delivered the German anniversary sermon and I one of a similar nature in English. In the afternoon, various addresses of felicitation were made by pastors of other churches of the group and of our nearby English churches. A visit to Newport, Ky., just across the Ohio River, that same evening, enabled me to become better acquainted with Pastors Steiner and Reikow, who anticipated the affiliation of the two groups some months ago by joining in their Sunday evening services. There seems to be no doubt that this new alignment of the churches of the Cincinnati and Pittsburgh regions will be of benefit to all concerned.

The state force of Ohio consists of Supt. E. S. Rothrock; Rev. A. M. Meikle, an associate who devotes himself to the northern part of the state; Rev. J. A. Schmink, who deals chiefly with the central and southern portion; Rev. G. L. Smith, secretary of the Cleveland Union; and Rev. C. L. Fisk, who takes care of educational interests. It is noticeable that this force is working together in complete harmony.

FLORIDA

West Palm Beach Purchases Parsonage

Union Church, West Palm Beach, has recently purchased a beautiful new eight-room house as a parsonage, completely furnished and with every modern convenience. The price paid for it was $26,000. It is located on Florida Avenue, one of the principal highways running north and south.

The old parsonage on Olive Street will soon be sold and the proceeds used toward a new church edifice which will be started this winter. The church property on Olive and Datura Streets now approaches the million dollar mark.

CALIFORNIA

Pasadena Folks at National Council

Pasadena would seem to be a considerable distance from Washington, D. C., yet 15 people, including Dr. and Mrs. D. F. Fox, undertook the trip to the National Council, some ten of them going by steamer. During the absence of the minister in the East, Prof. Raymond Brooks gave five Sunday morning sermons on the theme, "Is the Religion of Jesus Sufficient for Today?" The several sub-titles were: "Breaking Old Molds"; "America's Contribution to Religion"; "The New World and the New Religious Situation"; "What Is Christianity?"; "Can We Make Our World Chistian?" These are some of the subjects being used by Professor Brooks in various gatherings East and West, which have made him known as a rarely incisive thinker on the adaptations of Christianity to modern knowledge and thought. At Pomona College he is known as "The Man Who Makes Ideals Real."

First Church is one of those churches alive to the interests of its young people, which has provided for its people a cabin in the mountains, whither they can go in families or larger groups. Joining the young people of Pilgrim Church with them, the young folks of First had a Sunday vesper service in this cabin in Millard Canyon. An address was given by Mrs. Millacent Yarrow, new director of religious education at Neighborhood Church.

Sept. 20, as rally day, was also Bertha Allen Day, celebrating in the church school her birthday with the usual annual missionary program. Miss Allen, representative of this church in China, is known as "The Happy Girl."

Deaths

BASSETT—S. Cora Bassett, daughter of Deacon Abiel and Sarah W. Bassett, born in Bridgewater, Mass., May 24, 1852, died at the home of her sister in Winslow, Me., Nov. 2, 1925.

GILBERT SYKES BLAKELY

Gilbert Sykes Blakely died in New York City on Oct. 20, following an operation for appendicitis. He was born in Campton, N. H., June 15, 1865, the son of Rev. Quincy Blakely, for many years a New Hampshire minister.

He was graduated from Dartmouth in 1888. After teaching for several years at Worcester Academy, he went to New York, first teaching at the Morris High School and later, at the founding of the Evander Childs High School in 1913, became its principal, which position he held until his death.

He is survived by his wife, who was Miss Gertrude Woolworth, of Clinton, N. Y.; also by two sisters: Miss Ellen Blakely, of Marash, Turkey, and Miss Bertha Blakely, of South Hadley, Mass.; and by two brothers: Dr. David Blakely, of Boston, and Rev. Quincy Blakely, of Farmington, Ct.

GEORGE W. LEITCH

Many in different parts of the country will remember George W. Leitch, who, with his two sisters, went out under the American Board to Ceylon in 1879. After some years he was called home by filial duties, and afterward spent 15 years visiting many states, illustrating missionary work by means of stereopticon views.

His home was at Ryegate, Vt., where he was born Jan. 20, 1843. He came, with his sisters, to Pilgrim Place in Claremont, Cal., where, notwithstanding his advanced years and physical infirmities, he was happy in advocating the enlargement of Pilgrim Place to provide for others what he so much enjoyed, in the comforts of the Aloha Cottage, where he lived, the kindness of the people, and the beauties of the world around him.

Death came suddenly and peacefully, Oct. 18, as the result of a stroke, ending a sweet, unselfish life consecrated to missionary service.

The Vigil of Prayer

By William M. Auld

Lord of All Worlds! Whose wisdom never faileth,
Shadows of earth thy purpose often veileth;
But through the gloom the faith which e'er prevaileth,
Vouchsafe thy children.

Bitter the taste of some dread chalice given,
E'en as we drink with hearts in anguish riven;
Give us to know the healing touch of heaven,
And sins forgiven.

O storm-tossed soul mid sable shadows creeping,
Bend low with Christ thy faithful vigil keeping:
With him to wait, and watch, and pray unsleeping,
Patient and fearless.

So may we tread thy path with footsteps willing,
Chastened by sorrow,—thou dark passions stilling;
Till we delight thy purpose in fulfilling,
Through Christ to love thee.

Guide us through life, thy saving truth bestowing;
Grant us the grace from thy pure presence flowing;
Kindle the hope in brightness ever glowing,
And cheer us heavenward.

s Christians we face a world where the sions are largely traced in terms of racial udices and hatreds. These divisions become e definite and these prejudices more acute they are intensified by the clash of politi- and religious interests. It is supremely ortant that first of all we should seek to the attitude of Jesus, and meet this world dition in his spirit. To him the supreme ue in all the universe was a man. As he ed into the faces of men, there was no e in his consciousness of racial, national, lass distinction.—M. Ashby Jones.

The Little Boy Who Didn't Like Christmas

By Carrie Belle Boyden

Far away in the country, in a beautiful house surrounded by a beautiful park, lived the little boy who didn't like Christmas. Every year since he was a tiny baby there had been a Christmas tree, but Cedric did not care for Christmas trees. Every year there had been wonderful gifts for him: toy dogs and real dogs; toy ponies and real ponies; and building blocks and bonbons; but Cedric did not care for dogs or ponies or building blocks or bonbons. And then there was a grand Christmas dinner, but Cedric had a dainty appetite so that he did not care to eat much. You see, he had had these things all his life, on ordinary days as well as on Christmas Day, so of course he was tired of them. His mother and father were quite worried because their little son no longer cared for Christmas Day.

Finally, a sensible woman named Martha Williams, who came to the big house to do fine washing, heard about Cedric and said that she believed that she could make a Merry Christmas for him. Mrs. Williams had a large family of children of her own and they invited Cedric to spend the whole of Christmas Day with them.

Cedric did not really care to go but he was too polite to say so. So early on Christmas morning he was dressed in a fur coat and cap and put into a sleigh with jingling bells, and away he jingled over the snowy roads to the little brown house in the village. Johnny Williams met him with shouts of joy, for Johnny just loved Christmas. As soon as Cedric's coat and cap were off, Johnny raced him into the woodshed to cut up kindling. Cedric was very much surprised, for he had never cut up any wood before. This was not ordinary kindling, however, but Christmas kindling, for the boys were to chop the kindling to build the fire to roast the turkey for the Christmas dinner. And because it was an entirely new thing to cut up wood with a little hatchet, Cedric had lots of fun doing it. After the fire in the big kitchen range was roaring and cracking, Cedric and Johnny watched Mrs. Williams put in the big turkey to roast. Cedric had never seen a Christmas turkey being roasted, so he was very much interested. Then Mrs. Williams sent the two boys into a closed room where there was a big, bare Christmas tree. She gave them a box filled with long strings of popcorn and cranberries and some cooky animals, and asked them to trim the tree for the little kiddies. With shouts and laughter the boys worked busily for an hour, and then the bare tree was transformed into a glittering Christmas tree with gifts and goodies hanging from the branches. By that time, the house was filled with the appetizing odor of turkey and dressing and plum pudding, and they were just about to sit down to dinner when there was a rap on the door. Mrs. Williams threw it wide open and there stood Widow Crofoot with two little children. She said they were all out of wood and the children were crying with cold. Mrs. Williams drew them all in, and Johnny and Cedric ran for more wood to pile on the fire to warm the children's fingers and toes. How glad they were that they had chopped plenty of wood that morning! Then they all sat down to a bountiful dinner and Cedric thought that nothing had ever tasted so good in all his life before.

After dinner came the Christmas tree, and while they were distributing the cooky animals there was a loud jingle, jingle, jingle of bells outside. Mrs. Williams again threw open the door—and in bounced a big, fat, jolly, red-cheeked, white-whiskered old gentleman in a red suit with a pack on his back.

"Santa Claus!" cried all the little Williams kiddies at once. Mrs. Williams looked mystified, for he was an unexpected visitor. He opened his pack and handed out books and skates and dolls and paints and all sorts of toys. Even Mrs. Williams received a bright

CHRISTMAS MONEY FOR YOU

Search Your Attic for Fortunes in Old Envelopes

Among the old letters of many families are hundreds of very rare stamps and envelopes. Many have been found and sold for fortunes. Single envelopes have been sold for as high as $6,000, and many have brought upwards of $100 each. It sounds "fishy," but it's true. They are valuable because they are rare. And they are rare, not because there are only a few, but simply because most of them have remained stored away and forgotten, in old trunks, family chests, and closets.

Make a thorough search through your attic or store room for such old letters—anything mailed from 1845 to 1865. Fortunes in rare stamps have been found in old trunks which no one ever dreamed contained anything of value. Keep the letters if you wish, but send the envelopes to Mr. Harold C. Brooks, Box 314, Marshall, Michigan, and he will immediately write you, stating their value. In sending them to him you are not obliged to sell unless his offer meets with your approval. Anything not purchased he will return in good order. Mr. Brooks, who is mayor of his city, is a private collector and has paid thousands of dollars for old envelopes bearing stamps. Although the rare issues are especially desired he also buys many of the commoner kinds. Many people in this way are getting Christmas money with very little trouble and no expense.

The First National Bank of Marshall, Mich., writes: "Mr. Brooks has been in business here for twenty years. You will make no mistake when you recommend him to your readers as worthy of the fullest confidence, both financially and personally."

Mr. Brooks states that there are so many different stamps which are similar in appearance he cannot quote values from written descriptions, but must see the envelopes. Furthermore, he is not interested in buying loose stamps or stamp collections, but only the old envelopes bearing postage; so do not cut the stamps from the envelopes. It is not necessary to write dates on envelopes as Mr. Brooks is fully acquainted with all issues even though the postmark shows no year date. Those especially wanted are United States issues, but he also buys Confederate, Canadian, Hawaiian, and certain foreign stamps provided they are on the original envelopes and mailed not later than 1865.

If envelopes are sent in a bunch they should be carefully packed in a cardboard box to protect them from damage while in the mails. If you have reason to believe your envelopes are of special value send them by registered or insured mail. If you have no old letters written during or before the Civil War, show this notice to your friends—especially those whose families have lived in the same home for several generations. Many old families, old banks and law firms still have stored away hundreds of letters, waiting to be burned or sold for large sums. Before destroying such envelopes or folded letters investigate their value. Mr. Brooks' address is as follows:

Box 314, Marshall, Mich.

minum stew pan, so shiny that it reflected smiling face like a mirror. The Widow ofoot was not forgotten, for she received a ning gold piece, enough to buy all the wood y would need. But in his haste to get away ckly, Santa's long white whiskers dropped off and Cedric cried out: "Why, hello, F—!" and then clapped his hand over his mouth and would say no more.

But when it was time to go home and Cedric was again tucked into the sleigh with jingling bells, there was Santa Claus sitting in the corner of the big sleigh behind the driver. Cedric cuddled up close to him and whispered that he knew who he was the instant his whiskers dropped off.

That evening, when Cedric was sitting by the fireplace with his father and mother, he said thoughtfully: "I did not receive a single Christmas gift today, but it was the jolliest old Christmas I ever had. I wonder why."

His father laughed aloud and his mother said smilingly: "I know why. Can't you figure it out?" And Cedric must have figured it out, for no one in that house ever heard again of "The Little Boy Who Didn't Like Christmas."

The Little Boy Who Didn't Like Christmas, by Carrie Belle Boyden 801
Risibles 803

A husky stockman from the Texas Panhandle, going to Europe, was assigned by the purser to a two-passenger cabin as a roommate of one Maj. H. Roswell. Shortly afterward the Texas man, ignoring the purser, hunted up the captain of the ship.

"See here," he demanded, "what kind of a guy is this here head clerk of yours. I ain't goin' to travel with that Maj. H. Roswell. So far as that goes, neither one of us likes the idea!"

"What's the matter?" asked the skipper. "Do you object to an army officer for a traveling companion?"

"Not as a general thing," said the Texan, "only this army happens to be the Salvation Army, and that major's other name is Henrietta."—Boston Globe.

The Mothers, When Age Comes

A Twilight Free, Serene, Thankful.

PENSIONS of the Boards of Ministerial Relief save many mothers from absolute want. The Boards have for these dear women an ideal beyond guarding them against misery. It is to assure those who have been lifelong burden-bearers, utterly devoted to doing for everybody else, a respite from responsibility and care. It would not take much money to bring comfort to one of them, but there are nearly four hundred widows on the roll, and to do this for all involves a large amount. The income permits an average pension to widows of only $235. Would that the Board of Relief, by assuring them a quiet spot and an unworried mind, might have power to say, "At evening time there shall be light."

What the War Cost One Mother

A widow writes: "I had the assistance of my boys and got along very comfortably until the World War, when both boys went into the service and both came home disabled. I cannot find words to express my gratitude to all the kind people who have made the sacrifice to help in need like mine."

A Home Saved by the Boards

A daughter writes: "We can never thank you enough for giving us this quiet home to stay in during these last days of Mother's life. She is in her 95th year."

Send a Christmas gift that will give happiness to mothers who have made others happy through many years.

The Editorial Outlook

Look to the Home!

GENERALIZATIONS are somewhat dangerous. The traditional and rather cynical explanation of every complex circumstance, cherchez la femme, was never more than an approximation to truth. There is more truth concerning the complex problems of modern life and especially of modern youth in the counsel that emphasizes parental responsibility without regard to sex, and that says, Look to the Home! Press reports of an address by President Mary E. Woolley, of Mount Holyoke College, delivered recently in New Haven, Ct., contained much to set parents thinking—and acting. Speaking of the nervous strain under which too many girls live, Miss Woolley is reported as saying:

> Yes, it is overwork, but not as a rule overwork in studies. The girl of today follows in the footsteps of her elders in trying to do too many things. The amusements of our young people are more elaborate, more numerous, involving later hours and a greater drain upon nervous energy.
> Women's colleges in general dread the aftermath of the short vacation, when the college infirmary is too small to accommodate the daughters who are recovering from the two weeks' "rest" at home. The frequent "weekends" tend toward the same result, and parents wonder why college will so overwork their girls. When a girl comes to the close of her year over-taxed, the responsibility, nine times out of ten, should be shouldered by the extra-curricula activities.
> Remarking that the home should be the fun center and that young folks should not have to seek elsewhere for their pleasure, Miss Woolley expressed the opinion that the modern girl who takes part in "petting parties" will blush in her very soul some day, when she looks back over her freedom and behavior, her loss of fine reserve and of genuine modesty.

Other Testimony

MISS WOOLLEY'S remarks are entirely in line with what an eminent educational leader, until recently head of another college for women, said to us not long ago. He stated that his chief problems of discipline and of guidance were not with the students but with the parents, and he remarked upon a letting down in energy and morale that too often resulted from occasional home contacts. Parents, he said, often actually conspired to defeat the regulations and discipline of the college, and in general tended either to defend and apologize for manifest slackness and ineffectiveness in the student, or simply shirked all responsibility for supporting and encouraging the efforts of the instructor. Similar testimony was brought not long ago from a notable boys' school, also, where it was said that though the college had carefully prescribed rules concerning spending money parents actually helped to smuggle additional spending money to the pupils. A plain-spoken minister not long ago said to some of his parishioners: "Some of you mothers have to learn that you cannot chase your social ambitions and bring up children at the same time." But the problem is not only, or even chiefly, of mothers. It is a home problem, which parents must share in a new spirit of consecration, not only to high Christian ideals, but to elemental personal and social duty.

Christmas Ever New

CAN anything new or novel in page or pulpit be said concerning Christmas? Every Christmas gives the answer. Whether to one's self there comes some new and novel aspect or expression of Christmas, one may be sure that such expressions will come from many quarters. One sure evidence of the divine and eternal significance of the events that we celebrate at Christmas is the continued inspiration to poet, preacher, and artist, quickened with every return of the Christmastide. Even the historic events as they relate to the far-off past encourage ever new and inspiring descriptions and interpretations. When our minds and hearts fail to respond to the simple story of the Gospel, and when that story ceases to be Gospel, we had better diagnose our sloth and dullness.

But there is another and deeper sense in which Christmas is ever new and novel. It is constantly touching new lives and new environments, and new borders of old lives and old environments. The divine quality of the Christmas facts and message finds further evidence in the adaptation of the Christ-life and the Christ-teaching to every new environment.

What task can there be holier or more novel than the task of ever bringing the Christmas story to light and power in the life of each successive generation? Do we realize what Christmas means to the young? Do we adequately appreciate the privilege and responsibility of telling to the children the story of that greatest of all teachers, who said: "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God"? Do we not sometimes think of the Christmas story in its relation to the children chiefly as a mere story, embellished with beautiful pictures and beautiful descriptions? Should we not realize more vitally that if we are making that story real and vivid, we are creating for the children a whole life's environment?

To be able to say effectively to the world that Christ is born is the supreme attainment of life. To make, especially upon the minds of the young, such an indelible impression of the reality of the child Christ that the impression can never be removed, is the ultimate attainment of religious education.

There is a sense in which the newest and most novel things that may be said concerning Christmas are very simple; in fact, they may be found to be little more than new appreciations and expressions of the most commonplace and elemental things. Jesus compared the coming of the life that he brought to men to the wind, blowing where it listed. It is a figure that might be applied to the newness and freshness of Christmas. Throughout the world's age-long life the winds have been blowing, bringing constant change and refreshing. The winds and clouds are among the old and commonplace things, yet they are ever new, and the soul is indeed dead that never feels their newness and freshness. So is the birth of Christ to men, and the influences that are wafted from the life of the Nazarene. There are borders of our lives that are as Bethlehems into which the Christ has yet to be born. There are areas of the world where his coming in love and power is yet to be made known. There are depths of the life around us, even in so-called Christendom, where the joy of the wise men and shepherds has never been experienced. In fact, the newest thing in the world is Christmas. The largest inspiration that one could desire from a novel and unfulfilled task is that of bringing to a sad and disillusioned world the joy of the coming of the Lord:

Joy to the world, the Lord is come;
Let earth receive her King.

Members of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union in the 20,000 communities where unions are now organized, will begin their new year of activities by devoting a day to prayer. Mrs. Ella A. Boole, as her first official act as new president of the National W. C. T. U., has issued a call appointing Jan. 7, the Thursday of the Week of Prayer, as a day for special remembrance of the White Ribbon organization and its purposes. Mrs. Boole has had an interesting interdenominational experience. She is the widow of a former member of the New York East Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and after her husband's death returned to the Presbyterian Church where she was secretary of the Woman's Board of Home Missions for six years. She has served the W. C. T. U. in almost every capacity, and during the past fifteen years as president for New York.

Keeping Christianity Christian

IN the preface to his new, and valuable, book, The Religion of Yesterday and Tomorrow, Dr. Kirsopp Lake, referring to present-day religious controversies, between those whom he classifies as Fundamentalist, Institutionalist, and Experimentalist, expresses grave fears for the future. Pointing out that the outcome of these controversies cannot be immediately constructive, but must be chiefly "a clearing out of dead wood which has become diseased and dangerous," Dr. Lake says:

Almost against my will I have been unable to disguise my fear lest the churches leave their intellectual housecleaning too late, so that the generation now growing up will turn its back on all organized forms of Christianity. The result of any such movement at first would be inevitably the apparent strengthening of a not unduly intelligent orthodoxy, and indeed this can be observed already. The secondary and lasting result would be, if I am not wholly mistaken, the gradual emergence of a new form of organized religion which probably would not call itself Christian, though it would represent all that is best in the Christianity of the educated theologian of today. I am daily more and more convinced that this may happen, but words cannot express my regret. One object of my writing is to prevent such a result, if it be possible, and to keep the name of Christian.

How widespread are these tendencies and how deep are these dangers that Dr. Lake fears? Possibly much less than the Fundamentalist who is panicky over every manifestation of liberalism asserts, but probably more than the complacent liberal, who recognizes the truth as well as the error coming out of the past, imagines.

One of the most foolish and ill-considered expressions of the tendencies that Dr. Lake deplores is found in the report of a sermon by Rev. A. Wakefield Slaten, preached early last month in the West Side Unitarian Church, New York, and released for publication under the heading Modernism Not Christianity. Dr. Slaten talks like an ultra-Fundamentalist. His dogmatic generalizations display both the Fundamentalist method and temper, and the utter lack of careful and discriminating judgment that one expects from that quarter, but that one hardly expects to find in a professed ultra-liberal. He says:

Modernism is not Christianity. Those sturdy Fundamentalist defenders of the faith once delivered to the saints who make this assertion are correct. Though Modernists protest their loyalty to essential truth while discarding the old thought frame-work, this is merely a comforting delusion. The reluctance with which men give up the name "Christian" is highly significant. Not until ingenuity is exhausted and intellectual honesty has not where to lay its head, will a man admit that he is not a Christian.

Yet why should the Modernist not admit that he is not a Christian? There is nothing reprehensible in not being a Christian. It is difficult to see how any thinking man or woman could at present be a Christian on the basis of a conviction of the truth of Christianity's historic claims.

Slowly and painfully the disciples of a new religion learn that it is different from its predecessor. At first the early Christians supposed themselves to be only an improved type of Jew. Ultimately they learned that they were not Jews at all. At present Modernists assure themselves that they are only an improved type of Christian. In time they will see, as their clear-headed Fundamentalist antagonists see now, Modernism is not Christianity. To be a Christian is to accept a certain historic scheme of thought as true.

We should be the first to defend Dr. Slaten's right to speak for himself, but when he presumes to talk in this fashion for all "Modernists," or concerning all "Modernists," and to bring all under his narrow, arbitrary, and dogmatic definitions he transgresses that law of courtesy that ought to operate at least among men of liberal mind and spirit. When Dr. Slaten says that "to be a Christian is to accept a certain historic scheme of thought as true," he is either expressing himself badly or he is blind to the facts. For many devout Christians of ultra-liberal mind Christianity consists primarily not in "a certain historic scheme of thought," but in a definite relationship to Christ. Thoreau in his famous saying, If we would understand Christ we must abolish Christianity, at least suggested the positive possibility and reality of understanding Christ. Surely Dr. Slaten ought to be deep-visioned and broad enough to see and acknowledge that there are large numbers of men in the churches today who are known as "liberals" and "modernists," though they may not call themselves by these titles, for whom the whole movement of religion consists in a new and simple approach to Christ and the Gospel, defined in the simple New Testament terms of love and grace. The men and women for whom the cry, Back to Christ, has a clear, simple, and definite meaning, and for whom its meaning implies the dominance of the Christ-life and consciousness, and of Christian freedom, over "a certain historic scheme of thought" will still believe, despite Dr. Slaten's ridiculous dogmatism that the name Christian has a new depth and sacredness of meaning. We may have called things Christian that were not Christian, but surely the more nearly and truly we approach to the freedom and simplicity that are in Christ the more appropriately and tenaciously we may assert and hold the reality of the Christian name.

We should be the last to exalt names above realities, but when the name of Christ is held lightly we question whether the realities of Christ will be strongly evidenced.

It should be said that many Unitarians, even in the outstanding leadership of that fellowship, while not challenging Dr. Slaten's liberty of expression, dissent as strongly as we do from the position he has taken.

A Great Editor: Nicoll of the British Weekly

The Biography of an Eminent Journalist and Bookman *

NOT the greatest, nor the most lovable, nor even the most influential, but in many respects the most remarkable, and certainly the most versatile, figure in British Nonconformity during the past generation was William Robertson Nicoll, whose Life and Letters, by his friend of half-a-century, T. H. Darlow, is now given to the world in a volume of nearly five hundred pages. It is no disparagement of Mr. Darlow's work to say that the Letters constitute by all means its more important part. He should strangely have misconceived his task of biographer were this not so. For the American reader, and we suspect for some English readers as well, the volume is somewhat overloaded with rather trivial and unimportant matters which seem feebly related to the main interest, but with equal insistence it must be said that this main interest is so deep and so thoroughly exploited, and touches life and religion so vitally and at so many points, that the student and thinker can neglect this biography only to his very great loss. The general reader, also, will find it a book of fascinating interest.

Scholar, bookman, humanist, theologian, mystic, politician—he was all these and more—it was as Editor of the British Weekly that Nicoll became best known and attained his highest distinction. Few men, in fact, have attained such high recognition in so many spheres as was accorded Nicoll by experts in their various fields, but all his wealth of knowledge, his range of interests, and his varied gifts, found focus and expression in his work as editor of a religious weekly. In this field, also, his varied personalities were expressed in different characters, for in addition to being himself theologian and Free Churchman, he was "W. R. N.," writing upon "Things in General," "Claudius Clear," writing delightful letters upon life, and "A Man of Kent," rambling among books and authors. The British Weekly under his nearly forty years' editorship was, however, much more than a personal organ, or the reflection of a varied personality. It was a reflection through Nicoll of wide and distinctive phases of the life, religious, political, literary, of the time. It was the way in which Nicoll had interwoven himself into that life that gave his editorial work its supreme interest and distinction. And it was this that marked, likewise, the nature and the extent, as well as the limitations, of his influence.

Mr. Darlow's biography strongly confirms the impression, derived from many years' reading of the

* William Robertson Nicoll: Life and Letters, by T. H. Darlow (Doran. $3.50).

British Weekly, of Nicoll as a strange, and in many respects unco-ordinated, mixture. The very circumstances of his life were full of peculiar contrasts. The influences and environment of his youth, while they naturally made him a bookman, seemed little prophetic of his career as man-of-the-world and journalist-at-large. Did ever a boy have so strange a beginning? His father, a rural minister in the north of Scotland, seems to have been distinguished for only one thing—a passion for the gathering together of books. Out of a stipend that never amounted to £200 a year he amassed a library of 17,000 volumes. They overflowed into every nook and corner of the country manse, and everything, apparently, was sacrificed to this obsession. The most intense economies were practised and the family lived upon the most frugal fare while all the available money was turned into books. Nicoll as a boy seldom tasted beef, and through much raking in the garden, which was the chief source of the family's food, Nicoll developed a distaste for gardening and outdoor life—a curious lack, along with his lack of interest in art and music, for which these early years may also have accounted, in a man otherwise so eclectic in his enthusiasms and interests. His father married late in life, and Nicoll was the eldest of four children, whom his mother lived long enough to bear. The few years of married life in that unusual home were apparently happy, but Nicoll's mother died when he was eight years old, and the boy had his upbringing in that motherless environment of a bookman and his books. A reverential memory of his father, and the consciousness of all that that early environment had laid in the real preparations and foundations of his after life could not entirely suppress in Nicoll the recollection of the bareness and hardness of these early years. In a letter years afterwards he confessed with passionate sadness, "I always feel that I was defrauded of my youth—there was so little sunshine in it—far too little."

II

The steps by which Nicoll came to his career and achievement are amply recorded by Mr. Darlow and need not here be summarized. The British Weekly, founded under Nicoll's editorship in 1886, became rapidly the best known religious weekly in the British Empire, and it attained wide circulation and reading in other lands. In addition to wielding an able pen, backed by phenominal knowledge, Nicoll knew how to avail himself of the services of other men, and in the years of his editorship he gathered around him a group of contributors, Dods, Denney, Bruce, G. A. Smith, Alexander Whyte, Moffatt—not to mention many others—who would have given distinction to any paper. Deeper than this Nicoll understood what the religious public wanted, and he was at least as much a follower, as a molder, of public opinion. His insight as a journalist—an insight that is uncommon—is shown in a reference to an article by Robert Louis Stevenson, then in his fame, which had appeared in the British Weekly. In response to the assumption that this article had been a great asset Nicoll pointed out that it had made little difference in the sale of the paper. As a matter of fact that particular issue sold two hundred fewer copies than that of the previous week, and Nicoll made the observation, mor shrewd than many realize, that "it is personal matte that people like." Incidentally he ranked the lesse known Mark Rutherford (W. Hale White) as "a muc greater master of English style" than Stevenson.

That Nicoll had his prejudices and obsessions wa always evident to readers of the British Weekly, wh in spite of these things, loved him for his usual genialit as well as for his great ability. A strange prejudic born of a delicate constitution, was his antipathy to fres air. He was firmly convinced that "colds, neuralgia, an most other ills arise from the great modern curse o Fresh Air," and he assured R. J. Campbell that "ther are more deaths from fresh air than from all other dis eases put together." One reads this with a smile a the whimsical intensity of his prejudices—Nicoll had fashion in his private observations in conversation an letters of being both whimsical and intense—but it i symbolic of a weakness in Nicoll that pervaded his theo logical outlook. In justice to him it should be said tha it did not pervade his moral and spiritual atmospheres His spiritual interests always seemed to us to transcen his theological convictions and sympathies. There were windows in the theological world from which he would never risk the danger of draughts.

Nicoll was so great a figure that his faults may be spoken of without compromising one's high admiration of him. Mr. Darlow has strengthened his biography by discussing with candor some of these faults. He regards as a serious flaw in Nicoll that "as he succeeded, he grew too fond of successful men." Possibly this was in some measure the contempt of a hard and keenly disciplined worker for the slackness of shirkers seeking easy paths. None the less it was a real and crucial weakness that cut deeply across his work. For one who centered his theology and his religion in a conservative conception of the Atonement he failed adequately to appreciate how deeply truth and progress are related to the sacrifices and crucifixions that mark seeming failure. One would not misunderstand the manifest pleasantry of an expression in a personal letter, but when Nicoll wrote to Prof. A. S. Peake that, "the new truths should dawn on the Church as gently as the sunlight, and I am not at all sure but that heretics ought to be burnt," he was surely minimizing the extent to which progress comes by crucial sacrifice and struggle, and by toiling upward through the night. The burning of heretics is all too recent in history, and the forms of persecution that have succeeded eccelsiastical bonfires are still too prevalent and too acute to make the matter one even for jesting. In another letter to the same correspondent Nicoll plausibly defends his lack of open-mindedness. But even with regard to the most elemental doctrines and convictions there is a real danger that our definitions may easily become of more importance than the essential facts. Nicoll with all his progressiveness, and with his essential love of war, really lacked the characteristics of the crusader.

But Nicoll's was a great life, and this is a great biography—such as he himself would have loved. We only wish that more space were available to exploit its treasures.

From Our Western Editor

The Social Service Commission of the ational Council, through its chairman, Mr. hn Calder, and the secretary of the Social rvice Department, Rev. Hubert C. Her- ng, is putting on an extended educational mpaign in the West. The itinerary began ith Chicago, Oct. 30, and includes Minne- olis, Fargo, Glendive, Billings, Butte, okane, Seattle, Portland, San Francisco, kersfield, Los Angeles, and San Diego. he campaign will end about Dec. 15. The ject is to bring all parties representing dustry together to help them to under- and one another and to make any contribu- on possible toward having industrial ques- ons settled in the spirit of Jesus.

The plans adopted contemplated duplicat- g in each city the work done in the Chi- go meetings. Those held here were under e auspices of the Conference Committee Social Relation of which Rev. Albert W. lmer is chairman. Dr. Palmer, at my ggestion, gave me the following statement ncerning the meetings:

The first one was held at the Univer- ty Club and was an informal conference, which Mr. Calder met and talked with group of about a dozen outstanding busi- ss men. These were selected from a group large employers of labor and not neces- rily from those who sympathize with Mr. lder's viewpoint, but rather with the idea giving Mr. Calder a chance to get the re- tion of just such men as the ministers each to, Sunday by Sunday. Mr. Calder's lk was followed by an earnest discussion d while there were, of course, divergent inions the attitude was on the whole dis- ctly appreciative of the general spirit d viewpoint of the speaker's message.

There was frank and encouraging recog- tion of the responsibility of employers for e human product in industry, recogni- on of the importance of having a better pe of foreman, and of the desirability of me organized and legitimate way for em- oyees to get their complaints and criti- sms across to the management. There ere some pointed criticisms of the methods certain labor unions, but also recogni- on that some unions are more reprehensible an others, and a very real and con- uctive interest in Mr. Calder's story of his vn experience in the organization of em- oyee representation in the Western plants Swift & Company.

Mr. Herring and Mr. Calder addressed a int meeting of the Congregational men of ak Park. Both made an excellent impres- on in their addresses. Mr. Calder was es- cially clear and convincing in dealing with tails. He emphasized particularly the ings which the working man wants: 1) An adequate wage. (2) Reasonable ours. (3) A share in the management of ose phases in industry which directly af- ct him. (4) Security against sickness, un- ployment, and old age. (5) A vital in- rest in the job and a sense of the signifi- nce of the work that is being done.

He was very sane and sensible in his warn- g against mere paternalism. "Do nothing r the men," he said, "make it possible for em to do something for themselves." He ade a plea for open-mindedness with re- rd to industrial questions and illustrated s argument with witty Scotch stories. On unday both speakers were heard with ap- reciation at the new First Church and the ext day made addresses to the young people nd to the men at the Hyde Park Church.

Mr. Calder is a very fortunate choice for the chairmanship of the Commission on Social Service. He has had such long experience with every phase of the labor problem that he is open-minded, gently spoken, tolerant, and exhibits the mind of the Master in large degree. If the service rendered in the other cities now being visited is as fine as that given to Chicago, these two men will make a real contribution to the solution of the social problem. This campaign is a symptom of a new day in dealing with the social industrial question.

The West has moved much faster in giving oversight to the work of its churches than has New England. The fact that Congregationalism has had a much greater struggle to maintain itself in the West probably accounts for this. For a considerable time, state conferences in the West have had oversight not only of the churches receiving missionary aid, but of those that are independent. Of course, this oversight is advisory in all cases and is never authoritative. This oversight of the state superintendent which has been especially efficient in placing ministers did not function so well in the movement of ministers from state to state. This has made the secretaries of our missionary societies, often against their will, ministerial bureaus. The West has undertaken to remedy this situation at least in part by setting up a ministerial bureau of information. This bureau will not attempt to place ministers as does the Boston agency.

Superintendent Merrill of the Illinois Conference, one of the leaders in the organization of this agency, describes its work as follows:

The State Conferences of Illinois, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, and Wisconsin, have joined in setting up a Mid-West Bureau of Ministerial Information with headquarters in Room 1310, 19 S. La Salle St., Chicago. Rev. Ira D. Stone, who has had an extended pastoral experience in Illinois and Iowa, has served as registrar of Elgin Association for five years, and more recently has become associate registrar of the Congregational Conference of Illinois, is the secretary of the bureau. Its establishment is the outgrowth of discussion with regard to the advisability of having in the Middle West an agency which should do for this section something of what the Congregational Board of Pastoral Supply does for New England. Its function, however, will be different from that of the Boston agency in that it will aim only to supply information concerning ministers and will not attempt to effect any settlements of pastors, that being left as before to the State Conference offices.

It was hoped for a time that substantially all the conferences in the Middle West might unite in setting up the bureau, but that being impossible the conferences named above have sufficient faith in its worth to undertake the experiment alone. Other conferences may desire to join in the enterprise later. It is believed that a good deal of duplication in letter writing and in other work will be saved since any minister who wishes to be considered available for a pastorate in any one of these states can write to the bureau and can thus get his name before the state offices of all the states. He can give one set of references and these need be written to only once. The executive committee of the bureau under whose direction Secretary Stone is working consists of Supt. T. R. Faville of Wisconsin, chairman; Supt. Charles C. Merrill, of Illinois, secretary; Supt. A. R. Atwood, A. C. Hacke, and W. A. Tyler. The following statement is on the literature of the bureau: "The purpose of the bureau is to gather the information necessary to the establishment of new pastoral relations. The bureau does not seek the settlement of pastors. That will be accomplished through the regular established agencies of the co-operating conferences."

This is fair notice on the part of the superintendents co-operating in this bureau to ministers who wish to come into this section to write to Secretary Ira D. Stone, 19 S. La Salle St., Chicago.

Our New Machinery

To the Editor of The Congregationalist:

I so seldom can agree with the utterances of the Christian Century that I want to express my hearty approval of its general judgment of the action of the National Council respecting merger. While there are some indications in its editorial that it does not fully understand the action taken, yet its general position is absolutely sound when it says: "If it is more democracy that the young men wanted it is doubtful if they have secured it. There is a possibility that they have only succeeded in creating a more unwieldy denominational machine than they had before. . . ." Its fears that the identity of the American Board has been destroyed are, however, groundless, whatever may be the final outcome regarding the American Missionary Association. Further, there has been no sufficient reason shown by anybody for the opinion shared by the Century that more money will be raised in the future with less of "lost motion." Meanwhile, we shall have an abundance of lost motion in getting this new and more complicated (not more simple) denominational machinery into smooth running action.

It is well, sometimes, to see ourselves as others see us.

Fostering Inter-Racial Friendship

Early in November a dinner was given in honor of students from other lands at the La Salle Hotel, Chicago. This was done under the auspices of the churches of Chicago and the vicinity co-operating through the Chicago Church Federation, with the student departments of the Young Women's and Young Men's Christian Associations co-operating. Addresses were given by Dean T. F. Holgate of the Chicago Church Federation; Prof. C. B. McAfee, of McCormick Seminary; Dr. C. W. Gilkey, Hyde Park Baptist Church, with responses from students representing Japan, India, China, and Korea. Rev. E. B. Allen was a leader in making this meeting possible. It was a happy occasion and was indicative of the sympathetic and appreciative attitude of our churches toward inter-racial relations.

Eddy vs Eddy

The Eddy brothers, Brewer and Sherwood, are booked for a spirited discussion of war and pacifism in the Ford Hall Forum, Boston, the evening of Sunday, Dec. 20. Sherwood Eddy's subject is, "Pacifism Is Necessary; Brewer Eddy's subject is, "Pacifism Is Not Necessary." That will be a great night at Ford Hall.

The Christmas of Ivan Ivanovitch

By Rev. Carl S. Weist

IVAN IVANOVITCH sat up and rubbed his eyes. He had been dreaming that his mother had brought him a bowl of steaming soup, as she used to bring it every morning. It was the steam in the crowded railway station that filled his eyes. The station was so crowded with soldiers and peasants that there was no room for a little boy.

There was no room for him anywhere. He had been wandering for days. Several years before, his father and big brother had gone off to war to kill other boys' fathers. They had not come back. His mother had taken typhus and died, and there was no one left who cared about him. During the long days that followed, he had crept to the back doors of restaurants, where he sometimes found pieces of black, soggy bread. He had somehow managed to keep alive, but it had been very hard, and now he was weak and tired.

He rubbed his eyes again. It was the day before Christmas. Surely some good thing would happen today! It was the day before the Christ-child was born. The thought warmed his heart a little.

As he became wider awake, he grew more and more aware that he was very hungry. He worked his way through the dense crowd to the station counter and looked longingly at a steaming samovar.

"Want a cup of tea?" asked a smiling waiter.

"Yes," gasped Ivan, "but I haven't any kopeks." Kopeks are bits of paper that resemble postage stamps, which the Russians use for money.

"Are you all alone, and no money?" asked the man. Ivan nodded his head. The waiter's heart, with true Russian sympathy, went out at once to the poor, little fellow.

"Well, Sonnie, here's a cup of tea. It will help a little. You will feel better afterward."

The hot tea warmed his cold, shivering, little body.

"Bolshoe Spacibo," said Ivan. It is the Russian way of saying "Thank you." It means "God bless you very much."

The day passed quickly. The cold, grey sun did not show itself till ten, and began to hide its face from the frozen world by three o'clock in the afternoon.

Little Ivan waited on the station platform in the bitter cold. Once he tried to crowd into the waiting room, but it was jammed to the door. There was no room for him in that inhospitable inn.

Along in the afternoon a dog, lean and lank, came up to him. Ivan put out his hand, and the dog whined and licked it. It was the only warm touch that little Ivan had had for months. The dog had not had anything to eat. Ivan could see that. It hurt him to look into the dog's face.

Just then a train pulled in. Ivan was pushed to one side of the platform by the surging crowd. The train would wait there for an hour or more, he knew. An idea came to him. He remembered a song his mother used to sing. He would sing to the soldiers on the train and perhaps they would give him some kopeks.

He pushed his way into an icy car and began to sing. His quavering little voice rose and fell with singular sweetness, as he sang a sad song of a boy who went through the market place, trying in vain to sell his wares. When he finished, Ivan hesitated a moment, and then started to pass his cap. He had never done that before. One soldier smiled at him; one or two drew a few soiled kopeks from their pockets. It was all they had. They could not give more, but it was Christmas, and they wanted to give something. As Ivan brushed past one soldier, he saw him cross himself, and overheard some words that he was muttering very softly: "Inasmuch . . . ye . . . unto one . . . of these."

Little Ivan heard no more. Thanking them all, he hurried out, to find the dog wagging his tail, waiting for him. The dog licked his hand as though he, too, had appreciated the song, and was sorry he had nothing to give.

It was colder now, stinging cold, and very dark. A stiff wind was blowing straight into his face. Once, when a stronger gust came, the dog fell over against him. Ivan knew his friend was very cold and very weak.

He pushed his hand down into the pocket of his shabby sheepskin coat. There were the kopeks the soldiers had given him. He would buy some black bread for the dog! He forgot his own hunger in that of this dog, which reminded him of the one they used to have in their home before the war when they were so happy.

Together, they went to a peasant, who was stamping his feet and slapping his hands to keep from freezing while waiting to sell his meager stock of black bread, and together they came back with several hard crusts. Little Ivan pushed into a corner of the abandoned freight house. There, at least, they would be protected from the biting wind. And taking the dog in his arms he gave him the bread. The dog licked his hand appreciatively. Then Ivan tried to make his coat do for the two of them; and they huddled close together, for the wind outside was blowing a gale, and it was whipping like a sharp lash into the shed. Finally warmed by the dog, Ivan slept, with the bedraggled creature he had saved tight in his arms.

He felt a warm glow. Instantly he sat up. The freight house was strangely lighted. And stranger still, the light seemed to come from his corner. He looked down. In his arms was a little baby. It looked up at him and smiled. He tucked the blanket about it. He somehow knew by its face; it was the Christ-child. How his heart thrilled! he, little Ivan, was holding the Christ-child in his arms. As he looked, there came a voice, soft and sweet, repeating words that his mother had taught him, one Christmas day, long ago: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto me."

On the instant, he awoke. The dog was licking his face and hands. It was this that had warmed him. He listened: through the still, cold air came the sound of a cathedral bell. He made the sign of the Russian cross with a little hand that was numb with cold and pulling his coat tighter around them soon fell asleep, to dream of the Christ-child who came to help little boys like him.

"Merry Christmas," said a voice. It sounded like the same voice he had heard in the night. He awoke with a start. He was dreaming again! No! someone was bending over him.

"Your little friend kept you warm," he heard the voice say. "If you had not had that dog, you would never have seen this Christmas morn."

A kind, Red Cross man had come to the freight house that morning, looking for belated Christmas supplies, and finding little Ivan and his dog, had taken them into a warm house where heat and a vigorous rubbing had brought them both to life.

"Where is the Christ-child?" asked little Ivan eagerly. "I held him in my arms last night. He must be here. I saw him! He smiled at me."

"Yes, you did see him," said the good man. "When you gave the dog some of your bread you saw him, you held the Christ-child. For the Christ-child always comes to those whose hearts, touched with pity and with love, give their lives to others. Last night, you saved his dog. See! he understands." The dog did understand, for it licked little Ivan's hands and face again and again.

All that Christmas day the heart of the man was strangely cheered. He was fa [EDITORS' NOTE.—In a letter accompanying the manuscript of the following story, Mr. Weist says: "As you may remember, I worked with the Russian Twelfth army at Valk and Pskov—northernmost points on the eight hundred mile Russian front during the winter of 1917-1918. Christmas day I spent on a station platform at Pskov, from 8 a.m. till 5 p.m., waiting for a train. It was 27 degrees below zero. Some mail was brought by courier that day, the first I had had since September. To my surprise, the letters had been written before I left America.

"When the train pulled in at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, several thousands of us rushed for a place in the nearest car. I found myself in a crowded fourth-class car, with no heat and no light except a flickering wax candle which soon burned out. The car door was partly off its hinges and could not be closed.

"Just before the train pulled out a little Russian boy came into the car and sang this song. The soldiers gave him some dirty kopeks. It was not merry—that Christmas evening.

"That night we ran into a snow bank out on the Russian plain and were held four hours. With no light, no heat, snow beating against the car, and thick frost forming all over the inside of the car, I wondered that the Russian soldiers muttered no complaint or protest. There was not a murmur. They accepted it all as part and parcel of their life and land of subtle melancholy."] n home and loved ones; but altogether, he afterwards said, it was the happiest istmas he had ever known. He did not erstand the mysterious warmth that had ot into his life. It was as the glow of a ght, summer morning sun.

n Christmas evening, when Ivan was rmly tucked in bed, the good man lay n by his side to sleep, with a great peace his heart. But no sooner had he dozed than a strange thing happened. He found self sitting bolt upright, gazing at a soft, te light that flooded the room. And ngest of all, it seemed to come from the where he lay. He looked down. In his arms was a little child. He knew at once by the light that played across its face; it was the Christ-child. As he looked, it smiled at him. A new, deep joy flooded his soul, as a voice came, soft and sweet: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto me."

Instantly he awoke. He was holding little Ivan tight in his arms. Ivan had thrown his arms about his neck, and was kissing his cheek. Far away a cathedral bell was faintly ringing. He crossed himself in the cold stillness, and pulling the small, sheepskin covering over the little boy, quickly fell asleep, to dream again of the Christ-child.

Frederick E. Emrich
Fifty Years in the Christian Ministry

By Thomas C. Richards

WO of our Congregational leaders have come to prominence and leadership ab-tely unspoiled," was the comment of a l headed preacher when Dr. Emrich had hed talking about "Fifty Years in the istry." "They are?" "Frederick Em- and James L. Barton," was the mation.

've been hearing Dr. Emrich," I said secretary and denizen of the Congre-onal House. "Nobody ever discounts thing Dr. Emrich says," was his laconic inder.

ast Sunday he was dedicating a German onage. After it was over a Swede arose said, "You Germans love Dr. Emrich use he can talk to you in your own ue, but I want to tell you today that Swedes love him, too. The Finns think world of him and the Italians have the e feeling."

would rather have that said of me," arked the doctor, "than to have it said as the greatest preacher in America." e than any other man in Massachusetts has interpreted America at its best to e "pilgrims of the twentieth century." more than America he has interpreted is Christ to them in such a winning, some manner that it has gripped their s and gripped them to his soul with ks of steel.

is significant that the book he loves in the Bible is the Gospel of John, gospel of the heart of Christ," as Ed-d Sears called it. There is something, much of the flavor and spirit of John ut Frederick Emrich. "The disciple m Jesus loved," must have been lovable big-hearted like him.

ow he can make that same Bible live! reads it in many languages, and gets light from every version. And he reads nuch and lovingly. Then he tells you t a beautiful meaning he found this ning in the lesson for the day. For he the Prayer Book and no man uses it etter advantage. That deep spiritual which one feels even in a passing meet-with him is the result of his deep, search-daily devotions. One great secret of power is an almost forgotten secret in e days of hurly-burly; it is his devo-al hour. He "takes time to be holy."

he Greek Testament is his daily com-panion. He is a student, always studying. He knows the best books. Arnold of Rugby, Maurice and Kingsley found him as a young man and have ever been his comrades and friends. Always there are books in his bag, for the missionary journeys which he takes.

His gospel reminds me again and again of Whittier's "Eternal Goodness." His God has a great heart. The harsh, hard doctrines of Calvinism repel him. The cruelty of such a God is repugnant to him. He believes with the Quaker:

> Yet, in the maddening maze of things
> And tossed by storm and flood,
> To one fixed trust my spirit clings;
> I know that God is good.
> The wrong that pains my soul below
> I dare not throne above;
> I know not of his hate,—I know
> His goodness and his love.

There is nothing narrow about him. He has imbibed the mysticism of Swedenborg, and feels the glory of the Anglican Church.

Dr. Emrich in His Office

Religion is another name for fellowship to him and his friends are of all faiths. Of the Roman Catholic Church he sometimes speaks as the mother of us all.

The biggest thing about him is his heart. He has trodden the path of suffering. When he lost his youngest boy in the Spanish American War, it staggered him. Then Stanley fell at his post in the far-flung battle line of Christendom in Asia Minor. But the way of the cross has mellowed and enriched him. When my mother died he wrote me a letter that was beautiful in its sympathy. He is always writing letters of encouragement, of congratulations, and of sympathy. Into many a hard field his missives of the heart have come as a mighty dynamic. Some one ought to collect those letters.

Unmitred and untitled, by the grace of God and the goodness of his heart he has been unofficial bishop and father confessor to many a minister of the gospel. He has strengthened many a man's faith.

Fifty years he has been in the ministry. Seventy-seven years he has lived and lived intensely. The son of German immigrants, he was born in New York's east side near where Al Smith and Cardinal Hayes first saw the light.

He went to Bangor Seminary and Bates College after he was married. His first parish was Mechanic Falls, Maine. Part of the time he filled two outlying pulpits in the afternoon and came back to his home church in the evening. He was a demon for work. Then followed a term in Chicago—for New England theologians were hard on him, when he believed that those who had not heard of Christ in this life might have another chance before they were eternally damned. A great pastorate followed in Grace Church, South Framingham, Mass., and then the crowning work of his life when he became secretary of the Home Missionary Society of Massachusetts.

Greatheart he is in every sense of the word! Expounder of the love of God to a needy world! Catholic in his friendships, his fellowships and his faith! Brotherly to his own generation and like as a father to countless young men who have profited by his advice, his experience, but most of all by his love. Sagacious statesman for the Kingdom of God! A living example of how to blend and fuse men of all races into one by the power of Christian brotherhood. A man, a nobleman, and a Christian gentleman! All these things you are Frederick E. Emrich by the grace of God and by your faith in him, who is your Master, Redeemer, and Exemplar! God give us more like you!

In recognition of the fiftieth anniversary of the ordination of Dr. Emrich, the Boston Ministers' Meeting, on Nov. 23, adopted resolutions, presented by Dr. A. F. Pierce, in which it was appropriately stated that—

Dr. Emrich has given himself without stint to the service of the churches of the entire state; he has been a true friend to all of his brother ministers, no matter how humble or obscure the station in which they labored; he has been the champion of every good cause, and he has carried himself with such sweetness of temper and shown such consideration for those who have differed from his own views, that he has endeared himself to all our hearts.

We recognize in him one who excelled in the pastoral office; a devout student of the Scriptures; an able expositor and interpreter of the word and an earnest defender of the Christian faith.

Now that he has come to the autumn days of life when he must retire from the more active duties of the ministry, we wish to give him this testimonial of our affectionate appreciation, and express the hope and prayer that he may be spared to us many more years for fellowship and service.

KENNEDY'S SECOND BEST

BY JOHN FREEMAN

The first chapter introduces Rev. Gordon Kennedy, the successful young pastor of Rosemont Memorial Church, Toronto. He is thirty, and unmarried. A crowd of his merry, young people at the railroad station see him off, bound for the West on a summer vacation. They fill his Pullman section with fruit and other gifts. Before the train starts, a woman who introduces herself as Mrs. Wilcox presents her beautiful niece, Miss Margaret Pearson, to Mr. Kennedy as traveling companion. Miss Pearson is on the way from England to her father, in Vancouver.

CHAPTER II

KENNEDY proceeded to his section, midway down the Pullman. With something of dismay he surveyed the mound of gifts his friends had sent to the train. He frowned for a moment, then set to work to enter into his diary a list of the parcels along with the names of the donors. Most of the cards were in feminine handwriting.

He pressed the call button. The Negro porter answered promptly, and stood at respectful attention. Kennedy pointed to the heap in front of him.

"Do you know how many packages you've stacked up here?"

"Ah doan know de exact number of 'em, Cap'n, but Ah reckon dey's somewhere between thutteen and fo'teen."

"Correct! Nine lots of fruit, four parcels of books, and one bundle as yet unclassified. What's to be done with them? I haven't room to stretch my legs."

"Well, Cap'n, Ah's open to do anything you propositions. Ah know where some of dat fruit can find storage without botherin' nobody."

Kennedy rose and took off his coat. Then he opened the boxes of fruit and inspected their contents. Quantity was matched by quality.

"To start with, take these two boxes of fruit to the young lady in blue, at the end of the car, and say that Mr. Kennedy asks her to accept them with his compliments."

When the porter returned for further instructions, Kennedy handed him one of the largest boxes, saying:

"That's for yourself, with my regards."

"Thank you, Cap'n!"

"Now, I think I'll reserve these two lots. The rest you can take to the train chef. Perhaps they'll come in handy for the dessert."

"Ah don't think the Company's rules would allow him to put 'em on de tables, Cap'n. Dey's strict about any tamperin' wid de maynoo."

"Then let him do what he likes with them."

"Excuse me, Cap'n, de chef's a married man wid a fambly. If you give him all dat fruit he'll be dead in the mornin'."

"Well, do you think you can save his life by going halves with him?"

"Ah's willin' to try. Ah always says, a short life and a merry one for me."

A space having been cleared in front of him, Kennedy stretched his legs and leaned back with his hands clasped behind his head. He was glad to get away from the crowd for a while. He had been working hard and felt the need of a good, long rest. He craved a spell of free outdoor life. The invitation from his brother Jim to spend a couple of months on his Alberta ranch exactly coincided with his own desires. Two months in the saddle, roaming at will over the prairie, would put him in prime condition, and brace him for the next season's pulpit efforts. He had remarked to some of his friends that just now his mind was like a squeezed lemon, all rind and no juice. They protested that his preaching had shown no lack of substance or flavor. There seemed to be a conspiracy to say nothing but pleasant things about him.

It was true, as they had been singing back there, that Gordon Kennedy was a jolly good fellow; otherwise, he would have been spoiled by the adulations of the last three years. Nobody wanted to spoil him, but a host of people took the right way for doing it. He was flattered and pampered. The press boomed him. He was a picturesque personality whose ordinary sayings and doings interested the public.

It could not be truthfully said that Kennedy went out of his way to court publicity, but it was observed that he gravitated to the spotlight as faithfully as flowers turn to the sun.

He now opened one of the parcels and took out a book. It was a new novel entitled The Binding Spell. Having glanced through a few chapters he tossed it aside. The title suggested a love story, but the thing turned out to be a sordid tale of a woman gambler. He was in no mood for making a mental journey through the fusty air of the social underworld.

He turned to the window to observe the scenery through which they were passing. They were traversing a belt of wheat fields just beginning to take on a glint of gold. The farmhouses looked stiff and stolid. The trees, thinly sprinkled over the landscape, wore a limp and listless appearance. The air quivered in the heat. The atmosphere of the car was stifling, although the windows had been raised to the tops of the dust screens. Most of the men had removed their coats and the women were furiously fanning themselves. Presently he grew drowsy and fell asleep.

Half an hour later he awoke. Looking up he observed that Margaret Pearson had a pad of writing paper on her knee and was busy with her fountain pen. He went forward and spoke to her.

"Aren't you very energetic for such a hot day?" he asked.

"I don't think so. I like to be busy, and I'm terribly behind with my correspondence."

"You English people are much addicted t letter writing, I'm told."

"I believe we are. But I don't write lon letters, except to my grandfather. He is ol and lonely and deaf. He likes to get lon screeds from me. My other friends say tha my letters are only a few sentences slun together. Some of them go so far as to sa that I could write my letters on a finge nail."

He glanced down at her hands.

"It's a libel," he said. "But I came to as you if you will join me in a cool drink. The make them in good style on these trains."

"Thank you, I can just do with one. must thank you for the delicious fruit yo gave me. It was kind of you. I hope yo didn't rob yourself."

"Not at all. I found nine boxes of it pile up in my section."

She gave him an amused but searchin glance as she said:

"Your people evidently adore you. Yo must find it pleasant, but perhaps sometime a little embarrassing."

Kennedy flushed slightly.

"They are overkind to me, Miss Pearson I find it a responsibility. But what abou that drink? The juice of a couple of orange or lemons, squeezed into a big glass wit plenty of crushed ice, sugar to your taste filtered water, and a dash of soda! What d you say?"

"It sounds positively thrilling," she an swered with a smile. I haven't the courag to say No."

"Orange or lemon?"

"Orange, please."

When the porter appeared, Kennedy gav minute instructions regarding the drinks,— one of orange and one of lemon.

"Leave it to me, Gov'nor, and I'll fetc you a couple of drinks that'll make you wis you was a pair of giraffes with three yard of throat to taste with."

While waiting for the refreshments, Ken nedy inquired how long she had been i Canada, and if she was making an extende visit.

"I've only been here three weeks," sh said; "but I may remain for the rest of m life. It will largely depend upon my father' movements. He is in business in Vancouve and I learn from some of his recent letter that he isn't altogether settled in his plan I'm quite in love with this country so fa and shouldn't at all mind making my hom here."

He was observing her closely—the straigh eyebrows, the curved mouth, the shapel hands. He noted her ears—what delicatel tinted, shell-like things they were, and thos tiny bluebell pendants! He had been pr judiced against earrings, but these seeme to be a part of her and in harmony with he general appearance. Again he was struck b the music of her voice, so different from th women's voices he had been accustomed t hear. It occurred to him that one of th choicest gifts which nature could confer upo a woman was a pleasing voice.

"I hope you won't find the journey too tir-ng," he said. It's a long way to Vancouver, nd much of the scenery is rather monoto-ous. Some of it is exceedingly dreary, but fter you sight the Rockies it is superb."

"I'm expecting to enjoy every bit of it. Have you been over the line before?"

"Once out to the coast, and on another ccasion as far as Calgary, on the way to ny brother's Alberta ranch. That's my des-ination now—Black Gulch, on Moon River. 'm to spend my holiday there, doing the owboy act."

"Busting bronchos and lassoing wild cat-le?"

"Something of that sort. Do you think it's eneath a parson's dignity?"

"Not at all! I think it's very much up to he mark of a man. If I were a man I should ove that life. I'm fond of cattle and horses nd riding."

"You're real English, I see," he replied, aughingly. "I've never known an English erson yet who wasn't passionately fond of nimals. They adore horses, go daft on logs, and even dote on pigs. They seem to nderstand animals better than we do and o have a closer comradeship with them. They make pals of them. Why is it so?"

She looked at him with smiles in her yes.

"Possibly it's because they're such good ervants. We like to be served by creatures f a lower order than ourselves. Besides, hey can't talk. They let us do all the alking."

"No, that's not it. The Englishman is a hy creature. He won't uncork his affections or human consumption; but when he comes nto contact with the animal world, he feels ree to let himself go."

"There may be something in that," she eplied quietly.

"I'm sure there is. The Englishman has he softest heart in the world. He shows t in his feeling for nature. You know, they ay every Englishman is a born gardener. He chums with his plants and flowers. Some of my people at Rosemount have Eng-ish gardeners, and they're all alike in their ondness for the things they grow."

"Yes, I think that is one pleasing feature n our people. You should see the working nen, corporation laborers, and such like, arrying home their bunches of flowers from heir little allotment gardens. It seems to edeem them from sordidness. And the women of the slums! Turn them loose for a day in the country and they come back oaded with flowers. Only about a month ago, when I was riding in the underground rom Baker Street to Aldgate, I saw a sight I shall not soon forget—two cars filled with East End women. Some of them were tipsy; all of them tremendously noisy with their singing, dancing, and bantering. Yet those cars were gorgeous masses of color. Every woman had a huge bouquet, well arranged, too."

At this point the porter arrived with their drinks.

After she had sipped a portion of it, he asked:

"How do you like it?"

"It's perfectly heavenly! Nectar for the gods."

He asked her if he might share a table with her for meals. To this she gave a prompt and pleased assent. While they were still lingering over their glasses, the porter strode slowly through the Pullman, announcing in well-spaced impressive tones: "Dinner — is — now — ready — in — the — dining — car."

Parables of Safed the Sage

The Parable of the Footstep on the Stair

After that we had circumnavigated the globe, which means, being interpreted, after we had sailed around the world, and had come unto the lovely spot where we spend our Summers, we gathered our children about us and were proud and glad. And the children said, Father and Mother have sailed for Forty Thousand Miles upon the Seven Seas, and have seen Strange Continents and Islands, and now are they Home Again. Furthermore, they have sailed for Forty Years upon the Tempestuous Sea of Matrimony, and have kept their troubles out of the Newspapers. Go to, now, and let us give them the Time of their Sweet Young Lives, and celebrate their Fortieth Anniversary. And they did even so. And we feasted and were happy. And we lingered in that lovely spot longer than we had ever done before, until the Autumn came, and the Leaves turned Red and Gold, and the forests were Glorious. And we enjoyed each day.

And when the day for our departure drew nigh, being but seven days before us, I rose in the morning, and the Sun shone radiantly upon the Forest. And I said unto Keturah, Remain where thou art and take thy Supererogatory Beauty Sleep and I will build a Fire.

And I went down the stair, and I gathered Sticks and laid them on the Hearth, and lighted the small Wood, so that the Logs soon were blazing. And as I rose, I heard the footstep of Keturah, descending the Stair, and I stepped forward and greeted her at the Foot, and Saluted her, and led her to the Fire, and said, Behold how goodly it is and how pleasantly warm.

And she stood with me, and said, The day is Glorious, and the Earth is Beautiful, and God hath been very good unto us.

So we broke out fast, and began the day with joy. But before that day had ended, an angel passed that way, and cast a shadow as it passed; and the angel beckoned unto Keturah, and she turned and smiled at me in Farewell, and she vanished from my sight, and left me bewildered and in sore lamentation.

And that night I rested not, and the Dawn broke Late and Unwelcome. And the Sorrowful Sun had hidden its face, and the skies wept.

Then I rose, and descended the Stair, and gathered Sticks, and builded a Fire. And as it began to blaze, I rose, and I turned, as it were instinctively, as if I had heard a Footstep, even the Footstep of Keturah, descending the Stair. And there was no sound, but only an Agony of Silence. And I sat me down in Grief and Desolation.

Now the Footsteps of Keturah while she was yet Visibly near made Musick as they trod the Common Paths of Life, and ministered richly in little deeds of kindness and unselfishness, and the echoes still are to be heard in many places. And I have not lost them forever. For in my better thoughts I hear them before me for guidance and hope, and I know she is not far away.

Now there will come a day when I also shall ascend the Stair that slopeth upward from this mortal world to that which is above. And I know that she will be listening for my coming. Yea, and she will not altogether wait for me inside the Gate; for I shall hear her footstep coming a little way down to meet me, and we shall go in together.

A Tribute to Dr. Pond

Minute adopted Nov. 18 by the faculty of the Pacific School of Religion

In the death of Rev. William Chauncey Pond, D.D., Oct. 22, at the ripe age of 95, Pacific School of Religion has lost to view one of its choicest friends and largest benefactors. Dr. Pond was a member of the committee appointed by the General Association of California, in 1865, to overture the other denominations in favor of founding a Union Theological Seminary. Of the seminary established the next year by the Congregationalists, Dr. Pond was for many years one of the most strong-hearted and laborious leaders. He was a member of the board of trustees from 1866 to 1899, and secretary of the board for 27 of these years. His practical wisdom and energy contributed largely to the development of the young institution. In repeated financial emergencies the labor of saving the day was laid on his shoulders. Again and again he applied to California churches and individual donors for the threatened enterprise. Once he spent an entire year, nine months of it among the New England churches, as financial agent. In every step of the advance of the seminary he was a foremost, tireless, and confident leader. His service to this institution formed one of the main strands in the texture of his life. The other two were his pastoral work and his Chinese work. These three composed a remarkable life-work of 73 years from his ordination to his death.

Dr. Pond was characterized by a hospitable and progressive mind, a brotherly and sympathetic heart, an indomitable will. His activity was unflagging, his devotion absorbing, his controlling motive love and loyalty to Christ. He has left a shining example and vital influence of far-reaching power among the California churches and ministers and among the Chinese in California and in China.

Behold the Star in the East

By Jane C. Crowell

Let us like those of old
Be Wise Men on our way,
And in the East behold
The star whose brilliant ray
Led them to seek for him,
The Christ Child, where he lay,
Within a manger dim
Among the cows and hay.
They brought rich offering
Their homage true to pay,
As to a royal king,
Acknowledging his sway.
So let us on this morn
The holy star obey,
For Jesus Christ is born,
And this is Christmas Day!

George W. Cable

The Outreach of a Deep and Vivid Personality

By Mary Brewster

ON a spring-touched Sunday in a pause of one of the harsher New England winters the body of the Southern-born writer, George W. Cable, who died at St. Petersburg, Fla., Jan. 31, 1925, was brought to the old cemetery at Northampton, Mass. This town Mr. Cable chose for his family home when, at the height of his fame, he came north from New Orleans forty years ago.

Patient old pines and stark birches brooded and glistened over the white drift of snow, momentarily yielding itself to that peculiar peace that sometimes hovers in the sunlight of early afternoon. A wider world seemed sending a message. A fitness felt because Nature's manifestation was so vital a part of this life that had left a world it so loved.

It was an event when the Cables came to Northampton. Even children shared the local excitement; especially when it was reported that there were children in the family. There were six. Another was born there.*

Although apparently a happy age, it was before the time of automobiles, phonographs, or radio, and average families were, perhaps, more thrilled by things "literary." Their sitting-rooms would have been strangely unhomelike without their sets of Dickens, Thackeray, and George Eliot. They even read aloud from these. There was no flood of magazines existing mainly for the profits from advertising, and the common month was lifted by its richer days when Harpers, the Atlantic, the Century, and Littell's were due in the mail or ready to be contested for in the public library.

A Dominant Personality

Though in his last years George Cable was more generally known by his social philanthropy, he was, at this earlier time, a more famous figure than, perhaps, is quite possible of realization by the present American public teeming with its devotion to mechanical and visualized entertainment; its fusion of many cultures (and lack of these) and the transforming strain of Teuton and Slav in its literature, especially its periodical literature, in which Cable, now so casually passed over, if noted at all, was a dominant personality. It was the rare distinctiveness of his periodical contribution that led the Century to ask for a twelve month serial (The Grandissimes), which led to his novel writing.

At the period of his greatest fame the most approved popular entertainment was the public lecture. It was the great day of Major Pond and his famous platform stars. Chief among these was Cable, and biggest among attractions was his joint appearance with Mark Twain, upon which experience Mr. Cable, who delighted in "Mark," could be most entertainingly reminiscent.

And he was an agitating force politically. Only two stirring decades had passed since the Civil War. A serious boy soldier, earning a creditable record for service and, in his hours of recreation, studying his Bible by campfire light, he had fought for the South. He endured the hardships and knew the deprivations of reconstruction. But he came to believe that the main thing was the preservation of the Union (in Northampton he regularly joined the local G. A. R. in its Memorial Day observances), and he pleaded the cause of the Negro in a way, a time, and a section when all this was extremely inciting.

It was at this crest that Cable left the New Orleans that he so loved and so minutely studied, but where his wife's health was failing, and came to Simsbury, Ct., and later to Northampton where Smith College then was young. There were five little Cable girls to be fitted for life at that time.†

The Cable home was backed by Paradise woods and nearby were open fields—now filling in with the new quadrangle at Smith College—all a rich playground for children of the more original inclination and awake to the joy in wild flower and bird life. In this they were led by their father, who used to make music-scores from the notes of his favorite song-birds.

Noted Visitors to the Cable Home

People famed in many fields often came to that house. Getting first hand report of this from the young Cables, as they relishingly reflected it from original sources, was a rousing peep into the world of achievement; just as an older privilege of Northampton residents was the actual meeting of these people at the "at homes" and garden parties where, during many years, the hospitality of this household shared its honors with its friends.

There was a thrilling day when Joseph Jefferson was expected and certain cognizant, but less favored, children scarcely could wait for a report of what "Rip" was like when he came down—not from the Catskills, but from common sleep in the family guest room. Henry M. Stanley came almost the night before he started on his last trip to Africa. He was thrilling audiences crammed into hot lecture halls (appropriately decorated with potted palms on the platform!) and one's small horizons stretched almost until they ached, just to look at that bronzed face. Then George Kenyon came and told about the convicts in Siberia, whose dark horrors he had been writing for the Century. Also Conan Doyle,—heavy and hearty with less harrowing material. Richard W. Gilder, and so many whom the Century exploited, used to come to the Cable house, on the lovely lawns of which most of them planted trees to commemorate the visit. (Cable's love of nature came to the surface in some strain in nearly all his expression.) Then there were Henry van Dyke, W. D. Howells, Henry Ward Beecher, Frank Stockton, Charles Dudley Warner, Jane Addams, E. S. Willard, Mrs. Minnie Maddern Fiske, Julia Marlowe; in fact who—of both oncoming and older celebrities—that was a part of that shining time did not come? I am not sure about Bret Harte or Lafeadio Hearn (whom Cable knew before he left New Orleans, and there added to Hearn's collection of Creole songs), George William Curtis and Charles Eliot Norton, whose summer homes at nearby Ashfield drew many prominent persons also. Both were living when Cable first came to our town. James Barrie, whose quoted reasons for coming to the United States were "George Cable and Niagara Falls," made a visit of some length. With him was Dr. Nicoll, of the London Bookman. Neither were "Sirs" then. Mrs. Humphrey Ward and Andrew Carnegie were among later visitors.

A memory of Mr. Cable in his own home is of a small man of almost ministerial aspect—due probably to a frock coat and the importance that youthful imagination gave. He had brown hair and beard, a moustache with long sharply twisted ends. His voice was rather highly pitched to our New England ears but with a clear and often a merry note capable of whimsy and true to the pleasant twinkle in his hazel eyes that slightly moderated the awe of his sudden appearance at the door of his study when romping children became too vociferous in the hall. If one were there to supper when he was at home and joined that long tableful of lively children—at other times presided over by a mother with one of the sweetest faces and loveliest voices—he seemed usually rather off in a world of his own. But evidently he followed much of the young chatter, for he was likely to break into it with disconcerting astuteness, and doubtless with quizzical humor—because the memory that now recalls the smile associates with it the wit of later meals when it was not so flustering to drink cocoa with the great.

While his readings meant many absences, his returns meant active entry into the interests of the town, Smith College, and the Edwards Church, of which he was a deacon. Another prominent member of that church, Mr. Sydney Bridgman, was influential in bringing Mr. Cable to Northampton. He was head of the Bridgman Bookstore which for more than a century has been a center where might be seen notables who, for generations, have made this section of Massachusetts atmospheric. Mr. Bridgman, himself an interesting writer of reminiscences, was father of Dr. Howard Bridgman, former editor of The Congregationalist.

Southern and Northern Traits Combined

Underlying the grace of his Southern-born cordiality, his wit, and the ever-broadening ripple of his humor, was more rigid inheritance. There was an old New England strain mingled with the Virginian in his ncestry. Early a member and active worker the Presbyterian Church, religion was chosen, serviceable, and unshrinkable responsibility. He was not afraid to stand for hatever conviction came from conscience. e was great, also, in that he was not afraid change his opinion as mellowing life gave im broader outlooks. He was a true progressive—alert but searching. With a librality of view did not come laxness in the onscientiousness, duty, and service so fundaentally instilled in him. There was early obriety in his life. At fourteen a reversal a family fortunes had made it necessary or him to leave school and contribute to he family support. He married early, orked day and night, and knew the sharp ecessities through devotion to an increasng family on a small income. While there as natural merriment there was marked trictness, too, in some of the household ustoms of his earlier days in Northampton. ard-playing and dancing were not approved. t is notable here that later his Home ulture Clubs was first among social institutions to have the Saturday evening lances (now so customary in this sort of vork) where young people, who otherwise night be on the streets, could here enjoy hemselves under proper chaperonage. It s reported that he left his position on the New Orleans Picayune because asked to over a theatrical performance. But afterwards theater people were among his guests at "Tarry-a-while." At least one of his books was dramatized and he came to believe in the theater (in which today some of his descendants are participants) as one of the potent sources for good.

Always he was a close student of the Bible. Through his busiest and most celebrated years, teeming with opportunities that a less altruistic man would have turned solely to self-gain, he was an ardent worker for the Congregational Sunday school. A class of twelve members in the Edwards Church spread to an enrollment of 700. Then these lessons, open to the public of all denominations, each Sunday afternoon packed the old Opera House at Northampton and on Saturday afternoons for more than fifteen months, still greater audiences thronged Tremont Temple, Boston. These talks, supplemented, found wider audience through "A Layman's Hint," in the Sunday School Times.

THE PEOPLES' INSTITUTE IN NORTHAMPTON

Conspicuously a worker for the oppressed, his later years were more given to the less doctrinal social settlement effort of which great move of the past generation his Home Culture Clubs were pioneer.

These clubs, founded in 1887, at first were neighborhood groups meeting to follow any subject of common interest towards self-improvement. Scattered through the United States, and especially in the South, by 1896 they had a membership of 15,000. Later the effort consolidated and became the Peoples' Institute in Northampton, where Smith College, with its hundreds of young women, gives exceptional opportunity for the club purpose which Mr. Cable defined as "a cross-sectioning of society." People from the shops, mills, or wherever the day was employed, might in the evening find at the clubs a leader along whatever line special inclination for self-cultivation led. The Lyman family—for generations contributors to what was best in Northampton life—gave the first central building. Later Andrew Carnegie gave the present Carnegie House headquarters, and Mrs. Arthur Curtis James gave James House for the Domestic Arts.

A charactertistic offshoot of the Institute is the Carnegie Prize Gardens, perpetuated for Northampton by George Cable and Andrew Carnegie, and by which small home grounds and unsightly back plots have been converted to beauty spots throughout the city and suburbs. Just as his great love of outdoors permeated Mr. Cable's personal expression, so at the heart of his service lies the ideal of the home. The Peoples' Institute motto is, "The private home is the public hope," and behind the old Home Culture Clubs and from his youth a guiding creed with him had been:

To make a fireside home for bairns and wife
That's the true pathos and sublime of life.

Courage, choice contribution, love of Nature, and consideration for less advantaged humanity characterize this man who was both creative and observant, keen, resolute, and independent, and yet, in fancy gently playful, too. Courteous, he none the less was one who did not reveal himself to all. He held the artist's right to mood and his intimacies were more closely guarded. He knew the more sensitive aloofness but recognized kinships that were wider than class.

Out of these needs and kinships that were an ever-driving accompaniment to a long life of abundant expression there remain in outward symbol a group of books of exceptional appreciations and important national bearing (the rare historical value of his contribution is yet to be fully recognized); countless little gardens (most beautiful of human memorials), and the Peoples' Institute. These are the outward expression of the inner essences of a life of progressive and earnest individuality which—sharing both the arts and the humanities—was an unsual record of the domestic, the aesthetic, and the institutional.

No Room in the Inn

By Robert Elliot Brown

No room in the inn
For Joseph!
The dark night settled down;
The birds found a rest
In their Bethlehem nest
But Joseph was friendless
In town;
The smell of the sheep
On his garments,
The mud of the fields
On his shoes—
Said the clerk all aflame
Repeating his name,
"No room in the inn for Jews."

No room in the inn
For Mary!
Disconsolate there she stood,
The fear on her face
Enshadowing the grace
Of expectant motherhood.
Her robe of a homely
Fabric;
Her shawl of unfinished yarn;
Said the host with a sneer
And his eye with a leer,
"The cattle are calved in the barn."

No room in the inn
For Jesus!
A manger reserved for his bed.
The cock's shrill horn
Announced Christmas morn
To the revelers bleary and red.
The need of a child was
His summons;
The cry of a child was
His call,
But the proud, cruel world
To its gaiety whirled—
"It's the child of a peasant—
"That's all!"

No room in the inn
For Jesus?
At the work bench of life
He stands.
The saw and the plane
Shall labor in vain
If nails you drive
In his hands!
The look in his eye
Most appealing,
The goal of his soul
To pursue—
No room in the heart
For Jesus?
No room in God's inn
For you!

Eight Faiths on One Platform

A remarkable gathering crowded the Old South Meeting House in Boston the evening of Nov. 30, when eight men, representing eight different religious faiths, all "talked religion" in the most brotherly way, and the audiences, as varied in faith as the speakers, manifested the same spirit. The allied League of Neighbors, Union of East and West, and Fellowship of Faiths represents a movement for the development of friendly relations among people of all kinds. The unsalaried executives of the movement are Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. Weller and Kedar Nath Das Gupta. Offices are in Elizabeth, N. J., New York City, Boston, and London. Weekly luncheon conferences are held at the Twentieth Century Club in Boston, open to all on Thursdays from 1 to 2.

George W. Coleman presided over the Old South meeting. The speakers were: Bakai, William H. Randall; Buddhist, Amal K. Siddanta; Catholic Christian, Denis A. McCarthy; Protestant Christian, Rev. George L. Paine; Confucian, S. Y. Chu; Hindu, Kedar Nath Das Gupta; Jew, Rabbi Harry Levi; Mohammedan, Ahmed Hassan Halet Bey. Each speaker explained the characteristics of his own faith, and expressed good will and friendliness for those of other faiths. Each emphasized the fact of human brotherhood. No attempt was made to change the faith of others, but a unity of essential ideals was manifest. The spirit of the best thought of the meeting was well expressed by Rabbi Levi when he said that "those who try to shut God into their own particular body of faith are likely to be shutting him out."

The next meeting of the Fellowship of Faith will be held in Temple Israel, Boston, the evening of Dec. 14, when speakers of other faiths will pay tribute to Christianity. On Jan. 4, in St. Paul's Cathedral, there will be tributes to Judaism.

The Light of a Thousand Candles

By William Emerson Jones
Dane Street Church, Beverly, Massachusetts

[EDITORS' NOTE.—The many requests which have come to the author in regard to this Christmas service have prompted him to write it down as it has finally taken shape after the experience of several years' production. His hope is that it may be as helpful to others as it has been to him and to those who have participated with him in the service. The name of the service has been generally adopted after seeing a thousand people with lighted candles leaving the church and scattering into all parts of the community.]

The Christmas Story

PART I—THE MESSENGER OF THE LORD

Reader. The prophecy of the ages is about to be fulfilled. It seems as if the activities of the nations have been converging toward this one purpose. The nations are looking toward peace, their tranquillity augurs well the coming crisis in the life of the world. Faintly we hear the echo of the ancient prophets, so faint indeed that it seems but a murmur wafted on the soft breezes of the night. There is a portentous stillness. At last it is broken by the birth of a little child to an aged priest and his wife. Surely this is the one of whom the prophet spoke! Or, must we look for another? When the aged father looked upon the son of his old age he said: "And thou, child, shall be called the prophet of the Most High." This is the one of whom it was said, "A voice, crying in the wilderness." Then we must look for another? Yes, another.

Blessed be the Lord, the God of our fathers,
For he hath visited and wrought redemption for his people,
And hath raised us up an hope of salvation
In the house of his servant David
(As he spake by the mouth of the holy prophets
That have been since the world began);
To perform the mercy promised to our fathers,
And to remember his holy covenant;
The promise which he gave unto our fathers,
To grant unto us that we should serve him without fear,
In holiness and righteousness before him all our days.
Yea and thou, child, shalt be called the prophet of the Most High:
For thou shalt go before the face of the Lord
To make ready his ways;
To give knowledge of salvation unto his people
In the remission of their sins,
Because of the tender mercy of our God,
Whereby the dayspring from on high shall visit us,
To shine upon them that sit in darkness and the shadow of death,
And to guide our feet into the way of peace.*

CAROL, The First Noël the Angel Did Say.

PART II—SHEPHERDS ABIDING IN THE FIELDS

Reader. It is night. The sky is clear and the stars shine brightly in the celestial dome. There is a crispness to the air and the shepherds have kindled their fire. One is watching the sheep while the others, gathered about the fire, exchange stories or tell of experiences in guarding their flocks from danger. But even stories and tales of heroic deeds have an end, and so the weary shepherds lie near the fire to rest and in turn take their places in the watch. It is very quiet. There is only the contented movement of the sheep and the tinkle of the bell. Nothing unusual to attract the attention of anyone. It is a night similar to other nights which have often been spent in the fields. But behold! something suddenly appears in the distance! Is it an apparition? The shepherd stands spellbound and watches. There is something so unusual about it. A figure seems to approach closer and closer. It now takes upon itself the form of a man. The shepherd is terrified, forgets his sheep, and awakens his companions. In awe they lie prostrate upon the ground. There is no hesitancy in the approach of this mysterious one and the shepherds rise to their knees in terror, "And an angel of the Lord stood by them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them." And the angel, in the most musical and assuring voice, said:

Fear not; for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy
Which shall be to all people:
For unto you is born this day in the city of David
A Savior, which is Christ the Lord.
And this is the sign unto you:
Ye shall find a babe wrapped in swaddling clothes,
And lying in a manger.

CAROL, Shepherds Shake off Your Drowsy Sleep.

PART III—THE HEAVENLY HOST

Reader. So engrossed were the shepherds with what the angel said that they did not notice the approach of the heavenly host. Hardly had the shepherds heard what was said by the angel when they were further awed by hearing the multitude of the heavenly host praising God and saying:

Glory to God in the highest,
And on earth peace, good will toward men.

CAROL, It Came Upon the Midnight Clear.

PART IV—AND IT CAME TO PASS

Reader. Words fail to describe the feeling experienced by the shepherds on this night. Can you wonder if they hesitated and took some time to regain their poise? Imagine yourselves in the country watching sheep by night, surrounded by shadows, with only the song of a cricket, the hum of insects, and the tinkling of a bell to break the silence, and then to have such a strange occurrence as this, not only an angel telling of the new born child, but a heavenly host singing in perfect harmony a most exquisite carol!

Often after this the shepherds would recall the experiences of this night, but now they must hasten on to discover the truth of what the angel said. Again something most unusual is seen in the sky to bear out the words of the angel. There! brighter and larger than any star they have ever seen is a star immediately overhead.

And it came to pass, when the angels went away from them into heaven, that the shepherds said one to another, Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing that is come to pass, which the Lord hath made known unto us. And they came with haste, and found both Mary and Joseph, and the babe lying in the manger.

CAROL, Silent Night.

Reader. And when they saw it, they made known concerning the saying which was spoken to them about this child. And all that heard it wondered at the things which were spoken unto them by the shepherds. And the shepherds returned, glorifying and praising God for all the things that they had heard and seen, even as it was spoken unto them.

PART V—WISE MEN FROM THE EAST

Reader. The shepherds were not the only ones who knew of this important event. Far away in a distant country there were wise men who had been studying the signs in the sky. They did not live in the same community, but in different parts of distant lands. Being friends, however, they met occasionally to talk over the time when the great star should appear and they had calculated the approximate time of its coming. They had everything ready for the occasion. Horses and camels had been provided for the journey. How they must have felt on the eve of the appearing of the star! So sure were they of its appearing that they had sold all they had, only keeping enough to provide for their journey; the rest they spent in buying gifts for the new-born king. At last the star appears, they begin their journey, and after long, weary travel, behold, the Wise Men from the East came to Jerusalem, saying:

Where is he that is born King of the Jews?
For we saw his star in the east, and are come to worship him. And when Herod the king had heard it, he was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him. And gathering together all the chief priests and scribes of the people, he inquired of them where the Christ should be born. And they said unto him, In Bethlehem of Judaea; for thus it is written by the prophet:
And thou Bethlehem, land of Judah,
Art in no wise least among the princes of Judah:
For out of thee shall come forth a governor,
Who shall be shepherd of my people Israel.

Then Herod privily called the wise men, and learned of them carefully what time the star appeared. And he sent them to Bethlehem, and said, Go and search out carefully concerning the young child; and when ye have found him, bring me word, that I also may come and worship him.

And they, having heard the king, went their way; and lo, the star, which they saw in the east, went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was. And when they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy. And they came into the house and saw the young child with Mary his mother; and they fell down and worshiped him; and opening their treasures, they offered unto him gifts, gold and frankincense and myrrh.

CAROL, We Three Kings.

PART VI—PRESENTATION TO THE LORD

Reader. One of the most beautiful customs developed by the children of Israel was that of bringing a new-born babe to the sanctuary. This custom was kept faithfully by the Jewish people, and on this occasion Mary and Joseph must have felt highly honored and yet they were very humble. They brought their precious gift to the temple to dedicate him to the Lord. They came as any peasant parents would come, for all the experiences that had entered into the birth of this child Mary hid in her heart. So the populace would have known nothing unusual concerning the child, even though the shepherds had spoken to their friends about what had happened in Bethlehem. Mixed with the multitude nothing unusual or striking would be expected from the carpenter and his wife.

Mary and Joseph and the babe enter the temple and there another evidence of God's purpose is revealed in the song of Simeon. It was indeed a dark and helpless world into which this child was born, but now it is daybreak. The light has come. A new day is at hand, for the Savior who was born in Bethlehem has come to light the way of those who live in darkness.

And they brought the child up to Jerusalem, to present him to the Lord (as it is written in the law, Every male that is born shall be called holy to the Lord). And behold, there was a man in Jerusalem, whose name was Simeon; and this man was righteous and devout, looking for the consolation of Israel: and the Holy Spirit was upon him. And it had been revealed unto him by the Holy Spirit, that he should not ee death, before he had seen the Lord's Christ. And he came in the Spirit into the temple: and when the parents brought in the child Jesus, hat they might do concerning him after the ustom of the law, then he received him into his rms, and blessed God, and said:

Now lettest thou thy servant depart, O Lord,
According to thy word, in peace;
For mine eyes have seen thy salvation,
Which thou hast prepared before the face of all peoples;
A light for revelation to the Gentiles,
And the glory of thy people Israel.

And when the parents had accomplished all hings that were according to the law of the Lord, they returned into Galilee, to their own ity Nazareth. And the child grew, and waxed trong, becoming full of wisdom: and the grace f God was upon him.

CAROL, O Come All Ye Faithful.

PART VII—THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD

Reader. We have journeyed with the shepherds and the wise men to the humble birthplace of the Christ Child, as millions of others have done and will continue to do. We do not mind the dust made by pilgrim feet, nor do we become weary at noonday as we journey to Jerusalem to see him blessed in the arms of the aged Simeon. Would that we could see him during the silent years which follow, but that is not to be. We must be satisfied with the light of hope which brightly shone for a moment as through a rift in the clouds. Some time has passed since then. The intervening years have been overcast with storm clouds and suffering. And now there is another stir among the people. A man, clad in peasant garb, moves majestically among the crowds. He says strange things and does mighty works. The Pharisees said that "he spoke as one having authority."

(Increase illumination.) The day is somewhat brighter. The world does not now seem so dark. The expression on the faces of the multitude has changed. We see the sorrowing mother comforted, the sick made whole, the blind made to see, and the lame to walk. Surely there is something strange about this man. He breaks bread with publicans and sinners. He speaks of himself as the Son of God, and the multitude begin to feel that indeed the Messiah has come. They call him Teacher. So marvelous are his works that the people eagerly listen to what he has to say. The Galileans believe he is the king and would crown him in spite of the Roman authorities. The people know that the light has come. Their hopes and aspirations are to be fulfilled. They are to be free, for have they not heard this strange and marvelous man say that he has come to restore the kingdom? He goes about doing good and the people hear him gladly.

(Turn on all lights.) The light increases in its intensity and a flame is kindled in the hearts of the people. Yet it is not a constant light. We see it flicker as the breezes of opposition blow and the sky again becomes overcast. What is happening? A short time ago we saw the multitudes following him, they brought their little ones to be blessed and the sick to be healed. They sought his comfort, they wanted him for their emancipator. Now there is a feeling of uncertainty everywhere. Instead of the multitude we now see only a few men gathered about him. No longer do we see on their faces the marks of joy and expectancy. They look sad and perplexed. Turn your gaze to Olivet and see this mighty man of power standing on its summit and looking down upon the golden city. He weeps! Why? (Gradually lower lights.) He sees the night coming when darkness shall again overshadow the hearts of the people. It is only a few days until darkness shall again descend upon the world. The night has come. (All lights out except the two candles on altar.) The light of the noonday sun has been blotted out. Terror has taken hold of the hearts of men. Everything is shrouded in blackness. The earth trembles. Men flee in terror. No one seems to understand except the Centurion standing near the cross, who murmurs to himself, "Surely this is the Son of God."

HYMN (sung softly by choir), When I Survey the Wondrous Cross.

(While the choir is singing the hymn the minister slowly approaches altar and lights his candle. The deacons or those previously selected from the congregation come forward from the rear of the auditorium and stand on either side of the platform. The minister lights their candles. After the hymn has been sung and the candles of the deacons have been lighted the organist plays the hymn through again while the congregation, as previously instructed, quietly put on their wraps. When the congregation is ready to leave, the minister or reader speaks as follows.)

Reader. As surely as there is a night there follows the day. With the new day a new light enters the souls of men. They now know for a certainty that the child of Bethlehem has discovered the secret of life and has defied death. His disciples never forgot his last command, "To go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every nation." They were the first bearers of the light. Jesus said to them, "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify the Father which is in heaven."

(Addressing the deacons.) It is said that they who live in darkness shall see a great light. Like the disciples of old you are commanded to go and share your light with those who await the light.

(The deacons go down into the church and light the candles of those sitting in the seats nearest the aisles. They in turn light the candles of those next to them. The organist plays softly while the candles of the congregation are being lighted.)

(Addressing the congregation while the deacons are leaving the platform.) Jesus said, I am the light of the world. He that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life.

(When the candles of all sitting nearest the aisles have been lighted the deacons return to the platform.)

Reader. While ye have the light believe in the light. Through the centuries men and women have found the dark places of the earth becoming more and more illuminated through the light of the Gospel. We received our light from those who have gone before. One candle throws a very small light, but the sharing of the light dispels the darkness and finally all is light. Arise, shine, for thy light has come. Bear the lighted candle to your home and let it symbolize to you the living Spirit of the Most High.

POSTLUDE. The organist plays softly while the congregation departs.

ESSENTIALS

A good reader, either minister or layman.
Four, six, or eight deacons, or specially selected persons of the church or parish.
A vested choir trained to sing the Christmas carols effectively, without accompaniment if possible. They remain seated throughout the candle light service.
Some one to manipulate the lights.
Sufficient candles to supply one to each of the congregation and choir.
Large candles for altar, minister, and deacons.
Communion table or altar.
Candelabra or cross with candles on either side.

Note. It has been found most effective to have deacons wear the surplice.

DIRECTIONS

The communion table or altar is in center back of platform. Have candles lit on altar throughout service.
The minister (and reader if other than the minister), choir, and deacons should be gowned.
Ushers give candles to people as they enter the church.
At the time of lighting the candles the church is in total darkness except the two lighted candles on the altar.

Christmas

By Virginia Baker

Now holly berries brightly glow,
Now gleams the waxen mistletoe,
Now laurel, spruce, and fragrant pine
In wreaths and graceful garlands twine;
Now blaze the Yule logs, clear and bright,
Now candles shed their radiant light,
Now trees beneath their burden bend
Of gifts from loving friend to friend,
'Tis Christmas!

Now hearts with tenderness are fraught,
And deeds of loving-kindness wrought,
Now humble homes, once cold and drear,
Are filled with light and mirth and cheer;
Now shivering forms are warmly clad,
And weary, sorrowing hearts made glad,
Now greetings, everywhere, express
Wishes for peace and happiness,
'Tis Christmas!

After the Night—The Dawn

The self-inflicted sufferings that bulk so large in the stories of some of the old mystics revolt us of today. Nevertheless they are tokens of a very great thing. The hair shirts, the fastings and thirsts, the vigils through frozen nights, the garments studded with sharp nails, the clothing so scant that it permitted parts of the body to freeze—these things were not assumed because of a pathological longing for pain. They were instruments by whose use the soul tried to set itself free to more vital relations with God.

Even St. Francis of Assisi, whose story is so filled with sunshine and birds and music and laughter, treated "Brother Body" with harsh severity, and called it sometimes "Brother Ass." And John Tauler, we are told, used to pull his cap down over his eyes when walking in the country, so that the violets might not draw him away from his inward communings.

Nothing, nothing, said these ardent souls, neither the natural wants of the body nor any beauty or desirableness the world reveals, should be permitted to hinder them in the greatest quest of all. Man is spirit, they believed, no less than God is Spirit; and to have this spirit live with that Spirit, in conscious relations, is life. Merely to know about God is only to touch life far off and vaguely.

Therefore they were not satisfied with the story of other men's relations with God, whether found in the Bible or in the lives of the saints. Merely hearing God talked about did not satisfy their cravings. And no more did the intellectual approach satisfy them. It was not enough to think about God, reason about him, and build up arguments to assure themselves of him. Neither was membership in the church enough for them, however much the church might be held to represent God upon earth. They wanted to feel God as an enveloping Presence, to know him as a personal Friend, to walk with him as a sure Guide. If men in other days had had individual, personal relations with God, men could still enter into such relations with him, they believed.

Before they were out of the dark night of discipline, they began to see the gleam of lights in the sky,—stars, and then the vague glimmer of early dawn, and then a streak of gold heralding the approach of the sun, and then at last the joy of a new day.

The man or woman who would enter into personal relations with God must indeed set his soul free from trammels. The cost may be large. But negation is not the whole story. The soul must learn to practise also the affirmation of life. Does life bring pain? Yet life is to be taken as a good. Does life offer joy—little joys, in flowers, and the songs of birds, and children's love, the pageantry of the skies, and bits of friendship day by day? and sometimes great and overwhelming joys, which fill the day as with glorious music? The proffer is to be accepted rejoicingly, and all the delight enjoyed in the companionship of God.

Whether it is pain or joy that life brings, the soul that has made this affirmation goes ahead in peace and confidence. God is life, and we cannot refuse life without refusing God. But the God to whom we give ourselves, and whom we offer to other men as the soul's hope and the vindication of life, must be great enough so that he can be trusted utterly—utterly! It is by enlarging its conception of God, and making it worthier always, that the soul shall find hope, and joy, and peace.

THE MESSAGE OF GOOD WILL

Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men.—Luke 2: 14.

Good will is what the old world needs today in a sovereign sense; we need better business and more of it; we need surer, steadier, permanent employment; we need more knowledge and we need more wealth, for this world is still harassed among the overwhelming majority of mankind, by poverty and by the fear of want; and we need a deeper appreciation of beauty in art and in nature; but above all things else, we need good will,—good will that is not a mere fleeting mood among men, but one inspired by the constitution of our nature as social beings and endorsed and supported by the Eternal Good Will.—George A. Gordon.

Star of the East, that long ago
Brought wise men on their way
Where, angels singing to and fro,
The Child of Bethlehem lay—
Above that Syrian hill afar
Thou shinest out tonight, O Star!

Star of the East, the night were drear
But for the tender grace
That with thy glory comes to cheer
Earth's loneliest, darkest place;
For by that charity we see
Where there is hope for all and me.

Star of the East! show us the way
In wisdom undefiled
To seek the manger out and lay
Our gifts before the child—
To bring our hearts and offer them
Unto our King in Bethlehem.

Eugene Field.

Yes, it is Christmas day! God, in Christ, once for all sealed the intimations thrusting themselves through human nature. The highest intimations of man's love point to a love still greater. God's love is a central fire, from which the best of human loving is as a spark. God, once for all, answered all men's cruel suspicions. Christ on Christmas day entered the world with authority. Henceforth, knowing him, we know that God is love. Mysteries and problems still abound, but the central question is answered: "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, to the end that all that believe in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—Charles Lewis Slattery.

Infinite Father, we thank thee that thou hast brought us forth into the sunshine of thy eternal remembrance and compassion. Help us to lay to heart what is greeted in our Christian faith, the fatherly love of God declared to us in the birth of the Saviour of mankind. We thank thee for the song of the heavenly Poet: for this glorious faith in the living God and his love, we thank thee. And we ask thee by thy Spirit to make it real to our intelligence, real to our feelings, a motive power in our active life, the inspiration and the consolation of our entire existence. Give us a share in making the world better, and bless us with a vision that ultimately it must be converted to thy loving kindness and tender mercies in the Lord Jesus Christ, in whose glorious name we offer our prayer. Amen.

The World's Great Source of Joy

Comment on the Prayer Meeting Topic for December 20-26

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: Why is Christmas a Time of Joy? Luke 2: 8-20; II Corinthians 9: 15.

Light from the Bible Passages

When Jesus was born and placed in the manger of the Bethlehem animal shed it would not have seemed strange if no one outside of his parents had known of it. Of too great importance was the birth of that baby. Angels knew of it and the heavens rang with their songs of joy. Shepherds became aware of it and at once entered into the joy of the occasion and started for Bethlehem. Stolid wise men became aware of it, journeyed to the manger that they might confirm their questionings, and caught the joyousness of the occasion. Earth has never known such an outburst of joy, and that at the obscure birth of a babe to an obscure couple lost in the Bethlehem crowd. No such gift had ever been made by God to men.

Leads for Leaders

The joy at the birth of Jesus was expressed in two ways: praise to God for his marvelous gift, and eager telling of the news by those who had been at the manger-side. This meeting may well emphasize these two things. Make much of song and of prayers of gratitude; have many brief expressions of the latter.

Try to give an impression of the darkness of the day just before Christ was born. Note the longing of the prophets of a few centuries before; absence of any great spiritual leader; the hopes and prayers of the Jewish people.

Has the birth of any other person made such a change in the world? Other teachers have been national in their influence. The joy Christ brought is going into all parts of the world. How can we help to spread that joy: by our gifts, our lives?

Thoughts for Members

He comes, the wide world's King;
He comes, the true heart's Friend,
New gladness to begin,
And ancient wrong to end;
He comes, to fill with light
The weary, waiting eye:
Lift up your heads, rejoice,
Redemption draweth nigh.

—Thomas T. Lynch.

We see Jesus in the manger. We adore him; we worship him; we glorify him. We stand oppressed before such a love—a love stronger than death—a love so strong that it did die that we might live. We thank thee for the sweetness of human love, but how could we ever have dared to think that such love was in the heart of God for us!

—Maltbie D. Babcock.

Joy fills our inmost hearts today!
Shine on us, holy Child;
That we may keep thy birthday bright,
With service undefiled.

—William C. Dix.

A Moment of Prayer

We, O Jesus, would make place for thee in our hearts, that nevermore may there be no place for thee. We, too, O Father, would bend before the manger Babe today and join in praise of thy matchless gift. So fill us with the joy of this Day of Days that we shall not rest until all men everywhere have heard of him who has come to bring joy illimitable to mankind. Amen.

WITH THE CHILDREN

How Christmas Came to Hope House

By Daisy D. Stephenson

PART II

No, it was certainly not stout, rosy, smiley Aunt Lucy. It was a tall, stately woman in a gray velvety bathrobe, and she was inspecting them disapprovingly with beautiful dark eyes. She must have been ready for bed, for a thick braid of glossy black hair hung over her shoulder and she wore lavender bedroom slippers.

For a minute nobody moved or spoke. The children, three in a row like paper dolls, were spellbound with surprise. The stranger broke the silence, and her voice was low and musical but cold.

"What do you children want?"

"We—we came to visit Aunt Lucy and Uncle Jed," explained Mary Dale fearlessly. This trip seemed to have a great deal of explaining in it.

"Where are they?" demanded Theo.

The lady changed the damper and sat down on a little chair by the stove. "Just throw in some wood, will you?" she sensibly directed Theo, who stood near the wood box. "And sit down, children. We may as well be comfortable while we're getting untangled."

They obeyed quietly,—six clear unwinking eyes fixed on this stranger who could furnish the key to the puzzle.

"First, let us exchange names," began this lovely person whose regular features and fine dark eyes puzzled Mary Dale, so familiar they seemed. "Mine is Miss Barbara Shannon."

The children responded in unison as if it were a game, and it sounded so hodgepodgey that they all laughed. But Miss Barbara Shannon only smiled a little and called the roll by numbers so that she could understand. Mary Dale guessed that she had been a teacher.

"I live away east in Massachusetts, and I am on my way to California on—business." A worried look crept into her eyes. "I am ever so distant a relative of your aunt's and I visited here years ago when you"—she nodded at Mary Dale—"were a baby. So I knew your mother. I was almost ill with a cold on the way out; and besides, I wanted to see the mountains in winter. So as I was in no hurry to reach California"—she was twisting the purple cord of her robe with nervous fingers—"and I knew your aunt never left the ranch, I felt safe in coming up."

"Just like us," put in Chris, taking it all in, head on one side like a curious robin.

"I was surely surprised to find them all packed and ready to go to Salt Lake City and surprise the bride"—

"To the wedding! Where Mummy went!" exploded Theo.

"So, of course, I insisted they go right ahead, and your aunt finally agreed to if I would make myself at home as long as I pleased. I intended going on the day after Christmas."

At this point Mary Dale simply had to exclaim, "Not Christmas up here by yourself?" It was too terrible. Why, it simply wasn't done.

Miss Shannon shrugged. "But why not?"

"Well, but you—they—with no children or folks or anything, wouldn't you be lonesome? Mother says it's children that make Christmas."

"But I've never had children around. I've nearly always lived alone."

"Oh! Poor lady!" Chris moved close and laid his rosy cherub cheek against her arm in mute sympathy. She did not touch him.

"You see, I've never—understood children. I taught big boys and girls for a while." She thought of her big, handsome house with its exquisite order and undisturbed peace, and rebelled against the errand which had taken her from it. Then she included them all in a surprising question: "Well, since we're all here, what are we going to do?"

Mary Dale's earnest blue eyes sought the chatty little clock. "I think," she decided just as Chris yawned largely, "that we'd better go straight to bed."

Miss Barbara smiled, and it changed her completely. Then she put out her arms stiffly, for they were not accustomed to caressing, and took rosy, sleepy little Chris into them, bowing her proud dark head over his buttercup curls.

"Oh, now I know!" Mary Dale clapped her hands softly. "You look just like one of the Madonnas in mother's room. I wasn't sure till you hugged Chris. Of course, a Madonna has to have a baby with her or I guess she couldn't be a Madonna."

Stars in her eyes, roses in her cheeks, Miss Barbara lifted Chris in her arms, his curly head snuggled against her shoulder. "I'll put him to bed," she said gently. "Where are his things?"

Over breakfast the next morning, Theo made the astonishing discovery that at bedtime it would be Christmas Eve. For a minute Mary Dale lost her appetite. Chris kept right on eating his good egg and toast, remarking with his mouth much too full, "Well, 'at's all right. Uncle Jed's got a fireplace right in there, and didn't we bring stockings?"

Mary Dale's new Madonna laughed aloud. But Theo was not convinced. "But seems 'sif we ought to do something about it."

Nate, the grizzled, shy old fellow who came to look after Uncle Jed's stock, poked his head in.

"I'll hitch up and carry you all down to the meetin'-house tonight as lieve as not," he offered hopefully. "Sort of entertainment coming off—school young 'uns, and a tree, and maybe a treat for everybody."

Three pairs of eager eyes implored Miss Barbara.

"We had to go off and leave our entertainment," sighed Mary Dale sadly. "And I knew all the songs and we all had pieces," even Chris."

"Lemme say it now!" And Chris plumped down his mug and splashed milk over Miss Barbara's crisp apron.

And he rattled off something without pausing after words or lines until he ended up victorious but breathless. Old Nate was charmed.

"That's a crackerjack. He's got to speak it tonight for the crowd. It'll bring down the house. Mr. Weston will want all the extra help he can get, what with the Birch kids measlin' at the last minute."

So it was arranged that Nate should "carry them" down about seven. It was cold, and the hill people liked to gather soon after supper so as to get back home in good time.

There was an old-fashioned reed organ in Aunt Lucy's parlor and Mary Dale was quite thrilled over an idea that struck her while they were trimming the small spruce Nate had cut for the "little shaver."

"If somebody could play, Theo and I could sing plenty of songs," she told Miss Barbara, who was surprisingly interested in popcorn balls and gingerbread dolls. "We know a carol or two—'We three kings of Orient are,' and 'God rest you, merry gentlemen.' And this one:

'Twas in a lowly stable where cattle took their rest,
That once a precious babe was born, the Christ-Child, dear and blest.
The oxen, big and friendly, stood gazing by his bed,
The good, gray donkey wandered near, the doves flew overhead!

Do you like that?"

Miss Barbara's eyes sparkled as she took her place at the organ and played softly, with the loving touch of a skilled artist. She sang, and her voice was clear and bell-like. One by one the children joined in—"It came upon a midnight clear, that glorious song of old."

Billy Weston applauded enthusiastically from the kitchen. He had come up to extend a warm invitation to the visitors at Hope House to help out with the evening's entertainment. Not only had measles taken toll of the program, but now the organist was laid up—or down—with tonsilitis, and Billy's father was low in his mind.

"But now with you folks to the rescue," grinned Billy, "real professional musicians, we'll have a whizz of a show. Regular city affair."

So it came about that two very "Sunday-fied" boys, one dainty girl fairy in shining pink, and a beautiful lady in satiny brown, accompanied Nate to the tiny church in the pines, Billy introduced them with evident pride; and Miss Barbara took hold and led the crowd in singing until they simply let go, and, as Nate declared later, beaming like a full moon, "pretty nigh raised the roof."

Chris made such a hit that he had to go back and say it right over, and Santa Claus held him high so he could choose his own red net candy bag from the tall, glittering tree. They all went home, happy as chickadees, under the silvery star candles, and Chris picked out the one that he thought was about the size of that long-ago Star of the East.

Cold as it was, Miss Barbara had never felt so warm, so aglow and confident of the future. Back at the ranch house, Mary Dale lighted the bayberry candle she had brought and placed it in the window to guide "anyone who might lose his way anywhere."

Then they hung up their stockings—Chris's little one last in the row. And as she tucked the little boy in and kissed him good-night, Miss Barbara felt chubby arms about her neck, and realized the honor of being accorded a regular "lemon squeezer hug" such as they always gave their mother.

"You're awful nice," murmured the child drowsily, "but why don't you laugh more? Mother laughs a lot. She says little boys are such a joke."

Alone by the flickering logs, Miss Barbara once more pondered over the perplexing business that was taking her so unwillingly to California. With a deep sigh she took from her bag the letter that had started her journeying and given her a very unhappy week. She reread it from a strange, comforting, new viewpoint.

"They are beautiful children," wrote the woman in charge. "Little David is five and such a mischief. Betty is seven and a quiet,

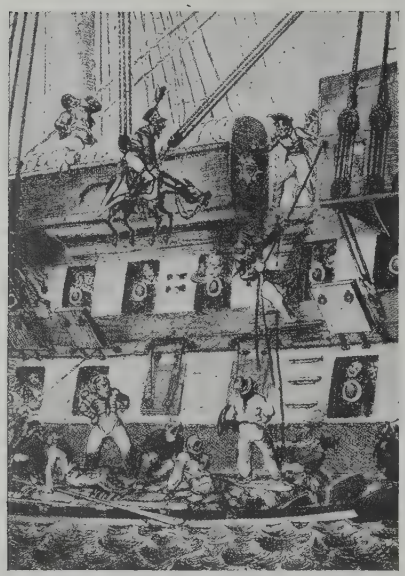
THE HOLIDAY BOOKSHELF



A Horse Marine
From Sea Life in Nelson's Time (Macmillan)

Of General Interest

ISABELLA STEWART GARDNER AND FENWAY COURT, by MORRIS CARTER (Houghton Mifflin. $6.00). The lavishly illustrated story of a notable Boston woman who built Fenway Court and housed there one of the world's distinctive collections of great paintings. Mrs. Gardner, whose interesting personality is revealed by Mr. Morris Carter, who was appointed by Mrs. Gardner, herself, permanent director of Fenway Court, was a brilliant and eccentric woman, with almost unlimited money at her command. It is interesting to read of her contact with artists and men of letters who found in her a friend and patron; but the book's chief value is perhaps in the glimpses it gives of the forming of this wonderful collection of objects of art, which will be for all time of so much value to students and visitors. Mr. Carter as a biographer has his limitations. While, obviously, he writes from intimate knowledge of Mrs. Gardner's life and work, he lacks the power to make so unusual a woman as vivid as she might have been made by one who brought to the literary task something of the genius with which Sargent portrayed her with his brush. The book, however, is of great interest as an introduction to Mrs. Gardner's art treasures, which have been bequeathed to the public and which constitute collections so remarkable that no visitor to Boston should fail to see them.

SEA LIFE IN NELSON'S TIME, by JOHN MASEFIELD (Macmillan). Even for Americans Nelson is an interesting figure, but in this volume Masefield has dealt with the sea life of his time rather than with the great Admiral himself. As this time was that of the beginning of the American navy there is additional interest in this close study of the details of the ships of the time and the life lived upon the "hearts of oak." The many illustrations add to the graphic and vivid descriptions of the text.

THE CHRYSALIS OF ROMANCE, by INEZ G. HOWARD (Times-Mirror Press, Los Angeles. $3.00). Beautifully bound, printed, and illustrated, this book of "whimsical essays," deals with a wide range of subjects. It represents an effort "to discover America to the Americans," and to find the causation of things, customs, and commodities. "The truth is," says the author, "there is romance in the woof and warp of every commonplace act and article in our so-called commonplace, everyday life. Back of every custom, commodity, and habit there is a story, a legend, a symbol, or a superstition. Back of every symbol a law. Back of that law—God." The book is an excellent expression of this general attitude.

YES, LADY SAHEB, by GRACE THOMPSON SETON (Harpers. $4.00). "Yes, Lady Saheb" were almost the first words Mrs. Seton heard on reaching India and the last on leaving. They were the response of her Hindu servant so many times a day that they became inextricably woven with all her memories of that country. Mrs. Seton, who is a much-traveled woman and has written several other travel books, has given in the present volume a detailed account of her impressions and experiences. She visited the Viceroy of India at the time of the opening of the Legislative Assembly and attended dinner and dances of Europeans and met the progressive men and women among the Indians. She went on tiger hunts in the jungle and visited the Hindu Burning Ghats. She shook hands with Mr. Gandhi while he was ill in the hospital, and was a guest of Nawab Sultan Jehan Begam, the famous woman ruler of India. It is a fascinating narrative of personal experiences, although she also discusses many Indian problems.

THE LITTLE WORLD, by STELLA BENSON (Macmillan. $2.50). Much of the charm of this book is the author herself. She has the art of making out of ordinary, as well as extraordinary, happenings a very entertaining narrative, and her clever sketches add much to the interest. It is the story of very rambling and heterogeneous travel—in these United States, off to Japan, in China, India, the states again, Aden and the Red Sea, back again in China, with several chapters on Yunnan, and a closing chapter on a journey in Indo-China. There is much that is important, and much unimportant, but it is all very readable and lively.

THE UPPER ROAD OF VISION, by KATHARINE R. LOGAN (Doran. $1.35), is an inspirational volume in which the author's comments serve as swivels in a chain of quotations and illustrations from well-known sources. These selections are well made and the high order of the author's style sustains the reader's interest with keen anticipation for what is to come. It is a splendid book to put into the hands of young people.

STEAMBOAT DAYS, by FRED ERVING DAYTON (Stokes. $5.00). A most attractive book, in which the actual history of steam navigation in America is related with great detail from the earliest times to the latest development, and with due appreciation of the human and romantic aspects of the story. The 86 pen and ink drawings by John Wolcott Adams constitute an essential part of the book, and have a touching significance in the fact that they were his last work before his death, which occurred recently. The book is in fine library binding and is neatly boxed.

From Steamboat Days (Stokes)

The Daibutsu Buddha, Kamakura
From Japan in Silhouette (Macmillan)

JAPAN IN SILHOUETTE, by TROWBRIDGE HALL (Macmillan. $2.50). An effort to present in attractive text and illustration the deeper aspects of Japanese life. "The book," as the author says, "is sent forth for those pilgrims to whom the beaten path holds not all the attractions of a journey, but who see in the less obvious signs and symbols the true picture of a people and its country." Geisha, theater, castle, and temple, literature, daily life, custom, and ceremony are all described with much interest of detail and incident.

THE VOYAGERS, by PADRAIC COLUM (Macmillan. $2.25). Legends and histories of Atlantic discovery told with the alluring touch of romance that one anticipates in a book by Padraic Colum. The book is dedicated to Vilhjalmur Stefansson, and is finely illustrated by Wilfred Jones.

FAVORITE OPERAS, by CUTHBERT HADDEN (Stokes). An account, intended for the musical amateur, of some 46 operas, from Mozart to Mascagni, with a summary of their plots and histories, and a characterization of their music. A handy and informing volume for the music lover, richly illustrated by twenty-four drawings in color by Byam Shaw.

POETRY AND PROSE OF THE REVOLUTION, by FREDERICK C. PRESCOTT AND JOHN H. NELSON (Crowell. $1.50). A companion volume to Colonial Prose and Poetry. The present volume surveys the years from 1765 to 1789. An anthology of that period is of unusual interest as much from an historical as from a literary standpoint.

REVERIES OF A FATHER, by JOHN CRAWLEY (Appleton. $1.00). Angelo Patri, in a preface, highly commends this book. The commendation is just. It is a wise, wholesome, and good-humored discussion of parental responsibilities, very suggestive and helpful. Such counsels, for instance, as in the chapter, As To Books, are excellent.

From The Medicine Buffalo (Appleton)

Interesting Fiction

THE NAKED MAN, by VERE HUTCHINSON (Century. $2.00). Miss Hutchinson's unusual title is Biblical, being suggested by Job 1: 21, "Naked I came out—and naked shall I return." It is, however, purely symbolical, and gives in itself little clue to the nature of the story, which, though strongly written, is a drab and tragic narrative of disappointed hopes. Luke Braddock is a coal miner with a passionate longing for the soil equaled only by his desire for a son. He inherits a farm, and his childless wife effaces herself and throws a girl in his way that he may realize his other dream. He loses his farm, he loses his son and his new wife, and into his embittered life his former wife returns, bringing with her the tranquillity for which he has always searched. Unlike her brother, the famous author of One Increasing Purpose, Miss Hutchinson writes with a forthright directness that is often brutal. She is consistently serious through the book and is not writing for entertainment. The fact that the book is powerfully written does not prevent its being a very depressing story, in which a ruthless realism reveals little clear purpose.

WILD GEESE, by MARTHA OSTENSO (Dodd, Mead. $2.00). In a competition for the best first novel by an American author this story won a prize of $13,500, probably the largest literary prize ever offered in this country. Martha Ostenso, the author, came to America, from Norway, as a baby, and has lived and taught school in Northern Minnesota and Dakota, which is the locale of her story. One of the important characters is a school teacher, among the Norwegians and Swedes, living in that sparse prairie district. She boards in the primitive home of Caleb Gare, a hard, greedy, hypocritical man. He has become the most prosperous man in that section principally by making his children, even the girls, do the work of hired men without pay on the farm,—a life in which they are no better than slaves. Judity, one daughter, whose strength is the strength of a man, revolts, and it is with her questing and endeavors to be free that the book is concerned. The bleak winters, the terrible struggles of the settlers with the soil, which seems to leave them as stolid as animals or as bitter, hard, and cruel as pitiless nature can be, are depicted with a terrible fidelity. The tyranny which has often accompanied farm life was never more starkly portrayed. The book is one of almost unabated strain, its realism so poignant that the happy ending of the story is a welcome relief.

THE POWER AND THE GLORY, by GILBERT PARKER (Harpers. $2.00). La Salle, one of the most notable and picturesque figures in the history of Canada and one of the most fearless explorers of the New World, is the hero of Sir Gilbert's new novel. It is not, however, the story of his explorations that has been told, but of his place in the life of his times. La Salle, the friend of Governor Frontenac, was most bitterly hated by the Jesuits, and it is with their intrigues against him that the story principally deals. It is La Salle, with an unselfish soul and dominated by a great purpose, who is shown in contrast to the lesser men and women who endeavored to destroy him. The scene of the story shifts from Quebec to the brilliant French court, and back to the new world and the wilderness frontiers, giving a realistic picture of a period with which the author is thoroughly familiar.

WILD HARVEST, by JOHN M. OSKISON (Appleton. $2.00). This is one of a number of Mid-Western novels that have appeared this year. Wild Harvest goes back some 40 years ago, when the prairies of Oklahoma were being turned into farms and white settlers were leasing their lands from the Indians. Here is a good story in which appear cowboys, farmers, outlaws, Indians, and half-breeds, and which also gives a notable picture of a very interesting period in the development of Oklahoma. The author himself has Indian blood, and lived for years in the country of which he writes.

THE LORING MYSTERY, by JEFFERY FARNOL (Little, Brown. $2.00). England not long after the battle of Waterloo seems an unusual setting for a mystery story, and still more unique is the character of the detective which Mr. Farnol has portrayed in it. David Loring comes to England to claim an estate and title from his uncle and is eventually suspected of his murder. But not merely in the solution of this mystery lies the enjoyment of this tale. The book is as fresh and entertaining as if no other detective-mystery story had ever been written, for the author's distinctive charm which made the Broad Highway so popular pervades its pages.

THE IMPERFECT IMPOSTER, by NORMAN VENNER (Stokes. $2.00). Jeremy Laytree, finding himself on several occasions mistaken for the younger son of an English peer, enters into an agreement with the latter to impersonate him for three months. Many unexpected things happen fast. Even the impersonation is detected by different people, but all such complications add to the zest with which the reader follows the tale.

THE ANCIENT HIGHWAY, by JAMES OLIVER CURWOOD (Cosmopolitan. $2.00). Always there seems to be a fascination about stories of adventure in forest and wilderness, providing the author shows an intimate knowledge of the open spaces and mixes freely danger, bravery, and romance. Once again Mr. Curwood has done this and the result is a typical Curwood story whose action takes place in the pulpwood forest of Quebec. Many readers will get the same kick from it as they do from a fishing trip or a summer holiday.

CHRISTINA ALBERTA'S FATHER, by H. G. WELLS (Macmillan. $2.50). Mr. Wells has succeeded in picturing the new type of woman, so prevalent in the younger generation, as perhaps no other writer has yet done. In her we see an eager love of life, a curiosity about all its experiences, a freedom from all the conventions and renunciations that old-fashioned training fostered, a determination to be a free and independent citizen. He suggests that perhaps as women develop along new lines there will no longer be just two sexes; "there would be recognized varieties and subdivisions." The story is that of a laundry-man who, after some experiments in table rapping, is convinced that he is no longer Albert Edward Preemby, but a reincarnation of Sargon, a great king in remote days of history, returned to help the world out of the evil days in which it has fallen. Such a story allows Mr. Wells to discuss at length ideas of man's place in the universe, particularly the idea that he is part of the race mind, the race life, and that what should matter alone to a man is what he achieves and contributes to the progress of the race. But besides, through such a plot as he has chosen in developing some of these theories and ideas, he has told a very arresting story, extremely humorous in parts. No one can resist the comedy of the picture of the studio home into which the very modern daughter brings her father and the contrast of the little inoffensive dreamy man with the Bohemian characters he encounters.

THE LORD OF TERROR, FANTÔMAS DETECTIVE NOVEL, by MARCEL ALLAIN (David McKay. $2.00). A translation from the French dealing with the adventures of a detective and journalist in pursuit of the sinister and mysterious criminal Fantômas. The action is rapid and absorbing and like many French detective stories the episodes have not quite the convincing air of actuality that American writers of this style of fiction endeavor to convey. However, the abundant ingenuity of the author piles thrilling situation on thrilling situation.

PRAIRIE GOLD, by HAROLD BINDLOSS (Stokes. $2.00). From the Canadian prairies to a country house in England events in this book of romance and adventure move quickly. It involves the rescue of a small boy from the power of a villain, and pursuit through the blinding snow storms that sweep the north country. It is a dashing story with plenty of action.

John Martin, Author of John Martin's Big Book (Dodd, Mead)

Boys' Books of Useful Knowledge

CHRISTOPHER AND THE CLOCKMAKERS, by SARA WARE BASSETT, CARL AND THE COTTON GIN, by SARA WARE BASSETT (Little, Brown. Each $1.65). For boys of 14 and up, these books in The Invention Series are of notable interest. The books are all the more attractive because their information is put in story form. In the course of the story interesting facts regarding the inventions are woven in very naturally and effectively. The boy who reads these books will know a great deal about clocks and about the history of cotton and its manufacture into threads and fabrics.

THE BOYS' BOOK OF THE EARTH, by SIDNEY AYLMER SMALL (Dutton. $2.50). This book presents in its nearly 300 pages the story of the earth from the beginning, in language that a boy can understand. It is fully illustrated. An excellent book for giving a boy knowledge of how the earth has evolved.

THE WIRELESS OPERATOR WITH THE COAST GUARDS, by LEWIS THEISS (W. A. Wilde. $1.75). A book relating many true incidents of the valuable patrol service along the Atlantic Coast. It tells how storms were fought and ships helped and saved through the wireless service and the staunchness of the U. S. Coast Guard, Iroquois. A book, too, of endurance and courage. THE FLUME IN THE MOUNTAINS, by the same author and publisher, tells for boys the story of the development of water-power for electricity. It is based on facts and presents a true picture of important developments in commerce and industry.

MAGIC IN THE MAKING: A FIRST BOOK OF CONJURING, by JOHN MULHOLLAND AND MILTON M. SMITH (Scribners. $1.50). We have tried this book out on boys who have been "crazy about it." It is, in fact, a most alluring book, completely explaining 22 tricks with which an apt learner might baffle the unsophisticated. It will provide much wholesome amusement, and it may provide a crop of youthful Houdinis and Thurstons.

From The Disappointed Squirrel (Doran)

THE EDUCATION OF NEGRO MINISTERS, by W. A. DANIEL. (Doran. $1.50). This volume, published for the Institute of Social and Religious Research may be regarded as a companion volume to Dr. Kelly's important book, Theological Education in America. Like Dr. Kelly's book, it is a careful study of actual institutions and conditions, and its constructive proposals are based upon a careful survey of all the facts. We hope to make further editorial reference to this book.

Mainly for Girls

THE HOUSE IN THE GOLDEN ORCHARD, by DOROTHEA CASTLEHUN (Page. $1.90). Another of the "Penelope Books" picturing a happy group of young people. There is enough of mystery and of romance and the charming spontaneity of youth to insure its popularity.

POLLY PUT THE KETTLE ON, by JANE ABBOTT and HENRIETTA WILCOX PENNY (Lippincott. $2.00). A jolly and instructive story for girls in their early teens. It begins with the departure of the housekeeper while the mother of the household is away. Polly gets the meal for "Dad." The first one is a disappointment. What happened after that is good fun and very interesting. Polly's recipes fill up nearly 100 pages at the back of the book. Other girls will like them, too.

ROSEMARY, by JOSEPHINE LAWRENCE (Cupples and Leon Co. $1.50 net). Rosemary is the elder of three little girls in the Willis family. They have a big brother doctor, Hugh, and a mother who has to go away for a long rest because she is sick. The girls, led by Rosemary, have some lively times, some real adventures, some trying times, and learn some things worth knowing before their mother comes home. A good story and well illustrated by Thelma Gooch.

FRANCESCA AT HINTERWALD, by JOHANNA SPYRI (Lippincott. $.75). A simple tale of Swiss boys and girls, by a well-known author—an attractive feature in Lippincott's Children's Classics.

JOHANNA SPYRI'S CHILDHOOD, by ANNA ULRICH (Crowell. $.60). The author of the well-known Swiss stories for children has been herself little known. No biography of her had been written until this, now translated from the German, by Helen B. Dole. It is by one of Madam Spyri's old school friends, and its interesting picture of the childhood of an author who never began writing until after she was forty will be welcomed by readers of Johanna Spyri's books.

Mainly for Boys

THE RED DIAMOND, by SAMUEL SCOVILLE, JR. (Century. $1.75). Much interesting natural history, combined with the thrilling adventures of certain heroes who have appeared in a former book, The Inca Emerald, and who in this story have perilous experiences in the jungles of Borneo.

OLD HICKORY'S PRISONER, by BERNARD MARSHALL (Appleton. $2.50). An historical story in which "Old Hickory" Jackson plays an important part. The chief character is a New England lad, Hugh Delaroche, who distinguishes himself first in Jackson's campaign against the Indians and then in that against the British at New Orelans. The story's climax is the court martial before old Hickory himself of Hugh as a suspected spy.

THE SON OF A SAVAGE: THE STORY OF DANIEL BULA, by R. C. NICHOLSON (Abingdon Press. $.75). A missionary story of the first Christian convert of Vella Lavella, Solomon Islands. The author was a pioneer missionary to Vella Lavella. A true and interesting story, to which forty illustrations add greatly.

From Old Hickory's Prisoner (Appleton)

BARRY AND BUDD, by EARL REED SILVERS (Appleton. $1.75). A story of vacation pastimes of a "high school bunch," in which both boys and girls appear. A cruise in a launch, camping, fishing, and boating experiences, become tame in comparison with the mystery and thrills that follow when suspicious characters turn out to be bootleggers, who are captured through the instrumentality of the girls.

THE MEDICINE BUFFALO, by ELMER RUSSELL GREGOR (Appleton. $1.75). A story of Western Indians, and of a warrior's life in the wilderness. White Otter's hunt for a mysterious "white buffalo," which is supposed to be bewitching the buffalo herds from entering the Sioux territory, is the main theme of the story.

THE CRUISE OF THE CUTTLEFISH, by FRANCIS LYNDE (Scribners. $1.60). Prohibition seems to have provided a new source of thrills in sea yarns. At least the new brand of pirate—the rum-runner—figures in this tale of three boys whose voyage on the motor-boat Cuttlefish from Philadelphia to New Orleans provides adventures a-plenty.

HARD WOOD, by ARTHUR O. FRIEL (Penn. $2.00). Starting with a fight between school boys, after which the hero became known as Hard Wood instead of Harry Wood, this vigorous story provides plenty of excitement for its readers. Some of the mountain people who lived in the hills of upper New York State at the time of the story were moonshiners, some were hunters, and most all were hard fighters.

From Tommy Tucker Stories (Doran)

The story is the account of the relentless avenging of wrongs by Hard Wood till love softens his nature.

For Both Girls and Boys

THE CHILDREN'S BOOK OF CELEBRATED BRIDGES, by LORINDA M. BRYANT (Century. $2.50). Few things have more subtle interest than bridges, and this book of bridges is very wonderful. Its fifty-five full-page photographs display bridges of every sort in many lands. It is a book that young and old may read together with delight and profit.

NUMBER THREE JOY STREET: A MEDLEY OF PROSE AND VERSE (Appleton. $2.50). This successor to Number Two Joy Street is a most alluring book for boys and girls. Fifteen authors, all very notable, have contributed to its pages, including Chesterton, Belloc, A. A. Milne, Rose Fyleman, Compton Mackenzie, Walter de la Mare, etc. A number of artists, likewise, have contributed its eight colored plates and other illustrations. It is a children's book of distinction.

THE YOUNG FOLKS' BIBLE, edited by JENNIE ELLIS BURDICK (The University Society, New York). A very beautiful setting of the text of the American Standard Revised Bible interspersed with many fine illustrations, mostly reproductions of famous paintings. The cut upon the cover of this number of The Congregationalist is from one of the illustrations in this book. The selections cover the entire Bible from Genesis to Revelation, only portions not adapted to the young and portions where repetition occurs being omitted.

THE BIBLE FOR YOUTH, edited by R. C. GILLIE and JAMES REID (Nelson. $2.00). Selections from the Old and New Testaments, with introductions and notes, from the Syllabus of Religious Instruction, compiled by a Joint Committee representing the Church of Scotland, the United Free Church of Scotland, and the Educational Institute of Scotland. The book has been prepared with a view to readers of from fourteen to eighteen years of age, but it will be found helpful by others whose critical knowledge of the Bible is limited. The introductions and notes are designed to make the Scriptures intelligible to modern youth.

THE FORGE IN THE FOREST, by PADRAIC COLUM (Macmillan. $2.25). The many color and line illustrations by Boris Artzybasheff give to this romantic book unusual attractiveness. Its text consists of eight stories, told by four story-tellers who bring a wild horse to get shod, and accept the demand of the King, turned blacksmith, that they must each tell stories of Fire, Water, Earth, and Air—two for each horseshoe.

FAMOUS CHILDREN OF STORYBOOK LAND, by LAURA A. LARGE (W. A. Wilde. $1.50). Stories of several of the most interesting figures of juvenile fiction. David Copperfield, Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm, Tiny Tim, Alice in Wonderland, and a number of others are among the "Famous Children."

THE PLUCKY ALLENS, by CLARA D. PIERSON (Dutton. $2.00). The story of four orphans, brought up by their "aunt," and of the plucky

From Everyday Science (Houghton Mifflin)

From Seckatary Hawkins in Cuba (Appleton)

manner in which they worked, played, and saved and helped to make their own way. They were resourceful youngsters, and Aunt Hannah, who was not their real aunt at all, knew how to bring out the best that was in them. A good, wholesome story.

THE MYSTERIOUS TUTOR, by GLADYS BLAKE (Appleton. $1.75). Another of this year's many stories of search for buried treasure—this time on a Southern plantation. The author is a Southerner, and writes from intimate knowledge of plantation life. The children, in search of the jewels, suspect their new tutor of searching on his own account, but the jewels ultimately are discovered in an interesting and unexpected way.

THOSE WILSON CHILDREN, by GERTRUDE S. TROWBRIDGE (Revell. $1.50). "A tale of harum-scarum days" of the family of a college professor, whose children's good health, high spirits, and love of adventure make up for the lack of worldly gear. The family fortunes are ultimately improved, but the real joy of the home and of the story are found in the golden days of childish prank and play.

THE BERRY PATCH, by JOSEPHINE LAWRENCE (Cupples and Leon Co.). The Berrys were a family whose dispositions were regarded as the cross-patch kind; so their home was called the "Berry Patch"—until it was changed into a very pleasant place. Just how it all came about is the story. There are some unpleasant incidents, some delightful ones, and the story is an interesting and worth-while story for children around 12 to 14 years old.

TOMMY TUCKER STORIES, by MAUDE RADFORD WARREN and EVE DAVENPORT. Illustrated by CHARLES A. FEDERER (Doran. $2.50). This volume is uniform with Mother Hubbard's Wonderful Cupboard, by the same authors, published last year. It is equally attractive in text and illustration, a book that will delight the hearts of little children.

ANOTHER BOOK OF VERSES FOR CHILDREN, edited by E. V. LUCAS (Macmillan. $3.00). One expects from Mr. Lucas' editorship an admirable collection of poetry for children, and the book is no disappointment. He has made his selection, having in mind the fitness of the poems for being read aloud. The grouping of the poems is particularly happy. The book is nicely illustrated by Francis Bedford.

IN THE ENDLESS SANDS, by EVELYN and C. KAY SCOTT (Holt. $2.00). This Christmas book for boys and girls is the story of a little American boy who gets lost in the Sahara desert. It has much description of Arab life in camps and villages, and ends happily in the restoration of the lost boy to his parents, through the agency of a little Arab girl.

A YANKEE GIRL AT GETTYSBURG, by ALICE TURNER CURTIS (Penn Publishing Co.). Another good story of the Civil War in the "Yankee Girl" series. The "Yankee Girl" rescues a Confederate soldier, and is well rewarded for it. She sees General Lee and hears Lincoln's Gettysburg address. For ages from 7 to 11.

Worship and Play

HYMN STORIES, by ELIZABETH COLSON (Pilgrim Press. $1.25). This volume contains a delightful collection of hymn stories upon which are built worship services for the junior department of the church school. The purpose is to create fresh and lasting interest and feeling in the hymn singing of youth. As the book is arranged, there is material for a short period of hymn study every week in the year, and at certain seasons such as Christmas and Easter programs or services are planned for the school as a whole, often including the congregation. Miss Colson is a successful worker with elementary children, and her methods and materials are eagerly sought by all workers with children. For many years she has been a contributor to the Pilgrim Elementary Teacher, in which these Hymn Stories originally appeared.

COSTUMING A PLAY, by ELIZABETH B. GRIMBALL and RHEA WELLS (Century. $3.00). A valuable and almost necessary book for all interested in the production of plays and pageants. There is a special chapter on Costuming a Religious Drama. The illustrations are numerous and helpful, and the suggestions and directions are clear and explicit.

SHORT PLAYS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE, selected by JAMES PLAISTED WEBBER and HANSON HART WEBSTER (Houghton Mifflin. $2.00). An extensive and well selected list of plays, grouped under three headings: Plays of Fancy, Plays with a Literary Background, and Plays Based on History and Tradition. There are 20 plays comprised in the 231 pages, and the length varies from a couple of pages to 20 pages.

SUPPOSE WE PLAY, by IMOGEN CLARK (Crowell. $2.00). A collection of indoor and outdoor games, in great variety, and from many sources, for young and old. Among the chapter titles are, Games for Little Children, Singing Games, Games from other Lands, Active Outdoor Games, Active Indoor Games, etc.

Paul's Summary of His Life

Comment on the International Uniform Sunday School Lesson for December 20

2 Timothy 3: 10, 11; 4: 6-18

We discuss the regular lesson instead of the alternate Christmas lesson. Could there really be, in any case, for a Christmas Sunday, a better theme than this?

No life ever more truly reflected the meaning of the coming of Jesus into the world than the life of Paul. No life has better manifested the Christmas spirit. It is to Paul, we may remember, that we are indebted for a recorded saying of Jesus that does not elsewhere appear. Paul invited the early Christians to "remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive." Whether in this Paul was recording some actual saying of Jesus, or was expressing in his own words the summary of the whole teaching of Jesus, we do not know. If the latter, no better or more effective summary could possibly have been made, and the fact that Paul summarized the teaching of Jesus in his own words indicates the clearness and practicality with which he had grasped that teaching and had applied it in his own life. For Paul, the giving of himself in love and service had become the supreme thing in life. This high quest he based always upon the prior quest of Jesus himself. He felt that Jesus had laid hold upon him in love and in sacrifice, and his whole life responded in the yearning to be found worthy of this Christ who had done so much for him. The one great aim and purpose of his life, Paul's "one thing," was that he might "apprehend that for which he had been apprehended of Christ."

Could there be any better introduction to the sublimity and glory of the Christmas season than this introduction through Paul? Could there be any more triumphant example that we might follow in the yielding of our lives to this Christmas spirit than the example of Paul? It is true that the characteristic expression concerning his life is a different figure from that of love and peace. "I have fought the good fight," he says; "I have finished the course; I have kept the faith." But the faith that he had served was the faith of love, and the fight that he had fought was the fight of love. Love was for Paul the supreme thing in the world, even greater than the other abiding elements, Faith and Hope. The power of his life was the power of its supreme consecration, the fullness of his response to the yearnings of Christ. "The love of Christ," he says, "constraineth us." This was the motive power of his service and triumph. He was not even longer himself, but his will had become lost in the will of God and his personality was dominated by the indwelling Christ.

In the Christmas prayer, "O, come to my heart, Lord Jesus, there is room in my heart for thee," we fulfill alike the clearness of the Christmas spirit and the allurements and promises of the divine life. The greatness of Paul was that he had taken Jesus to his heart and that Christ had come to live and dwell in Paul with as much reality as he had come to Bethlehem or Nazareth. It means little that Christ was born in Bethlehem unless he is born in our hearts. And the greatness of Paul's life lies after all in its significance; namely, that in every life the Christ may be born in love and power. Every home and every heart may be a Bethlehem.

"Only Luke Is With Me"

By Bertha Gerneaux Woods

I wonder if he realized it then—
That kind and dearly loved physician when
He entered in the prison dungeon grim—
His privilege to share the dark with him
Who now was ready to be offered and
The time of whose departure was at hand.
Almost I see Paul's chained and withered wrist,
His furrowed brow, his tortured fingers twist
As memories heart-rending burn and throb
And make his breath come catching in a sob:
That day the witnesses laid down in place
Their clothes before his feet, when Stephen's face Shone like an angel's with forgiveness large.
"Lay not this sin, I pray thee, to their charge."
That journey breathing threats and slaughter, when
He set out toward Damascus, seeking men
And frightened women to be bound and brought Before the high priest!—Ah, his bitter thought!
The light that shone from heaven, blinding, strange,
And then the Voice—and, as it spoke, the change
Transforming all his world. . . . With gentle force
I think Luke hushed his anguish, his remorse.
Dear words he must have murmured, "Nay, we know
The loving Christ forgave you long ago.
He is so kind!—They say who knew him best
That looking on his face meant peace and rest."
Ah me, those waiting days, the chill, the chains,
The patient bearing of those torture pains;
The worn and martyred body soon to be Transformed and clothed in immortality.
They two within that little prison room!
Oh, Luke, beguiling those last days of gloom,
Kind healer, tender comforter, we see
The Holy Ghost was minist'ring through thee!

HYMNS for the LIVING AGE

Edited by H. AUGUSTINE SMITH

Director of Fine Arts in Religion, Boston University
Director of Music, Chautauqua, N. Y.

Important features of this book:

All words are between the staffs, making it possible to read and sing with ease.

The reinforced binding protects the book against the hard, if devout usage of over-zealous members of the choir.

The responsive readings, which mark a new epoch in Biblical literature for public worship are in the front pages where they can be used without throwing the book out of balance.

The index, which is so rarely used, is in the back of the book.

The musical settings constitute a rich and varied feast throughout and are fitted to the text with great care.

The music is within the range of the average voice and creates no unwilling sopranos and bassos.

No section of the book is over-populated; there are a number of social service hymns, but not at the expense of hymns of devotion.

The price of HYMNS FOR THE LIVING AGE is $1.75. The introductory rate is $1.35 with transportation additional, from New York or Chicago.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

In Memory of Mrs. Barton

First Church, Oak Park, Ill., set apart the morning service, Nov. 29, as a memorial for Mrs. William E. Barton. Appropriate music was rendered, the story of Mrs. Barton's life was given by the pastor, Dr. A. W. Palmer, and addresses of appreciation were made by Mrs. James H. Moore on behalf of the W. B. M. I., of which Mrs. Barton was for many years an officer, by Mrs. George M. Davidson on behalf of the women's organizations of the church, and by Prof. C. A. Beckwith who spoke as a close friend of the family. The latter said in part: "There is a word somewhere in the Old Testament which reads, 'Woe unto you when all men speak well of you.' This may be true as a rule, but, if so, its truth is proved by rare exceptions. Today we commemorate the exception. Our beloved friend was known by thousands of people all over the world; we have ourselves heard hundreds of allusions to her, but never a word of criticism or dispraise. This does not mean that she was merely complaisant and easy-going, without strong and urgent convictions. On the contrary she was a person of firm and resolute moral judgment, her life a perpetual embodiment of high commanding ideals. Some people are born to be firebrands and strew their path with ashes of destructive deeds; others are born to be reformers to overthrow the established order. These doubtless have a place in the plan of God. But others are born to a different mission—to perfect the art of being kind, to serve in unrecorded ministries, to bind up broken hearts, to increase the sum of human joy. Of these Mrs. Barton was a shining example. At what cost this grace was won for her and by her, we do not know; we only know that some one paid the price, and that she carried to a still higher degree the 'sweetness and light' which were hers by a rare inheritance of birth. Had we been sensitive to the harmonies which awoke wherever she went, we would have felt again the truth in Wordsworth's great Ode to Duty:

'Flowers laugh before thee on their beds,
And fragrance in thy footing treads.'

* * * * * *

"For a little while God lent her to the earth, to the mountain dwellers of Tennessee, to churches in town and city and last and longest to all of us. She belonged to her husband by marriage, to her children by motherhood, but she is also theirs and ours and will always be in a love which in higher love endures.

'Nothing is here for tears, nothing to wail,
Or knock the breast, no weakness, no contempt,
Dispraise or blame,—nothing but well and fair.'"

The church adopted the following resolutions:

"The First Congregational Church of Oak Park, Illinois, assembled at the midweek service on Wednesday, November 11, 1925, desires to place on record its tribute to the memory of our beloved Mrs. William E. Barton, who entered the Heavenly life on November 7, 1925; and we hereby express our universal appreciation "For the constant inspiration she was to her husband and children as wife and mother; for the atmosphere in her home of spiritual serenity; for the sincerity of her hospitality which knew no distinction of class or condition.

"For the warmth of her friendship, the breadth of her sympathies for an ever-increasing circle of acquaintance; for the wisdom of her counsel, for the kindliness of her judgment, the unselfishness and the constancy of her affection.

"For the simplicity and beauty of her Christian faith, the quiet strength of her personal character; for the unstinted service she gave to the church and to the work of Christ throughout the world.

"Thereby be it resolved: That this expression of our affection for her and our sorrow at her passing be spread on the minutes of the church, be published in the press, and that a copy be sent to Dr. Barton and to the family with our love and deepest sympathy."

A Christmas Gift

An answer to the annual holiday gift problem

Each year, as Christmas approaches, the question of suitable and appropriate gifts comes to mind. We wish to make gifts that carry with them the spirit of the holiday, of thoughtful selection and of use and enjoyment to the recipient. The usual Christmas present seldom combines all these things, and therefore fails in its mission. Many are the gifts that please us for the moment and then are carefully put away and forgotten. Thus the entire purpose is lost and the thoughtfulness of the giver is wasted. The custom of giving Christmas presents was not intended as such, but rather an expression of the highest ideals and love for Him whose birthday we celebrate.

We suggest a year's subscription to The Congregationalist as a splendid solution of your problems. To the person receiving your Christmas gift will come fifty-two times during the year this magazine filled with messages that are at the same time interesting, instructive and inspiring. It contains able editorials, news reports, good stories, poetry, methods of Christian service and helps in personal religion. It portrays what Congregationalists are doing together, stories of the missionaries at home and abroad and the latest news of the schools and colleges.

It is a thoughtful gift for mother or father, an absent brother or sister, or to some one who through ill health is denied the joys of church attendance.

Our Special Price for Christmas Gifts

For the holidays we will make a special price of $2.75. Three subscriptions for $8.00. On the attached coupon write the names and addresses of those to whom you wish this remembrance sent, mailing it to our Boston address. The names will immediately be entered on our list and a suitable gift card either be sent them direct or to you for presentation.

of young people's work is being carried out, with week-end conferences and intensive activities with individual churches.

Rev. L. H. Keller, retiring superintendent of Florida and the Southeast, closed his work Nov. 30, and moved to Atlanta to assume the presidency of Atlanta Seminary.

The enlarged auditorium of the St. Petersburg Church is wondrously beautiful since the recent reconstruction. The magnificent new pipe organ is being installed.

The recently dedicated church at Coral Gables is already too small for the crowds attracted to this beautiful house of worship and the helpful ministry of Rev. T. B. Powell.

Coconut Grove Church is advertised freely by the Miami Chamber of Commerce as one of the beautiful buildings of the Miami region, and Rev. J. D. Kuykendall is preaching to large congregations before the tourist season opens.

Avon Park Church, in the heart of Florida, calls to its pastorate one of Michigan's strongest leaders, Rev. M. J. Sweet, of Highland Park Church, Detroit.

The newly organized church in one of the best residential sections of Fort Myers worships in the new parish house till the house of worship is built.

Melbourne, New Smyrna, and Arch Creek are planning the building of fine churches to displace the historic but small wooden churches in which they now worship.

Rev. R. E. Newton, of Pomona, has been elected mayor of the town. Congregations and the attendance at Sunday school and Endeavor Society are the largest they have been in the history of the church.

Winter Park Church enjoys its new house of worship, built after one of the finest models of the New England meeting house. Dr. C. A. Vincent, the pastor, preached the Sunday morning sermon when the first week-end young people's conference, held in Florida, met in Winter Park.

Rev. G. S. Boyer, successful pastor of the Ormond Church, brings his membership from the Lutheran denomination to take his place with the strong body of young Congregational ministers who are creating the new Florida Congregationalism.

Dr. E. A. King, of Miami Beach, finds the church embarrassed for want of room for the growing congregations, and is now planning the erection of one of the most adequate church plants to be found anywhere in Florida.

The illustrated lecture on Florida, Home Missions under Southern Skies, recently rewritten by Dr. E. A. King, will be kept busy in the South the present season. Development is so rapid in Florida that the lecture needs to be rewritten once a year.

At the time of the writing of these notes, late in November, 40,000 people a day pass through the railway terminal into Florida and other thousands enter by auto. Many of these are Congregationalists and will make their residence in Florida. L. H. K.

Georgia Conference at La Grange

Entering the church building of La Grange, Ga., Saturday, Nov. 14, I met a score of young men on the church steps. They were young men from the congregation of the La Grange church attending the meeting of the State Conference of Georgia. The church was well filled with young people at each session. There is a young people's movement of much power in the Georgia churches, developed by the Sunday School Extension Society, under the leadership of Miss Olive Pearson. Notable features of the meeting were the annual sermon by Rev. J. C. Pryor, of Demorest; addresses by Supt. N. P. McQuarrie, Dr. D. W. Dodge, Miss Helen Wilcox, and by two young men representing Atlanta Seminary. The echoes from the National Council meeting were enjoyed. The remarkable growth of the La Grange Church, under Rev. C. C. Hamilton, lent inspiration to the meeting. L. H. K.

The Alabama State Conference

Alabama Congregationalists met with the Mount Olive Church in Tallassee, Nov. 7-9, for their annual meeting. Rev. J. E. Each was chosen moderator and Mr. James McKay, scribe. The keynote for the meeting was given by the veteran Sunday school leader, Rev. F. J. Blackburn, and the closing message by Rev. J. W. Graham, of Montgomery. Mrs. E. W. Butler led the meeting of the women, so recently organized in Alabama. For three years Supt. Neil McQuarrie had led the churches along modern lines, introducing the apportionment, perfecting the Sunday schools, and introducing trained men to the ministry of the churches. This, with the young people's movement in the churches, is creating a new day for Alabama Congregationalism. L. H. K.

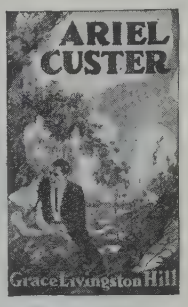
What to Give in Books



ARIEL CUSTER
By GRACE LIVINGSTON HILL

For all the glint of copper in the ripples of her hair and the jade lights in her young eyes, Ariel needed every bit of the Custer courage before the course of her love ran smooth. "A novel by Mrs. Hill is like a crystal-clear brook. Freshness, clarity, and rest are in both and each has a singing undertone of happiness and good-will. If one doubts that God is in His heaven and all's right with the world, there is no surer way to the recovery of that faith than by reading this book."—Boston Transcript. $2.00

BOOTH AND THE SPIRIT OF LINCOLN
By BERNIE BABCOCK

A stirring romance of the escape of John Wilkes Booth. The idyl of the young actor and lovely Bessie Hale is sweet with the fragrance of young love. In the conversion of Booth to a lover of Lincoln through understanding with the spirit of the Martyred President, Mrs. Babcock has struck a deeply human appeal. No Lincoln admirer can resist it. $2.00

1906, and has held pastorates in several important city churches, including Los Angeles and Santa Barbara. He had a break in health five years ago and went into the orchard country at Yucaipa to recuperate. He took the pastorate of a small church which was almost ready to disband. He left the field in a prosperous condition.

Mr. Ferris has been a pioneer in the use of motion pictures for religious purposes. He used these with great success in Sunday evening services. His church maintained a vigorous young people's organization and a live brotherhood and was the center of many community activities. The membership was more than doubled during his five-year pastorate. The Chula Vista Church is in the country club district of San Diego and has a fast-growing population. It offers opportunity for the strong leadership which Mr. Ferris can provide.

MONTANA

Accepts Call to Ballantine

Rev. G. J. Powell, recently retired from the general work in Montana, has accepted a call to Ballantine and is at work. Inasmuch as Dr. Powell has made his home at Ballantine during the past few years and knows all the people, it is a great tribute to him that his home church should call him. While state superintendent, Dr. Powell rendered 312 monthly reports to the Congregational Home Missionary Society, besides those rendered during three years of service at an earlier period when he was superintendent of the Black Hills and Northern Wyoming District. His many friends are rejoiced to know that he will continue to live in the state and to share in the counsels of the local association and conference.

Baker Congregationalists and Methodists Federate

An interesting development has recently taken place at Baker, in the coming together of the Methodist Episcopal and Congregational Churches in a federation. Rev. A. W. Seebart becomes the pastor of the united program, and all are looking forward to a greatly expanded work under the new plan.

IDAHO

Rev. Thomas McCamant Goes to Boise

The coming of Rev. Thomas McCamant to Boise is a significant event in not only the history of the church itself but of the Oregon Conference, for Mr. McCamant is a native of Oregon and therefore is thoroughly at home in the West. He returns to that part of the country after a course of study in Union Seminary. His statement to the council was, as might have been expected from a graduate of a modern school, concise and vital, with a keen appreciation of all that Christianity means in our personal and social life.

Pueblo Church Building Improved

First Church, Pueblo, held its services of rededication Sunday, Oct. 11. The remodeling of the church auditorium and additions to the parish house, costing about $11,000, have been carried through successfully. The remodeled auditorium is most satisfactory, and the additional room will enable the church to go forward in its broadening program of service. Rev. O. O. Smith is pastor.

Sunday School Lessons Broadcasted from Washington Park, Denver

The work of Washington Park Church, Denver, which was recently reorganized, is going forward encouragingly. The new organization started off with a charter membership of 39. A Christian Endeavor Society has been organized and a fine spirit is shown in the meetings. A ladies' aid society has also been started. The Boy Scout troop is active and doing good work. The pastor is broadcasting the Sunday school lessons each week from station KOA Denver. Hundreds of letters of appreciation have reached Mr. Rogers from points as far apart as New Jersey, California, New Mexico, and Canada. A number of strangers have attended the services of the church who first heard Mr. Rogers over the radio.

Flagler Moving Forward

The work of Flagler is well organized and is going forward splendidly under the leadership of Rev. B. T. Schwab. The church occupies a position of influence in the entire association.

This, however, is the first instance where a Chinese has been made state president.

In this way this great territory that should have the services of a full-time man is at least partially cared for.

Work Among Various Mexican Churches

Rev. J. J. Valencia recently assisted in meetings at the Mexican Church in Gallup, and at other towns in New Mexico. At Seboyeta nearly the whole town turned out to a meeting which was held in one of the town halls. In Gallup so many adults are unable to read or write that the pastor, Rev. J. M. OKLAHOMA

Pilgrim, Oklahoma City, Steadily Advances

During the absence of Dr. F. M. Sheldon at the National Council, the pulpit of Pilgrim Church, Oklahoma City, was occupied by Supt. A. E. Ricker. The church is making steady progress, more than 70 having been added to the membership during the year. The church school and young people's society are both in a flourishing condition. Dr. Sheldon is proving a tower of strength to all the work in the Southwest, where the influence of a strong leader for liberality and freedom in religion are so greatly needed in both church and state. During November he has been preaching on such themes as "Simplicity, Democracy, Liberty, and Outreach in Religion," "Divine and Human Impossibilities" (Armistice Day sermon), "The Man Nobody Knows," "Shall We Continue to Give Thanks?," "Christian Science," "Healing Without Medicines."

MISSOURI

Country Club Church, Kansas City, Dedicates

In the southern part of Kansas City, amid a rapidly developing residential section, is located our Country Club Church. It was organized in 1923, and services held in the Community Hall were, from the first, well attended by a substantial congregation who early felt the need of a more commodious building.

REV. ROBERT PORTER

The present edifice is 50 by 150 feet, of colonial architecture, with beautiful windows, perfect acoustic properties, modern ventilating system, a lounge, women's parlor, men's room, class rooms, picture booth, invisible pipe organ, and a comfortable auditorium. This new meetinghouse represents a cost of $75,000.

The dedicatory sermon was preached by Dr. F. G. Smith, of Omaha. Others participating in this service were Supt. A. R. Atwood, Dr. C. B. Moody, and the pastor, Rev. Robert Porter.

Much of the success of this enterprise is due to the loyal co-operation of our Kansas City churches and ministers. Mr. Porter was formerly pastor of Plymouth Church, Cleveland, O., and was instrumental in locating it in the Shaker Heights District. Afterward he served successfully, for eight years, First Church, St. Joseph, Mo., greatly increasing its membership and prestige in the community. After supplying First Church, Sacramento, Cal., he came to Kansas City and has gathered into the Country Club Church a capable and enthusiastic membership.

Those conversant with conditions predict that this new church will become one of the strongest in the Central West. A. R. A.

its organization in a residence, Sept. 6, 1885. Twenty-five men came together for the first meeting. The creed adopted was so short that the first minister who was asked to conduct a service for the new organization declined, with the remark, "I will not come until you make your creed longer." When the church was seeking a permanent pastor, the minister whom it called was advised by his friends "not to touch the church with a ten-foot pole," on account of its short creed and its union character. He did not take the advice and had a notable pastorate.

The first building stood at 5600 Greenwood Avenue, on a lot that cost $6,000. Seven years ago Plymouth Congregational Church united with the Kenwood organization, thus bringing in a considerable body of Congregationalists, although many of the members of the church in the beginning were Congregationalists. The other largest body representing any one denomination in the church is Presbyterian. The most prominent and best known layman of the church is probably Mr. Arthur Burrage Farwell, president of the Chicago Law and Order League, and, for practically half a century, an outstanding leader in reform movements in this city. The church has been served by three pastors: Revs. J. P. Hale, 1886-98; J. R. Crosser, 1898-1910; and A. J. McCartney, since 1911. The church is well located and has a commodious and adequate building.

LOUISIANA

Bell Raising at Kinder

Bethany Church, Kinder, long ministered to by Rev. Paul Leeds, recently held a celebration at the raising of a church bell. Lumber for the tower was given by a local company. The whole neighborhood turned out, and after a few hours' work the bell was hoisted to its position and sent forth its melodious tones.

GEORGIA

Becomes Pastor of Cedartown

Mr. Louis Schultz has accepted a call to Cedartown and is already on the field. The outlook is most hopeful, owing especially to the fact that the Methodists have shown a fine spirit of co-operation in the uniting of the Sunday schools of the district. A young people's society of 20 members was organized in October, and gives promise of success.

MASSACHUSETTS

Completes Twenty Years at Middleboro

Old First Church, Middleboro, rejoices in the completion of a 20-year pastorate by Rev. A. G. Cummings. This church, still standing in the midst of country conditions at the historic Green, renders an important service. The quiet, constructive ministry of Mr. Cummings, now dean of the clergy of the town, is largely responsible for its continued influence.

Centennial of East Northfield Church

The church at East Northfield celebrated its centennial Nov. 28 to Dec. 6. It was on Nov. 30, 1825, that 28 members of the original parish at Northfield, under the wave of religious thought that was spreading throughout New England at the time, separated themselves and organized a new church that would continue the original creed. This was given the name of Trinitarian Congregational Church, while those from whom they separated constituted the Unitarian Congregationalists.

The centennial program opened with an historical meeting, Saturday evening, at which "The First Fifty Years" were outlined by Prof. H. M. Morse of the Department of History, Mount Hermon School, and "The Past Fifty Years" by A. P. Fitt, son-in-law of Dwight L. Moody. The centennial sermon was given Nov. 29 by the pastor, Rev. F. W. Pattison, and was followed by a Sunday school and young people's rally addressed by Rev. Miles Moore of Utica, N. Y.

Beginning Sunday evening, and continuing throughout the week, Melvin E. Trotter, of Grand Rapids, Mich., conducted a series of evangelistic services, assisted by soloists, and a special chorus of 50 voices. Mr. Trotter will be an added dynamic force in the work the church is planning to do during the coming winter. Delegations from churches throughout the county and nearby towns of Vermont and New Hampshire attended the Trotter meetings.

Men Help Build Squantum Parsonage

Parishioners and friends of Squantum Church, Quincy, inspected the new parsonage, Nov. 23. This manse has just been completed and was largely built by the men of the parish who take due pride in their handiwork. It is located on land adjoining the church and adds value to the plant of this progressive representative of the denomination in the Granite City.

A Forward-Moving Church at Winchendon

The spire of North Church, Winchendon, removed about one year ago on account of decayed timbers, has been rebuilt at a cost of $3,300. The Bible school, which had met for many years at 12 o'clock, is now meeting immediately preceding the morning service. The change is working well. The daily vacation Bible school, a community affair, drew half its enrollment this year from North Church. A successful school of missions was conducted during October and November. This church is rich in young people and has at the present time 11 of its number in the student body of Middlebury, Norwich, Colby, Springfield, Rensselaer, and Cornell. Rev. R. A. Hamilton is the pastor.

Concludes Service at Atlantic

Rev. T. W. Davison of Atlantic has begun a new pastorate at First Church, Charlestown, after 17 years with Memorial, Atlantic. Numerous expressions of regret and good will have been accompanied by gifts showing loving appreciation. The service club of women presented a beautiful table, and the ladies' benevolent society gave Mrs. Davison a Martha Washington sewing table with full equipment. Representing the church, a special committee presented Mr. and Mrs. Davison with a testimonial emphasizing high appreciation and reciting the effort, sacrifice, and foresight of this ministry as evidenced in the finely furnished plant which is in fact their own memorial. Accompanying the message was a purse of $300 in gold. A committee of 11 has been appointed to look to the securing of a permanent minister.

Union Service at Concord

The union Thanksgiving service of the Protestant churches of Concord, held annually at South Church, has come to be one of the outstanding religious events of the year's calendar. For ten years these services have attracted a large gathering, and have been addressed by some of the leading speakers and leaders in current thought. This year's service had as speaker Dr. W. L. Sperry, dean of the Theological School at Harvard. He took for his text Psalms 137: 4. In his discourse Dr. Sperry drew a parallel between the Psalmist singing the Lord's song in a strange land and the Pilgrim fathers when they celebrated the first Thanksgiving. He said that Thanksgiving is comparable to no other festival day, and that it means more to Americans than to any other people. As usual, there was a musical program by a union choir under the direction of Mrs. Ruth May, and an opening period of worship in which local clergymen took part. A group of men from the several Protestant churches ushered at the service.

Vesper Service Topics at Concord

At South Church, Concord, Rev. C. B. Bare has inaugurated the Sunday vesper services for the year, with a series of talks on the topic, "The Fundamentalists and the Modernists." The individual subjects were: "In Fairness to the Fundamentalists," "What are the Modernists After?", and "Will Fundamentalists and Modernists Split the Church?" There was a special musical program and the services were well attended, testifying to the interest of the average man in the subject under discussion.

Rev. A. N. Wilder Goes to North Conway

North Conway is happy in the coming of Rev. A. N. Wilder, of New Haven, Ct. He is a graduate of Yale Divinity School, and was a Rhodes scholar at Oxford. While in England he supplied a Congregational church there. He is a fine scholar, an athlete of distinction, and has published a book of verse, which has met with the approval of the critics. His friends and the Conway parish are confident that he has unusual possibilities before him.

Personals

RICHARDS, DR. F. B., of Needham, Mass., recently pastor of North Church, St. Johnsbury, Vt., is serving as acting pastor of the Union Church at Waban, Mass., until Jan. 1, when the pastor-elect, Rev. J. C. MacDonald of Christ Presbyterian Church, New York City, will begin his work.

WANGELIN, REV. F. G., of Grandin, Mo., is taking active steps in connection with agricultural experts to relieve the situation among the farming people of this region. During the past season two droughts were experienced. The first, broken about the middle of June, was sufficiently severe to ruin the potato crop. The second, which lasted eight weeks, ruined the corn. And when the cotton was ready to pick, a week's rain ruined a large percentage of that. Mr. Wangelin hopes, by the aid of experts, to suggest new ways and new methods of farming which will relieve the situation.

WEBSTER, REV. D. E., of Lambert and Savage, Mont., faces the coming winter with great expectation of performing a most useful service in this large field. A new Service Car makes it possible for him to minister adequately to this widely extended parish.

WEEDEN, REV. C. F., of Newton Center, Mass., has closed his engagement with the People's Union Church, Quincy, where he has served for six months in helping to erect a new church

Give Your Minister a Book

Any time is a good time to give your minister a book. Christmas is a very appropriate time. Here is a list of some—not by any means all—of the recent outstanding religious books—any one of which a minister would appreciate. At any rate, if he would not be interested in these he is beyond help. Some of these he could not afford. Some of them, possibly, you could not afford. But we have made the list elastic both as to theme and price. The higher priced books the minister is not apt to get—unless some one makes him a present of them. Some of these have been already reviewed in The Congregationalist, some are yet to be reviewed. The Pilgrim Press Bookstores will help you in securing any of these, or in advising you regarding other books, many of them equally good, not on the list. Here are our own suggestions, with publisher and price added, for convenience:

The Religion of Yesterday and Tomorrow, by Kirsopp Lake (Houghton Mifflin. $2.00).

The Christian Renaissance, by Albert Hyma (Century. $4.00).

While the auditorium is still dark the deacons march from the rear of the church to the platform. At the same time the minister approaches the altar and lights his candle in turn lighting the candles of the deacons. The deacons light the candles of those sitting nearest the aisles, beginning in the front of the church and going toward the rear. They return to the platform and take their place on either side of the minister, facing the audience.

In leaving the church, those occupying the front rows leave first, then second row, etc. until the end. If the church has a gallery

Unless we realize our sins enough to call them by name, it is hardly worth while to say anything about them at all. When we pray for forgiveness, let us say, "my temper," or "untruthfulness," or "pride," "my selfishness, my cowardice, indolence, jealousy, revenge, impurity." To recognize our sins, we must look them in the face and call them by their right names, however hard.—Maltbie D. Babcock.

A World-Wide Week of Prayer

January 3 to January 9

The Federal Council of Churches has issued an appeal to the Churches of Christ in America, concerning the Week of Prayer. The entire statement, with full delineation of the daily topics, may be had from the Federal Council, 105 E. 22d St., New York, for $1.50 per hundred. We give herewith the main portion of the appeal and the general daily topics. The call is signed by William Horace Day and Charles L. Goodell, respectively chairman and executive secretary of the Federal Council's Commission on Evangelism. Our own Congregational Commission on Evangelism is supporting this appeal and is urging Congregationalists everywhere to unite in communion with Christians throughout the world in the observance of the Week of Prayer. The Federal Council's appeal is as follows:

To the Churches of Christ in America:

The World's Evangelical Alliance has for many years issued a call for a universal week of prayer on the first full week in January. The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, in hearty co-operation with the Alliance, hereby invites the Christians of America to unite their minds and hearts with those of the Christians of the world in common meditation and prayer during the week of Jan. 3-9, 1926.

Herewith we submit the general program of meditation, thanksgiving, confession, and prayer, with minor modifications calculated to adapt it to the needs of America.

It is suggested—

That where possible gatherings of earnest Christians be held each evening of the week for discussion and prayer, arranging union services if convenient, but each church by itself if the other is not possible. That where public meetings are not possible this call to prayer be issued to individuals in order that each in his own place may join thought and prayer with Christians in all lands on the great themes of the Kingdom.

The themes and meditations here presented will not only be circulated throughout all English-speaking lands but they will be translated for use in Austria, Belgium, Bulgaria, Ceylon, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Egypt, Esthonia, and Russia, France, Germany, Greece, Holland, Iceland, India, Italy, Japan, Korea, Madeira, Mexico, Nigeria, Norway, Panama, Persia, Portugal, Rumania, Transylvania, South America, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Syria and Palestine, Tunisia, Turkey and Armenia, and Uganda.

Borne up by the uplifting sense of world-wide communion with the people of God, let us come to this week of prayer with high faith and deep devotion, looking confidently to him whose is the Kingdom and the Power and the Glory.

Eminent Scholars to Visit America

"One of our ambitions we can now begin to realize more fully," said Dean Shailer Mathews, of the Divinity School of the University of Chicago recently. "That is the bringing of men eminent in religious scholarship to the university to give special courses of instruction." The first to come will be Dr. Gustav Kruger, professor of theology in the University of Giessen, Germany. Dr. Kruger will arrive for the spring quarter, when he will lecture, in English, on Christian and anti-Christian thought during the "period of enlightenment" in Europe, and give a course in German on the history of Catholicism. Dr. Kruger has a reputation in Europe comparable with that of Adolph Harnack and other great church historians. Later in the year Dr. Archibald Main, professor of ecclesiastical history in the University of Glasgow, will give a special course, as will also Dr. Daniel C. Holton, professor of church history in the Japan Baptist Theological Seminary.

Twelve Outstanding Religious Books

Suggested for Christmas Gifts

Science and Religion

SCIENCE AS REVELATION John M. Watson

I have had a growing conviction since boyhood that the truths of nature constitute a dependable revelation of the Divine will. I have now acquired for myself a newer, higher, and holier view of religious faith, one that is satisfactory to the intellect as well as to the heart, which I wish to share with my readers.

Contents: The Astronomer Speaks; The Physicist Speaks; The Chemist Speaks; The Biologist Speaks; The Geologist Speaks; The Anthropologist Speaks; The Voice of Ethics; The Philosopher Speaks; The Religion of the Future; The New Revelation. $2.25

SERMONS OF A CHEMIST Edwin E. Slosson

That this book will be of great service to those whose faith has been perplexed or shaken by the echoes of the world-wide conflict between science and religion is shown by the titles of a few of his seventeen chapters:

The Chemistry of the Greatest Miracle of the Bible; The Geometry of Ethics; Lessons from Other Faiths; The Internal Conflict; The Revival of Witchcraft; The Bible in Modern English. $2.00

WHAT LAYMEN WANT

Edwin Tenney Brewster

Although primarily a man of science, Mr. Brewster has studied philosophy under Royce and William James and has made the study of religion his hobby. "Religion," says Mr. Brewster, "is really a branch of Natural History." The point of the book is to help crystallize opinion among forward-looking clergy and laity alike, to suppress the whole "sacerdotal cast," and to have some sort of rational, scientific religion that will be adjusted to all our present-day interests and all our modern knowledge. $1.25

Philosophy

IDEALISM AS A PHILOSOPHICAL DOCTRINE Prof. R. F. Alfred Hoernle, B.S.C.

Author of "Studies in Contemporary Metaphysics," "Matter, Life, Mind, and God," etc.

One of the clearest philosophic writers of the day. He is simple and profound at the same time. In this volume he traces the history of the subject from the time of the ancient Greeks. He explains the various forms of idealism which have been upheld in our own generation, and makes his own definite contribution. $1.25

THE WORLD AND ITS MEANING

An Introduction to Philosophy

G. T. W. Patrick

Author of "The Psychology of Relaxation"

"One of the most vital books I have read since Royce's 'Spirit of Modern Philosophy.' . . . There is not an issue before the world today upon which it does not cast real light."—Dr. Joseph Fort Newton. $3.50

Biography

INCREASE MATHER The Foremost American Puritan Kenneth B. Murdock

He was intellectually a pioneer, actively interested in scientific progress, able to expound liberal ideas in politics, moderate and enlightened in dealing with the widespread witchcraft delusion, and tolerant of other sects than his own.

His story thus shows the progressive, intellectual, liberal side of New England Puritanism. It challenges many pseudo-historical conclusions as to Mather and his period, and combats them by telling the whole story for the first time and by going back to much unpublished and hitherto unused material for its authorities, especially Mather's own diary and letters and his autobiography. $6.00

Social Questions

COAL Your Side of the Coal Question

Edwin T. Devine

"The book presents a complete picture of the coal industry and an extraordinary analysis of the technical, social, and ethical problems which grow out of it. It makes an impartial assignment of responsibility for the solution of these problems, and offers a thoroughly workable program in which owners, operators, miners, consumers, and the government can effectually co-operate."—F. E. Johnson, Executive Secretary of the Department of Research of Federal Council of the Churches. $3.00

SOCIAL CLASSES IN POST-WAR EUROPE

Lothrop Stoddard

"The Great War marks the beginning of a new epoch as definitely as did the fall of the Roman Empire, the discovery of America, or the advent of those novel economic forces a century ago, usually termed 'the industrial revolution.' As might have been expected, this new epoch upon which we are entering is accompanied by notable class changes. They are discernible throughout the civilized world, but they are most pronounced in Europe—the main theater of the late conflict and, hence, the region most immediately affected by its consequences."—Lothrop Stoddard. $2.00

RACE OR NATION The Conflict of Divided Loyalties Gino Speranza

If the Melting Pot won't melt, what then? Shall we close our eyes to the inevitable result, and join the ranks of the easy-going optimists?

He discusses the effect on our national institutions—the bar, the public school, the church and the press—of the presence in our country of great foreign elements with differing traditions, customs, and points of view. $3.00

Theology

THE REASONABLENESS of CHRISTIANITY

Douglas Clyde Macintosh

Dwight Professor of Theology in Yale University

This book, awarded the $6,000 Bross Prize for 1925, is by an author who is distinguished alike in the fields of religion and philosophy. Dr. Macintosh here deals with a much discussed question in an unusually clear, logical, and enlightening manner. Dividing his subject into two broad headings, "Moral Optimism" and "Critical Common Sense," he has produced a work of extraordinary conviction, power, and interest. $1.50

THE RELIGION OF YESTERDAY AND TOMORROW Kirsopp Lake

Professor of Early Christian History in Harvard University

Professor Lake's new book is divided into two parts, entitled "Yesterday" and "Tomorrow." The first part contains chapters on Catholicism, Protestantism, the Theological Storm in the Nineteenth Century, and the Real Divisions in Modern Protestantism. The themes in the second part are the Faith, the Bible, and the Creeds; God and Prayer; Jesus; and Probable Results of the Clash of Parties. $2.00

THE RELIGION OF UNDERGRADUATES

Cyril Harris

Sometime University Pastor for the Episcopal Church, Cornell University

This is a challenging book. This colorful, accurately-drawn study of the undergraduate mind impartially and sympathetically discusses the religious situation among college students. After a vivid analysis of undergraduate religion as one finds it today, including quotations from undergraduates themselves, there follow closely-knit chapters in which point after point is constructively discussed. The author is not an alarmist but a careful investigator and a reliable reporter. $1.25

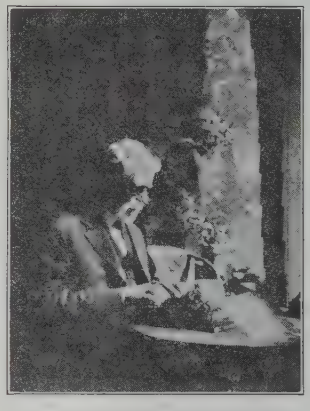
FOREFATHERS' NUMBER

BOB CRATCHIT AND TINY TIM

From Dr. Crothers' "Children of Dickens" (Scribners)

Age and Childhood alike Protected

The chief work of the Boards of Relief is for the aged, with life's work done after long years of service. Pensions guard hundreds of them from want. The Boards perform a service no less significant for young widows fighting for the future of their children. They also keep the door of opportunity open for boys and girls who have lost both father and mother.



Much of his thirty-five years' service was in home mission fields. With sight lost, he is learning at 73 to use a typewriter. His son, to whom attractive churches in the East were open, preferred to follow his father, and is serving one of the "larger parish plan" home missionary fields in the wheat belt

One mother writes:

"The children were small when my husband went ten years ago. The neighbors wonder how I kept them together and educated them. I tell them it was the Lord and Ministerial Relief that brought me safe this far. If it were not for your help and the friends back of you, I would have lost my boy, whom I have pulled over the dangerous period."

These boys and girls are helped to help themselves. Another mother writes:

"The children are getting good rank in school. The oldest girl earns four dollars a week and has the highest honors for the fall term of high school. My boy of thirteen has cut a cord of hard wood."

There is sometimes hard sledding in these homes. A disabled father in Maine wrote, upon receiving a gift from the Christmas Fund:

"The check will ease the situation wonderfully. Especially will it give our smaller children a comfort which hitherto they have not always had on account of inadequate footwear."

One of our wards who has lost both father and mother

Her husband served churches between the Mississippi Valley and the Coast. He died four years ago at thirty-eight, leaving to her the bringing up of these children, the oldest of whom was then seven. Help her brave struggle by a gift to the Christmas Fund

Remember that while the main stream of the Christmas Fund goes to revive those fainting under the burdens of age or disability, it helps widowed mothers to fill Christmas day with happiness and makes little children sing for joy.

The Editorial Outlook

Fred B. Smith as Peace Crusader

IN accepting appointment as Chairman of the Executive Committee of the World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches, Fred B. Smith, one of the best known of our Congregational laymen, has issued a statement declaring his purpose to devote the rest of his life to a crusade against war and what he calls "war philosophy." He proposes to make his new office one of active leadership in an anti-war campaign throughout the churches of America, and not merely that of executive action. In summing up his experiences in visiting Europe during the war, and every year since the war, and his recent visit to the World Christian Conference and concurrent gatherings at Stockholm and to the League of Nations at Geneva, Mr. Smith says regarding the discussions at these gatherings and the outlook for world peace:

> In all of these there were obvious notes of hope, but no confident message and a constant undertone of warning and fear of more wars. Not one of these great organizations, nor all of them combined, could issue a glad triumphant message to the people, saying humanity was delivered from the curse of armed conflicts. Thus these accumulating lessons have become the call of God to this service.
> I have no delusions about the possibilities of a sudden transformation of the world to a peace program. Winning the world to a program of abiding peace will be a long task. I harbor no conceit in reference to the effect of any one life upon this question. I only hope to bring whatever I have to offer, to add a little to that mighty sentiment among a host of people, which is calling for, praying for, and demanding peaceful methods of procedure in settling difficulties arising among the nations and races of the world.

In another column we print the categorical statement of Convictions expressed by Mr. Smith. It is good reading.

The Football Millionaire

THE baseball magnate has long been a familiar figure in American life, and now we have the football millionaire. At least "Red" Grange, noted college football player, who, according to the papers, has amassed a fortune of some $370,000 in a few weeks of professional football, hopes, according to the same source of information, to make it a million shortly.

There is something in one's finer feelings that instinctively recoils against the commercialization of sport and particularly of college sport, and it is a satisfaction to see that not many noted college football players are likely to follow Grange's example. The commercialization of sport almost invariably has much to do with its ultimate injury, and not infrequently it has a lowering effect upon the character of the men who commercialize it.

Before, however, Grange is condemned too quickly for commercializing his prowess in college sport, it should be remembered that a judge, whose decisions upon the bench had made him a national and admirable figure, was lured from that high office by a much less amount than has dazzled the vision of Grange. And it may also be remembered that another figure, prominent in public service and intrusted with a department that surely needed the highest type of sacrifice and ability that the country had to offer, turned his back upon that place to become a prominent figure in the movie industry.

Probably these eminent men justify their new tasks. Sport and recreation may be so important in the modern world that the interest of the public justifies the devotion to these spheres of men admirably adapted for seemingly higher service. Probably it is necessary that we should think through anew all these problems of worths and values. But there is still such a thing as the pearl of great price which it is worth the sacrifice of everything to procure. Frankly, we question whether the pearl of great price is to be found usually either for college men on-the-make, or for any other men, in the fields where alluring opportunity offers quick and immense financial reward.

Remember the Aged Ministers

FOR more than twenty years the Christmas Fund for aged ministers and their wives has been a noble part of our Christmas giving. The yearly growth of this fund shows its grip upon the heart of our churches. Last year approximately 4,000 subscribers gave over $50,000. This provided an average Christmas remembrance of $40, a great boon to the pensioners, for the average grant to a minister was only $310 and to a widow $235.

A note from Dr. Charles S. Mills, dated Dec. 9, says, "In the three days of this week we have received $13,122.07 from 1,277 contributors, and it looks as though we should reach and probably surpass the splendid mark of last year." It ought to be not merely a responsibility, but a privilege, to share in these gifts, but being a matter of gift and privilege the Christmas Fund for aged ministers and their wives ought to be none the less a real responsibility. Send your check before Christmas, if possible, but send it anyway, to the Congregational Board of Ministerial Relief, 100 East 42d St., New York City.

National Ideals: Christian or Militarist?

TWO profoundly important stages in the fight to establish the supremacy of peaceable and Christian ideals in the churches and educational institutions of this country, and through them in the country at large, are recorded in this issue. The first is found amply reported in Dr. Fagley's important article concerning the Conference of the Churches on World Peace at Washington, for which we urge a careful reading.

The second matter, in accordance with action taken independently by the conference at Washington, is the Report, released Dec. 7, of the Committee on Militarism in Education, contained in the foreword to a pamphlet, by Winthrop D. Lane, made public the day following, on Military Training in Schools and Colleges of the United States. This Report finds its significance in the decisiveness of its findings and in the widely representative character of the names attached to it.

"The extent of military training in the United States," say the Report, "will come as a surprise to many Americans." Mr. Lane's pamphlet shows in fact that in 56 American cities today there are Reserve Officers' Training Corps in connection with high schools, and that in 23 of this number military training is compulsory. A list of 83 universities and colleges is given in which military training is compulsory, and a list o 48 where such training is elective. The pamphlet' revelations of the intensive nature of this military train ing in the schools and colleges is even more startling thar the evidences of its extent. It is shown plainly that ir this country which has always opposed the idea of uni versal compulsory military training there is a more o less deliberate purpose to develop much the same thing

The real menace of this invasion of the educationa sphere by military establishment, method, and spirit is concealed by much plausible argument, and by state ments that are calculated to blind the public to the possible and probable results, if not the actual purpose Take, for instance, these statements given in parallel columns on page 13 of the pamphlet:

PRESENTING THE R. O. T. C.

To American Fathers and Mothers:

"The purpose of this book is not to make soldiers out of your boys, but to develop them physically, morally, and mentally into the best type of citizens, capable of defending our flag should an emergency arise. . . . With the support of the parents we hope to get the American boy outdoors and enjoying these activities . . . which will develop that hardness and uprightness so common to the pioneers who founded this free country." (Italics ours.)*

* From Preface to the Junior R. O. T. C. Manual, p. 5.

To Army Officers:

"Always remember that the men are the material being trained and moulded for the work of battle. They should be handled with the same care which an expert artisan gives a fine tool. . . .

"So it is necessary that a drill instructor look and act at all times on the drill field and elsewhere like a trained soldier, if he is to create in the minds of his men a desire to be like him. They are being trained to be soldiers, and the model should be actually before them." (Italics ours.)†

† From Infantry Drill Regulations for 1925 for Use with R. O. T. C. Manual, pp. 168 and 169.

It is not necessary to see in the minds of all who believe in the present policy of the War Department any calculated and designing militarism. No doubt many Americans honestly believe that the natural, surest, and fairest method of national defense is through provision for the training of every youth in the ability to defend his country if need be. It is a plausible plea that if the country is to be defended every citizen, every home, every family, should share in the provision for its defense, and that in a democracy all should bear the burdens, sacrifices, and dangers, and not a particular soldier class. There are problems of this whole business of national defense, if we are to maintain a War Department, responsible to the country and for which the country is responsible, that have not been thought through. But on the other hand we have had in recent years such unmistakable evidence regarding the effect upon a nation of too much thought about military matters, that the danger of the submergence of civil ideals ought to be plain. The concluding statement of this Report enforces what every American ought to realize: There is no virtue of our own which makes us immune to a militarism which has played so fatal a rôle in Europe.

This Report, or Foreword, is of such great importance that we print it elsewhere in full, with all the signatures attached to it. Among these signatures are the names of such well-known Congregationalists as Dr. Francis E. Clark, Sherwood Eddy, President Irving Maurer, President Mary E. Woolley, Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, and William E. Sweet.

Russell H. Conwell

RUSSELL H. CONWELL, who has been probably the most popular inspirational lecturer of his day, died at his home in Philadelphia on Dec. 6, at the age of nearly 83 years. Dr. Conwell was born in Worthington, Mass. He served in the Civil War when only a boy, and gained promotion from the rank of captain to lieutenant-colonel. After graduation from Yale he was immigration agent of the State of Minnesota in Germany and foreign correspondent of the New York Tribune and the Boston Traveler. He practiced law in Minneapolis and Boston. He left a successful law business in Boston to enter the Baptist ministry, first serving as pastor of a little struggling church in Lexington. Since 1891 and until his death he has been pastor of the Baptist Temple, Philadelphia, which has developed a great work. Allied with it have been Temple University and Garretson and Samaritan Hospitals.

The University has given education to thousands of young people, and Dr. Conwell has earned millions of dollars from his lectures and books for that work, given all that he could earn and raise until he died, being himself a poor man. His most famous lecture was "Acres of Diamonds," which he gave over six thousand times. Among many other lectures were "The Silver Crown," "The Angel's Lily," and "The Jolly Earthquake." His books included Lives of the Presidents, Life of Spurgeon, Life of John Wanamaker, and many others.

Many thousands have been sent on the road to success and stimulated to give their best to others by his influence.

A Notable Forefather: Increase Mather*

Professor Murdock's Biography of "The Foremost American Puritan"

By the Editor

THE chimes in a nearby Episcopal Church are playing Sawley as early Sunday morning I sit reading Kenneth B. Murdock's recently published definitive biography of Increase Mather, "the foremost American Puritan." Sawley is always associated in my earliest recollections with Charles Wesley's hymn of Puritan aspiration:

O for a heart to praise my God;
A heart from sin set free;

and particularly with the verses:

A heart resigned, submissive, meek,
My great Redeemer's throne;
Where only Christ is heard to speak
And Jesus reigns alone.

A humble, lowly, contrite heart
Believing, true and clean
Which neither life nor death can part
From Him that dwells within.

With the strains of this hymn and all its intimacy of meaning recalled to my mind I find myself inevitably measuring New England Puritanism against that larger world of Puritanism, much of it with little or no background of Calvinism, in relation to which the New England type is revealed in its limitations as well as in its strength and significance.

Puritanism, as Professor Murdock indicates, is not easily defined. The significance of this biography is in its study of Puritanism as incarnated in a typical and foremost New England Puritan. It is notable not only for its wealth of detail, and for the intimacy of its portrayal of its subject, but also for the certainty with which it corrects widespread misstatements and misjudgments concerning New England Puritanism.

Here is a volume of utmost importance, scholarly, thoughtful, accurate, bearing upon every page the thoroughness of a man who has been careful to master, and cite, his authorities and who has taken nothing for granted. If the Puritan needed defending, here is his defense; and it comes from one who writes mainly with a sense of detachment, even, in fact, from the standpoint of a certain inherent antipathy to the Puritan, but with a determination that the Puritan shall at least have the justice of being understood in the light of his own purposes, and in the environment of his own age. The misrepresentation of the facts, and the errors of judgment, displayed by certain critics of the Puritan are revealed strikingly in many passages in which Professor Murdock's penetration and sense of fairness make the evidence plain. J. T. Adams' Founding of New England is particularly discredited at some essential points, and in various matters where other authorities are challenged we should have much confidence in Professor Murdock's investigations and judgments.

Our only criticism, somewhat graceless at a time when detachment and impartiality are none too prevalent virtues in the historian and observer of religious movements, is that Professor Murdock has written in some respects with too great detachment. He is careful to indicate that he is not himself a Puritan, and while he displays all the insight of a sympathetic outsider one feels at certain points the lack of an inner view. There are things in Puritanism, cold as seemed its outward aspect, that can be adequately viewed only at white heat. We do not mean that Professor Murdock's biography could have been improved by a Puritan bias. On the contrary if Puritan zeal might here and there have discovered some color and truth hidden even to a sympathetic observer, the chief thing that we miss in the biography is the faithful wounds of a friend. It is not quite enough to defend New England Puritanism by what it was in itself, and by comparison with the movements and ideals with which it stood in contrast, and conflict, in its own age. We should like to see in addition to this, which has been admirably done by Professor Murdock, some adequate criticism of Increase Mather, and all that he represented, from the standpoint of the highest aspects of the Puritan ideal.

Professor Murdock takes in a sense a very limited view of Puritanism. Describing the theological and general environment of the world in which Mather grew up and developed, he says: "Naturally, in such a world there was no place for ideas of religious liberty or freedom of conscience, and few Puritans thought of them." He speaks of Puritanism as having been "inevitably intolerant," and "inevitably often cruel." He thinks that its strength was largely associated with intolerance and that "toleration and gentleness would have meant faintness in the pursuit of its central ideals."

We cannot express anything more than a mere sense of challenge toward these assumptions, but we have a feeling that a man whose scholarship and knowledge of the period equaled Professor Murdock's, writing from the standpoint of ultimate faith in the Puritan ideal as both tolerant and gentle, could make out a strong case, even deriving his data and arguments from seventeenth century Puritanism. One thinks, for instance, of Richard Baxter, two excellent biographies of whom were recently reviewed in these columns; and it is a pleasure to find that Professor Murdock's own description of Baxter, on page 266, in some measure belies his description of Puritanism, and his assumptions of its inevitably intolerant nature in the earlier pages of his book.

Of Baxter he says: "He was unique among Puritans in his breadth of activity, and his character, his patience, moderation, and truly Christian spirit, mark him above the rank and file of his brethren." One thinks, likewise, of Milton, who surely stands in history not only as an eminent Puritan, but pre-eminent in all time as a believer in liberty and toleration. Even if it be said, as Professor Murdock indicates, that Baxter was exceptional, and Milton even more so, is there any reason why we should defend as "inevitable" a type of Puritanism that did not measure up to its own loftiest ideals? In asserting the strength of the Puritan, and in defending him against the attacks of enemies, who in the guise of breadth and catholicity represented, and continue to represent, an intolerance much greater than that of the Puritan himself, we have tended altogether too much to apologize for faults that were faults, and weaknesses that were weaknesses, measured by the standard of the highest expressions of the Puritan ideal itself. We shall never adequately express and maintain the permanent nobility and integrity of the Puritan ideal until we get it more clearly related to its truest, even if its most exceptional, exponents, and until we dare more frankly to regard for what they were the limitations and defects of its historic expression.

Moreover, to return to Sawley, John and Charles Wesley, with whose grandfather Mather was for a time associated in England, were in a sense as much an outgrowth and expression of Puritanism as was Increase Mather himself. And the Wesleys, in their Arminianism, represented a movement that in its own way asserted the Puritan ideal of God's rule in the individual life and God's government of church and society. This larger, or other, Puritanism found expression in that same hymn of Charles Wesley:

> Thy nature, gracious Lord, impart;
> Come quickly from above;
> Write thy new name upon my heart,
> Thy new, best name of Love.

The developments of Puritanism, though they have been slow in two centuries, and have been particularly hampered by the coldness of New England theology, have been largely in this direction of attaining the dominance and meaning of Love.

We are conscious of giving to the term "Puritanism" a larger meaning than is perhaps justified by its use in Dr. Murdock's volume, but we are confident that this larger definition and reference must be in mind if New England Puritanism is to be judged by exacting standards, as well as with sympathetic comprehension of its difficulties, environment, and tasks.

Of Increase Mather one feels, in reading Professor Murdock's biography, that he represented much of the strength as well as much of the weakness of Puritanism. The intellectual and scholarly interests he represented at their highest, and one gets from Dr. Murdock's biography more the impression of intellectual than of spiritual supremacy. One feels that more than some Puritans he was a theologian and man of affairs, and one misses that warmth of feeling and glow of idealism that are associated with the highest vision. Standing between a distinguished father and a distinguished son, he inherited the lofty character of the former and he exemplified all the brilliance of the latter. His long ministry in Boston touched in the most intimate way the life of the Puritan Colony, and he had undoubtedly a powerful influence upon the course of political and general affairs. Greatest of all, one feels, was his character and influence as a bookman in the life of the new Colony, and associated with this, of course, is his interest in, and service of, Harvard College, of which he was one of the earliest graduates.

It is interesting to read that of the Harvard graduates before 1656 more than one-third went back to England sometime after leaving college. Increase Mather was among this number. In his early ministry he had experiences in England, Ireland, and Guernsey, and throughout his life his contacts with the mother country were frequent, not only through books, but through personal visits. Probably more than any other man he acted as an intellectual and spiritual link between England and the Colony.

Professor Murdock gives a very convincing portrayal of this long, intense, and useful life. If he does not reveal Mather as the highest type of Puritan idealist, he does at least make Mather's personality and labors very vivid in their intensity of conviction, their breadth and depth of scholarship, and in their human quality, which, if it be not always most conspicuous, is shown to have been very real. One would like, for instance, to dwell upon what Professor Murdock's pages reveal of love in the home and family relationships of the Mathers. In this sphere, as, perhaps more than this review would suggest, in the entire life of Mather, finely emotional qualities were evident beneath the somewhat austere and repressing influences that were all too evident in the atmosphere of New England Puritanism. Professor Murdock has written a monumental book which every one who reads it will wish to keep near at hand for constant reference. It is an illuminating picture not only of a great figure, but of the whole backgrounds of New England Puritanism.

From Our Western Editor

Chicago has just been host to the International Live Stock Exposition, which drew multitude of visitors not only from the ural districts of the whole country, but rom the cities as well. The chief interest f the exposition to many of us was not ound in the fine animals shown, though they ere good to see, but rather in the 1,200 boys nd girls who were present, representing ne 600,000 boys and girls of America who re members of farm clubs.

The banners that these boys and girls arried at the exposition set forth some tartling statistics about the work that hese young people are doing on the farm. ccording to these banners each of the 00,000 has a bank account averaging $102, nd they raised products and live stock last ear to the value of more than $10,000,000. t seems that they own property valued at n average of $185 each and they claim hat eighty-five per cent of them expect to ay on the farm. These 600,000 boys and irls own 65,000 head of live stock. These oung people claim that there are about 0,000,000 young people of their age on the arms and therefore the amount of property hich young people produce and own is large.

Among the contests staged for the boys nd girls at the exhibition was one of ealth. In this test Alice Burkhart, thirteen years of age, of Oregon County, Iowa, nd George Cuskaden, fourteen years of age, f St. Paul, Indiana, were the winners. The ontests for the awards began in the states nd the winners in each state were then xamined by physicians of the McCormick emorial Fund, Chicago. The test was a gid one. Miss Burkhart is a junior in gh school and grew up on an Iowa farm. he is five feet five inches tall and weighs ne hundred and thirty-one pounds. She cored ninety-five per cent perfect—the reuction of five per cent being made on acount of a slight cold. George Cuskaden five feet seven inches tall, weighs one ndred and fifty-five pounds, and scored nety-seven per cent perfect. Both excel athletics. Miss Burkhart rides horseback, ays basketball and tennis, and is a good vimmer; young Cuskaden is a member of e high school basketball team, plays baseall, and helps his father run a two hunred acre farm. Neither of these young eople drinks tea or coffee and both claim hat they retire at nine-thirty o'clock in the ening. Cuskaden gets up at five and Miss urkhart at six o'clock in the morning.

If these 1,200 boys and girls who attended ne exhibition are a fair sample of the 0,000 who are members of the farm clubs nd of the remainder of the 10,000,000 young eople on American farms, it is easy for us believe that the rural boys and girls of merica are better physically, mentally, and orally than ever before. Those of us who re dealing with the youth most of the time ave become convinced that the youth of ur day are better than the youth of those r-away days when we made a part of the outh of the land. It is altogether probable hat the youth of our day are not receiving much religious training as those of a former day, but in many other particulars they are far ahead. Those of us who attend young people's conferences are sure that in many of the youth there is coming a depth of religious experience which is just as strong and vital as the religious experiences known in the days of our youth. Judging by these youth, the golden age is on a head.

The Second International Boys' Work Conference, with four hundred delegates present, has just been in session in Chicago. All the troublesome facts found in the boy life of this day were frankly faced, not in a spirit of pessimism, but with optimism in spite of some of the forbidding things that came to light. It was freely admitted that there are a good many young people who are in revolt against their elders. The blame for this revolt was laid upon motion pictures, the automobile, and the slackness of parents. This has made a good many of the youth of this generation sex excited, self-assertive, self-confident, and parent critical. It was said that the arrival of the over-mastering sex desire in the boys' life has been antidated by at least two or three years, on account of the stimulation of motion pictures. Figures were given showing the large percentage of youth in the leadership of crime and it was estimated that the crime bill at the present time of America is $1,250,000,000, and that seventy-five per cent of the criminals now in prison are under twenty-five years of age.

The remedies offered for the present situation are the development and training of a different type of parent. It was said that "not one boy in ten has a father enlightened enough to teach him what he needs for modern life, and that the criminal element would be wonderfully reduced if children were shielded from bad surroundings and if every orphan or abandoned child were placed in a good home." Prof. Edward A. Ross of the University of Wisconsin said, "It is necessary in order to combat the formation of lawless gangs, built around exceptionally vigorous and dominating youths, to bring boys into association with the right type of adult. What is needed is picked men, to associate the boy in his preferred activities with an adult who not only sympathizes with his boyish interests, but who is capable of impressing him with the importance of preparing for the serious tasks of later life and fitting himself to play a creditable rôle as a wealth producer and citizen."

Phillip Seaman, of the Jewish People's Institute, put another phase of the matter in small compass when he said, "We are spending nine cents per capita for recreation to help keep young folks straight, and forty-three thousand cents per capita to deal with those who go wrong."

This meeting was called by the Rotary International and the Boy Scouts, the Russell Sage Foundation, the Y. M. C. A., the Chicago Crime Commission, and a large number of other agencies dealing with boys were represented. Such a gathering as this is just as heartening, if not more so, than the one mentioned in the first part of this article. These leaders of boys try to know all the facts, to face them without fear, and are going forward in the spirit of the Master to solve the problem.

Parable of the Road to the Left and Back

Now as I skim over the bumpy surface of this old planet in the Automobiles of Other Men who are poor enough to own a Car, there is nothing I become more familiar with than Roads Under Repair, except it be Roads in Need of Repair.

And as we were riding, we came to a place where a Fence was across the Road, with a Red Flag and a Red Lantern, and a sign that pointed to a Side Road on the Left. And as we looked ahead, we saw Trucks hauling Rock, and a Steam Roller at work. So we went to the Left.

And we came unto a Road that led to the Right, and we discussed whether that were the Way Back into the Main Road, but we decided that it could not be so, for there was no sign to indicate it.

So we kept ahead on the Left Hand Road.

And we came unto another Road that led to the Right, and we said, Surely this is the way back to the Main Road, but again we sought for a Sign and no Sign was given us. So we kept ahead.

And by this time the Left Hand Road, which had not been Very Good to start with, became Very Bad. But we kept on.

And we reached the Main Road at last, about Nine miles from where we left it.

And we made our journey to the place whither we went, and returned the same day.

And when we came back, the day was near its close, and the Steam Roller was at rest, and they had moved the fence a small space to one side to make room for a car to get carefully by. And we found that the Road under repair was not more than One Furlong in length, and to avoid it we had gone Nine Miles.

For I suppose that he who put up the Sign telling us to take the Left Hand Road thought we would know enough to come back by the first Road to the Right, and that there was no use expending energy in going down half a mile to put up another Sign.

But he guessed Wrong.

Now I see signs along the roadway of this present Generation, saying, It is not necessary for thee that thou travel in the straight Old Path of the Mid-Victorian Days. There are pleasant paths to the Left that lead no great distance and through a pleasant country, and bring thee safely back into the Main Road and get thee to where thou wantest to go quite soon enough, and with a Merry Jolt out of the Rut. But I do not see the plain Signs before those who take those Roads that show them the Way Back.

And I say, He is a False Friend and no safe Guide, who directed the Traveler along a Cheerful Road to the left. For one who goeth that way may search in vain for the Signs that show the Way Back, and it is a Long and an Hard way. And some there be who never discover the Way Back.

The Christmas Carol

Christ's Coming Celebrated in Song

By William M. Auld

CHRISTMAS as a distinct festival of the Christian Church, to be celebrated on December 25, came into being, it would seem, during the middle of the Fourth Century. There is some reason for believing that this date was fastened upon, because it was the occasion of a pagan festival of considerable importance in the Julian Calendar. "There is no direct evidence," remarks one historian, "of deliberate substitution; but, at all events, ecclesiastical writers, soon after the foundation of Christmas, made good use of the idea that the birthday of the Savior had replaced the birthday of the sun.

Once established, it was not long before its meaning was celebrated in stately and elegant song. Hymns Ancient and Modern will supply many illustrations of these old Latin Christmas hymns. "Veni, redemptor, gentium (Come Redeemer of mankind) was written by St. Ambrose; while another fairly well-known hymn was composed by Prudentius, and begins, "Corde natus ex parentis—"

Of the Father's love begotten
Ere the worlds began to be,
He is Alpha and Omega,
He the source, the ending He,
Of the things that are, that have been,
And that future years shall see,
Evermore and evermore.

With all their differences the old Latin hymns have certain well-defined characteristics. They are severely classical in form, in no sense popular, while the note is exclusively theological. Two things account for this: first, the dominant theological thought of the times in which the interest centered in the ineffable mystery of the incarnation; and, second, the fact that the writers were monks, whom we can "hardly imagine filled with joy that a man is born into the world."

The rise of Francis of Assisi (1182-1226) was an event of great importance in the history of the Mediæval Church. M. Arnold declares the century of Francis to be more interesting even than the Reformation, "because of the profound, popular instinct which enabled him to fit religion for popular use." With this humanizing of Christianity a new type of Christmas came into being. The Franciscans assumed the mystery of the incarnation, but it was the human aspect of Jesus, and consequently the human aspect of the nativity that appealed most strongly to their affectionate hearts and untutored minds. Jacopone da Todi (1228-1306) is conceded to be the sweetest of Franciscan singers. Here is a picture of the Madonna and her Child which might well have been the source of many an artist's inspiration:

Come and look upon her child
Nestling in the hay!
See her fair arms open wide,
On her lap to play!
* *
She with left hand cradling
Rocked and hushed her boy,
And with holy lullabies
Quieted her toy . . . . . .
Little angels all around,
Danced, and carols flung,
Making verselets sweet and true,
Still of love they sung.

The Christmas season was one to prepare for, and the preparation involved both heart and hearth; so he sings:

Sweep hearth and floor;
Be all your vessel's store
Shining and clean.
Then bring the little guest
And give him of your best
Of meat and drink. Yet more
Ye owe than meat.
One gift at your King's feet
Lay now. I mean
A heart full to the brim
Of love and all for Him,
And from all envy clean.

The great difference between these tender human songs and the old dignified Latin hymns is apparent. Both notes are, perhaps, necessary to a true appreciation of Christmas. We need to emphasize the human aspect of Jesus from the cradle to the cross; but the conviction which inspired the older hymns, that the entrance of Jesus into the world was an act of God, will, however explained, be felt to be a natural, and even necessary belief bound up with faith in the fact of God himself.

English carols fall into two classes, the secular and the sacred. The former were written for the merry circle around the hearth, or the convivial board, the latter to be used in the church or chanted from house to house to announce the coming of the Birthday of the Redeemer.

The secular carols fall into four types. These are (1) Carols of welcome,—Proface (Welcome); (2) Carols of health drinking,—Wassail (Salutation); (3) Carols of the boar's head,—Caput apri defero (I bring the boar's head); (4) Carols of holly and ivy,—Veni coronaberis (Come and you shall be crowned). If we keep in mind the times, and the mediæval Englishman's idea of good fellowship, we shall not be surprised at his convivial conception of the Christmas season. A Proface Carol, which appeared in Poor Robin's Almanac for 1695, but is regarded as much older, runs:

Now thrice welcome, Christmas,
Which brings us good cheer,
Minced pies and plum pooridge,
Good ale and strong beer;
With pig, goose and capon,
The best that can be,
So well doth the weather
And our stomachs agree.
With holly and ivy,
So green and so gay,
We deck up our houses
As fresh as the day,
With bays and Rosemarry,
And laurel complete;
And everyone now
Is a king in conceit.

There are many carols in this strain, and some border on coarseness and vulgarity. This kind of Christmas appears in Ben Jonson and in Nicholas Breton in all its pagan strength, and for a festival of this sort King Charles I wrote some carols and showed a deft hand at composing bacchanalian ditties. But the Puritans began to lift up their voices against these pagan feasts and ribald songs, which to them sadly disgraced the Christmas season. It would probably be true to say that Puritanism practically killed carol-making and caro singing of this kind; at all events it dea them a blow from which they never con pletely recovered.

The English sacred carols are far mo numerous than the secular, and are of man kinds. But in the main they follow the tw types already mentioned; they either sin after a fashion, of the divine mystery c the incarnation, or follow the strain of th Franciscan song, and deal with the annunc ation, the wonderful day of the nativity the beauty of the Virgin, the charming chil hood of Jesus, the shepherds, the magi, an the Christmas saints. Miss Rickert ob serves:

In literary value the carols range fro gems of religious inspiration to jogging tav ern ditties. . . . Out of something like tw hundred anonymous carols there are ver few that lack some beauty or quaintness o charm; and there are perhaps twenty o more that may be counted among those bes songs that spring perfect out of the huma heart.

English carols to the Virgin are pre-Refo mation. Some of them are very beautifu Here is one:

I sing of a maiden
That is makeless (matchless);
King of all Kings
To her son she ches (chose).
He came all so still
Where his mother was,
As dew in April
That falleth on the grass.
He came all so still
To his mother's bower,
As dew in April
That falleth on the flower.
He came all so still
Where his mother lay,
As dew in April
That falleth on the spray.
Mother and maiden
Was never none but she;
Well may such a lady
God's Mother be.

In the carols of the divine mystery ther is an effort to state the wonderful benefit which accrued to mankind by the Adven of Christ. It was not sin as a personal mat ter that seemed to concern the writers, bu sin as some evil influence magically cure by the Nativity. One carol sallies forth after this fashion:

It was dark, it was dim,
For men that livëd in gret sin;
Lucifer was all within,
Till on the Christmës day.

There was weeping, there was wo,
For every man to hell gan go;
It was little merry tho,
Till on the Christmës day.

But since Jesus has come into the world and mankind has been mysteriously re deemed, all may be extremely happy:

Now sitte we down upon our knee,
And pray that child that is so free;
And with good herte now sing we Gloria tibi domine (Glory to thee, Lord)!

Back of all these carols there is the feel ing that the childhood of Jesus, as well a all other periods of his life, has somethin to tell us of the eternal truth of God. Bisho Temple writes:

We have made our religion somber b hinking of the tragedy of Christ's death, or glorious by thinking of the triumph of the esurrection. Shall we not also try to make t cheerful and intimate and human by thinkng at this time of Christmas of his childood. We may learn from his infancy that God desires love and mirth as children desire it, and that in our merry-making we nay be very near to God.

In days past people sang not only of the coming of Christmas, its actual appearance, but also of its departure. Here is a charming farewell to Christmas:

Noël is leaving us,
Sad 'tis to tell,
But he will come again,
Adieu, Noël.

His wife and his children
Weep as they go:
On a grey horse
They ride through the snow.

The Kings ride away
In the snow and the rain,
After twelve months
We shall see them again.

The Passing of Dr. Goodrich

By Grace M. Boynton

A group of young missionaries sat on the steps of the Altar of Heaven as the moon of the eighth month rose over the city of Peking. It was their weekly gathering and the leader had chosen the great hymn of praise, "The Canticle of the Sun," for a part of the hour of worship.

"O most high, almighty, good Lord God, to thee belong praise, glory, honor, and all blessing!—Praised be my Lord for our sister the moon, and for the stars which he has set clear and lovely in heaven—" The voice paused a little before the next words—"Praised be my Lord for our sister the death of the body, from which no man escapeth. Blessed are they who are found walking in thy most holy will, for the second death shall have no power to do them harm."

The word of Dr. Goodrich's death at the home of his daughter had come to the Mission only a few moments before they gathered for this open air service. It was not unexpected news, and now they spoke together quietly of the gracious ministry which each one had received from Dr. Goodrich in his later years. But of all the groups there, scarcely one had known the man in his prime. The story of his endeavors and achievements was something which had come down to them from a time before their life in China began. He died in his ninetieth year, and his old age is what most of the missionaries now in Peking have known. With all their love and veneration they could not bear the witness which such a life should receive.

The next day the casket was brought to the church in the American Board compound to rest in the same spot where Mrs. Goodrich had been not quite two years before him, for a last public tribute. The church was filled with grief-stricken friends. Here were men who had been Dr. Goodrich's students: here were foreigners who had used his Chinese dictionary, and there was not a missionary, or a Chinese Christian there, who did not remember that he owed his Chinese Bible largely to the labors and the learning of this magnificent pioneer. The Legations had their representatives in the midst of the congregation of Chinese and missionaries. Their presence brought to my mind a letter from Sir John Jordan, written to Dr. Goodrich when Sir John was leaving China, a copy of which came to me from Mrs. Goodrich and contained the following tribute:

"Although we have not seen as much of each other as I could have wished in recent years, I have always retained a great veneration and respect for you. Your time in China has been long compared with mine, and has been spent in far better and higher service; but I have always tried to do what little I could to assist the Chinese on the path of progress."

Many took part in the service held in Peking, but it was not even that tribute from those who had worked with Dr. Goodrich which remains in the thought of those who best knew and loved him, as the perfecting and most fitting completion of his earthly life. It was rather the sunset hour in T'ung Chou when the casket was carried by loving hands across the fields to the hallowed spot where the martyrs of Boxer year and many a devoted missionary, including Sarah Goodrich, lie at rest within the shade of the cedars which surround the place. As the group following the casket approached the cemetery, the sun sank in clear golden light behind the purple hills, and we heard the voices of young girls, clear and sweet, singing one of the hymns Dr. Goodrich translated. We found them standing on either side of the green aisle through which we passed to the open grave where flowers banked the piles of earth, and where T'ung Chou friends were waiting. Over all was the solemn mellow light from the Western Hills.

Here the Chinese took charge of their beloved dead. Foreigners stood quiet while hymns and prayers and the single tribute were offered. Nor was there a formal committal service. A tall, grave man spoke his heart out and his voice failing him he said, brokenly, "It is fitting that I should weep at this place." But he went on presently to glorify the Master who had become a living presence to him and to others in the personality of Dr. Goodrich, and it was in the worship of Christ Jesus that this burial took place while the radiant afterglow gave place to the still white peace of the harvest moon.

That broken Chinese voice had proclaimed this an hour of consecration for those who were gathered together in that place, and a time of holy triumph of one who might have said with Paul, "For me to live is Christ and to die is gain." And it was also very full of the simple human fellowship which Dr. Goodrich loved. The young people from the schools were there as well as their elders. Old friends were there and little Chinese children played about in the green gloom and called to each other in their high sweet voices, and no one forbade them. Village women were there and men burdened with heavy international responsibilities. At that place they were one in grief and in thanksgiving and in praise.

The full moon floated high before the line of color was gone above the hills. For, at the close of such a life it must needs be that at evening tide it shall be light.

Dr. Goodrich's Career

Chauncey Goodrich, D.D., of Peking, celebrated, shortly before his death on Sept. 29 last, the sixtieth anniversary of his service as a missionary of the American Board in China. He was in his ninetieth year. A graduate of Williams College and Andover Seminary, he became famous as a translator of the entire Bible into the "Universal Mandarin Colloquial" of China, the language advocated for use all over the Chinese Republic today. Another great service rendered by Dr. Goodrich was in the translation of hymns into Chinese. In 1875 he, with Dr. Blodget, of the China Mission, was asked to prepare a Chinese hymnal. After twenty-five years' work two editions of the book were finished and printed—just in time to be destroyed by the Boxers in 1900. "Nowhere," said Dr. Goodrich, shortly before his death, "can I find a copy of that first edition of our precious hymnal." However, the book was reissued and is doing notable service up and down China. Professor Hu Shih, leader of China's literary revolution, declares the Mandarin Bible to be the entering wedge in the renaissance movement. The death of Dr. Goodrich removes, we believe, the last one of the committee of five chosen to undertake the Bible translation. F. S. F.

Day of Prayer for Missions

February 19, 1926

By Helen B. Montgomery

The annual Day of Prayer for Missions, held under the auspices of the Council of Women for Home Missions, and the Federation of Woman's Boards for Foreign Missions of North America, has become a fixed feast in the Christian year to which thousands of women look forward with expectation.

The program for this year has already been prepared by a joint committee of the federation and the council. The theme is: "In Everything by Prayer." The committee decided that as this year is to be signalized by the study of prayer as a force in the mission enterprise, the attempt should be made to have the day really devoted to prayer; that we should come together for thanksgiving, communion, and intercession, and that instruction and inspiration furnished through addresses should be minimized. Definite periods are assigned for thanksgiving and for meditation. The prayers are made definite. Responsive readings are provided in which God's great promises are recited. Intercessions for great causes are stressed. Songs are interspersed. It is suggested that the offering on the day, as in former years, be devoted to causes that belong to all denominations. In the home field the offering will go toward the work among farm and cannery migrants; in the foreign field for Women's Union Christian Colleges and Christian Literature for Women and Children.

The committee feels especially anxious that the causes selected, both home and foreign, should be the ones chosen in each meeting, rather than some local cause or causes. The council and the federation which are promoting the meeting are each responsible for their causes, and are depending on the Day of Prayer celebration for a large part of their funds.

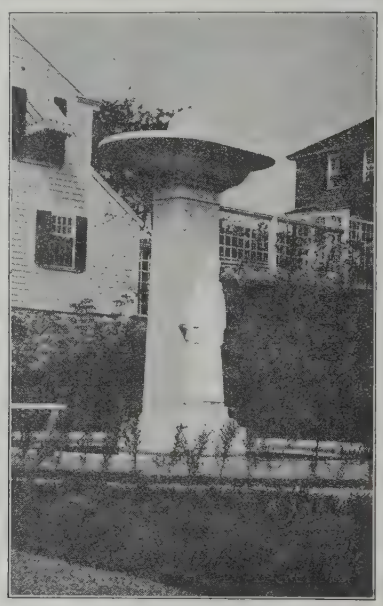
The condition of the world in which we live certainly summons us to prayer with a great, compelling voice. If we can only unite the hearts of the Christian women of America in an outpouring of their souls to God we may help mightily in these times of crisis.

At Pilgrim Shrines

Memorials and Reunions at Plymouth

By Warren P. Landers

PLYMOUTH, the true New England home of the Pilgrims, has had special consideration again this year, greatly enriching



PILGRIM MOTHERS' FOUNTAIN
A memorial to the Mayflower women, erected by the Daughters of the American Revolution, near Plymouth Rock her historic memorials. The latest gift, a Fountain to the Women of the Mayflower, was dedicated June 24 by the donors, the National Daughters of the American Revolution. The fountain is located upon the new water front at the foot of Cole's Hill. Of Tennessee marble, the life-size figure of a Pilgrim woman stands with demure and downcast eyes; posture and expression reproducing her traditional place among mortals. On the rear base is carved: They brought up their families in sturdy virtue and a living faith in God without which nations perish.

Above, on a tapering pillar set in the circular basin and just below the spraying water jet, are the names of the twenty-nine women of the Mayflower. There are Humility, Desire, and Remember, with other less suggestive names but including also Priscilla Mullines, and Dorothy Bradford. Were the eyes raised, the gentle woman, whose hand carries a Bible, would look directly across the renovated shores to a nearby landing and see Rose Standish, the twentieth century Boston steamer. Not far away, at the right, under its Grecian canopy and on the level with the incoming flood, is Plymouth Rock.

The white marble figure, wearing the cap and the cape of the period, forms a contrast to the rest of the memorial—upper and lower basins of Maine granite. The sculptor was Paul Jennewein of New York, a graduate of the Academy at Rome. The cost, $25,000, was met by gifts from every state. The architects were McKim, Mead & White.

Naturally the visit of President and Mrs. Coolidge on Aug. 1, was a distinguished event. Plymouth graciously and with enthusiasm welcomed its guests who had not been in town since vice-presidential days with Mr. Harding, on the occasion of the Tercentenary.

Reunions of Pilgrim descendants crowd the canvas of a year's painting of this historic community. Shortly before the President came the sons and daughters of John Howland, "a lustie yonge man" who, according to Gov. Bradford's Log fell overboard from the Mayflower, "yet he lived many years after and became a profitable member both in church & comone wealthe." They revisited the old homestead on Sandwich Street, among the most ancient buildings of the town. They also viewed the pulpit of the First (Unitarian) Church, the gift of the Howland descendants. Earlier, Plymouth District of the State Medical Society commemorated the service of Dr. Samuel Fuller, practicing physician to the Mayflower Pilgrims.

Last summer interested citizens of Marshfield set in motion a plan to purchase and preserve the Isaac Winslow house (1699), built by a grandson of Governor Edward Winslow of the Mayflower. In 1830 Daniel Webster, whose estate adjoined, bought the property. Thus it came under the care of the Webster Association. At Duxbury, after three years, the state has begun repairs on the decapitated statue of Myles Standish, who, if tradition be true, had more than once lost his head. This time the restoration included an arm, removed by a bolt of lightning. The shaft is 116 feet high and the Doughty Captain fourteen feet more. The monument was originally erected by the Standish Association about 1899; later the grounds became a public reservation. Citizens and organizations of Provincetown are cooperating for a yearly observance of the Pilgrim Sabbath. It is designed to stress the principles proclaimed by the Compact, signed in the nearby harbor.

The Plymouth Chamber of Commerce is preparing a new guide-folder for tourists to include a map of the surrounding territory, with routes inland; it also lists the historic objects to be visited. If the Chamber would push vigorously for the appointment of an Art Commission to have constructive oversight as to the placing of memorials, it would render a distinct service. Co-ordination or anything like town-planning seems not greatly in evidence. It is much needed in a community where reasons constantly arise for new commemorative statues and buildings.

A Layman's Convictions

By Fred B. Smith

[EDITORS' NOTE: The following categorical statement of the convictions prompting him to devote the rest of his life to campaigning in behalf of world peace, is part of a longer statement which Fred B. Smith recently made on assuming the chairmanship of the Executive Committee of the American Branch of the World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches. Reference to the matter is made editorially.]

FIRST—That the abolition of war is the paramount world issue. In the judgment of men possessing wisdom and information far beyond anything I profess to have, every hope and aspiration of the human race is being placed in jeopardy by the War Philosophy. The heart of the world problem is just this, can humanity find some way to abolish war? This I am convinced is the supreme issue of this moment. Nothing else matters much. Viewed from the standpoint of good government, good economic or true religion, the abolition of war is the supreme affirmation.

SECOND—That the ominous war clouds still hover over the nations. I am profoundly impressed by the fact that notwithstanding all the lessons of the past, in the face of all the warnings which have been issued and all the superb efforts which have been put forth, particularly since 1918, ominous war clouds still hang over the world. The one great aim of the war, "No more war," seems to have failed.

THIRD—That war can be abolished. I am glad to record my conviction and unbounded confidence in the belief that war can and will be abolished. I do not believe that war is an incurable malady, and therefore must be carried on permanently in all future human activities. I do not believe it is in the purpose of God to organize war. I believe it is in the great plan of God that nations and people shall live in peace. I believe Christianity and the War Philosophy cannot live together in the same world.

FOURTH—That the great hope will only be realized through the full co-operation of all the agencies which believe in God. I am further constrained to hope that in this relationship I may render some service in enlarging the co-operative plans of the allied Christian societies which are so deeply interested in the world brotherhood ideal. I am thoroughly of the opinion that this task is so colossal, and the consummation to be desired is so exalted, that the realization of it will only come through the growing co-operation of all those agencies throughout the world which believe in God and universal brotherhood.

FIFTH—That this message is the highest and most compelling Christian apologetic. I am moved also by a conviction that this message of Christian good will, of world-wide brotherhood, and of unbroken concord among races and nations of the world is the most compelling Christian apologetic. Frequent tours throughout the world have led to a very serious consideration of the problems confronting the Christian Church in that universal extension of the Gospel message we believe to be indispensable to all people. I have been made strongly aware of the fact that millions of people in this as well as in other lands have lost a good deal of their faith in organized Christianity as they have observed these professed followers of Jesus, organizing, promoting, and leading the most horrible war in all history. We may as well recognize the fact that Christianity cannot become universal until it has rid itself, root and branch, of the War Theory. I have always believed in evangelism, and have sought to press that message upon every appropriate occasion and feel now that any service rendered in exalting the Christian doctrine of World Peace will add to the most compelling argument for the indispensable place of our faith.

Christianity will not become the religion in a million years unless it can be purged of its war traditions.

SIXTH—That the noblest service to be rendered to America is to have her assume her full place in this great undertaking. What the men of our country need most just now is a great new, compelling challenge to idealistic life and service, and I believe that this message of universal good will and world peace can be so translated in the life of our American citizenry that its reaction will become highly beneficial in the realm of our domestic issues. The fact is that when on Nov. 11, 1918, the order was given to "cease firing," we not only began to demobilize our army, but in an appalling way we demobilized our altruism, our idealism, and high aspirations for world human welfare. I do not believe anything short of a program which contemplates world peace will be sufficient to arouse again those great emotions which led to sacrificial service for country and humanity.

In accepting this responsibility, therefore, I do it with the expectation of organizing and personally conducting campaigns in the cities and towns and colleges and universities, which will carry the whole message of our own Christian, moral, patriotic welfare as well as these issues which reach to the uttermost parts of the world.

SEVENTH—That the World Alliance is the best hope of co-ordinating the Christian peace sentiment throughout the world. In my travels since 1918 I have been meeting men in all parts of the world who are saying that some kind of a world grouping of the Christian and religious forces is necessary to preserve the impulses and desires which are being quickened everywhere in behalf of world peace. Not long ago Sir Douglas Haig, in addressing the Presbyterian General Assembly in Scotland, said, "What we need just now is a World League of Christian Men and Women to Promote Ideals of Peace and Brotherhood." I was profoundly impressed, in the last tour around the world, by the fact that this World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches is already that organization. Twenty-nine nations now have branches of the World Alliance. While this is an emphasis upon only one issue of the Christian program, it is an emphasis upon the supreme item and it is already in action. It has in it men, resources and vision, and it is the best hope we have for enlisting immediately the whole Christian world upon this subject. It would naturally be expected that of the nations organized in this group, the American Branch ought to be one of the most effective. Therefore, I welcome this responsibility cordially, and more heartily than anything I have ever before given myself to in a rather long and varied life.

The St. Francis of the Mayflower

By Charles S. Tapley

Since the sailing of the Mayflower the name of Francis Cooke has possessed little significance. It deserves to be rescued from oblivion.

Francis Cooke was baptized at St. Martin's, Charing Cross, on Oct. 27, 1578. The name is spelled "Francisca" in the church register. One of the church wardens, who made a study of the history of the church, said that the clerk of that period was a clear writer, but that he had no knowledge of Latin or Italian. The "i" is certainly masculine, but the "ca" is just as certainly feminine. It is owing to the terminal letter "a" that the story of Francis remained a secret for so long. Of course it should be "o."

Francis Cooke was the grandson of Sir Anthony Cooke of Gidea Hall, near Romford, Essex, who was tutor to King Edward VI. Francis was born at the Hall. It was a charming old place, and here Sir Anthony entertained Queen Elizabeth and Marie de Medici. On the outer walls of the Hall were inscriptions in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, a prominent Hebrew motto being "With God's help."

Sir Anthony was a stanch Protestant, and during the reign of Queen Mary escaped to Strasburg, where he attended Peter Martyr's lectures. He had six children. Three of the daughters became famous. Mildred married Queen Elizabeth's distinguished Treasurer, Lord Burghley, or Burleigh; Anne became Lady Bacon, mother of Lord Bacon; and Elizabeth married Lord John Russell.

Francis Cooke worked for the cause of religious freedom in the seventeenth century as Francis of Assisi had done in the thirteenth. In 1592 he entered St. John's, Cambridge. St. John's College was a powerful center of Puritanism. The Cooke family were closely allied to the Nonconformist movement. Lady Bacon, aunt of Francis Cooke and mother of Francis Bacon, believed that "the cause of Nonconformists was the whole cause of Christ."

Francis Cooke and his son John came on the Mayflower, but the rest of the family were left behind to be sent for later on.

Francis Cooke spent a considerable estate in promoting the success of the colony. No poet has immortalized him, and but little is known of his life, but in the annals of the Plymouth Colony are frequent references to his statesmanship. His family later joined him and his son, John Cooke, lived to be the last male survivor of the Mayflower. He was a prominent man in the colony, like his father, and was the founder of Dartmouth, Massachusetts.

Francis Cooke was a man of clear judgment and of keen mentality. He was called upon repeatedly to administer justice and to arbitrate in disputes. As commissioner for laying out roads he was very efficient. He was a fine type of man and devoted his life to what he thought was right.

Like Francis of Assisi he was willing to forsake all and follow where God led.

Chicago City Missionary Society Meeting

The annual meeting of the Chicago Congregational Missionary and Extension Society is an outstanding event in the Congregationalism of the Middle West. It brings together more Congregationalists than any other gathering in this section. This year nearly 700 people were present at the 43d annual meeting, which was held at the La Salle Hotel, Dec. 1. This meeting assumed an added significance because of the generous provision made for the society by the will of the late Victor F. Lawson.

The Chicago Society has long been the foremost city organization of our fellowship in America, both in endowment and in the number of churches founded and under its care. The report of the superintendent, Dr. J. R. Nichols, emphasized the fact that the board is planning to make the best possible use of the generosity of Mr. Lawson. The initial bequest from his estate was $1,300,000, established as a trust fund, of which the society is to have the interest. Of this the income on $300,000 is to be given to the New England Congregational Church, so long as the board of the City Missionary Society believes that the church has a future. This is the church of which Mr. Lawson was for many years a member. The society is to have the interest also on one-fourth of the residuary estate, the value of which is not known at present; it may amount to as much as $2,000,000 or $3,000,000. This money is given without restrictions of any kind, save that it shall be used for the religious work of the society.

The society not only organizes churches and gives oversight to them until they become self-supporting, but it maintains a revolving fund for aiding churches in building. In addition to the work done in English-speaking churches, the society co-operates with other denominations in religious leadership among the Poles, the Bulgarians, the Finns, and the Chinese. Brief addresses were made at the meeting by Rev. F. E. Stillwell and R. Paul Fox, and the address of the evening was delivered by Rev. A. W. Palmer on the topic, "The Church and the City." Rev. J. C. Armstrong, founder of the City Missionary Society, now 85 years of age, was present and received an ovation. Mr. F. E. Reeve is president and Rev. C. S. Laidman, assistant superintendent.

KENNEDY'S SECOND BEST

BY JOHN FREEMAN

The first chapter introduces Rev. Gordon Kennedy, the successful young pastor of Rosemont Memorial Church, Toronto. He is thirty, and unmarried. A crowd of his merry, young people at the railroad station see him off, bound for the West on a summer vacation. They fill his Pullman section with fruit and other gifts. Before the train starts, a woman who introduces herself as Mrs. Wilcox presents her attractive English niece, Miss Margaret Pearson, to Mr. Kennedy as traveling companion. Miss Pearson is on the way from her grandfather in England to her father, in Vancouver. Mr. Kennedy generously shares his fruit. He and Miss Pearson develop a pleasant acquaintance on the train as they travel westward together.

CHAPTER III

THE evening brought a flaming sunset followed by a lingering twilight. In their conversation, lasting several hours, they touched upon many matters of common interest. She seemed to have a well-stored mind and a broad, mental outlook. He was charmed by the fresh and vivid way in which she expressed her thoughts. The character of the scenery through which they were passing was constantly changing, and she remarked upon the pleasure one experienced in traveling through such a country for the first time. It occurred to Kennedy that he was enjoying a similar pleasure. He, too, was traversing new territory as he talked with this interesting girl.

The next morning he was early astir. Having shaved and dressed, he found the time hanging heavily upon his hands while waiting for breakfast. Presently he became conscious of a certain amount of excitement which increased as the moments passed.

For a considerable time the Pullman presented a scene of pantomimic confusion, as relays of sleepy and irritable passengers struggled into their garments behind fantastically bulging curtains, or made sudden eruptions into the open in various stages of dishabille. Kennedy was eager to see some swaying of the curtains which guarded Margaret Pearson's section, but they hung motionless until the first call for breakfast had been sounded. Then she parted them and stepped forth with her toilet complete for the day. She looked the picture of healthful beauty. The golden morning seemed to be reflected in the ruddy brown of her cheeks and the clear luster of her eyes.

"I hope you had a good night," Kennedy said as he hastened to join her.

"Thank you, I did, indeed."

"There was a lot of jolting and bumping. From midnight on we were doing one of the roughest parts of the line. The train kicked up a dickens of a row, I thought."

"I didn't feel anything of it," she answered. "I slept like a top. Quite an achievement, wasn't it, for my first night in a sleeping car?"

"Extraordinary, I should say. I scarcely slept at all."

They were now traversing a desolate region. Not a vestige of verdure could be seen, nothing but an inferno of naked boulders away to the sky line. In the morning light the gigantic masses of heaped up rock resembled the bleached vertebrae of primeval monsters which had perished in colossal combat.

"Ghastly region, isn't it?" said Kennedy, glancing out of the window. "We are traveling over the bones of a dead world. It must be appalling to you after the park-and-garden beauty of England."

"Not at all! It makes me feel all the more glad to be alive. I find it has given me a ravenous appetite for my breakfast."

For a time they found it difficult to carry on conversation, owing to the noise of the train. Now it would go roaring over some bridge beneath which a tortured stream hissed among the rocks as it writhed on its snakelike course. Again the wheels of the cars would set up a deafening shriek as the train wriggled and scraped around sharp curves between towering walls of granite. The dishes rattled on the table and the food was hard to come by. Margaret Pearson laughed with delight. When for the fourth time she lifted her fork with the same square of melon on it, she declared laughingly:

"I should like to get this bit of cantaloupe into my mouth. I know it's delicious."

"Well, I'm going to treat this slice as it deserves," he said—"take it in my hands and devour it. Why not follow suit? You don't mind getting your ears wet, do you?"

"No. Thank you for the suggestion and for the noble example."

Presently she was gazing at him over the top of her slice of melon with eyes at once appealing and reproachful. He burst into loud laughter. She lowered her hands and joined him in the laughter till the tears came into her eyes.

While the meal was in progress the blue expanse of Lake Superior flashed into view.

"What a magnificent sheet of water!" she said. "Look at that stretch of sand beach and those glorious colored rocks! I can scarcely believe that the water isn't salt. Seems to me I can smell the brine."

Later on, as the train crossed the Nipigon, Kennedy said:

"I had ten days' fishing in that river a couple of years ago, along with a party of Toronto friends. We took a cook and an Indian guide with us and had great sport."

"It makes me tingle all over to imagine it," she answered. "Do you shoot?"

"Not much, thus far: only small stuff found on the prairies. I've not been in the bush for big game yet. That's one of the thrills I'm looking forward to."

They sat without speaking for some time, looking out of the window. After a while she remarked:

"You Canadians ought to be great men. I suppose you are. You get a big go at life."

He smiled as he replied:

"We ought to have some 'pep' in us, as well as a bit of initiative. The stimuli are all here. It's a country where men can earn a living and live a life."

"I'm glad to hear you say that. It's painful to think of the crowds of people who can only do one of those things, and more painful still to think of other crowds who can do neither of them. I've met heaps of people who could earn a living but didn't know how to live: didn't grasp the meaning of life; and I've met as many more who were shut out from real life because they couldn't earn a living. Between the two they create our great social problems. Mr. Kennedy, I hope Canada will be able to help England to solve some of them. You have room for millions of people here."

"Yes, but I imagine we're getting nearly all that want to come. England keeps a strong grip, you know, even upon her poorest people."

"True. She has bewitched them. They'd rather have half a loaf, a bit of cheese, and a sup of beer in Shoreditch than own a farm in Saskatchewan. It will take a long time to give them better ideas of life and it will involve a lot of work."

"You're evidently interested in social reform," he said. "Have you made a study of it?"

"To some extent. I have had three years of social settlement work in East London."

Kennedy was amazed, and something of his amazement showed in his face. It was difficult to imagine this refined, young woman spending her time and strength amid scenes of filth and wretchedness. It seemed to him that she could better grace a salon than improve a slum.

"Did you enjoy it?" he asked.

"In many ways, yes; it was good for me. It put me in touch with reality. I think it kept me from growing selfish. Certainly it opened my eyes. A good many of my earlier theories got badly smashed when they bumped up against the hard facts of every-day life in East London."

"Do the labor organizations give much encouragement to social settlement work?"

"No, not a great deal. They're mostly concerned about wages and hours of work; very little concerned about how the men spend their wages or what they do with their time when they're out of work. They haven't got to the real core of the poverty problem yet. They're not facing it. They think it's a purely economic problem and fail to see that it's a moral one as well. Strange to say, they are opposed to emigration. They resent the idea of having people driven out of England, as they choose to put it."

"Doesn't it seem to you, Miss Pearson, that this constant friction between capital and labor is bad for all concerned?"

"It's something more than friction," she replied. "It's grim, deadly, wasteful war.

But how can it be stopped? Things are just whirling round in a vicious circle. Work is needed to create capital and capital is needed to provide work. One would think that these two should be friends.

"You're not an extremist, I'm glad to see."

"No, but I think I'm something of a radical," she replied, smilingly. Presently she said:

"I wish I had two lives and could live them both at the same time! I believe I could pack them both full!"

"I'm sure you could," he replied.

Council on the Churches and World Peace

Significant Conference and Findings

By Frederick L. Fagley

THERE has just been held in Washington a conference of church representatives interested in the churches' attitude toward war. The conference was composed of delegates from thirty denominations. The Methodists had a delegation of twenty-five, including three bishops. The Episcopal Church had a delegation of fourteen, including five bishops. There was a group of five Catholic clergy present headed by Father Ryan. These last were not official delegates but were present in their individual capacity. The Congregational Churches were represented by delegates appointed by the Commission on International Relations. This delegation included Dr. Charles E. Burton, Dr. Clarence Wilson, Dr. W. W. Peet, Dr. Frederick Lynch, Dr. Marna Poulson, Mrs. Ernest Youtz, Rev. Walter A. Morgan, Mr. Hugh Thrift, Dr. B. F. Winchester, and F. L. Fagley.

In addition to the delegations from the denominations there were groups representing the Federal Council, the Church Peace Union, and other agencies interested in peace propaganda.

What It Was All About

In the whole discussion of war there has been a great deal of hazy thinking and much futile talk. There is little clearness in the deals of the people and many do not understand what the churches are trying to do. Many questions arise in the minds of people when they read the pronouncements of the churches concerning war. Do all denominations think as does the Congregational group about war? Are they the same in their attitude toward peace? Are the churches essentially pacifistic and are churchmen pacifists? If another war should come, what would be the attitude of the churches again? Would they take the attitude they did in 1917 and 1918, or would they refuse to have part in war? What is a defensive war? And above and beyond all this, what is there in the teachings of Jesus which apply to the war question, and what is the consistent and logical position for a conscientious Christian to take?

The purpose of the conference was (1) to study what are the Christian ideals and attitude with regard to war and peace; (2) to study what the churches ought to do; (3) to plan a nation-wide campaign of education. It should be said that this plan of education would be to carry to the churches and to the members of the churches the results of the study of the two points above.

The way in which the conference proceeded about its business was extremely interesting. The entire group, some 250, met the first morning and after a devotional service and an outline by Bishop McDowell, the temporary chairman of the conference, the conference separated into two sections and later into three sections, where there was general discussion on matters referred to these various groups.

At the beginning of each session, the entire company would assemble, and selected spokesmen from the various groups would report how far the discussion had progressed in this group or that and then the council would attempt to formulate the common judgment of those present. After giving themselves to this general discussion, they would again separate and discussions on particular items would be begun again in groups.

There was deep interest in the discussions from beginning to end. Perhaps the attitude of the delegates might be well summed up in the words of one of the Congregational delegates, Dr. Wilson, when he said, "For the first time in my life I am attending a convention where I do not feel that I can be absent a minute. I feel that I want to be present every minute of the session." The confirmed convention goer will realize that this is quite a tribute to the interest that had been aroused by discussions from the floor.

There were no set addresses save at the opening session and at the closing session; but for eight periods this group of earnest men and women met and discussed definite problems. There was never a moment when the proceedings lagged, and usually when one speaker had used his five minutes, there would be from four to eight others on their feet at once to continue the discussion.

Call of the Conference

This conference was unique in the manner in which it was called. The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, meeting in Springfield in May, 1924, issued a call to the churches that they might unite to put an end to the menace of war. This call was received by the other churches with marked interest, and other denominations passed similar resolutions.

The Federal Council's Commission on International Justice and Goodwill and the Church Peace Union had before them these documents, and together, under the leadership of Dr. Gulick, a committee on arrangements was formed for this city conference.

The committee worked independently from any of the denominational or Federal Council's Commission, though it was represented by members of these various bodies.

It was therefore in a peculiar sense a conference officially called by the churches. The Federal Council's Commission did not officially call the meeting nor direct it, yet the members of the Federal Council gave a good account of themselves in the discussions that were had, and the members of the conference from all the denominations came away with a new sense of confidence in the leadership of this interdenominational body, the Federal Council, and increased appreciation of the fine spirit and effective management of the body which the various denominations had created for mutual conference and action.

The Way the Conference Worked

One of the most interesting topics before the conference was this, Does an individual citizen have the right after a declaration of war to reject the judgment of his government and refuse to participate in war? Or in other words, is it right for one to decide that although he has made every possible effort to persuade his country to adopt those courses of action which would have avoided the coming of war, now that war nevertheless has come, is it his Christian and patriotic duty to refuse to participate in any way whatever? This, of course, was the question of the "conscientious objector." Is the conscientious objector evidencing the highest Christian virtue, or has he failed to take into consideration some questions vital both to his own Christian thinking as well as to the welfare of the country?

After these questions had been discussed for some little time, Dr. Alva Taylor proposed this for vote: "That the church guard the right of the individual to follow his conscience in time of war, if he felt war was wrong." This was debated pro and con for some time, and finally it came to vote and the vote was 41 to 43 against.

Then Rev. Kirby Page presented this proposal: "That the church should guard the right and assert the duty of the individual whether he will or will not participate in war." This also was discussed, and when the vote was taken, there were 64 affirmative votes when 70 were needed for a two-thirds vote majority which was necessary.

When this failed, then Dr. Frank Mason North presented this proposal: "That the church should recognize the right and the duty of each individual to follow the guidance of his own conscience as to whether or not he shall participate in war."

The final session was given to the "findings." Among the statements adopted were the following:

From the Message to the Churches

War is the most colossal calamity and scourge of modern life. War is not inevitable. It is the supreme enemy of mankind. Its futility is beyond question. Its continuance is the suicide of civilization. We are determined to outlaw the whole war system.

Economics and industry, social welfare and progressive civilization, morality and religion, all demand a new international order in which righteousness and justice between nations shall prevail and in which nation shall fear nation no longer, and prepare for war no more. For the attainment of this high ideal the life of the nations must be controlled by the spirit of mutual goodwill made effective through appropriate agencies. War must be outlawed and declared a crime by international agreement. The war spirit and war feelings must be banished and war preparations abandoned. Permanent peace based on equal justice and fair dealing for all alike, both great and small, must be achieved. The Kingdom of God in the relations of nations must be established.

The teachings and spirit of Jesus clearly shows that the effective force for the safeguarding of human rights, the harmonizing of differences, and the overcoming of evil is the spirit of goodwill.

The Church the body of Christ all inclusive and transcending race and national divisions, should henceforth oppose war, as a method of settling disputes between nations and groups as contrary to the spirit and principles of Jesus Christ, and should declare that it will not as a Church sanction war.

The Church should not only labor for the coming of the Kingdom of God in the hearts of men but give itself to constructive policies and measures for world justice and peace. It should fearlessly declare its distinctive message of goodwill. It should proclaim this message regardless of fluctuating opinion and political exigencies.

The Church should teach patriotic support of the State, but should never become the agent of the Government in any activity alien to the spirit of Christ. The Church should look to the responsible statesmen of a Christian country to conduct the public business along those lines of justice and reason which will not lead to war.

The Church should recognize the right and the duty of each individual to follow the guidance of his own conscience as to whether or not he shall participate in war.

POLICIES AND PROGRAMS

1. The fundamental forces in upbuilding a Christian world order are those concrete activities which by their very nature create as well as express goodwill between nations and races. Let the churches, therefore, be zealous in works of international benevolences, be friendly to the strangers in our land, and support home and foreign missionary enterprises and institutions.

2. The churches in all lands should rise above the spirit and policies of narrow nationalism, and to this end they should strengthen the bonds of friendship and mutual acquaintance through common activities and conferences such as that recently held at Stockholm on Life and Work.

3. In the achievement of world justice and peace the United States and other nations will have to reconsider those policies and practices that tend to create international illwill, suspicion and fear. In the enactment of legislation dealing with even domestic matters that have international consequences, each nation should practice the principle of the Golden Rule. In this connection we have especially in mind such difficult questions as

(1) Monopolistic control of raw materials essential to modern industry and economic welfare
(2) Regulation of immigration
(3) Race discriminatory legislation
(4) Investments in backward countries
(5) Economic and social oppression of minority racial groups within a nation

4. In harmony with the spirit of the Washington Conference on Limitation of Armament and in keeping with the declaration of President Coolidge that "peace and security are more likely to result from fair and honorable dealings . . . than by any attempt at competition in squadrons and battalions," the United States should actually co-operate with the other nations in still further reduction of armaments.

5. Plans for military expansion and increased expenditures in the Pacific are needless in themselves, because of agreements already made. They are provocative of suspicion and misunderstanding on the part of other nations, and are contradictory to the affirmation of President Coolidge that "our country has definitely relinquished the old standards of dealing with other countries by terror and force and is definitely committed to the new standard of dealing with them through friendship and understanding."

6. We rejoice in the policy of our Government, adopted by the Washington Conference on Limitation of Armament, for co-operating with China in seeking the early abolition of "extraterritoriality," the adoption of "equal treaties" and the recovery of tariff autonomy. We urge the maintenance by our people and Government of such attitudes toward and treatment of China and the Chinese and of all Asiatics as are required by the principles of good neighborliness and the Golden Rule.

7. The maintenance of justice and goodwill between the peoples of the Orient and the Occident is essential to the peace of the Pacific and of the world. We of the United States, therefore, need to scrutinize with seriousness and with care those acts and laws, both local and national, that are straining these relations, with a view to such modifications as will conserve the essential rights, the self-respect and the honor of both of these great branches of the one human family.

8. We believe that the United States should examine its historic policy known as the Monroe Doctrine, and seek in co-operation with other American peoples such a restatement of this policy as will make it a ground of goodwill between the United States and Latin America.

9. We rejoice in the condemnation of the militaristic spirit by the President in his Omaha address and record our opposition to all efforts to use the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, the Citizens' Military Training Camps, and the Mobilization or Defense Test Day exercises as means of fostering the spirit of war among our citizens and especially among our youth. We approve all suitable efforts to improve the physical well-being of students in our schools and colleges, both boys and girls, but we emphatically disapprove of compulsory military training. We urge careful review of the effect of military training in all its phases.

The Church deplores and regards as unnecessary the proposed organization of industry under the Government in preparation for possible war. Such organization is opposed to the declaration of President Coolidge that we should demobilize intellectually as well as in the military sense. It would inevitably tend to promote the war spirit in commerce and among industrial workers.

10. Our Government, together with all the other great civilized nations, should share in common agreements and in common undertakings and activitites in the establishment and maintenance of the institutions essential for world justice, for the peaceful settlement of all disputes, for mutual protection of peace-loving and law abiding nations from wanton attack, and for reduction of armaments by all nations.

In this program the United States has an inescapable responsibility and an essential part. The movement for world peace cannot succeed without active participation by its Government and people. We therefore recommend to the people of our land the following concret measures:

(1) Immediate entry of the United State into the Permanent Court of Internation Justice, with the Harding-Hughes-Coolidg reservations.
(2) Declaration by the United States that will accept the affirmative jurisdiction of th World Court and will submit to it ever threatening dispute which the Court is cou petent to settle.
(3) Full co-operation of our Government wit other nations in securing the negotiatio and ratification of an international treat outlawing war as a crime under the law c nations.
(4) Adoption by the United States of th policy of complete co-operation with all th humanitarian and other commissions an committees of the League of Nations f which commissions and committees it ma be invited.
(5) Entry of the United States into the Leagu of Nations with the reservation that th United States will have no responsibility moral or otherwise, for participating in th economic or military discipline of any na tion, unless such participation shall hav been authorized by the Congress of th United States.

Stenography in Our Forefathers' Day

By W. H. Morse, M.D.

HENRY WOLCOTT of Windsor, in the colony of Connecticut, went to church and in short-hand took notes of the sermons that he heard, sermons not alone those of his pastor, Rev. John Warham, and the assistant, Rev. Ephraim Huit, but, as well, those of the Hartford pastor, Rev. Thomas Hooker, and his associate, Rev. Samuel Stone. One of his notebooks, containing the reports of these sermons, to which he listened from April 19, 1638, to April 9, 1641, is preserved by the Connecticut Historical Society. It is a little book, measuring about four by five inches, and having 190 leaves. The system of short-hand is much like that of Willis, and the date, text, and general outline of every sermon are fully given. On the fly-leaf the writer states that he was born January 31, 1610. Closely following, he transcribes the titles of two old English tracts:

"God's holy mind touching matters moral, which He uttered in the words of the Ten Commandments," and "God's holy mind touching prayer, delivered in that most holy prayer which He taught His disciples."

If the term is allowable, the most noteworthy of Mr. Hooker's sermons, which are here reported, were the so-called "election sermons," delivered in May, 1638, and April, 1639. In addition to these there are noted seven others by the same divine, of which number six are from the same text, Acts 2: 7. In all, the number of sermons notated was one hundred and twenty-nine, and these were preached from only twenty-three texts. The number of Mr. Warham's discourses was seventy-five, and of these, twenty-four were from Psalm 92: 5, 7, 8; nineteen from First Corinthians 11: 11; fourteen from Matthew 22: 37, 38; and four from Matthew 22: 5, 7, 8. Of the forty-five preached by Mr. Huit, twenty-one were from Second Timothy 2: 19, 20; five each from Jeremiah 8: 4 and James 2: 4; and four from First Corinthians 10: 12. So it seems that the preachers averaged about six sermons to a text, holding with Paul that every text was "profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction." No matter what the text was, it was made to unfold a full and undiluted system of doctrines in divinity, and in almost limitless variety. No two sermons from a single text were at all alike, and when the number mounted up to nineteen, and even to twenty-one and twenty-four, similarity never intruded.

One of the eight sermons preached by Mr Hooker, which was the only one that had t do with the text, may be taken, in Mr. Wol cott's outline as principal among the one hun dred and twenty-nine. It is one of the tw "election sermons."

The text was Deuteronomy 1: 13, "Take yo wise men, and understanding, and known among your tribes, and I will make them rulers ove you."

Doctrine: (1) Choice of public magistrates belongs to the people by God's allowance. (2) Power of election must not be exercised according to human humors, but according to God's will and law. (3) Those who have power to appoint officers and magistrates, may set their bounds and limit their power.

Reasons: (1) Because the foundation of authority is laid in the free consent of the people. (2) Because by a free choice the hearts of the people will be more inclined to love and obey their magistrates. (3) Because of the duty and engagement of the people.

Uses: The lesson is threefold. (1) We should appreciate God's faithfulness to us in permitting these measures which he vouchsafes and commands. (2) Reproof: In that it dashes the conceits of those of opposing minds. (3) Exhortation: In that it persuades us that he has given us liberty to make use of it. And lastly: It is for us to seek God's guidance in choosing men for and in his work.

Christmas

By Caleb W. Lawrence

The ancient world with all its art had failed
And death was welcomed as despair's release;
But Jesus came, and soon his power prevailed
To lead mankind towards hope and love and peace:
A little babe, he came to Bethlehem
And clearly showed to men the Father's face;
The cross he hallowed at Jerusalem
And bought salvation for the human race:
His Spirit, like the radiating waves,
Has coursed the centuries to every clime
And brought the wondrous message, "Jesus saves"—
That gift of God, unspeakably sublime!
If God neglected not his Son to give
Shall not we give ourselves and nobly live?

Military Training in Schools and Colleges

[EDITORS' NOTE.—The following is the FOREWORD to a pamphlet on "Military Training in Schools and Colleges in the U. S.: The Facts and an Interpretation," by Winthrop D. Lane, and constitutes the report of the Committee on Militarism in Education, to which reference is made editorially in this issue. Mr. Lane's pamphlet may be secured from the Committee on Military Training, 287 Bible House, Astor Place, New York, at the nominal price of 10c. each, or $5.00 per hundred. It seems important that the names of those who have signed this statement should accompany it. It is explained, however, that the signers to the foreword have acted only in an individual capacity.]

Mr. Lane's account of the extent of military training in the United States will, we think, come as a surprise to many Americans. His conclusions are so well founded on facts that they do not need recommendation from anyone. They carry their own weight to the thoughtful reader.

But facts like these call for some action. Even those who, having read this pamphlet, still believe in the R. O. T. C. will surely want to be on their guard against its becoming a means of militarizing America. It would be a tragedy if at the very moment when such ancient enemies as France and Germany are outlawing war between each other, the military spirit should assert itself in the United States.

Our schools ought to be the best defense against this. There, certainly, we should have a positive education for peace. Such education is wholly inconsistent (1) with military training in the high schools, and (2) with compulsory military training in the colleges.

At the very least, military training should be rigidly excluded from the high schools. It does not provide the best form of physical training, it does not teach constructive citizenship; if successful it tends to impart aggressive, even chauvinistic, notions by its effect upon immature minds at their formative period. When such training is made compulsory in high schools it is an indirect approach to that universal military training and service which in peace time public opinion in America has overwhelmingly rejected.

The same argument applies to compulsory military training in the colleges when imposed by college faculties. A country which has refused to accept compulsory training and service for all its citizens cannot consistently permit young men ambitious for an education to be forced into accepting military training as part of the price for that education.

So much ought to be clear to every man who has respect for the spirit of American institutions and hope for American leadership in world peace. The removal of military training from high schools, and of its compulsory feature from the colleges, is a minimum program for dealing with the R. O. T. C. But a further conclusion is forced upon us. We are convinced that it is alien to the best interests of our universities and to the highest ideals of learning that the War Department should be given so much power, and military training so much place as it now has, in our college world. The atmosphere of military training is not the atmosphere for the finest, the most thoughtful work along any line requiring independent thinking. Higher education ought to exist for the encouragement of independent thinking. Science, art, and culture are not and cannot be purely national. All learning is witness to the truth that "above all nations is humanity." Colleges and universities, therefore, are peculiarly inappropriate fields for military training and for the intrusive presence of a military bureaucracy. We Americans would have said this of any country in the world. There is no virtue of our own which makes us immune to a militarism which has played so fatal a role in Europe.

In recommending this pamphlet, therefore, we urge not merely thoughtful consideration of its statements but action to secure to American youth such educational influences as will make unequivocally for peace.

The Congregationalist's Bible Class

In place of the review of the Quarter's lessons we devote the space this week to reviews of several recent books on the Bible and Bible study.

THE SPEAKER'S BIBLE, edited by the late JAMES HASTINGS, D.D.

THE BOOKS OF DEUTERONOMY, JOSHUA, JUDGES, AND RUTH (Speaker's Bible Office, Aberdeen, Scotland. $4.00). A fourth volume in the series in which volumes on Hebrews and Luke (2 vols.) have already appeared. The name of the late Dr. Hastings attached to any volume as editor is worth more in commending it than any formal review notice. One questions, however, whether even so great an editor as Dr. Hastings was not given at times to doing too much for the minister in the way of compilation and leaving him too little to dig for himself. Here, at any rate, is a great compilation of interpretation and exposition upon the books discussed.

MOUNTAIN PEAKS IN THE LIFE OF OUR LORD, by WILLIAM BANCROFT HILL (Revell. $1.50). Dr. Hill has formerly written a Life of Christ with the critical student in mind; in this volume he has written for the average reader interpreting the significance and meaning of mountain experiences in the life of Our Lord. The volume is illustraetd from photographs taken nearly forty years ago.

THE WOMEN OF THE BIBLE, by ISABELLA REID BUCHANAN (Appleton. $1.25). This book contains a short description of each of the women who appear in the narratives of the Old and New Testament. The stories are vividly and humanly told, and the book will be a great aid to church school teachers and other Bible students. It is a book of reference rather than one to be read straight through.

THE LOCAL COLOR OF THE BIBLE, by CHARLES W. BUDDEN and EDWARD HASTINGS, Vol. III, Matthew-Revelation (Scribners. $3.00). This completing volume in the series of articles by the authors, on the backgrounds of Biblical narrative covers the entire field of the New Testament. It is just what it professes to be—a book full of the local color of the New Testament, explaining simply and effectively the environment, incident, and details of life in Palestine as they arise in connection with the reading of the New Testament. It is much more colorful than the average Bible dictionary, and the preacher will find it very helpful in the task of making vivid for his people the New Testament story and teaching.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE INFALLIBLE BOOK, by CHARLES GORE (Doran. $1.00). In this little volume, a writing of prime importance, Dr. Gore, sometime Bishop of Oxford, best known as "Canon Gore," has prepared at the request of the Student Christian Movement an admirable book on the right understanding of the Bible. He champions the necessity of sane Biblical criticism, and shows that inspiration does not necessarily involve infallibility or inerrancy in matters of historical detail. His plea is for reverent freedom in the study and use of the Scriptures. Professor Mackintosh, of New College, Edinbugh, contributes a section on The Reformers' View of Scripture.

Rev. William G. Puddefoot

Rev. William G. Puddefoot, the famed and beloved spokesman for Congregational home missions for many years, died on Tuesday, Dec. 8, at his home in Brighton, Mass., after a long illness. He was born in Westerham, Kent, England, May 31, 1842. In his youth his parents, with their children, came to Canada, settling in the Province of Ontario. After a few years in secular work, Mr. Puddefoot was drawn into the service of the church, and Superintendent Warren of Michigan drafted him for a difficult home missionary field in northern Michigan, where he was ordained to the ministry in 1880. Service as a general missionary in that area followed, then the long and brilliant service among the churches across the country in behalf of the home missionary cause, a service which brought him to Massachusetts for his home. For seven years in the midst of this work he served as the superintendent of home missionary work in Indiana.

His generous friendships, his keen appreciation of all that was good everywhere, his love of beauty, will be remembered gratefully by all who knew him.

Mrs. Puddefoot, his devoted comrade for more than fifty-nine years, and their three daughters survive him. The funeral was held in the Brighton Congregational Church on Thursday, Dec. 10, Rev. S. Whitman Anthony, the pastor, and Dr. Emrich and Secretary Walker of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society taking part in the service. The burial was in Framingham.

Mary's Baby

By Leah M. Leach

Now the manger's wondrous story is again to children told;
How the great Star led the Wise Men past the watching shepherds' fold, Bringing gifts to Mary's Baby, myrrh and frankincense and gold.

All the deep Judean midnight, tranced with angel wings astir, Brooded o'er the low-lit stable where the Child and Mother were,
In the straw by Mary's Baby, gold and frankincense and myrrh.

Myriad heavenly voices chanting thrilled the air with joy intense, Mystery Divine! Excelling! Weary Earth's great Recompense.
Son of God—yet Mary's Baby! Gold and myrrh and frankincense.

THE HOLIDAY BOOKSHELF

More Books for Young Folks

ROSES OF ST. ELIZABETH, by JANE SCOTT WOODRUFF (Page. $1.75). A pleasant story, partly historical, partly imaginative, centering around the castle of the Wartburg, where Luther was once confined. Interwoven with the legend of the saint and the castle, and the description of the toy-making country-folk is a wholesome lesson for young readers.

BARBARA WINTHROP AT BOARDING SCHOOL, by HELEN K. BROUGHALL (Page). A story of Southern California boarding-school life, in which the author has used the backgrounds of her own experience at Bishop's School at La Jolla. The book is in the Barbara Winthrop series, the first and title volume of which Miss Broughall wrote when she was sixteen.

A YANKEE GIRL AT GETTYSBURG, by ALICE TURNER CURTIS (Penn). The adventures of Kathleen Webb, a little Northern girl living near Gettysburg at the time of the great battle and when President Lincoln delivered his Gettysburg address. Just the proper sort of book to weave romance and history into stimulating realism for a child.

ON THE WARPATH, by JAMES WILLARD SCHULTZ (Houghton Mifflin. $1.00). A lively book for boys in the Riverside Library for Boys and Girls which is composed of a selected list of copyright stories, printed from the original plates, and republished in attractive but cheap editions. There are enough Indians to the square inch in Mr. Schultz's story to satisfy the most exacting youngster.

RED EAGLE ISLAND, by KENNETH PAYSON KEMPTON (Century. $1.75). Plenty of sea and plot in this story of a sixteen-year-old boy, who, thrust out of home by his stepfather, ships on the Peep-o'-Dawn. Adventures while fishing, racing with a rival craft, and the defeating of treachery, among other things, provide a swift-moving tale.

RED PLUME, by EDWARD HUNTINGTON WILLIAMS (Harper. $1.75). A story of pioneer children out West and of what happened to Dick Webster after he was taken captive by a Blackfoot chief. "Red Plume" became skilled in hunting, fishing, and trapping, but his affection for some of the Indians did not prevent his escaping when the chance came to get back among white people again.

THE JUNGLE PIRATES, by LEO E. MILLER (Scribners. $2.00). The "jungle pirates" are engaged in the cruel slaughter of egrets for the sake of their plumes. In this story two boys, who appeared as the discoverers of an Inca city in a former book, The Hidden People, enlist in the suppression of this traffic in egrets. Their adventures upon South American rivers are interwoven with much interesting knowledge of natural history.

SILENT SCOT: FRONTIER SCOUT, by CONSTANCE LINDSAY SKINNER (Macmillan. $1.75). Mostly true stories of scouting on the Tennessee border against the British and the Indians in the War of Independence. A few of the adventures have been related in the Boy Scouts' magazine.

TRAIL'S END, by BETH B. GILCHRIST (Century. $1.75). A story which boys may read, but which girls especially will enjoy, of the experiences of fourteen girls in a winter vacation camp in Vermont. Winter sports and friendships provide materials for a wholesome out-of-doors book.

SECKATARY HAWKINS IN CUBA, by ROBERT F. SCHULKERS (Appleton. $1.75). The genial fat boy who appears in this story, who goes with his friend Link, the "Skinny Guy," to hunt treasure in Cuba, has some mysterious experiences, and the treasure they do find turns out to be of an unexpected and surprising sort.

BELOVED ACRES, by JOHN H. HAMLIN (Century. $1.75). A story for young people in their teens, about a California ranch and a young girl's brave conquest of its management when her mother, a widow, seems forced to abandon it.

MIDSHIPMEN ALL, by FITZHUGH GREEN (Appleton. $1.75). This is the story of a summer's cruise, aboard a man-of-war, of a group of midshipmen, fresh from the Naval Academy at Annapolis. Their adventures are thrilling enough to suit even a twelve-year-old boy. The importance of self-control, initiative, and resourcefulness as elements in success are clearly brought out.

FRIENDS AND RIVALS, by ARTHUR STANWOOD PIER (Houghton Mifflin. $1.75). Sydney Desmond's way of overcoming his own physical limitations and of winning Jack Northrop over from enmity to warm friendship makes a story of real merit. The ideals of honor, friendliness, and fair play will not fail to impress the boy reader.

A PRAIRIE ROSE, by BERTHA E. BUSH (Little, Brown. $2.00). This addition to the well-known Beacon Hill Bookshelf is the story of a plucky girl of fifteen and her older brother, Bob, who go in a prairie schooner from Wisconsin to Iowa. It is a wholesome story of pioneer hardships and triumphs, with some humor and much romance.

SINGING FEATHERS, by THEODORE A. HARPER (Penn Co. $2.00). A sequel to The Mushroom Boy, in which the hero of that former book has some interesting adventures along the seacoast.

THE GOLDEN TABLE, by RALPH D. PAINE (Penn). Mr. Paine gets a lot of the lure of the sea into his stories, and this of three Yale students whose historical studies put them on the track of a wrecked galleon and lost treasure. They find adventure on the modern Main almost as exciting as those that marked the days of Kidd and Morgan.

THE SWORD OF THE HOUSE OF DE MARILLAC, by THOMAS A. H. MAWHINNEY (Penn). One expects from the title a book of French setting, and this is a story of seventeenth century France, of galley ships, ships of the line, battles, adventures, and ultimate attainment.

REBECCA OF SUNNYBROOK FARM, by KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN (Houghton Mifflin. $2.00). A new edition in The Riverside Bookshelf of one of the best known juvenile stories, first published in 1903.

SPANISH DOLLARS, by REGINALD WRIGHT KAUFFMAN (Penn Co. $2.50). Mrs. Reginald Wright Kauffman has been a frequent contributor of religious poetry to the columns of The Congregationalist. Her husband is a writer of stirring tales, and in this story presents more lively experiences from the memoirs of Nicholas Rowntree, who figured in a former story, The Ranger of the Susquehannock. The present story relates to the American colonists' expedition against Louisburg, Cape Breton, in 1745.

THE STORY OF THE JOHNS, by GRACE HUMPHREYS (Penn Co. $2.00). Of course the Johns ought to have their story told as well as the Marys and the Elizabeths whom former volumes have honored. Others, we suspect, besides the Johns will be interested in this retelling in fiction of the story of the lives of famous men whose name was John. King John, John Bunyan, John the Baptist, and others are all in the story.

CAUCASIAN FOLK-TALES, selected and translated from the originals, by ADOLPH DIRR (Dutton. $2.00). This volume re-translated into English by Lucy Menzies, presents a great deal of hitherto unknown folk-lore material. Professor Dirr, an eminent philologist, traveled for ten years through the region of the Caucasus, collecting these fairy tales, heroic sagas, fables, etc., in his journeys among the sixty different peoples settled there. Many of the stories go back to Greek and Persian sources. A book full of interesting and surprising things, with the atmosphere of enchantment that one expects from the borderlands of Europe and Asia.

MORE OLD RHYMES WITH NEW TUNES, composed by RICHARD RUNCIMAN TERRY, illustrated by GABRIEL PIPPET (Longmans. $1.40). Sixteen of the old favorites, from "Little Polly Flinders," to "Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John," are found here with new musical setting. In cover, text, and illustration a very inviting book for little folks.

THE BUILDERS OF AMERICA, by EDWIN WILDMAN (Page. $2.00). Uniform with The Founders of America, the present volume deals with sixteen outstanding builders of our national life, institutions, and prosperity. Madison, Clay, Munroe, John Quincy Adams, and other pre-eminent leaders, are discussed as well as men less famous who made distinctive contributions to the building of America, such as Nicholas Biddle, "who stabilized our financial system," Cornelius Vanderbilt, "the father of American transportation," etc. A good and instructive volume in a useful series.

CHATTERBOX FOR 1926 (Page. $1.75). This has become one of the recognized "hardy annuals" among juvenile books. The present volume maintains well the standard of former years.

ANNE THORNTON, by LOTTA ROWE ANTHONY (Penn). This is the fourth and last of the books in the Woodcraft League series. The book is based upon the fourth law of Woodcraft, the Lamp of Love and its three rays,—be kind, be helpful, be joyful. A wholesome story for girls of nine to fourteen.

POLLYANNA'S JEWELS, by HARRIET LUMMIS SMITH (L. C. Page. $2.00). In the fourth Glad Book, Pollyanna, now the mother of three children—her jewels—appears again to the host of admiring and enthusiastic friends she has made her own. They will like her more than ever.

OUR LITTLE UKRAINIAN COUSIN, by CLARA V. and ANNA WINLOW (L. C. Page. $1.00). This is one of a series of very interesting as well as informative books known as The Little Cousins Series. Through the medium of a story the customs, history, and folk-lore of that little known republic of Ukraine, which during the World War declared its independence from Russia, are presented in a way that will appeal to children.

THE JOURNAL OF THE BABY (Penn. $5.00). A beautiful book, attractively bound and fittingly illustrated, which offers in its many pages a recording place for everything in baby's history, even to space for "favorite names" before his, or her, arrival. Quite the most complete thing of the kind that we have seen, and sure to be alluring to fond young parents.

THE CHILDREN OF DICKENS, by SAMUEL MCCHORD CROTHERS (Scribners. $2.50). A most attractive volume in the series of Illustrated Classics for Young Readers. One knows what to expect in such a book from the pen of Dr. Crothers, and the ten full-page color illustrations by Jessie Willcox Smith aid the text in giving the real flavor of Dickens. Dr. Crothers has written a book that will not become a substitute for Dickens, but that will give to young readers a desire to know the master more fully.

For children from 7 to 12 the Penn Co. (Philadelphia) offers several interesting stories. For boys, A PATRIOT LAD OF OLD SALEM, by Russell Gordon Carter, tells the story of three boys living in Salem in the time of the Revolution, who put to sea in a small boat, hoping to see John Paul Jones' Ranger. After some strange adventures the boys are actually picked up by the Ranger and accompany the famous captain to France. JOHN AND THE WINNERS' CLUB, by Joseph Chase, is a story of baseball. For girls, MARY, by Nelia Gardner White, ought to be a good book, for it is dedicated to "All Parsonage Boys and Girls Everywhere." It is the story of a family that moves to a new town, and of Mary's part in settling the family affairs in their new environment. LOUIE MAUDE AND THE CARAVAN, by Helen Sherman Griffith, is the story of a girl whose love for travel found satisfaction in a summer's trip, in which many amusing and entertaining things happened. For both boys and girls of these ages Amy Le Feuvre's story, THE LITTLE DISCOVERERS, looks pretty interesting. The tours of discovery seem safe enough, but Grace Norcross' illustrations have imparted to them an atmosphere of mystery and wonder.

Other books in series for girls of from 10 to 15 are THE LITTLE COCKALORUM FINDS ROMANCE, by Wallis Simkins, the fourth of the series of Little Cockalorum books, and JEANNE'S HAPPY YEAR, by Alice Ross Colver, the third of the Jeanne books. For girls of from 12 to 17 HILDA OF THE GREEN SMOCK, by Pemberton Ginther, the third of the Hilda books, tells the story of Hilda's experiences in a summer school of outdoor painting.

More Holiday Books

THE ADVENTURE OF WRANGEL ISLAND, by VILHJALMUR STEFANSSON (Macmillan. $6.00). This book of adventure, an accurate history which has been described as having "the flavor of a Conrad novel," is more than merely an alluring book of adventure. It brings the story of Arctic discovery and exploration into the realm of struggle for possession. Air navigation, as Stefansson points out, has changed the whole situation and has given a value to the Arctic islands not only as way stations, but for their intrinsic value in minerals, fishing, etc., that they have not formerly possessed. He tells the story of the expedition of 1921, based on the diaries of three of the party. Mr. Stefansson says: "The main purpose of this expedition was to continue the occupation of Wrangel Island, on behalf of the British Empire, against the time when commercial developments (transatlantic flying, reindeer ranching, etc.) should make it valuable. It was British by discovery, American by first exploration. We decided to colonize it to prevent some third nation from making it legally theirs by occupying it ahead of us." It was to discover how this party fared that Harold Noice was sent to Wrangel Island in the Donaldson in August, 1923. The Donaldson returned to Nome and reported that three of the party had been lost on the ice in an attempt to cross to Siberia, and that Knight, the fourth, had died on the Island, leaving Ada, the Eskimo woman, as the sole survivor. The book deals fully with controversies that arose regarding Noice's version of the facts. A chapter is devoted to Noice's signed explanation and apology concerning his misstatements.

TOURING THROUGH FRANCE, by ELIZABETH SHACKLETON (Penn Co. $4.00). A charming gift book, neatly boxed and finely illustrated, with some 400 pages of intimate portrayal of travel in France, and of life and incident in that land of color, variety, and interest.

HOWARD PYLE: A CHRONICLE, by CHARLES D. ABBOTT (Harper. $5.00). An unusual and very appropriate biography in which the life-story of a famous illustrator, beautifully told, is enriched by many illustrations from his own works. The introduction by N. C. Wyeth is a tribute from a pupil to his master. The frontispiece, The Mermaid, painted by Mr. Pyle in 1910, and now in the possession of his widow, is reproduced for the first time. Few of the season's holiday books are more alluring.

BEACON HILL. ITS ANCIENT PASTURES AND EARLY MANSIONS, by ALLEN CHAMBERLAIN (Houghton Mifflin Co. $4.00). Boston's famous hill, on which the state house stands, and on which many famous people have lived, has had a remarkable history. This is a record of changes of ownership and occupancy of pastures, lots and houses, and the changing roads and streets of the hill. The record runs from early days down to recent ones. Incidentally the reader is introduced to the lives and customs of Bostonians of many years ago. Illustrated.

GARDEN OF SONG, by LYNAS CLYDE SEAL (Christopher Publishing House, Boston. $1.50). Here is a collection of short poems vibrant with the beauty and worth of the everyday experiences of life. They have a charm which will surely please those who love nature, home, and family.

Visitors to Washington may be interested in two pretty booklets by Minnie Kendall-Lowther, which appealed to many who were at the National Council. MOUNT VERNON, ARLINGTON AND WOODLAWN ($.60) is a concise, connected account of these national shrines with many illustrations. MARSHALL HALL AND OTHER POTOMAC POINTS IN STORY AND PICTURE ($.75) is a fitting guide and souvenir for an interesting river trip to a noted Maryland Colonial mansion, and to other points. Its pictures are very striking. (The Author, 2416 12th St., N. E., Washington.)

NEGRO ORATORS AND THEIR ORATIONS, by CARTER G. WOODSON (Associated Publishers. $5.25). Dr. Woodson has collected and classified the more notable speeches by Negroes in America from the early days of this republic down through our history to the present time. Introductory sketches outline the history as related to the Negro and tell who these colored orators quoted were and are. It is an impressive, instructive, and significant exhibit. Moreover, the many speeches given prove the remarkable intellectual ability of the men who spoke and their high attainments as orators. One notes the names of Peter Williams, Frederick Douglass, B. K. Bruce, John R. Lynch, Booker T. Washington, William H. Lewis, Robert R. Moton, Emmett J. Scott, William Pickens, Mordecai W. Johnson, James Weldon Johnson, and the brothers Archibald H. and Francis J. Grimké among others, and many others in addition deserve a place in such a collection were it to be made complete.

GIPSY SMITH: HIS LIFE AND WORK, by HIMSELF (Revell. $2.00). The twenty-third American edition, revised, and up-to-date, of the life-story of a very lovable and winning personality.

To our friend, William Elliot Griffis, we are indebted for two little books of his, published some years ago by the Funk and Wagnalls Co. THE HOUSE WE LIVE IN is a series of talks about the body and the right use of it. It is an unusual, delightful, and highly literary approach to the theme. THE CALL OF JESUS TO JOY, a smaller volume, in a series of six brief chapters, emphasizes the meaning of the expressed purpose of Jesus that his disciples should have his joy "fulfilled in themselves."

Any book mentioned in these columns may be obtained through the Pilgrim Press Book Stores, Boston and Chicago.

Sunday School Lesson Helps

THE LESSON HANDBOOK, 1926, by HENRY H. MEYER (Methodist Book Concern. 35 cents). A convenient vest-pocket commentary on the International Uniform Lessons.

PELOUBET'S SELECT NOTES ON THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS FOR 1926, by AMOS R. WELLS (Wilde). The ever popular volume of Peloubet's Notes, founded by Dr. Francis N. Peloubet, is kept up to its high standard of value to the teacher and Bible student by Professor Wells. This is the fifty-second volume. Preceding the lesson studies are valuable suggestions to teachers, to stimulate interest, discussion, originality, and effectiveness. The lesson helps are abundant and broadly illuminating.

TARBELL'S TEACHERS' GUIDE TO THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSONS, by MARTHA TARBELL (Revell. $1.90). This well-known series of helps now published in the 21st annual volume attains the standard of former years. It is freely illustrated, has good maps, and is helpful for suggestion.

General Fiction

TALES OF INTRIGUE AND REVENGE, by STEPHEN MCKENNA (Little, Brown. $2.50). A collection of 16 short stories by this well-known author. Most of the stories are light, humorous, satirical, others more somber. All are marked by brilliance of style, and a certain felicity in interpreting the social life of those whom the British themselves would call the "better class."

BALCONY STORIES, by GRACE KING (Macmillan. $2.00). A new edition of a collection of New Orleans stories, to which have been added two new tales. The stories are charming, delicate glimpses of life—quite such as might be whispered "in that country where women love to sit and talk together of summer nights, on balconies,—the stars breaking the cool darkness, or the moon making a show of light." They are rich with the beauty and sadness of memories.

PORTRAIT OF A MAN WITH RED HAIR, by HUGH WALPOLE (Doran. $2.00). Mr. Walpole tells us in a dedicatory letter that he has enjoyed writing this book, but that he does not know whether in these days stories are intended to be enjoyed either by the writer of them or by the reader, and that "people speak rather scornfully of a story as 'readable.'" If, as seems to be suggested, the author has set himself the sole task of entertaining his readers, he has succeeded well. This is a story of the astonishing adventures that befell a modest young American in the little town of Treliss, on the Cornish coast. His adventures involve him in a romance with the old-fashioned happy ending. Mr. Walpole's hero is "the American man at his simplest and most idealistic," regarding whom he adds, "than this there is nothing simpler and more idealistic in the whole of modern civilization. The Englishman has too much common sense and too little imagination, the Frenchman is mercenary, the Southern people too sensuous to provide the modern Quixote." There is nothing, however, in this novel that would win for Mr. Walpole that place in modern fiction that The Dark Forest or The Old Ladies merited.

BOOTH AND THE SPIRIT OF LINCOLN, by BERNIE BABCOCK (Lippincott. $2.00). Mrs. Babcock's stories of Lincoln have had much success. Here she exploits the same field, though in a more imaginative and romantic way. Booth, the slayer of Lincoln, is supposed to escape, and the story follows him through strange experiences and reappearances as a "living dead man." Most remarkable of all is the representation of Booth's conversion from a hater to a lover of Lincoln through communion with the spirit of the man whom he had assassinated.

The Appropriation of Christmas

Japan is not, religiously, one of what we call the Christian nations. Yet last year, in Tokyo, for several days, both before and after Christmas, all tickets and transfers used on the trolley cars had printed on them the words with which the angels made their glad announcement on the first Christmas morn:

Glory to God, in the highest,
Peace on earth,
Good will to men.

To the unthinking, whether non-Christian or nominally Christian, those were simply printed words: they made no difference in the thought, the feeling, or the practice of the person who reads them. To the ordinary American, indifferent to religion and disregardful of Christ, they doubtless gave a little shock of surprise and possibly a pleasant suggestion of old days at home. But the eager Christian, confronted with those words in that place, would be sent on his way with a song on his lips and a new access of good will to all the earth, making his heart almost to burst. And the thinking man, of whatever kind, would ask himself: What is the great meaning of these words? What can they be made to mean in my life?

Christmas brings to us only what we choose to appropriate. It may bring thoughts chiefly of weariness and dread. It may stir up a grudge against life because our lot is so hard, and we can do so little for others and can expect so little for ourselves. Or it may mean joy, joy, joy!—the most joyous joy of the whole year; not because of the function it is turned into by the world's way of celebrating it, but because it is the festival of heart's ease. As Jesus showed himself to be, so is God the everlasting Father. We look at the life of Jesus, we read the words of Jesus, and we see in them God's most personal revelation of himself, and we take to ourselves heart's ease.

If you had been in Hyderabad on Christmas morning last year, in India, you would have seen a procession of thousands of Christians from the degraded classes who are shunned by the higher castes as unclean, their hands laden with the gifts of sacrifice, bands and banners, and a stately elephant leading them on, and the marchers singing and shouting as they went. After ten years of self-denying effort they had come at last to the consecration of their church. Before the yet unopened doors they paused, and a leader offered a prayer. The prayer ended, he advanced and unlocked the doors, calling out in ringing tones:

Victory to Jesus! May His Kingdom come!
Hallelujah! Hallelujah! Hallelujah!

And from the great throng came back in response the tones of time-honored Coronation:

All hail the power of Jesus' name!
Let angels prostrate fall;
Bring forth the royal diadem,
And crown him Lord of all!

And when that was ended and the people surged into their church for their first worship there, they sang as they moved forward:

Oh come, all ye faithful, joyful and triumphant,
Oh come ye, oh come ye to Bethlehem;
Come and behold Him, born the king of angels;
Oh come, let us adore Him,
Oh come, let us adore Him,
Oh come, let us adore Him, Christ the Lord.

Then the gifts were handed over the communion-rail,—sheep, fowls, goats, grain, money—sacrifices, but the sacrifices of joy, and tokens of the heart's passion that the whole world should be lifted up to the ideals and spirit of Christ. Those people appropriated much from Christmas.

DISCOVERIES OF GOD

And ye shall seek me and find me, when ye shall search for me with all your heart. —Jer. 29: 13.

Now in this is the excellency of man, that he is made capable of a communion with his Maker, and, because capable of it, is unsatisfied without it: the soul being cut out, so to speak, to that largeness, cannot be filled with less.—Robert Leighton.

He is the eternal wisdom, the eternal truth, the eternal light. What does he give us then? Himself, wholly and completely. He does not cut a piece off for me or give me a little morsel, but the whole fountain of eternal wisdom, not a little brooklet. If then I am thus his and he mine, I have eternal life, righteousness, and all that belongs to him.—Martin Luther.

God only is the creature's home,
Though rough and straight the road;
Yet nothing less can satisfy
The love that longs for God.

How little of that road, my soul!
How little hast thou gone!
Take heart, and let the thought of God
Allure thee further on.

F. W. Faber.

Jesus appeals to our deepest nature; our hearts go out to him instinctively and hail him as their Friend and Lord, and confess how good he is. Turning to him and accepting him is just letting our hearts have their way and allowing our true selves to rise up and live. And this is Conversion. It is the soul approaching and welcoming Jesus.—David Smith.

"Zacchæus sought to see Jesus who he was." There was in him already a certain inquiry and readiness for a blessing. And whilst Zacchæus was seeking Jesus, Jesus was seeking Zacchæus. In several other instances we see how our Lord at first sight understood men, penetrated to their thought, character, aspiration, and at a glance he understood the publican and his spiritual susceptibility. Sincere seekers of salvation may always be assured that the eternal love is yet more ardently seeking them. "Whilst he was yet a long way off his father saw him." The heavenly Father discerns the first rising thought in our heart for good, and promptly meets it with sympathy and grace.—W. L. Watkinson.

After we have seen Jesus we may have an infinity of things to learn concerning the purposes of God, but we have nothing whatever to learn of his nature; we know it; it is like Jesus; it is Jesus.—R. G. Campbell.

O Thou, who art the everlasting reality of things, beyond space and time, and yet within them; thou who transcendest yet pervadest all things, manifest thyself unto us, feeling after thee and seeking thee in the shades of ignorance. Stretch forth thy hand to help us, who cannot without thee come to thee, and reveal thyself unto us who seek nothing beside thee, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

John Scotus Erigena.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

A Priceless Privilege

Comment on the Prayer Meeting Topic for December 27 to January 2

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: Press on! Philippians 3: 7-14.

Light from the Bible Passage

A fine ancestry should be no hindrance to nobler living. It certainly should be no excuse for an ambitionless life. Paul came from a great line, but he refused to let that be a self-satisfying possession. A greater passion possessed him. For him the most priceless privilege was to know Christ better. He was never content with the point he had reached. He was always reaching forward. He was ever making fresh starts. Though he never quite reached it he was always keeping the ideal of a perfect Christian life before him. That spurred him on. He had his eyes on the matchless prize of God's call which comes through Christ.

Leads for the Leader

What is the value of a backward look over the year? What is the right way to think of our failures? of our successes? What is the peril of being satisfied with our attainments? A German writer once said: "Teach yourself to despise ambition; it is one of the meanest of passions." How would you answer that?

Press on—in the practice of prayer. Without prayer we can make no progress. Do we feel ourselves in closer relationship with God? Is prayer a greater factor in getting us through the day?

Press on—in the knowledge of Christ. What new thing about Him have we gained this year? If we cannot recognize any, is it not to our shame? Why not determine this new year to learn more about, say, His courage—the sources of it, the uses He made of it.

Press on—in spiritual achievements. Do we take seriously enough God's call to us to go forward? Do we think enough of his disappointment when we halt or actually drop backward in the pursuit of our Christian ideals?

Thoughts for Members

The bars of life at which we fret,
That seem to prison and control,
Are but the doors of daring, set
Ajar before the soul.

—Henry van Dyke.

"Make the shoes you must walk with today rather than the wings you would fly with tomorrow."

Rise! if the Past detains you,
Her sunshine and storms forget;
No chains so unworthy to hold you
As those of a vain regret;
Sad or bright, she is lifeless ever;
Cast her phantom arms away,
Nor look back, save to learn the lesson
Of a nobler strife today.

—Adelaide A. Proctor.

Pay as little attention to discouragements as possible. Plough ahead as a steamer does, rough or smooth, rain or shine. To carry your cargo and make your port is the point.

—Maltbie Babcock.

A Moment of Prayer

We are ever grateful, O Father, for thy unceasing care over us in the past, but we rejoice even more in that unshakable confidence that thou wilt be with us in the days ahead. In thy wisdom, in thy strength we would press forward that we may win that matchless prize which thou hast set before us. Amen.

WITH THE CHILDREN

The Christmas Detectives

By Rose Brooks

"Uncle Billy! Coming a whole week before Christmas!" Three young Martins gave a joyous war whoop. Mrs. Martin looked as beaming as they sounded.

"It will be lovely—with Father way off in South America on coffee business," she said. "We'll have two Christmases—one with Uncle Billy, another with Father, whenever he gets back."

"Things hum when Uncle Billy comes," said Peter, pelting a snowball at a distant telephone pole with accurate aim. Mother, returning from errands, had met them, returning from school, at the gate.

"Never can guess what he'll do," contributed Betty.

"Can't have more fun than if you stick right at his heels," chuckled Jimsy, reminiscent of former visits.

"School's out the day before he gets here!" said Peter. And Mother, watching her three race for the cellar door, to drag out sleds and skiis, realized with deep content that her vacation problems were solved.

"Today? We're off to town today," said Uncle Billy, at his first breakfast. "All of us? To be sure, if Mother can spare us." Uncle Billy and Mother exchanged understanding smiles. "Only six shopping days before Christmas, and the things I must get! Need you 1ll to help me. Mother doesn't mind if we stuff things wholesale into the cellar when we get back? And may we commandeer the Beverly? Only for summer? Poof! Who minds the cold?"

"Shopping!" exulted Betty, hunting in the vestibule for overshoes.

"Can't be things for us, or he'd be s'prising us," said Peter, hunting his "baa-baa" in the depths of the coat closet.

"Can't be for us, or he wouldn't be taking us along," came the smothered voice of Jimsy, also in the coat closet, in pursuit of his earlap cap.

"I'll see you when I see you," said Mother, smiling at the excited group, finally bundled.

"Not for hours!" said Uncle Billy. "We don't know ourselves just all we'll do, but we'll be happy."

That was it. Uncle Billy was always happy. Whoever was with Uncle Billy was always happy, too. "And yet," mused Mother, watching the bundled figures settle themselves in the brown Beverly, "he never does anything that anybody mightn't do—if he thought of it! A whole day to finish my own Christmas planning!" And Mother sped upstairs as the Beverly sped townward.

"Here's a little notebook apiece, and a pencil apiece—your detective insignia," Uncle Billy had said as they climbed aboard the Beverly. "How use them? Don't know myself yet, but we'll find out. Christmas detectives are what we all are, and of course all good detectives must find their own clues."

"You passed the bridge! This bridge leads to the shopping part," said Peter, as the Beverly sped straight ahead instead of turning right to take the bridge.

"Next bridge for us," said Uncle Billy. "Takes us down to the crowded part—tenements—the next bridge, doesn't it? We have the whole day—let's drive around the crowded part a little while, before we go to the shops."

"We love it," exulted Betty, sniffing adventure.

"And we can't ever go, 'less there's a grown-up," said Jimsy. "And you see more things."

"Course you do. That's why we're bound there," and over the next bridge whizzed the Beverly, straight for the narrow, crooked, hilly streets.

Uncle Billy, about to turn left, put his foot on the brake and came to a sudden stop, at the unlifted hand of a uniformed Scout.

"Would you mind," said the boy, fingers at hat brim in courteous salute, "would you mind driving up the next street back, instead of this? This hill's the best coast in town, and the kids have to slide somewhere." His tone suggested an abyss of years between himself and "the kids," flying past on sleds.

"Here's where we get off," said Uncle Billy delightedly, backing the Beverly and parking it well out of the way. "Come on, detectives!" he whispered joyously. "No luck like having your clue run to meet you, instead of hunting for it!"

Speechless, but confident of adventure, the three Martins followed close at his heels, and found themselves at a standstill before the Scout on guard over the coast.

"Your own idea?" asked Uncle Billy as companionably as though he were an old friend. "Your own idea, giving the kids a chance to coast in safety?"

"We take turns, all the Scouts in my troop," said the boy simply. "Hi! You! Jack! Keep your runners in the ruts!"

"Different hours?"

"Different hours, and three different hills. Hi! You! Sally! Give him back his cap! Might as well make your 'good turn' give the kids their fun. Their mothers had a fit before—wouldn't let half of 'em coast before. Now they know we'll look out for 'em."

"Every day?"

"Just from three to five, school days. Mornings, couple of hours, now it's vacation. We can help each other out on our newspaper jobs, so we don't lose money by it."

"I see. Just to give the kids their fun."

"Well, we like to coast ourselves. Hi! You! Johnny! Next time, you let Tommy come down with you, or you'll go home! Tommy hasn't a sled," he explained to Uncle Billy, as though man to man. "Most of the kids share, but sometimes they're mean."

"Of course lots of them haven't sleds," mused Uncle Billy. "Do you know their names—some of them?"

"Know whose names? I know everybody 'round here. My troop all live in these five streets," with a sweep of his hand. "Go with you? Now?"

Then, after Uncle Billy's astounding plan was clear, "You wait! Just run these kids a minute will you? And I'll phone Bob. He'll come."

That's how it happened that Uncle Billy had four at his heels, instead of three, when he walked into the biggest toy shop in town, the fourth being John Murray, Scout, of Troop 8.

"Sleds I'll send to Scout headquarters?" asked Uncle Billy, conferring with his capable aide. "You and the troop distribute them as you think best, only be sure a name goes with each. But not from anybody. What's the fun of getting a present if it isn't addressed to you? Wish I could send five times as many," he mourned, as he gave the order for twenty sleds. "Now we'll all go over in this corner, and you give us the names of about fifty children, boys and girls both, who mightn't have much for Christmas."

The three Martin detectives scribbled names and addresses fast and furiously in their notebooks.

"Gertie Perkins—she's six—and she wants a doll. Heard her talking 'bout it on the coast. Says she never had one. That makes fifty, doesn't it?"

"Fifty," Uncle Billy checked up. "You know more names, if we wanted them?"

"Course I know more," John smiled, and added shyly, "but I never knew anybody wanting any names, like this, before."

An orgy of shopping, John often passing judgment, when the others were in doubt.

"All these we'll pile in the Beverly," said Uncle Billy, viewing complacently the mountain of assembled dolls, fire engines, books, caps, mittens, games, woolen stockings,—goodness knows what. "We want the fun of wrapping and addressing them at home. Mustn't forget paper and string, enough for a shop. Christmas eve, suppose we drive 'em all over to your headquarters? You said you and your troop wouldn't mind distributing them?"

"Mind?"

"It's all your fault! And your troop's!" accused Uncle Billy, jovially. "Here we drive to town, vacant-minded, and first thing we see is a young scout on his self-imposed job, and my detectives—Mercy! Where are those three?"

Deep in a whispered conference were the three. "Something brewing," Uncle Billy nodded in their direction, just as Betty turned and beckoned him.

"Uncle Billy," she stood on tiptoe to whisper in his ear, "Peter has two dollars, and so has Jimsy, and so have I. We were going to buy Christmas presents for each other, and Mother, and you, but John said he knew more names, even after all your fifty"—

"Think Mother'd mind if we gave the kids things, 'stead of her?" from Peter anxiously.

"We'd have to leave you out, too," said Jimsy.

"John!" summoned Uncle Billy. "We want a whole dozen more names!"

"Oh, Mums, did you ever have such fun?" said Peter, two evenings before Christmas, passing his wrapped bundle to Mother to tie.

"I feel the way I used to think Santa Claus did!" chuckled Jimsy, struggling to fold neat ends.

"Did you ever do this before?" Betty suddenly accused Uncle Billy.

As embarrassed as a boy caught in mischief was Uncle Billy. "Oh, well, when you're all alone," he began, lamely.

"But you're most always never in the same place two Christmases!" gasped Jimsy, astonishment freeing him from all bonds of grammar.

"Oh well, doesn't matter, does it, where you are?" Uncle Billy was as inarticulate as Jimsy.

"How do you find out?" Mother asked, eyes shining at this spirit of Christmas made manifest, though all unconsciously to Uncle Billy himself.

"Oh, well, easy enough. Didn't have any trouble finding a clue this time, did we?" He turned to the three children for support. "Clue just fell into our hands before we even began to look."

"I think," said Mother, "that clue knew what it was about when it made its choice of hands to fall into!"

"And nobody knows, any place you are, who gives 'em things!" Jimsy again made himself clear in his own way.

"Suppose you didn't have any money," said Peter, the practical.

"What difference does that make?" Uncle Billy answered both questions at once. "That Scout didn't need any money, did he? Making a Christmas present to every youngster in his neighborhood, wasn't he? Just standing guard? He's the boy to give us clues"—

"I repeat," interrupted Mother, happily, "that clue made a wise choice of hands."

"Anyway," Betty summed up their Christmas joy,—"anyway, we all know now how to be Christmas detectives, don't we?"

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

The Aroostook Larger Parish in Action

By Secretary Frank Lincoln Moore

Aroostook, Maine, is famous as the great potato country. It is also becoming well known through the workings of the Larger Parish, which is, simply stated, the effective working out of a common program for four organized churches and several preaching points.

A visit to this part of Maine in summer well repays the effort. There is the drive over good roads up the long way from Bangor. There is Mt. Katahdin, impressive in the purple haze, lifting its shoulders out of the black surrounding forests, and there is Mt. Chase, splendid as seen from Patten. Then come the Big Woods for 30 miles. At last settlements again begin to appear, and Aroostook County is reached, in many respects an interesting combination of the old and the new. From these settlements hunters take the big plunge into the wilderness, where are to be found deer in plenty, and game birds, and fish in lake and stream.

Field Day

Let us briefly view the parish in action. Early in August came Field Day. By nine o'clock in the morning the people began to assemble on the shores of Portage Lake. They came in all kinds of machines, Fords outnumbering the rest. Some drove as far as 35 and 40 miles, returning home at night in time for the chores. As soon as the people arrived, not waiting for the entire crowd to assemble, sports began. These were under the direction of Malcolm Boyd Dana—"Bud," as everyone calls him. There was a canoe race on the lake and swimming contests which drew a big crowd to the shore. There were games for the little children in a big field, baseball for the older boys, while fathers and mothers enjoyed the well-earned rest from the summer work in the shade of a fine grove of trees.

"Bean 'ole Beans"

Then came the noonday meal. Coffee was served by the gallon. Provisions were brought in baskets, being supplemented by "bean 'ole beans," several huge kettles of which were on hand, piping hot. These "bean 'ole beans" are a specialty in northern Maine, said to be a left-over method from the old lumbering days. Beans cooked in this way are apparently prepared in the usual manner, but instead of being baked in the oven are sunk in a heated hole in the ground, covered up with hot coals and ashes and left for twenty-four hours. Taken out piping hot, and served to the hungry crowd, no better beans were ever known.

Then followed the program—music by young people from the various churches, and short speeches, cheers led by two little eight-year-old boys who had the time of their lives. Then a word from the senior pastor, Rev. Wilbur I. Bull, whose decade in Aroostook County has meant more to the religious life of that region than he knows. "Bud" Dana was called for, the people greeting him with prolonged cheers. A notable work he has done during his year's stay. He modestly says he has accomplished little. He has only discovered talent and released energy! The day would not have been complete without a word from Dr. Charles Harbutt, who in this expanding work is seeing the logical outcome of his efforts in days gone by. Nearly a quarter of a century ago he was present at the organization of the Portage Church and has been from the first an enthusiastic believer in and supporter of the recent plans. Dr. A. E. Holt, of Chicago Seminary, was also present and gave an encouraging word. He thought it worth while to drive 300 miles and back just to see this attempt to solve the problem of the rural field. This was the third and largest Field Day yet held since the churches came together in the Larger Parish, 400 or more people being present.

The Four Fields Visited

When the parish is fully manned, there is a pastor with headquarters at Ashland, who has general oversight of the preaching and distinctly spiritual aspects of the work, a director of religious education, and a director of social activities and sports. Sunday services are divided, each pastor preaching in two or more places a Sunday. A cabinet, meeting usually on Monday for reports and the laying out of the work for the week, keeps matters well in hand, gives an opportunity for checking up on the weak spots in the work, and makes possible the carrying forward of a unified program. On Sunday I was privileged to visit all four of the organized churches. The Ford Missionary Car took us from place to place. There was the morning service in Ashland, at the center of the parish, a hurried drive to Oxbow, "at the end of the road," an appointment later in the afternoon at Mesardis, with the evening service at Portage.

While some of the communities were rather reluctant to enter upon the experiment of the Larger Parish, they now are all fully agreed that the plan is worth while. The gains are many, not the least being the enlarging of horizons, and the extension of the neighborhood spirit to include the common interests of the various communities united by the plan.

The last view of the parish in action was far up Fish River, where the pastor and his helpers plunged into the wilderness with a troop of Boy Scouts for a ten days' camp. Ever since, years ago, I read James Russell Lowell's Moosehead Journal, I have wanted to see the Maine woods and lakes, and here we were, a hundred miles or more beyond Moosehead, in one of the wild regions still to be found in Maine. We had steamed across Portage Lake and had wound our way up the stream. Several of us rode on the upper deck of the little boat where we could watch the ducks, cranes, kingfishers, and other birds as they flew, startled, from the water or from the trees along the shore. Behind us trailed the flat-bottomed scow loaded with a team of horses, a saddle horse, and the troop of Boy Scouts with their camp luggage. At the head of navigation we unloaded the lively party and reluctantly turned back toward the lake and the little town.

Cleveland Churches and Pastors

Cleveland Congregationalism is approaching the end of the most prosperous year in its history, and our 39 churches are entering upon the every member canvass this month with high hope. Some canvasses already made indicate substantial increase in giving.

A large delegation from our city attended the National Council and returned with new courage and self-respect. A leading business man who has never before attended a Congregational meeting of any sort, but who accompanied his wife on this occasion, expressed himself as amazed at the business-like way in which we do our work. Upon our return from the Council we found a few of the constituency at home disturbed over the sensational headlines in the daily press regarding the resolutions of the Social Service Commission. It was heralded in big type that the National Council had declared in favor of the Single Tax, and the Closed Shop. The exact text of the resolutions as published in The Congregationalist allayed conservative fears lest the denomination had gone "Red." The full reports of the Council by The Congregationalist have been widely read and greatly appreciated.

The action of the Council as to the merger of the missionary societies was favorably received and our State Conference trustees and the two women's organizations have authorized committees to study jointly the local and state situation and report a suitable plan of merger of all our organizations for missionary promotion in Ohio. In that connection it may be thought best to re-arrange the boundaries of our local associations, which are of varying size and inconveniently put together.

Several of our Cleveland churches have during the year acquired increased facilities and

A Christmas Gift

An answer to the annual holiday gift problem

Each year, as Christmas approaches, the question of suitable and appropriate gifts comes to mind. We wish to make gifts that carry with them the spirit of the holiday, of thoughtful selection and of use and enjoyment to the recipient. The usual Christmas present seldom combines all these things, and therefore fails in its mission. Many are the gifts that please us for the moment and then are carefully put away and forgotten. Thus the entire purpose is lost and the thoughtfulness of the giver is wasted. The custom of giving Christmas presents was not intended as such, but rather an expression of the highest ideals and love for Him whose birthday we celebrate.

We suggest a year's subscription to The Congregationalist as a splendid solution of your problems. To the person receiving your Christmas gift will come fifty-two times during the year this magazine filled with messages that are at the same time interesting, instructive and inspiring. It contains able editorials, news reports, good stories, poetry, methods of Christian service and helps in personal religion. It portrays what Congregationalists are doing together, stories of the missionaries at home and abroad and the latest news of the schools and colleges.

It is a thoughtful gift for mother or father, an absent brother or sister, or to some one who through ill health is denied the joys of church attendance.

Our Special Price for Christmas Gifts

For the holidays we will make a special price of $2.75. Three subscriptions for $8.00. On the attached coupon write the names and addresses of those to whom you wish this remembrance sent, mailing it to our Boston address. The names will immediately be entered on our list and a suitable gift card either be sent them direct or to you for presentation.

quipment. East Cleveland, whose pastor, Dr. . G. Hindley, is the minister moderator of our nion, has added, at a cost of $38,000, a fine ddition for Sunday school and social purposes. t should be mentioned here that the plan just dopted by the Council of appointing a lay and co-ordinate clergy Moderator has prevailed ere for many years. Grace Church, once supposed to be near extinction, has under the eadership of Rev. David Howie taken on new ife and added a substantial brick addition for Sunday school and recreational activities costng $25,000, taken care of without outside aid. A new commodious chapel costing $9,000 has een erected and dedicated Nov. 29 to house he Brooklyn Heights Sunday school, where a hurch, under the leadership of Mr. Kirk Dewey, is soon to be organized.

The East View Church, on Kinsman Road, as moved from E. 140th to East 156th St., elling its property at a great profit, and upon ts new lot will erect a convenient and adequate difice next summer. North Church refuses to lie; it has sold its parsonage to pay for improvements and an accumulated debt, and, hough badly located, will test its power to be seful for another two years. Trinity Church, aught in the drift of Nordic population away rom its vicinity, has sold its property for $67,000, and will locate in Cleveland Heights, where Superior Boulevard reaches Lee Road n the extreme east end of the city.

During the summer negotiations were entered upon between the Woodland Ave. Presbyterian Church, a church with a great record, but whose vicinity has now become almost solidly populated by Negroes, and the Kinsman Union Congregational Church, favorably located, but with inadequate equipment. A Plan of Union was drawn up whereby both churches unite in services at Kinsman Union, with a pastor satisfactory to both bodies, combining the total resources and membership. The theory of the plan requires no compromise of polity or doctrine. The united church and its pastor, Rev. E. D. Barry, who has carried on the negotiations with consummate tact, will be members in full standing in both the Presbytery and the Union. Fifty per cent of the membership will be reported to the Year Books of each denomination, and the benevolences will be divided equally between Presbyterians and Congregationalists. The plan was officially approved by both Presbytery and Union without dissent and the marriage has been consummated. In the reception of new members, while both the Presbyterian and Congregational Confessions of Faith are to be held in high esteem, no candidate will be obliged to subscribe to them, but will be accepted upon his confession of faith in Jesus Christ. It is hoped that the plan may suggest the way to further unions between the denominations.

There have been several shifts in the pastorates hereabouts. Rev. C. J. Dole, after a fine piece of work in organizing and nursing Parkwood Church, withdraws from the active ministry in Cleveland at the first of the year. Rev. F. L. Graff, who has put in four most fruitful years at West Park, which is the newest suburb of our city, goes to Berlin Heights. Rev. L. L. Wood, who has tactfully led Baptists and Disciples to co-operate happily with Congregationalists in Chagrin Falls Community Church, accepts the call to our Highland Church to begin work Jan. 1. Mount Zion in its great Temple on E. 55th St., has recently welcomed Rev. R. T. Brown of First Church, Atlanta. Congregations are increasing and the outlook is exceedingly hopeful for this great church among the Northern Negroes. Highland and Nottingham Churches, children of the Congregational Union, expect to become self-supporting at the beginning of the new year.

Our Congregational Union, under the leadership of competent laymen such as W. B. Davis, A. F. Allen, R. C. Craford, Mark Thomson, David B. Ford, worthy son of the founder of the union, D. H. Farnam, and John T. Sheer, has made its real estate and other investments so wisely that a large revenue-producing fund has been accumulating which is enabling it to finance new projects in the suburbs. Thus in a recent real estate transaction property bought for a new church at $70 a foot a year ago is worth $400 a foot now, and a piece of it not needed for the church has been sold at that price. One of our missionary churches derives a revenue of $1,500 a year from the lease of land for a gas station. Another church owns a garage and rents it for a snug sum. The Plymouth Fund, estimated when formed at $30,000, has increased to four times that value by wise real estate investment. The property of the Puritan and Madison Churches, disbanded a few years ago, furnish a fund of several thousand dollars which may be loaned to struggling enterprises at a nominal rate of interest. Rev. G. L. Smith, our genial secretary, has been re-elected for his eighth year. Cleveland Congregationalism is hopeful and healthy. It will celebrate Forefathers' Day at Archwood Church, when two new professors at the Oberlin School of Religion, Dr. W. M. Horton, successor of Finney, Fairchild, and King, in systematic theology, and Dr. F. W. Buckler, successor of Dr. Ian Hannah and himself a witty Englishman, will be the speakers. D. F. B.

Activities at Farmington

The church at Farmington has been under the guidance of its new pastor, Rev. W. R. Hamlin, since early in the fall, and fine progress and enthusiasm has been manifest in all departments of the church and parish work. On Oct. 5, a reception was tendered Mr. Hamlin and his family. The morning services have shown increased attendance, and especial interest has been shown in the evening services, where there have been not only addresses by the pastor, but special programs presented by outside speakers and different church organizations. Rev. Donald Fraser, of Rochester, reported the recent National Council at Washington; Hon. Huntley N. Spalding, chairman of the State Board of Education, reported recent progress in the line of education in the state; members of the Bible class presented a program of discussion of "Crime, Its Causes, Cure, and Prevention," and on one Sunday evening, Mrs. Hamlin's class of young women presented the program. The church has a fine choir, which greatly adds to the interest and benefit of the church services.

He has been a leader among the ministers of the denomination in the state. He is a wide reader and close student, at the same time being interested in many good causes and having active relations with important organizations.

HYMNS for the LIVING AGE

Edited by H. AUGUSTINE SMITH

Director of Fine Arts in Religion, Boston University
Director of Music, Chautauqua, N. Y.

Important features of this book:

All words are between the staffs, making it possible to read and sing with ease.

The reinforced binding protects the book against the hard, if devout usage of over-zealous members of the choir.

The responsive readings, which mark a new epoch in Biblical literature for public worship are in the front pages where they can be used without throwing the book out of balance.

The index, which is so rarely used, is in the back of the book.

The musical settings constitute a rich and varied feast throughout and are fitted to the text with great care.

The music is within the range of the average voice and creates no unwilling sopranos and bassos.

No section of the book is over-populated; there are a number of social service hymns, but not at the expense of hymns of devotion.

The price of HYMNS FOR THE LIVING AGE is $1.75. The introductory rate is $1.35 with transportation additional, from New York or Chicago.

leadership; and from both a numerical and financial standpoint, the church has become an aggressive, wide-awake organization with a deep underlying spiritual development. He cultivated and urged Christian fellowship, which had concrete expression in the union of the churches in a great Communion service.

Before leaving Brattleboro Dr. and Mrs. Woodin were surprised by friends who were the bearers of a valuable present which betokened the love and appreciation in which they are held in the town. Dr. Woodin has become pastor of the church in Old Saybrook, Ct.

Union Service at Taunton

Under the auspices of the Taunton Ministers' Union a union Thanksgiving service was held at Broadway Church, Taunton, Wednesday evening, Nov. 25. This is the second union service of the churches of the city held within the month. The sermon was preached by Rev. M. J. Creeger, Methodist; the call to worship was given by Rev. O. J. Aldrich, Methodist; the invocation was by Rev. H. M. Medary, Episcopalian; the responsive reading by Rev. E. A. Burnham, Congregationalist, and the benediction by Rev. F. B. McAllister, Congregationalist. Rev. E. H. Chandler, also a Congregationalist, gave the pastoral prayer.

Boston Ministers Honor Dr. Emrich

Monday, Nov. 23, was the 50th anniversary of the ordination of Dr. F. E. Emrich, Secretary Emeritus of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society, and at the Boston Ministers' Meeting on that day honor was paid to this "father and friend of us all." Drs. S. H. Woodrow and F. H. Page spoke appropriately of the deep regard and affection in which Dr. Emrich is held. The Finnish churches gave him a testimonial of affection. Dr. Emrich spoke of "How I Feel About the Ministry after Fifty Years." He said he has sought to be a student, a teacher, and a pastor. It has been said of him repeatedly that "he made God beautiful." Dr. Emrich spoke of his education in Bangor and Bates, of his various pastorates and of his secretaryship. He spoke of the books that have been "epoch-making" in his intellectual life. He said, "I have lived long enough to see that the Congregational fellowship is the broadest and most comprehensive fellowship in the United States."

In it Origen and Tertullian could sit down together. In his study of the Bible along the lines of modern criticism he never forgot "the sacramental use of the Bible." "It is easier living today along theological lines. The difficulty today is with the confirmation of the spiritual ethics of Christianity." Dr. Emrich advised as a background for preaching "the certainty and reality of divine retribution for sin." He said he would rather be loved by the common people than to have any other reward. The entire audience paid Dr. Emrich such a tribute of affection as is seldom witnessed in a public meeting.

Installation of Rev. J. J. Lockett

Rev. J. J. Lockett was installed pastor of First Church (Oldtown), North Attleboro, Nov. 20. The council, at 3.30, was called together by Rev. Zenas Crowell, and was composed of the ministers and one delegate from each of the churches of the Taunton Association of Churches and Rev. H. H. Loud of Hopkinton, Mass. The ministers of all the Protestant churches of North Attleboro sat as corresponding members. Rev. J. L. Mitchell was moderator and Rev. E. A. Burnham, scribe. At the evening service the sermon was by Rev. H. H. Loud. Other parts were taken by Rev. F. L. Briggs, Rev. Zenas Crowell, Rev. L. B. Goodrich, Rev. E. E. Craig, Rev. C. L. Holton, Rev. F. B. McAllister, and Rev. G. E. Osgood.

Dr. Guild Installed at New Bedford

A large and representative church council, including the churches of the vicinage and also a number of leading Congregationalists, gathered at Trinitarian Church, New Bedford, Dec. 1, for the installation of Dr. R. B. Guild as pastor. The situation is unusual in that Dr. Guild has been acting pastor of the church for a year past, and his installation marks the determination of the church and his own decision to go on in the constructive work which he has successfully inaugurated. His paper was a fine recital of his religious experience and of his notable career as a pastor and also as one who has been prominently and successfully identified in secretarial work among the churches. The period of questioning was prolonged because it was so happily productive in the illuminating replies of Dr. Guild over a wide range of church activities and pastoral problems. The council was happily united in its decision to install him, and the church was congratulated upon every hand at the promising outlook.

CONNECTICUT

Rededication and Installation at Willimantic

The life of First Church, Willimantic, has recently been quickened by two interesting events. On Sunday, Oct. 18, rededication services were held in the morning and evening to celebrate the remodeling of the church auditorium. Some time earlier a campaign was started to raise funds for this needed work and over $18,000 was raised in a short time. This enabled the alterations to be made at once, and everything was completed by the first of October. The result more than justified the sacrifice and expense. In order to bring the interior more into harmony with the general design of the exterior, it was necessary to introduce a new ceiling, Gothic arches and columns, and a change in the choir gallery and platform at the front. This was done with gratifying effect under the direction of the architect, Arthur Eaton Hill, of Providence. Three Gothic windows, the gift of a family formerly prominent in the church, though now removed from Willimantic, greatly increased the beauty of the church. With these changes the church now has a finely-equipped plant, with a large church house for social activities and an auditorium conforming to the best standards of architecture and providing the suitable atmosphere for worship. The rededication services were made notable by the presence of Dr. C. A. Dinsmore, of New Haven, and Rev. W. S. Beard, of New York, both former pastors of the church and who preached the rededication sermons.

A second event of marked interest was the installation of Rev. A. S. Wheelock as pastor. He has been serving the church for about a year, the installation having been delayed until after the remodeling. This inspiring service took place on Nov. 10. The sermon was preached by Dr. A. D. Leavitt, of Brookline, Mass., pastor of the church from 1904 to 1908. Taking the text, "Ye are the salt of the earth," he challenged the church to give holy flavor to all the relationships of life. Others who participated were Rev. A. H. Wheelock, of Auburn, Mass., father of the pastor-elect, who made the installation prayer; Rev. Boynton Merrill, of Boston, who gave the charge to the minister; and Rev. W. S. Beard, who gave the charge to the church.

Anniversary of Pastor's Coming

The 15th anniversary of the coming of Egg Harbor's present pastor was fittingly observed early in November. Then the church building was only partly completed and the organization was in debt. Now they have a comfortable property, a large lot in the center of the town, on which they have erected a most attractive parsonage. Rev. C. W. Carroll preached the sermon morning and evening and the pastor, Rev. W. J. Richards, conducted the afternoon service.

Goes to First, East Orange

First Church, East Orange, is greatly encouraged over the coming of Rev. E. R. Holden, formerly assistant pastor of Second Church, Waterbury, Ct. Mr. Holden is a graduate of the Yale School of Religion, was ordained at Portsmouth, Va., and comes to the church finely equipped for the large task.

OHIO

Gift of Car to Cincinnati Pastor

On Friday evening, Nov. 20, the trustees of Walnut Hills Church, Cincinnati, held their annual banquet. At the end of the dinner a surprise was thrust upon the pastor, Rev. H. K. Eversull, in the form of a gift from the whole church. It was a bright, new Hudson coach, and it came as a celebration of his first anniversary in the pastorate.

Anniversary of Radnor Church

Bethel Church, Radnor, Rev. J. G. Peters, pastor, celebrated its 105th anniversary, Nov. 22. Among the happy features of the day was the singing of Welsh hymns in Welsh by a choir of the older members of the church, some of whom sang in the choir 50 years ago; also the presentation to the pastor of a beautiful bouquet of pink and white chrysanthemums, a gift from the deacons, the occasion being also Mr. Peters' birthday. Over 150 people partook of the fellowship dinner.

at Sioux Rapids, Nov. 4, 1875. Services in commemoration of this event were held on Sunday, Nov. 1, while the regular midweek church night was in the nature of a jubilee, the pastor, Rev. E. W. Willcox, giving a modern interpretation of the ancient Jewish observance of the Year of Jubilee. Two former pastors, Rev. J. E. Holden of Storm Lake, and Rev. C. E. Wilson of Peterson, shared in this anniversary, the former relating the thrilling story of the establishment of Congregationalism in Northwestern Iowa. Mrs. R. T. Jones, of Fort Dodge, widow of a beloved former pastor who served the church from 1902 to 1908, returned to their former parish and was cordially received. The church night service gave opportunity to every one who had been a member for 25 years, to recount his, or her, experiences. Many old-time friends and members sent greetings. This mid-century milestone is recognized as an Ebenezer in the fruitful history of the church, and from this anniversary pastor and people turn toward the future with renewed courage and consecration for an enlarged service to God and humanity.

Goes to First, Cedar Rapids

After a search of several months for a successor to the late Rev. H. F. Milligan, whose passing occurred last March, First Church, Cedar Rapids, has called Rev. W. A. Lee of Winona, Minn. Mr. Lee began his work at Cedar Rapids, Nov. 1, and the church and pastor are happy in the new relationship. The new leader was born in England, but received his higher education in this country at the University of Wisconsin and Newton Theological Seminary, graduating from the latter institution in 1906. For nine years Mr. Lee served the Baptist Church, first at Ann Arbor, Mich., and then at Worcester, Mass., and in 1915 he began his association with the Congregationalists, serving Central Church, Atlanta, Ga., from 1915-1917. Following this fruitful pastorate, he was engaged in religious work at Camp Gordon; then camp secretary at the Charleston Navy Yard; was supervisor of the War Work Council of the Y. M. C. A. for the state of Georgia, and in 1922 became pastor of First Church, Winona, from where he was called to Cedar Rapids.

Decorah's Steady Progress

Recent months have witnessed a most pleasing transformation in the house of worship at Decorah. The interior has been completely renovated, and the exterior, as well, has taken on a new and attractive appearance. In these improvements of the physical property many willing hands and hearts have shared, including pastor, deacons, and trustees, while the young women of the Fortnightly Club contributed over $1,000 toward this project. Beautiful shrubbery has been added.

The reopening service occurred on the last Sunday in September, when the pastor, Dr. J. P. Burling, preached on "How Jehoash Repaired the Temple." It is the aim of pastor and people to make the ministry of this church richly and deeply spiritual, and all organizations are working with that ideal in view. The church entertained the Northeastern Association early in October, and this meeting made a fine impression on the Decorah people, and on the churches of the association which shared in the gathering. Dr. Burling was a delegate to the National Council and brought back to his church an inspiring report of that historic gathering.

CALIFORNIA

First, Oakland, Dedicates House of Worship

First Church, Oakland, completed dedication services in their new church, practically the whole month of November, from the first to the twenty-sixth, having been set aside for this purpose.

The services opened with a Week of Praise, ushered in by the Sunday school rally day, and the rendering, on Sunday morning, of the oratorio, and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" in the evening. Both Sunday services were led by the pastor, Dr. R. E. Brown, in the morning a service of thanksgiving and in the evening "The Ministry of Music." The Wednesday evening meeting opened the new Social Hall, with a church dinner followed by addresses from Dr. Aurelia Reinhardt, president of Mills College, and Mr. Robert G. Sproul, vice-president of the University of California, and also by a play by the Players' League. At this meeting former assistant pastors were special guests.

The second week of the month was the Week of Dedication. The morning sermon was preached by Dr. F. J. Van Horn, former pastor. The evening service was one of recognition of those who had rendered service in the construction of the new church, with an address, "Christ and Those Who Toil," by Dr. Lynn T. White of the San Francisco Theological Seminary at San Anselmo. Thursday of this week a reception was given to all members and friends of the church, at which time an opportunity was given to inspect the new buildings. This was followed by an organ recital by Mr. Uda Waldrop, municipal organist of San Francisco.

Sunday, Nov. 15, ushered in the Week of Fellowship. In the morning Dr. Brown preached on "Church Loyalty." A service of consecration was held in the afternoon, embodying a communion address by the pastor, the reception of members, and the ordinance of the Lord's Supper. This was followed by a social hour with new members in the Social Hall, and a fellowship gathering in the evening, presided over by Rev. H. S. McCready, pastor of Plymouth Church, Oakland, with greetings from the pastors of several other Oakland churches of various denominations. All Congregational churches of the East Bay were invited to this meeting.

The last week was the Week of Education. At the morning service Rev. R. C. Waddell, assistant pastor and director of religious education, presided and the Sunday school attended in a body. Dr. H. F. Swartz, president of the Pacific School of Religion, gave the morning address. The evening service was de-

HAWAII

Installation of Rev. Philip A. Swartz

The installation of Rev. P. A. Swartz as pastor of Central Union Church, Honolulu, took place on Wednesday evening, Nov. 4. A joint committee of the church and the Hawaiian Evangelical Association arranged for the installation service. The moderator of the Oahu Association, Rev. H. K. Poepoe, presided. The sermon was preached by Rev. P. E. Huyler, pastor of First Foreign Church, Hilo, on "Some Reasons for the Continuing Existence of the Church." Rev. J. P. Erdman, field secretary of the Board of the Hawaiian Evangelical Association, propounded the constitutional questions and offered the prayer of installation. The charge to the pastor was delivered by Rev. Akaiko Akana, and the charge to the people by Rev. N. C. Schenck. A large congregation was present, including representatives of many different churches and national groups who gathered to felicitate the pastor and his congregation upon this auspicious beginning of what Honolulu hopes will be a long, useful, and happy pastorate.

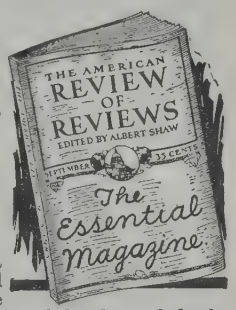
Your Clergyman Will Appreciate This Gift!



WHAT Christmas gift shall you select for the Pastor of your church? What gift will best express your own thoughtfulness and be sure to be deeply appreciated by him?

Nothing is more important for a man in charge of a congregation than a sound, impartial knowledge of the great public questions of the day. Only the Pastor so informed can help to mould the opinions of his hearers.

THE AMERICAN REVIEW OF REVIEWS is the "Great Monthly Newspaper" which presents both sides of important questions in clear, forceful editorials and articles by men who know.

You could make no happier choice of a gift than a year's subscription to this great monthly magazine. Your Pastor will value it for its broad outlook on world affairs and its masterly interpretation of current issues. In addition, there are many articles of particular interest to churchmen. For example, in the December number:

"The Stockholm Conference on Life and Work," by William Adam Brown; "The National Cathedral of the Protestant Episcopal Church; "The Changing Near East," by John W. Mace; "The Way to Disarmament," by Hamilton Holt; "The New Era of Peace in Europe," by Frank H. Simonds.

Edited by Dr. Albert Shaw

Under the distinguished editorship of Dr. Albert Shaw, THE AMERICAN REVIEW OF REVIEWS has assumed a commanding place among contemporary magazines. To quote from a letter written to Dr. Shaw by Charles F. Thwing, LL.D., D.D.:

"The future historian of American and of world life will find no richer material, both of fact and of judgment, than is given in Dr. Shaw's "Progress of the World" of each number. These pages have breadth, yet definiteness of touch. They give interpretations, as well as facts. Your contributors are good and their contributions bear light. But, really, you are the master."

A Remembrance for All the Year

The coupon below will bring the Christmas number Free, followed by twelve issues of REVIEW OF REVIEWS, to any address you designate. Every month throughout the year the recipient of your gift-subscription will thus be reminded of your thoughtfulness. A gift card will be sent to arrive at Christmas.

It is not necessary to send any money now.

The Vote on the Merger

To the Editor of The Congregationalist:

I take exception to your statement in The Congregationalist of Nov. 3 that the Merger was voted with unanimity. As I saw it from the floor of the Council (in Washington) and took part in it, there were one-third to one-fourth in opposition. When Dr. Atkins gallantly moved to make it unanimous, scores remained seated, though none thought it worth while to oppose his motion by rising.

There was one notable word spoken by Dr. Huget which voiced the feeling of many. While the debate was largely devoted to the discussion of legalities he called attention to the "witness" of the societies to some of the great principles of the denomination. The danger lurking in the Merger is this, that there shall be a leveling of loyalties through the operation of one great board of directors, facing all ways at once, simply doing business with the money in hand, but not committed heart and soul to any one of the causes for which the denomination stands.

GEORGE N. EDWARDS.

[When the final vote on the Merger was taken and no opposition was manifested, none could be recorded and the chair followed the accepted rule in declaring it a unanimous vote.—EDITORS.]

Race Superiority

To the Editor of The Congregationalist:

In the Oct. 22d issue of The Congregationalist, under the caption, "Negro Educational Leadership," Irving Maurer, president of Beloit College, has said this about white superiority: "This policy, I admit, is part due to the foolish and mistaken notion of racial superiority which the white race so unconsciously and mischievously entertains."

I wish to ask Mr. Maurer this question: If white superiority is not a fact, how does it happen that the white race has been the banner-bearer of progress and Christian civilization unaided by any other race, whereas the Negro, although he has been upon the earth for a much longer period, has done nothing for himself or for others, unaided by the white race?

Moreover, there never has been a Negro in the United States who has attained prominence in any line of business, trade, occupation, or profession who did not have white blood in his make-up.

I may also add that the only sensible and ultimate solution of the Negro problem must be the segregation of the race into a state by themselves under the United States, giving them all the immunities and privileges as well as franchise equally with the white race, and let the Negro work out his own salvation politically, socially, morally, and intellectually with such aid as the white race can and will give to the Negroes.

Ashby, Mass. NEWELL W. WHITMAN.

[We suggest that our correspondent check up a little more closely on his facts.—EDITORS.]

The Vocabulary of Charity

To the Editor of The Congregationalist:

I have read with much interest your review of The Confessions of a Reformer, especially as I have known and liked Mr. Frederic C. Howe for twenty-five years.

In quoting Mr. Howe's view of the Cleveland Charity Organization Society of nearly thirty years ago, I think it a bit unfortunate that it is not brought out in your review that this applies to the conditions of thirty years ago and not of today. Even then, as you say, there is another side to his critical summary, and I doubt very much whether even then Mr. Howe is quite right in saying that applicants to the society had to show that they were "worthy." More than twenty-five years ago the New York Society adopted a solemn resolution to exclude "worthy" and "unworthy" from its vocabulary. That means plainly enough that for a good many years before that the attitude of mind that finds those words appropriate no longer obtained. I think this was typical of the attitude in similar societies throughout the country.

Certainly today charity organization societies ask first, "What is the trouble that brings this family for advice or material help? How can that trouble be remedied?" If so be the chief trouble is a defect of character, which in old days might have been regarded as unworthiness, it only means that such a family calls for more of the resources of knowledge and helpfulness than one where character was well-nigh perfect and poverty presented the only difficulty to be overcome.

LAWSON PURDY.
Secretary of the Charity Organization Society, New York.

Herbert R. Gibbs

Herbert R. Gibbs passed away on Dec. 16, at his home in Newtonville, Mass., and his funeral was held on Dec. 8 at the Central Congregational Church of which he was a deacon. He was descended from Elder Brewster of Plymouth, and was born in Pittsfield, Mass., Dec. 23, 1850, and was graduated from Williams College (Phi Beta Kappa) in 1871, later pursuing graduate studies leading to the degree of M.A. at Yale. After a year's service as principal of the Lenox High School, Mr. Gibbs was a proofreader of the Riverside Press for a number of years. In 1890 he became an editor and literary adviser of Houghton Mifflin Company, and he continued in that position until his death.

Mr. Gibbs gave constant and devoted service to the church, and was a leader in various departments of Congregational work. For years he was a director of the Publishing Society and the Education Society; as chairman of the committee on The Congregationalist he was a loyal and constructive friend of this journal.

Mr. Gibbs leaves a widow, who was Sarah M. Cabot of Cambridge; a son, Edwin F., of Newton Highlands, and a daughter, Miss Marion B. Gibbs of Newtonville.

Referring to his professional career, an associate wrote as follows to the Boston Transcript:

Mr. Gibbs brought to his work an equipment of accurate scholarship, sound literary judgment, and clear-headed common sense. Hundreds of authors will recall with gratitude his intelligent sympathy with early ambitions, his judicious encouragement of improving workmanship, and in the hour of their success, his wise handling of nice or knotty editorial problems. His associates in business will always remember the steady cheerfulness, serene courage, and gentle humor, which marked him, good days and bad days alike, and made him the most delightful of office companions. Even in the last weeks, saddened by the death of his elder son (Russell), he never faltered in his observance of a maxim in a language he loved to quote:

Aequam memento rebus in arduis servare mentem.

Mr. Gibbs was a rare, sweet spirit, a true Christian gentleman.

A Lifetime of Devoted Service

Such in brief might well be the story of the life of Ada R. Hartshorn, who left us for the higher service on Oct. 24, 1925. All her active life was spent with the interests of the Woman's Board of Missions before her, and never once did she lose her loyalty to that cause. Coming into the work of the Board rooms in Boston as a young woman, in 1882, she remained there steadily until the infirmities of age made her withdrawal necessary. Her duties included receiving and waiting on the constant stream of callers, answering requests for Board publications, and later caring for the circulating library. Her ingenuity in preparing programs was felt not only by her callers from the churches of the constituency, but the more steadily in her home church where she was always a strong influence for all forms of missionary work. The funeral services were conducted at the Eliot Church in Roxbury, Mass., by her former pastor, Dr. B. A. Willmott, whose beautiful tribute to her was an inspiration to the friends who were present.

Her finished labors now speak for themselves, and the reward is hers. "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." K. G. L.

Set not the pulse-beat of your life to any borrowed opinion; be yourself, and let that self be just as good, just as pure and strong as nature and the grace of God can make it.—Canadian Baptist.

Mr. Goodman and the Waldensians

Fred S. Goodman, National Secretary of the American Waldensian Aid Society, is giving instructive and interesting illustrated addresses on his rewarding trip through Southern Italy. The good work of the Waldensians and present conditions in Italy challenge the attention of Protestant Christians in America. Mr. Goodman addressed the Boston Ministers' Meeting on the morning of Nov. 30, and in the afternoon gave an illustrated lecture at a meeting of the Boston Branch of the American Waldensian Aid Society. During his visit to the Waldensian churches of Italy and Sicily Mr. Goodman attended services, including the Sunday schools. He says:

Every meeting was large, even on week nights, when many of the men did not return from work till sundown, sometimes walking miles to their homes at the top of the hills, and coming to the meetings without rest. The little churches or halls were crowded to the doors, sometimes more than a third of the company standing. The majority were men, and in most places more than half were non-Protestants. In forty years of public work I have never seen finer attention, or greater appreciation.

The Bangor Luncheon

By P. W. Pennell

The annual luncheon and business meeting of the Boston Association of the Bangor Seminary Alumni was held at the Boston City Club, Nov. 23. The following officers were unanimously re-elected to serve during the coming year: Rev. J. H. Quint of Chelsea, president; Rev. T. B. Bitler of Somerville, vice-president; Rev. A. W. Stone of Concord, secretary and treasurer.

President Moulton and Professor Cumming of the Old Testament Department were the guests of the occasion and brought to us stirring messages. Dr. Moulton spoke briefly of the work of the seminary and outlined some of its plans for the future. He told us that the calling of Professor Bradshaw of Iowa College to the chair of Systematic Theology filled the last vacancy on the faculty. Modestly leaving himself out of the picture, he paid a high tribute to his colleagues. He failed to mention that much of the credit for bringing to the seminary such a strong group of men was due to his own high vision and untiring efforts.

Professor Cumming, one of the younger members of the faculty, was then introduced. His theme was "The Old Testament in Modern Life." He referred briefly to some of the recent misuses of the Old Testament in theological controversy, and as a basis for military propaganda. He traced the conception of God in the minds of the Israelites from that of merely a tribal deity to the lofty conceptions of the later Isaiah and Amos. Along with the idea of a just and holy God we find a passion for social righteousness. While much of the Old Testament is of purely historical interest the messages of these great prophets are applicable to every age.

Prof. Daniel Evans of Andover Seminary was introduced and responded with a few remarks, referring wittily to ministerial knowledge of the Hebrew language, and paying tribute to the work of the seminary in both past and present.

Few people not in close touch with Bangor realize the sacrifices which its faculty are making in order to carry on the work. Located as Bangor is, nearly eight-hours' ride from the nearest large city, these men have comparatively few opportunities to mingle with other people who are doing the same type of work. In spite of this fact, men of a high type of scholarship, ability, and Christian character are willing to devote their lives to training young men for the ministry. Their devotion stands out in contrast to a tendency which crops out even among ministers to seek places of advantage. They should be accorded the hearty co-operation not only of the alumni of the seminary, but of the denomination at large.

The Pastor Says: A learned treatise on heredity says: "One family—the Jukes—has produced 1,200 people, and the one man to whom this family is traced was a hard drinker." To have such a lot traced solely to one man, while all their multitudes of other ancestors pose as innocent bystanders, is enough to drive him to drink!

Christmasing

By Anne Mathilde Robinson

Busy little snowflakes
Out a-Christmasing,
Up and down the highways,
Into everything.
Kissing pretty faces,
Chasing dainty feet,
Powdering small noses
With a cold conceit.

Fickle little snowflakes,
Shining crystal flowers,
Flinging fragile beauty
On the fleeting hours.
Building pixy snowdrifts
In my hat's close brim,
Poking down my collar
Chilly fingers slim.

Merrily they wrestle
With December winds,
Tossing white confetti
In a swirl that blinds.
Winter's gypsy artists,
Making strangely new Every homey by-way
That they travel through.

RISIBLES

Billy, 6, was exasperated with the almost continuous squalling of his baby brother.

"I bet I know why he came from heaven," Billy mused. "They put him out."

Manager of Dinner Dance Club—No more tables, sir; we're absolutely full up.

Patron—But there's space for another table there.

Manager—Sorry, sir; that's the dance floor. —Pittsburgh Sun.

The woman was rather condescending.

"My husband is very jealous," she remarked to her partner on the dance floor, "so I only dance with exceedingly plain people."

"It's a good system," said he. "I follow it, too."—Stray Stories.

An ancient car chugged painfully up to the gate at the races. The gate-keeper, demanding the usual fee for automobiles, called:

"A dollar for the car."

The owner looked up with a pathetic smile of relief and said:

"Sold."—Bison.

A student brought his mother to the university and was showing her about. The dear old lady was anxious to make her boy think that she understood everything.

"Over there, mother," said the son, "are our wonderful polo fields."

"Ah," sighed the old lady, "What is there that is nicer than fields of waving polo?"—Iowas Frivol.

Nobody loves a good story better than John D. Rockefeller. Here is one he told to his friends on his eighty-sixth birthday:

"Down in Virginia a negro was brought before the Judge for stealing chickens or some similar offense. The judge asked him if he had any children.

"'Yas sir, judge,' replied the negro, 'I'se got a boy.'

"'What's his name,' asked the judge.

"'His name is Weatherstrip, judge.'

"'Weatherstrip? Why where did you ever get that name, Sambo?'

"'Well, judge, it was disaway. Dat boy was born just before de war and he kept me out of de draft.'"—New York Times.

Biography

THE LIFE OF JUDGE GARY The Story of Steel — Ida M. Tarbell

Assuredly no biography of a contemporary American could hold greater possibilities of interest than that of Judge Elbert H. Gary, head of the United States Steel Corporation and leader of present American business. Ida M. Tarbell in writing it shows not only the man, typically American in birth, training, activities, ambitions, conquests, but also the industry which his figure dominates, making the book the Story of Steel as well. Illustrated. $3.50

WIVES — Gamaliel Bradford

Author of "Damaged Souls"

In "Wives" Mr. Bradford gives us seven soul-portraits of American women, the wives of famous and infamous characters in our history. Every one of these women depends for her place in history on her masculine connections, yet all but one of them, says Mr. Bradford, seems to have been at least the equal, if not the superior, of the man who made her famous. Here are Mrs. Benedict Arnold, Theodosia Burr, Mrs. Jefferson Davis, Mrs. Benjamin F. Butler, the delightful Dolly Madison, Mrs. James G. Blaine, and, finally, that puzzling, tragic figure, Mrs. Abraham Lincoln. $3.50

HENRY CABOT LODGE — William Lawrence

Bishop of Massachusetts

His personal and political life, policies in regard to the war, the League of Nations, and the years immediately following the war, are most graphically and sympathetically set forth by Bishop Lawrence, the Senator's lifelong friend. The first few chapters are based on the Senator's own "Early Memoirs," but the remaining chapters are the author's recollections. "This little book is written for the fuller information of his fellow citizens about a son of Massachusetts who served her in the United States Senate for thirty-one years."—From the Preface. $1.75

WILLIAM ROBERTSON NICOLL Life and Letters — T. H. Darlow

Sir William Roberston Nicoll lived a life of unique influence in the English-speaking world. This biography reveals his versatile character as humanist, politician, journalist, editor, publisher, theologian, mystic, Free Churchman.
"This volume reveals not only the brilliant personality and powerful publicist, but also the trusted counsellor of statesmen and the cherished friend of men and women eminent in varied spheres of thought and learning."—Daily Chronicle. $3.50

WHO'S WHO IN THE BIBLE

E. Fletcher Allen

The Bible contains more characters than any other book in the world; Biblical names and allusions abound in the speech of every day as well as in all forms of literature. How often have you found yourself vainly struggling to identify one of these names, to place it in Biblical history, and to associate its bearer with the events in which he participated? This book furnishes you the answers to all such questions; and in every case the biographical sketches are accompanied by references to the original sources of information. For religious teachers and for schools this volume should prove invaluable. It should be equally useful to the general reader. $2.00

Autobiography

CHARLES M. SHELDON His Life Story

An Autobiography by the author of "In His Steps" and the Editor of "The Christian Herald"

With charming simplicity the author recounts the intimate incidents of his early days—the hardships and pleasures in the old Dakota home, the new life which unfolds as he faces school and college, influences which shaped his life decisions, his pastorates, books, travels, and public life. The account will prove a healthful tonic for those who have imagined that the prairie offered no compensations, while those who believe in the inspiration of pioneer life will delight in it. $2.50

Sermons

WEEK DAY SERMONS IN KING'S CHAPEL

Edited with Introduction by Harold F. B. Speight, D.D.

Minister of King's Chapel

These sermons were delivered to week-day congregations from the oldest pulpit in the United States by some of the country's ablest preachers, of various denominations, and by two visitors from Canada and Great Britain. The emphasis throughout is upon a simple gospel adequate to meet universal needs. This volume is a shining example, indeed, of the way that representative leaders of many denominational affiliations, who approach theological questions from different view-points, can and do find and express a real religious unity when they are ministering to the spiritual needs of men and women in the midst of the work and worry of the present day. $1.75

Miscellaneous

THE FAITH OF A WORKER — L. P. Jacks

Author of "The Challenge of Life," "Realities and Shams," "Religious Perplexities"

The two great specters of the worker's life are the monotony which reigns over his work, and death which meets him in the end. Dr. Jacks frankly faces these great realities of life. Then he shows how a faith may be builded which is great enough to triumph and give mastery to the spirit of men. $1.25

FAITH AND SUCCESS — Basil King

Author of "The Conquest of Fear"

The author says: "Success is Faith's objective: the purpose for which it exists. Faith can carry out. It is dynamic. It cannot suffer us to stand still. If we are dissatisfied with Faith it is because we don't know what it is." A book that gives Faith the same vital meaning that the author's "Conquest of Fear" gave to courage, and one that enables you to make use of Faith as the most dynamic force in the world. $2.00

RELIGION and MEDICINE in the CHURCH

Edward S. Cowles, M.D.

"Religion and Medicine in the Church" speaks out in meeting concerning the type of healer who is a throw-back to pre-scientific ages; rakes much that is being done in the name of psycho-analysis fore and aft; condemns those who market Christian Science without a license and with label missing; advocates clinics in every city in which doctor, surgeon, psychiatrist and clergyman would co-operate in treating all out of the ordinary cases. 75 cents

MEN, WOMEN AND COLLEGES

Le Baron R. Briggs

Wise and illuminating studies of college problems by one of the best known of American educators, former dean of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences of Harvard University and President of Radcliffe College, and author of "Girls and Education," "Routine and Ideals," "School, College, and Character," etc. $1.50

THE MINER'S FREEDOM — Carter Goodrich

Assistant Professor of Economics in the University of Michigan

This book attempts to show the effects on the working life of the individual miner of the inevitable extension of machine processes in the mining industry. The individual miner is becoming less and less his own boss, and the coal industry is in the initial stage of an industrial revolution like that which has long since taken place in the factory and machine shop. This menace to The Miner's Freedom seems to be an important element in the present unrest in the coal industry. $2.00

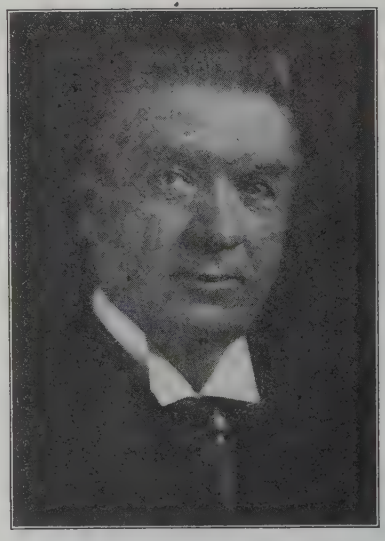
Beginning January 7th



The Autobiography of Dr. George A. Gordon

"My Education and Religion"

ONE of the most notable series of personal reminiscences of recent years has been written by Dr. Gordon, the distinguished minister of the Old South Church in Boston. Beginning with boyhood days in Scotland and the delightful Scotch life of over half a century ago, he gives his own experiences as a youthful worker, as a student who acheived exceptional scholarship, as a seeker after truth in religion and life, as a great preacher and religious leader. The times in which Dr. Gordon has lived and prominent personalities in America and abroad are interpreted and described. The weekly installments of these interesting and important autobiographical sketches will be featured in The Congregationalist through the early months of the coming year, 1926.

The Editorial Outlook

Talking It Over

HOW far should a religious weekly in its editorial comments follow, or avoid, the course of public events, and particularly the things not most important in themselves that happen to be most widely exploited in the daily press? This is a question to which the answer is not always easily determined either in theory or in practice. Limitations of space frequently decide the issue, for only a very limited range of matters can be dealt with, but even in this limited range it is not easy to decide what references should be made and what should be omitted. If the things that are most widely mentioned in newspapers generally are ignored, there is the suggestion that the religious press is not in touch with the world of everyday life. On the other hand, just because these things are so widely exploited elsewhere may be good reason why the religious press should give its space, its interest, and its influence to more important matters that the press in general ignores or deals with lightly.

A Case in Point

HERE, for instance, is this matter of Mellie Dunham and Henry Ford. Detroit's King Henry summons to his court from the wilds of Maine a distinguished fiddler, champion fiddler of his state, and the space immediately given to this incident in the daily press is of such proportions that one might imagine that this was the most important incident in local American affairs. The experiences of "Mellie" and "Gram" in their first long journey, what they thought of Mr. Ford and what Mr. Ford thought of Mellie and his fiddling, if the newspapers at all adequately measure the interest of the public, are matters of very deep importance. There is the suggestion also that whereas fiddling was once the accompaniment of the distruction of a city and the beginning of the downfall of Rome, fiddling may become a corner stone for the building of the new society and the restoration of gentleness and happiness to a jazzy and war-torn world. If the papers report him correctly, Mr. Ford suggests that pleasant old tunes and the social dances that accompanied them may be a means of saving the world from the "billy wow-wows." Just what sort of wow-wows are "billy wow-wows" we do not know, but we wish Mr. Ford success in his self-appointed crusade. But is not the Ford car itself a symptom of a jazzy age and of a populace rattling about from place to place in quest of they know not what? There will have to be a little deeper mission than that of the fiddler, and a somewhat more adequate conception of life if we are really to save the world from its "billy wow-wows." But the sphere of pleasures and social habits and customs is not by any means to be despised. Every little helps, and we are glad to acknowledge it, even if the doings of "Mellie" and Mr. Ford seem to us a bit exaggerated in the columns of our glorious daily contemporaries.

The Larger Issues

THE larger and deeper issues offer more distinctive problems for the religious journalist. One would surely be blind who sought to ignore the moral and spiritual aspects of world affairs. The day has gone by when things can be confined to purely political or social spheres. The issues of our commercial and industrial life cut straight across the path of personal ideals and elemental conceptions, not only of love and brotherhood but of right and wrong. The issues of world peace and international comity, whether they be symbolized in the League of Nations, the World Court, or other practical proposals, are inevitably associated with world conceptions of brotherhood and democracy. In a deeper sense than we sometimes realize it, they constitute the most important and distinctive foreign missionary problems that the church has to face today, and we can no longer shut off the missionary interests of the church into a purely "religious" sphere that has no relationship to political situations and ideals, and even in a sense no relationship to practical politics. We cannot see how any paper can be alive religiously that does not appreciate this responsibility in relation to world happenings and world problems, and yet we do sympathize at times with those good friends who suggest that papers, even like The Congregationalist, might be improved if they had a little more religion. We think we understand what such critics mean. The criticism is not always unjust and it is seldom unkindly. We may say for ourselves that we seek never to forget that beneath all issues and problems are the foundations of spiritual life and what is called the "devotional." But increasingly we must recognize that "devotion" must have an object and direction. Devotion is vague and meaningless, unless it is devotion to something. Christian devotion cannot be dissociated from visions and tasks, and the visions and tasks of redemption are related to the world that is to be redeemed. The interpretation of life from the Christian standpoint and the interpretation of Christianity in relation to the world in which it must have its growth and progress is the dual task of Christian journalism. It is essentially a religious task, even if the themes of which it treats be not always labelled "Christian," or the treatment seem conventionally "devotional."

Race Relations Awards

TO give recognition and stimulus to creative work the Harmon Foundation, on behalf of William E. Harmon, has provided $4,000 annually for awards for distinguished achievement. There are seven first awards of $400 offered annually to Negroes who have made distinguished achievement in various fields of endeavor, and one award to any person, white or colored, for outstanding achievement in race relations. This announcement comes from Dr. George E. Haynes, secretary of the Commission on Race Relations of the Federal Council of Churches, to which has been committed the executive direction of the awards.

Seven awards are open to all Negroes of American residence of both sexes; the eighth award to the person, white or colored, "who has made the greatest contribution toward improving the relations between white and Negro peoples in America." There is also a gold medal for the first award in each of the seven divisions, and a second award of $100 and a bronze medal; the eighth award will carry with it $500 in money and a gold medal.

The classes of awards are to be as follows: literature, music, fine arts, industry including business, science including invention, education, religion, and the award for improvement of race relations between the white and Negro peoples in America. The purpose of the "William E. Harmon Awards for Distinguished Achievement" is "to give recognition and stimulus to creative work." "They are especially designed," the statement continues, "to bring public recognition to persons who have made some worth-while achievement who have not yet received such recognition." Awards are to be made Jan. 1, which is the date Lincoln signed the Emancipation Proclamation, and will apply to work done or completed during the twelve months ending June 1, preceding.

There will be five judges for each award. Three of the five judges will be persons recognized as outstanding in their particular fields. At least one will be a Negro. The two other judges will represent the Harmon Foundation and the Commission on Race Relations of the Federal Council of Churches. The decision of the judges will be final.

Applications and recommendations for next year (1926) may be filed on and after Jan. 1, and must be filed not later than June 1, 1926, with Dr. George E. Haynes at the offices of the Federal Council of Churches, 105 East Twenty-Second Street, New York City. Detailed information will be available from Dr. Haynes.

Another Baptist Editor

WE join in a cordial welcome to the editorial fraternity to Dr. Austen K. de Blois, who has resigned the pastorate of the First Baptist Church in Boston to become co-editor of the Watchman-Examiner. Dr. Curtis Lee Laws, the genial and competent editor for fourteen years, continues in his sanctum, but with a staff enlarged and strengthened by the addition of one of the outstanding ministers and writers of the Northern Baptist churches. Dr. Laws describes Dr. de Blois as "a thoroughgoing conservative," "a man of such culture, wide reading, and large contacts" that he "could never be a reactionary or obscurantist," but "holds to the faith of his father who was an old-fashioned intelligent Baptist. He feels that it is worth while to contend for the faith once for all delivered to the saints." "No change will be made in the things for which the Watchman-Examiner stands," Dr. Laws tells us.

Friendship with Japan

ON the evening of December 15 the Editor was guest at a dinner tendered by the Japan Society of Boston to the Japanese Ambassador, Viscount Tsuneo Matsudaira, and Madame Matsudaira. This gathering of national and international significance deserves comment.

Some hundreds were gathered around the tables in the Copley Plaza Hotel, and the occasion was one of color and brilliance. But more important than this outward setting was its spirit, and the note of good will that was sounded in the addresses, both in those welcoming the Ambassador, expressive of a sympathetic and cordial attitude toward Japan, and in the Ambassador's reply, delivered in excellent English and showing an equally responsive and sympathetic spirit. One felt that if the things symbolized in this gathering could become more adequately expressed in international affairs and relationships we should be brought nearer to the basis of permanent friendship and peace, and also that we should find for every nation a larger life in the richer environment of a world fellowship to which every nation was privileged to contribute its best.

Governor Fuller of Massachusetts made a brief but very sensible address in which he revealed the fact that the firmness that he recently displayed in upholding the ideals of world peace in connection with the Armistice Day celebration in Boston was not a mere accident. He reminded the Ambassador that in democratic America anybody who was dissatisfied with his government or with anything else had merely to hire a hall to air his grievance, and in a playful reference to George W. Coleman's Ford Hall forum, he suggested that it was not always necessary even to hire a hall but that halls would be provided. He emphasized the fact that expressions of racial and national prejudice must not be regarded as indications of the better vision and spirit of America, and he spoke of the gathering there present as typical of what many in this country felt of good will not only to Japan but toward all nations.

The Ambassador's address, which was carefully written, had something of the formality of an official utterance, but back of it there was genial and human quality. His references to Boston's part in the early beginnings of missionary work in Japan, under the auspices of the American Board, if touched with a somewhat subtle and delicate humor, indicated his real perception of the spirit in which these missionaries had gone to his country and an appreciation of the basis of good will that they had sought to establish.

The great address of the evening was by President W. H. P. Faunce of Brown University. President Faunce, who is just recovering from a long and serious illness, had come at considerable sacrifice. In appearance he showed the effects of ill health in contrast with the occasion when we last saw him at the National Council Meeting in Springfield, but the vigor of his utterance was unabated. With deep passion he spoke of the obligations of all true Americans to take a larger view of world relationships. Referring to the rapidity of progress in transportation and intercommunication he suggested the hell to which the nations would descend if getting together physically they stayed apart intellectually and spiritually. He condemned the provincialism of America, and defined as our greatest task the giving to America of a larger horizon through interpreting the best in every land to the best in our own. He thought that where so large a proportion of our national income was being spent for wars past or potential a larger part ought to be devoted to promoting international understanding and good will. Emphasizing the fact that we must create not only the right spirit, but also the mechanism of good will, President Faunce contrasted the spirit that sent two millions of Americans to France to fight with the spirit that feared to send one man to sit in a court. Quoting the words of a great Mohammedan to the effect that the three Cs—caste, color, and creed—had been chiefly instrumental in keeping men apart, President Faunce made a profound appeal for a type of faith and conduct that would rise above prejudice of caste, color, or creed, to the visions and deeds of brotherhood.

Pointing out that the name of the Japanese ambassador signifies, Peace-under-the-Pines, Willis J. Abbott, who presided over the gathering, suggested that it would be fitting if under the pines of New England there might be established new understandings that would help to fulfill for the world the symbolism of such a name. Would that it might be so!

The New Atheism

IT is now more than half a century since Bakunin, the eminent Nihilist, wrote his well-known book, God and the State, published after his death, in which, reversing the well-known saying of Voltaire, If God did not exist, it would be necessary to invent him, he expressed his essential attitude in the words, If God existed, it would be necessary to abolish him.

For one who has been familiar for nearly thirty years with the literature of atheism, agnosticism, and rationalism, there is nothing particularly new or startling in a statement like the following to which an Amherst graduate calls our attention, and which is intended to be descriptive of what its author regards as the progressive and liberalizing movement of modern life:

> God becomes progressively less essential to the running of the universe; and the soul as a separate entity becomes more and more doubtful. As the ghosts of immortality thus recede, this life becomes at once more interesting and more valuable than the life hereafter.

What is new and startling is the setting in which this statement is found. It appears as the very heart and center of a "senior chapel address" delivered at Amherst last May by Professor Frank H. Hankins, and published in the Amherst Graduates' Quarterly of last August. Our reference to the matter is delayed because it is only within the last few weeks that it has been called to our attention.

We have read the entire address with great care and not without considerable interest. The quotation given above is typical of the address as a whole. There is nothing in the address that has not been quite as well said, and in some instances much better said, by atheist and secularist writers again and again during the last half century. As an exposition of the religion of science offering inspiration toward high ideals it is far inferior to Prince Kropotkin's Modern Science and Anarchism, and vastly inferior to the same writer's really noble pamphlet, An Appeal to the Young.

What is strikingly unfamiliar about Professor Hankins' address is its setting, and the fact that it appears with strange inconsistency in a magazine that bears upon its cover a church steeple, and above the steeple the seal of the college on which an open book, presumably the Bible, is most conspicuously displayed. If articles like this by Professor Hankins are to become typical of the Graduates' Quarterly, we suggest in the interests of artistic unity and literary propriety that the steeple and seal might well be omitted. For, if Professor Hankins is right, and the spiritual conception of man and the universe is the great, essential stumbling block in the liberal pursuit of knowledge and in its liberal application, why should the symbols of the spiritual be perpetuated? Let us be liberal at all costs, and let us maintain the liberalism of the college even if we have to accept, somewhat grudgingly of course, the foundations laid by those whose enthusiasm for education was encumbered by so unprogressive and illiberal a thing as Christian faith.

It is, however, precisely at this point of liberalism that we challenge Professor Hankins' contentions. (We must not call them "convictions," for Professor Hankins speaks contemptuously of "those thought-destroying things called by all evangelists 'convictions'"—to have "convictions" isn't quite proper in this world of nondescript and colorless impartiality.) In the guise of liberalism he shows himself to be the most illiberal and narrow partisan. He would not warp his judgment by displaying anything like Christian convictions, yet he does not hesitate in the baldest and most ruthless way, dogmatically and arbitrarily, to dismiss Christian faith and spiritual conceptions from the whole sphere of the quest of the meaning of the world and of life. He sets over against all "spiritistic" conceptions, without distinction, the belief in "the natural order of a mechanistic world" from which man and life are "derived" and of which they constitute an integral part.

Between this mechanistic view of life and the universe and the view of extreme Fundamentalism Professor Hankins can find no stopping place, and his illiberalism appears in the arbitrariness of his contention that no stopping place can be found. "The Fundamentalists are clearly right," he says, "in holding to all of the old faith for fear they may lose all." That is the level of this liberal professor's vision; that is his caliber as a thinker. His words are an insult to Christian thought and scholarship, and to innumerable men in the present generation whose approach to the whole problem of life is as free and untrammeled as his own, but who in their free and untrammeled quest have found a place for faith and a necessity for spiritual foundations where Professor Hankins has found only a mechanistic universe.

It is Professor Hankins' attitude and expression to which we take exception. We are getting altogether too much of this overbearing, arbitrary, intolerant presumption of one-sided scientists and philosophers. The intolerant dogmatisms of science are to be classed with the intolerant assumptions of religious authoritarians. We have constantly deplored the one, and we as heartily condemn the other.

With much that Professor Hankins has said we thoroughly agree. We accept what is, perhaps, the deepest, most basal and most revolutionary thing he says, viz., that "the values of life are not arbitrary and authoritative, but are implicit in the nature of life itself." But that does not by any means imply that these values are not spiritual, or that the spiritual factor of personality can be eliminated from the universe. When one considers that the universe for every man is centered in his own personality, it is amazing that any man should deny even the reasonableness of the assumption that personality is at the center of the universe. It is in reaching out through all that is best in himself that man has felt the need of God and the certainty of a larger spiritual life without which his own spiritual nature seems unexplainable. The significance of Professor Hankins' statement is found not merely in its denial of God, but in its denial of man. In a mechanistic universe there is no essential place for personality either in man or in God. Professor Hankins' logic breaks down when he talks of men being "free." How can man be "free" if he be merely an integral part of a mechanistic world. The conception of freedom is inseparable from that of personality.

Starting with the consciousness of his own personality it will not be surprising if man, with sound logic, continues to find a place for God, the soul and immortality. We commend to students getting an overdose of mechanistic logic, the logic of faith in such a book as that containing Professor Macintosh's Yale lectures upon The Reasonableness of Christianity, recently awarded the Bross prize. The shallowness of much of the new atheism becomes sufficiently apparent when one comes into the range of men like Macintosh who do not speak as experts outside their own field, but as students who have given their particular thought and mastery to the problems that they discuss.

A Great Editor

AMERICA has lost one of its greatest figures in American journalism in the death of Solomon Bulkeley Griffin, who was managing editor of the Springfield Republican for over 40 years. He retired from the Republican in 1919, but he has been busy ever since then in literary work, benevolent service, and in the management of paper mills. Two years ago his excellent book of a lifetime's reminiscences, People and Politics, was published. He had just finished a biography of his friend, the late Senator W. Murray Crane, which will be published in February and the proof sheets with his final corrections upon them were found upon his desk after his death. His heart gave out apparently from overwork.

Mr. Griffin was born in Williamstown, Mass., Aug. 13, 1852. His father was a Congregational minister, Rev. Nathaniel H. Griffin, who was librarian and a professor in Williams College, which Solomon Griffin attended. His two elder brothers (both Congregational ministers) attained distinction, Edward Herrick Griffin as a member of the Williams faculty and later dean of Johns Hopkins, and the late Henry L. Griffin as a professor at Bangor Theological Seminary.

Solomon Griffin began his newspaper career in 1872, under Samuel Bowles the second, who made himself and the Springfield Republican famous. In 1879, following the death of Mr. Bowles in 1878, and in accordance with the latter's plans, his son, Samuel Bowles the third, became editor and publisher, and Mr. Griffin the managing editor. They continued in this relationship until the death of that Mr. Bowles in 1915. The relationship was remarkable. Mr. Bowles directed the business management, and with notable success. In the editorial management Mr. Griffin directed the making of a newspaper of the highest ideals and literary quality. Mr. Bowles and Mr. Griffin developed extraordinary co-operation and team work, their combined efforts and ideals giving the public a newspaper often criticized but always respected and having a powerful, far-reaching influence. The public gave chief credit to Mr. Bowles, but Mr. Griffin was the great editor, and his spirit and his genius made the Republican to a larger degree than those outside its offices can ever know.

Mr. Griffin was a master of his profession. He led his staff in brilliant, courageous, constructive work. He was insistent upon the truth, upon fair and impartial reporting of the facts. Editorially he aimed at discussion which illuminated as fully and fairly as possible the subject treated and led public opinion along lines of democracy, justice, and righteousness. He never dodged a controversial issue nor hesitated to stand for an unpopular cause if he believed it to be right. Editorial policy was free from advertising and outside business or political influence.

Mr. Griffin had a wide acquaintance among public men. He attended many political conventions and his reports of the great national conventions were the work of a master hand and a brain that understood men and the ever-changing stream of government and of political affairs. His first book was a study of Mexico under Diaz.

Mr. Griffin was modest, unselfish, warm hearted, brotherly, and loyal.

He has left a significant expression of his faith in the last paragraph of his book of personal reminiscences, People and Politics. Here it is:

Our time has not brought the Peace foretold by prophets and poets. Still the resort has been to the arbitrament of force and hate. What then? Still must we look forward to the reign of reason and honor among nations, despite all that hampers. Can this foremost democratic nation do other than cherish its Christ-born hope and move in a sensible way toward it with steady purpose, seeking to lay hold on "the promises"? The boundaries of the Eternal Purpose are at no time within man's measurement, but the obligation to cling to faith and carry on the work of human betterment abides with us as it did with the fathers. Like them must we "wait on the Lord," whose coming is to appear in the hearts of men.

The Human Bond

A Contributed Editorial by Harry P. Dewey, D.D.

[EDITORS' NOTE—The following was Dr. Dewey's special editorial contribution to a recent "Good Will Edition" of the Minneapolis "Daily Star." The issue was edited by four Minneapolis ministers: Dr. Dewey, Rabbi Matt, J. M. Reardon (Catholic), and G. K. Stark (Lutheran), with Roy L. Smith (Methodist) as cartoonist. The number both in craftsmanship and in the high ideals which it served reflected great credit both upon its editors and upon the "Daily Star."]

THE supreme question of the day is how to establish a secure international peace, for it seems certain that if another world war occurs, civilization will perish in the maelstrom. Of the numerous influences that incite to hostilities the four most conspicuous are the political, the economic, the racial, and the religious, and the wisdom of the present situation is to make the dreaded catastrophe less possible by recognizing and nurturing the human common denominators of condition and belief. By so doing we can do much to soften the political rivalries, the strife of trade, the racial antipathies, and the religious differences.

Neither meanness nor nobility of character is peculiar to this or that nation. A boorish German sought to break into the line as I approached the ticket window of the Vatican Gallery, and at once I inwardly said, "That's the German of it!" A little later a German youth stooped and picked up an article that had slipped from my hand to the ground, and graciously gave it to me. Self-condemned for my previous sweeping generalization, I inwardly and gladly admitted, "That, too, is the German of it!" Either incident might equally well have been the French, or the English, or the American of it. The finer qualities of manhood are found under all flags, and wherever we see them we straightway forget the possessor's nationality and claim him as a kinsman. As this pleasant fraternal fact is observed and proclaimed, bumptious patriotism will seem woefully selfish and discreditable.

It is increasingly clear that all nations are bound up together in an economic bundle from which none can escape. Greed, over-reaching, unfairness, react upon the offender. In the long run, if one nation is robbed all others are made poorer. Therefore, good sense is declaring that prosperity will be most widely distributed in the earth when the international competitions in trade give way to international co-operation.

Ability and character cannot be classified by the color of the skin. Major Moton, of Tuskegee Institute, was accorded an LL.D. degree by a leading New England college, not because he was black, but because, as the peer in mental strength of leading educators of the country, he had become the successful head of a great school. All hats came off, the other day, in tribute to the Negro porter who risked his life for train-wrecked passengers. He did the kind of heroic human service which all of us would be glad to have credit for doing. The ungrudging appreciation elicited promotes that genuine democracy which scorns all race prejudice.

The intensest religious antagonisms are over non-essentials. Jew, Catholic, and Protestant are heartily one in the most fundamental of all beliefs, the belief in God; and if representatives of the three orders were to meet in Turkey or in Egypt and were there to hear the minaret call to prayer, they could with all consistency enter a mosque and kneel on a rug alongside a Mohammedan believer, and, while thinking his conception of God inferior to their own, silently perform with him the most universal and the greatest of all religious acts. We cannot all believe just alike, and no one should be asked to surrender a belief that he feels to be vital; but no cherished conviction is worth much if it makes the holder narrow and bigoted. It can be a truly valid one only as it moves him to be liberal and tolerant and to be ready and eager to join hands with another who cannot accept it, as he stands with him upon the broader and more essential ground where both feel at home.

The general brotherhood of the nations must begin in the local communities, and, therefore, whatever we can do for tolerance and good will, here and now, in our behavior toward one another will be our most valuable contribution to the future peace of the world.

The High Cost of Spiritual Living

Worship, Faith, Hope, Prayer—Their True Values

By Harry S. McCready
Pastor of Plymouth Church, Oakland, California

"The things wherein there is no breath are bought for a most high price."—Baruch 6: 25.

Old "High Cost of Living" has long reigned in the realm of things. We do not need to be reminded that it costs to keep these bodies of ours alive and efficient.

In the realm of spiritual realities, it has been supposed that all things are free.

At the devil's booth are all things sold,
Each ounce of dross costs its ounce of gold;
For a cap and bells our lives we pay,
Bubbles we buy with a whole soul's tasking:
'Tis heaven alone that is given away,
'Tis only God may be had for the asking.

But this is far from being true. Salvation to the highest and holiest things is not free. Jesus told the young ruler to go and sell all that he had and to turn all his possessions into capital that he might buy eternal life. He told us that the Kingdom is like a merchant seeking costly pearls and paying a supreme price for the pearl of consummate beauty and value.

Let us think together about some of the spiritual commodities which have been steadily advancing in price.

Money but Not Time

1. It costs more to worship God than it did a generation ago. The price has advanced. I am not forgetting the days when our early settlers walked through the fearsome forests and crossed the treacherous streams and made "with stern, impassioned stress" a thoroughfare to the meetinghouse. That meetinghouse was unheated; the minister turned the hour-glass. And yet the worship of the first day of the week was a delight and not a dread. There were no papers, no magazines, no lectures, no concerts, no operas, no plays; the weekly meeting provided the sweetest neighborly fellowship and the deepest intellectual and moral quickening; without it life would have been unspeakably drab. It did not cost a great deal to worship God in days when every social impulse drove one to the church doorway.

But now there are a hundred allurements, many of them richly rewarding. There are a score of enticing appeals every Sunday morning and the fruits won by yielding to these appeals are not all low and sordid. For social quickening and mental stimulus we are no longer dependent upon the meetinghouse. He who today habitually mingles his prayers and praises with his fellow-creatures does so because he has made a place in his life for worship, as one of the things by which he lives, without which he cannot see life steadily and see it whole. He pays the price for worship, a higher price than that paid by an earlier generation.

Not only public worship, but the elements which enter into worship are today bought at a most high price,—quiet and meditation. "Be still and know that I am God,"—but this is a noisy age and stillness is won at great cost. "Enter into thy closet,"—but this is the age of the highway; he who would "steal awhile away" must make a trail, and trail-making is real work. It all costs time, and time is what we moderns think we have not; silver and gold we have and will give, but ask us not our minutes and hours.

If I had the time to find a place
And sit me down full face to face
With my better self, that stands no show
In my daily life that rushes so,
It might be then I would see my soul
Was stumbling still toward the shining goal—
I might be nerved by the thought sublime,—
If I had the time!

Price of Faith Advanced

2. The price of faith has advanced. Faith was never to be had cheaply. The eleventh chapter of the letter to the Hebrews is the cost-mark of faith. But the fire, the dungeon, the lion's gory mane did not require such anguish of spirit, such mental discipline and mastery as that which the man of faith pays today for the "conviction of things not seen," the possession of things wherein there is no breath.

Ours is a mechanical age. We think in mechanical patterns. The biological method has invaded the realm of psychology and the realm of religion. All things are studied in the light of their origins. A scientifically-minded age will explain everything in terms of cause and effect. The mind and the spirit of man are not counted as creative; man is a plaything in a mechanical order, rather than a creator of things wherein there is no breath, these things being the great determining factors in human evolution.

Faith in spiritual values costs; it costs real prospecting, spiritual venture. We believe in the reality of the scientist's formulae; in the flower which he describes in general terms, composed of stem and pistil and ovary and stamens; but unless we have ventured with the Master and have considered the grass of the field we do not feel the stir of might, the instinct within it which reveals a living universe. We accept the scientist's definition of the hearth-fire as "the transformation of potential into kinetic energy through the combination of carbon atoms with those of oxygen and the formation of oxides in the shape of gases which become progressively oxidized." But when one sits before the fire on the cold winter night, and joins a circle of friendly hearts and genial spirits, there are values no less real than the scientist's facts; and the man of faith declares that these things wherein there is no breath are supremely real.

I watched a log in the fireplace burning,
Wrapped in flame like a winding sheet,
Giving again with splendid largesse
The sun's long gift of treasured heat—

Giving again in the fire's low music
The sound of wind on an autumn night,
And the gold of many a summer sunrise
Garnered and given out in light.

I watched a log in the fireplace burning—
Oh, if I, too, could only be Sure to give back the love and laughter
That life so freely gave to me.

Such an aspiration is as real as potash and pig iron! The man of faith believes this,—at the cost of turning aside from the pathway of the mechanical and the external and removing the shoes from his feet as a pledge of his readiness to be persuaded by spiritual values not less than by physical facts.

The Value of High Hope

3. The cost of hope has advanced. Old Testament patriots stand on tiptoe, looking for the coming of the Messiah. The pose of the early Christians is one of eager expectancy; all are looking for the immediate return of their Lord. The Bible is a book of hope, of hope that comes easily and is easily retained.

But it costs to hope in the twentieth century. We cannot accept the detailed anticipations of eschatology. Our understanding of God's ways forbids the acceptance of a cataclysmic coming of Christ. But are we as hopeful as those who looked for His coming in the clouds? A few months ago I met a nurse in one of our hospitals; each morning as she entered the room she was radiant. "I think He may come today," she said, and this hope of the immediate return surely made her cheerful and patient. When I suggested that I was sure He was coming,—coming in ways and in a measure almost imperceptible, she seemed to think that my expectation was a hopeless one.

Here is the challenge: to be as vibrant with hope, as jubilantly confident of His coming, when we know that in no catastrophic, spectacular way will He come. It takes a finer courage far to say, despite the numberless and persistent efforts of men to retard His coming, "Yes, today His rule in the hearts of men will be a little more complete; His power over the nations will be a little more determinative." If we are not willing to pay this higher cost of hope, we shall be of those who declare that the present order is a fixed and inviolable one.

"Trusting God against appearances" is the cost of hope today. To be so confident that "the world is circling onward out of shadow into light" that it becomes one's daily determination to keep step with God, is the measure of the Christian's hope.

Forenoon and afternoon and night; Forenoon,
And afternoon and night; Forenoon, and—what?
The empty song repeats itself. No more?
Yea, that is life; make this forenoon sublime,
This afternoon a psalm, this night a prayer,
And time is conquered, and thy crown is won.

To do this requires a hope that is purchased at great cost.

Value of Prayer

4. It costs more to pray than in earlier generations. There have been three prayer-levels: that of magic-prayer, that of petition-prayer, and that of communion-prayer. On the lower levels, prayer is not costly. One must know the proper modes of conjuration and incantation; one must know definitely what he wants and be passionate in demanding it. That is all.

When men glimpsed the meaning of the omnipresence and the uniformity of natural law, and were not altogether sure that back of all natural phenomena was a personal and infinite Will, prayer began to cost and cost mightily. First, to be intent not so much upon the clear definition of one's own desires, as to apprehend the nature and the scope of God's purpose; then, to make that apprehension of God's will the dominant desire of one's own heart,—all this entered into the purchase price of prayer.

He who knows the value of consecration-prayer no longer seeks or desires to change the will of God, that will which includes in its majestic sweep the myriad human destinies and social forces, but every day endeavors to employ all his creative energies in the realization of God's hope. This often costs self-abnegation, self-effacement, but he who pays the cost knows that an understanding of "the meaning of prayer" is worth all its costs.

Are we willing to pay the cost of spiritual living? In the realm of things advancing prices but slowly retard the determination of men to secure what they want. They will pay the price, will pay what they have to pay. Prices soar, and demands keep apace.

Is there the same passion for the things of the spirit? We ask to live by faith and hope and love. "Ye know not what ye ask," says Jesus. "Are ye able to pay the price?" We shall live by the spirit when, cost what it may, we accept the Master's ringing challenge with, "We are able to pay, to pay with the whole of us, will of us, brain of us, senses and soul of us!"

Christmas Bells

By E. H. H. Holman

The Christmas bells! the Christmas bells!
The day of peace their message tells!
The star which lowly shepherds saw—
Bright star aflame with Love's true law!

Anew we pledge for brotherhood:
To stand for what the Worker stood,
The Christ who learned a humble trade,
Who toiled in shop, the Christ who made

The hearts of slaves to thrill with hope;
The Christ who with a scourge of rope
Drove from God's house the selfish gang
Whose greed defiled. The angels sang

Their "Good-will" anthem, "Peace on earth,"
When Mary to the world gave birth
To that brave Soul, "the Son of Man,"
With whom real brotherhood began.

For him ring forth these Christmas bells,
And in the earth a new hope swells:
Blind eyes now see, deaf ears now hear,
The promised day now draweth near.

"Make way! make way for brotherhood!"
Thus ring the bells, for God is good;
His truth shall reign. For this we stand:
Real brotherhood shall rule the land.

Some Impressions of Washington

As Congress Opens

I HAPPENED to be in Washington early this month—the opening week of Congress. It was too early to get any clear indication of what Congress is going to do this session, but one could get a line on issues and personalities that are likely to be at the front. As I talked with wise political observers in Washington I was reminded that the quiet, prudent man in the White House today has a larger following in the country at large than any President in the history of the nation. Roosevelt had many shouting, devoted friends, but he always had many bitter enemies in his own party, and always the Democrats against him. Confidence in Coolidge is one of the significant facts of the day. Congress is bound to be influenced by the fifteen million votes which were cast for Coolidge in the last Presidential election.

However, there is nothing to indicate that President Coolidge has Congress eating out of his hand. We may fairly expect that on most issues he will find the regular Republican members of Congress co-operating with him. There are at least two kinds of Republicans. The ones that are not regular are hardly Republicans, if one may judge by the uncomplimentary remarks that they have made about regular Republicans and the way they have lined up heretofore on political issues. They have not seemed to be as much inclined to co-operate with the party whose label they wear as they have been inclined to join with the Democrats in fighting regular Republicans. Perhaps they will change their tactics now, but we may continue to expect the insurgents to insurge occasionally, at least. They claim to have the balance of power in the Senate.

Republican party leaders, desiring their votes, have adopted a somewhat conciliatory policy toward the members of Congress who followed and fought with La Follette in the third party revolt of 1924, but such wayward Republicans are being demoted in the committee assignments. The most serious issue has been made on young Bob La Follette, who succeeds his late father in the Senate; but it seemed that he is to be given the benefit of the doubt, with the hope that he may be on good behavior. From the start young Bob is destined to be in the limelight. He is likely to have an influence out of proportion to his thirty years. Although inexperienced in personal legislative responsibility, he has had ten years of training in Washington as his father's secretary.

Young Bob and the other Progressive Republicans are interested chiefly in economic problems within the United States. They are not greatly interested in the international issues. We can hardly expect them to help along the Administration program for entrance into the World Court.

The indications are that a majority in the Senate are with the President for the World Court. Probably they will win in the end, but much depends upon how insistent are the people who want the United States to join the World Court and how strongly they make their desires known to their Senators and Representatives at Washington. It is an awkward situation. The chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. Borah, is strongly in the opposition, and he is associated with a strangely assorted company, all the way from so-called reactionaries to so-called radicals. The World Court opponents promise a determined fight, and express the cheerful hope that, even if they have a minority of votes, they will try to win by forcing delays. Vice-President Dawes has a good deal of right and justice on his side when he asks for a revision of the Senate rules which makes possible so many delays. If proof were lacking it may be supplied by the opponents of the World Court. I believe they will oppose in vain, and that we shall enter the World Court.

Apparently President Coolidge wishes to co-operate with other nations increasingly. He wants to prepare for peace rather than war. He is in earnest about the reduction of armament. The "isolationists," the big navy men and the big army men, if such there are in Congress, may be expected to be heard from at Washington this winter. They seem to be out of luck.

Congress will provide a forum for debate of the issues raised by the aircraft people who want the aircraft taken from both the Army and Navy and unified in a single department. Another proposal is to unite Army, Navy, and aircraft all in a single Department of Defense. It does not seem likely that the status quo will be changed immediately, but military aircraft have changed the whole problem of warfare, and it would seem to be desirable to make some changes in administration and methods to develop and utilize most effectively this new arm of defense. The issue is between the young men of the air service and the old men of the Army and Navy.

Tax reduction is one of the major issues before Congress this winter. Coolidge economy is bearing welcome fruit. The budget system and better business methods have brought credit to the Administration and financial relief to the whole country. The President feels that the next steps in economy should be along the lines of cutting down expenses for a war system that should be discarded as rapidly as it may be wisely possible.

There will be loud talk in Washington this winter about national prohibition. The wets will try to modify the Volstead law. The drys are in control. Prohibition enforcement has made great gains lately, and the Administration is much encouraged. The President is in earnest about law enforcement, and is determined to make prohibition prohibit if possible. If his recommendations to Congress are granted, federal enforcement of prohibition will be increasingly effective throughout his administration. At no time since the dry laws went into effect has the prospect looked as good in Washington as it does today. E. C.

Progress of Co-operative Christianity

Federal Council of Churches Meets in Detroit

By Frederick L. Fagley

A MEETING of the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America was held in Detroit, Dec. 7 to 11. Because of the nature of the questions before the Council, this meeting was one of the most interesting gatherings of representatives of the churches that have been held for a number of years. The first question related to the much-discussed report on prohibition and the attitude the churches should take towards temperance organizations and work; and the second major question was, what is the position of the churches in the whole program for world peace. The third major question was the relationship of the churches to Christian education.

Along with these three major questions for discussion were a number of others; for example, the development of better relations between the Jews and Christians; the attitude of the churches on the Asiatic Exclusion Section of the immigration law; the attitude of Christians on the problems of interracial relationships; the Christian attitude toward co-operation in industry and how this may be furthered by the churches. These and many other questions were before the Council for discussion and decision as to what are the most fruitful lines of activity.

What the Executive Committee Is

The Executive Committee of the Federal Council is made up of elected representatives of the various denominations co-operating in that organization. The number of representatives of the various church bodies depends upon the size of those bodies: two delegates for a minimum of 500,000 communicants and additional representatives for additional units of 500,000. It works out that the Congregational churches have four representatives on the Executive Committee; the Methodist North have eleven; the Northern Baptists have five. Altogether the committee is a group of about 150 official representatives. The members of the various commissions of the Federal Council are corresponding members as well as are the representatives of various city and state federations of churches. This together makes a group of about 350 men and women who represent in most cases officially the various denominations, and these representatives are expected to express, as far as they are able, the official position of the various bodies on the questions brought before the committee for discussion. The Executive Committee meets annually, and during the four years between the quadrennial meetings of the Federal Council, the Executive Committee is the one official body which is supposed to represent the united Protestant opinion on the major questions of public concern.

This year, because of the widespread interest in the report on prohibition as well as the growing interest in the cause of world peace, there was an unusually large attendance. The discussions were of exceeding interest and directly to the point. While there was wide difference of opinion, for the most part those who discussed the questions were governed by the high standards of Christian gentlemen, as would be expected from members of such a body.

The discussion of the temperance question occupied perhaps one-half of the time and aroused intense interest. The decisions here as well as the discussions are of sufficient importance to warrant a story apart from this general report, and I shall prepare for next week's issue a report dealing entirely with that problem.

The Unity Above Difference

One fine thing about the Federal Council in all its work is that nothing is done to make the loyal adherents of the various denominations feel that their own denominations are not really worth while, and that they have not a message and contribution to make to our common life. At the same time there is always an emphasis upon the unity which is above our differences, that is, that here is a unity sufficiently large to include all those believers in Jesus Christ, whatever may be their individual differences. The platform is so broad, the lines of activity so generous and so essential, that all Christians can here meet and fellowship together for the common good.

As Bishop Moore, the chairman of the committee, so well said in his opening address, "The Federal Council strives for unity, not uniformity."

After the opening address, Dr. Macfarland introduced the various secretaries of the Council, some fifteen men and women who are giving themselves to this type of fine Christian service. It is heartening to Congregationalists to realize that out of the fifteen, eight are Congregationalists—and that the one woman secretary, Mrs. Jeannette W. Emrich, is a Congregationalist—and that these men and women, serving the cause of Christ in this organization, are no less true Congregationalists and no less faithful to the teachings and the inheritance of the church which is their home by taking this service in the Federal Council.

Development of Christian Ideals

It is encouraging to realize how Christian work has broadened in its ideals and its activities in these later generations. One of the speakers illustrated this fact by calling to mind how in Pilgrim's Progress, Christian worked alone through most of his course and found companionship with only one or two fellow pilgrims, and not until he reached the celestial region did he find fellowship in a large group and come to realize that Christianity was social as well as individual; that there were obligations resting upon the group, for group action, as well as upon the individual, for individual purity of motives and righteousness.

And again the thought was brought out that the Christian group is not simply a group of people in a lifeboat trying to save their own lives, but that they are as yeast in the midst of the multitudes of men and that they are to work not only for the salvation of men but also for the regeneration of society. The true churchman is not only giving himself to the "romance of the far," that is, trying to save the world, but he is giving himself also to purifying the nature and life of the church. We who are in the church realize that it is far from perfect. We can criticize it more effectively than those outside the church, for we know more of the shortcomings. But at the same time we are absolutely confident that the Church of Jesus Christ is the agency for the saving of the world, and that while we are busy in trying to carry the gospel into the far corners of the earth and in giving ourselves in large measure to social and industrial reforms, we are none the less intent upon purifying and perfecting the church from within. We confidently believe that the church as the body of Christ shall be purified and strengthened, not by critics who know little of its life and share not in its work, but by those who love it, who give themselves to it, that it shall show forth to the world true Christian virtue and spirit.

International Relations

As usual, the conference gave much attention to the problems of international justice and good will. A new undertaking by this commission is the establishment of a committee on good will between Jews and Christians. This committee was formed two years ago, and it is financed not out of the treasury of the Federal Council directly, but through gifts made for this particular committee, though it works under the general direction of the Federal Council. Dr. Alfred William Anthony is the chairman and Rev. John W. Herring is the secretary.

Sub-Committee on Jews and Christians

This is the first time in nearly twenty centuries that definite steps have been taken to bring together the Jews and Christians on a basis of good will, understanding, and fellowship. The committee does not in any way deal with distinctly religious or ecclesiastical matters of either group, but it is to secure co-operation between Christians and Jews in matters of civic, social, and international concern, and thereby break down bigotry, and prejudice, and promote mutual understanding.

Meetings under this committee have been held in a number of cities, and it is expected that within the year public meetings for Jews and Christians will be held in all of the major cities of the country, where Jewish rabbis and Christian ministers will speak concerning the common interests of these two groups in strengthening the moral fiber of our people and in supporting all good causes for the community welfare.

The committee does not believe, as Mr. Herring so well says, in a Pollyanna type of good will, but it believes rather that in our mixed America we should add an eleventh commandment to the decalogue which would read, "Thou shalt know thy neighbor."

During the discussion of the report Dr. Frank Mason North, a former president, lifted the assembly to a high plane by his personal testimony to the power of Christ in individual lives. Dr. North stated that he was a member of this committee and that he longed for the day when there would be a fuller understanding of what Christ means to the world; that in undertaking the work of bringing Jews and Christians closer together in fellowship he was not in any way turning his back to the great beliefs of Christianity in the salvation of the soul through belief on Jesus Christ and the acceptance of him as a personal Savior; that Christianity was not simply a cult, but that Christianity was a belief and acceptance of a person.

This committee is not proselyting but is to be truly Christian. The statement was made by one of the members of the committee that he had taken the names of one hundred and fifty prominent Jews who had been converted to Christianity. These Jews lived in different countries and he had written and asked them what it was that had led them to accept Christianity, what was the first thing that turned them to belief in Christ. He received one hundred and fourteen replies and ninety-eight per cent of this one hundred and fourteen replied that "the thing that brought me to Christ was the kindness of an individual Christian." Here, it was pointed out to the committee, lies the avenue of fruitful activity for Christians. We are not to convert the world by doctrine or by argument, but by kindness in the name of Christ.

Outlook for World Peace

In a further report, of the Commission on International Justice and Good Will, there was outlined the situation as it is in international affairs today, with the comment that the outlook for permanent world peace begins to look brighter. Many events, religious and secular, national and international, give cause for rejoicing. A new hope, a new mind, a new purpose among the nations are beginning to appear. Constructive political agreements of great promise are taking shape. The churches are awakened to the international responsibility and duty.

Continuing, Dr. Gulick, the secretary of the Commission, said:

Among the signs of peace is the growing number of communions which have their own commissions, committees or departments to deal with the questions of world justice and peace.

Dark clouds were lowering on the horizon twelve months ago, says the report in discussing the international outlook in Europe. The high hopes that had been roused by the Geneva Protocol with its specific plans for the peaceful settlement of every international dispute, for mutual guarantees of security, and for early and general disarmament, were beginning to be discredited by rumors of the unwillingness of Great Britain to ratify that Protocol.

But in September the Assembly of the League of Nations made it clear that although the Protocol "was sleeping, it was not dead," and the Locarno treaties of October showed that, guided by the initial proposal of Germany and by the helpful co-operation of Great Britain, France, and Italy, the principles and procedures of the Protocol were accepted in regard to the principal danger spot of Europe.

The five treaties negotiated at Locarno give promise of permanent peace between France and Germany, guaranteed by Great Britain and Italy, and between Germany and Poland and Germany and Czechoslovakia. The willingness of those powerful nations of Europe to agree in advance to the peaceful settlement of every dispute, whatever its nature, sets a high standard to other nations.

The black and ominous war cloud that suddenly loomed up in the Balkans in October was dissipated in a remarkably short time, thanks to the existence of suitable and effective international machinery and technique for peace.

The smoldering flames of discontent in China at her position as she faces the nations of the West, blazed up with vigor in connection with the tragic shooting of unarmed students in Shanghai in May. China's appeal to the conscience of the world is beginning to bear fruit. Many important religious and secular bodies in the United States and England have spoken in no uncertain voice, calling for a new international policy of respect, friendship, and good will in dealing with China.

Christmas

By Frances J. Delano

No vain regrets today shall in my heart arise;
In this swift-passing year,
If I have lifted aught of woe, it shall suffice;
This day I give to joy,—
To friends who have gone out upon the last great quest,
To friends still with me here;
To visions, dreams, and memories. O glad behest,
To dream of homes where mirth
Abounds! to call to mind, with thrilling gratitude,
The beauty of the earth!

Whether or not the spirit of militarism exists in the United States is a matter of opinion depending on definitions. Certain it is, however, that a considerable section of our people think of international relations and especially of national security in terms nearly, if not exclusively, of military power. They put little or no confidence in international good will, justice, conciliation, and friendly helpfulness. They even stress the need of more military training and equipment.

Although many recent events justify a hopeful outlook in the general movement toward permanent world peace, this hope can be justified only if the forces of righteousness continue to operate with ever-increasing vigor. Our hope lies in the facts that the churches are beginning to awaken to their duty, and the nations are beginning to turn in the right direction. We should gird on our armor for still more earnest effort.

We are involved in the most stupendous undertaking of history and also the most urgent—the complete abolition of the war system of the nations.

Man's mastery of Nature's titanic forces has far outrun his moral development or his international organization. Moral fitness to use these mighty forces, as individuals, as groups, and as nations must be speedily developed. If this moral fitness is not secured, our scientific achievements in the production of instruments of destruction will bring down upon us overwhelming disasters and chaos.

Interracial Relations

The report of the Committee on Interracial Relations had to do with the growing tension between the races in Northern cities. This report brought out that part of the trouble is in the matter of housing. The colored people are making money and many of them are saving it. They want their families to enjoy better surroundings, better homes, better neighborhoods. They go into the white neighborhood and buy property. Immediately trouble begins, and that is the situation that is being faced in all of the great Northern cities. A number of the colored delegates asserted that the only way to handle this situation is through conference and by persuasion; that no law can be passed, violence will not avail; but only by mutual conference and good will can this matter be adjusted. One of the colored delegates made this statement, "You teach us your literature; you teach us your history; you teach us your ideals; and then you say we ought not to have your aspirations. Can such a thing be?"

The colored delegates were insistent that the church, white and colored, held the key to the situation and was the only agency that could bring about good feeling and could settle in any way the complex problems that are perplexing our Northern communities.

In Conclusion

No better summary of the committee meeting is more to the point than from the address of Dr. Marquis, the chairman of the administrative committee, wherein he characterized the Federal Council as an expression of the growing unity of the churches. In characterizing the work of the Christian churches in co-operation, Dr. Marquis said:

The conviction that a blending of freedom and unity is possible is what led the churches to create the Federal Council. The growing realization of this ideal is what leads to their continued support. They believed that the "federal" way is the great method by which a larger unity is being obtained. They are trying to achieve in the religious realm what our forefathers brought about in the political realm—a free association based upon common interests and common goals.

In the churches as in the American colonies there is a realization of great tasks to be performed which cannot be performed by isolated action that is the mightiest spur to federation. If the function of the churches is exhausted in furnishing comfort and inspiration to the individual, unity will hardly seem a fundamental need. But if there is also the supreme goal for building the Kingdom of God in the whole life of the community, the nation, and the world, then a consolidation of Christian forces is absolutely indispensable.

The work of the Federal Council is a means of expressing to the world the unity that the churches already possess. It is a laboratory in which the churches are seeking collectively for the solution of difficult problems which none can solve alone.

Through the Federal Council of Churches where the communions working together have been able to present the Christian and moral viewpoint on community, national and international problems they have exercised effective influence.

Note.—This report will be followed by 1. The Discussion of Temperance before the Federal Council; 2. The Report on Christian Education with the address of Professor Weigle, which was considered one of the best addresses given before the committee. Our Congregational people want to read about both of these matters.

An Ambassador of the Churches

William George Puddefoot—Nation Builder

By Isaac Ogden Rankin

THREE nations—England, Canada, and the United States of America—had their part in making and maturing the romantic life of this ambassador and inspirer, builder and helper of the American churches. England gave him birth. Canada trained him in experience with all sorts of men, inured him to the hardships of the lumber camps, gave him a trade, used him as a soldier, found him a wife, and taught him that personal devotion to Christ, which burned always as a guiding light of service in his soul. The United States won his deepest affections, kindled his prophetic hopes, and found him his life work, first as pioneer preacher and then as ambassador from the just-founded, struggling churches of the New West to the people of the long-established East.

Someone has described his life as a strange marriage of hard reality and improbable romance. Now that he has left us, and I remember the work he did and my own experiences of friendship and co-operative work, I feel the truth of that saying. It was a life full of striking contrasts and apparent contradictions fused together by a strongly independent character for a great purpose. And these strangely diversified experiences were always at his command for those dealings with all sorts of men in which he showed his mastership in what we call Socratic dialogue and courteous and persuasive personal relations. His wonderful memory had vast treasures from Scripture and the great modern writers to draw upon. He knew how to meet each comer on his own ground and how to speak the genial enlightening and persuasive word.

Consider a few of these contrasts in the life-experience of this prophet and nation-builder: He was the most outspoken democrat I have ever known. He was also the direct descendant of a Scottish king. He was born in England, but he loved America best of all, and his most characteristic and important work was done as the founder and nourisher of pioneer churches in the North American wilderness. His formal education ended at thirteen. But for breadth of reading and wide interest in science and history I have seldom met his equal. For eight years of his early manhood he called himself an atheist. But when he gave himself to Christ, he burned with an enthusiasm without smoke of bigotry or impatience with the beliefs of others. An abounding sense of humor often opened the way for serious thoughts by a touch of keen but kindly fun. And the common people heard him gladly. He was carpenter, shoemaker, soldier, farmer, lumberman, poet, and painter in his vision of the beauty of the world.

He was born in England, in the "Garden County" of Kent. Westerham, where his first years were spent, lies a little off the railroad route from London to Dover. Eighty years ago, when he first found his way about on sturdy childish feet, it had hardly changed from the looks and ways of rural England under Cromwell or Elizabeth. He has described it charmingly in "Leaves From the Log of a Sky Pilot." His father was high constable, overseer of the poor, highway rate collector, and a church warden. The village people lived in this feudal atmosphere and traditional relations. "My father," he tells us, "was the first and only radical in the family."

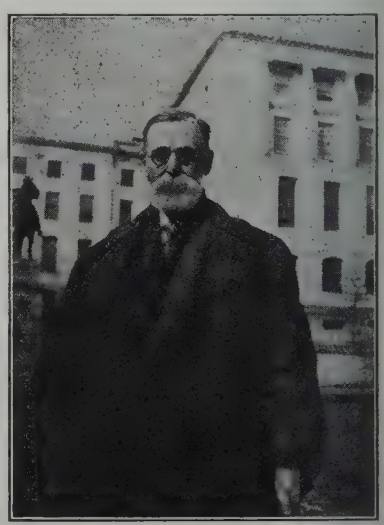
I should like to linger over that picture of an English, rural neighborhood. He tells us of the Dame's School where he was the youngest child: "It was a grand old brick pile with quaintly-shaped tiles on its many-gabled roof, surrounded with a brick wall, the top of which was so round that it was impossible for the boys to get hold or climb over." The house in which he was born "was not old—that is, not more than three hundred years old. Our dining-room had an immense fireplace, so large that we could go under the mantel and sit down on seats arranged on either side. Looking up, we could see flitches of bacon and hams, and beyond them the stars. On either side were cupboards that met at the back of the chimney."

From the feudal life of Westerham he was sent, at ten years old, to the London of Dickens, at Westbourne School. "It was not exactly a 'Dotheboys Hall,'" he says, "but it was one of that kind, only a trifle less cruel. . . . My room was at the top of the house in the front garret; six little iron bedsteads and a washstand were the only furniture. . . . Our meals were small, too small for growing boys. More than once I picked up orange peel and devoured it to satisfy my hunger. For breakfast we had a round and a quarter of bread and a mug of coffee; for lunch just a round of bread and no more. Six o'clock found us hungry as hounds for the dinner, which was good for quality but quite insufficient in quantity. The big plum pudding was always welcome, because it was so filling. Often and often I traded my marbles with the day scholars for a piece of pie."

Then follows a self-revealing touch: "I never fought except when forced to, and I received many blows for each I gave, but I aimed to make one a settler and, as a rule, it was. My humorous side kept me out of many fights and I was a favorite with most of the boys. I could tell them stories to which they would rather listen than play marbles, and at the boarding-house on wet Sundays I painted woodcuts for them all day. . . . When money was sent to me I spent most of it for bread and cheese and divided with my roommates. This low living brought on influenza and scurvy, and it was many months before I became free from their bad effects." At the age of thirteen this meager schooling ended and he was apprenticed to a carpenter. He records with pride that he helped to build an experimental greenhouse for Darwin. He quarreled with his master, tried various jobs, and emigrated with his father's family to the forest country of Ontario.

Canada taught him the shoemaker's trade, inured him to life in the forests, showed him how to deal with men, brought him the two gifts he treasured most—a vital faith in Christ and a wife to whose help and character he has left beautiful tributes. He was a convert of Christian character rather than of the preacher. He has left us broad and humorous pictures of camp meetings in the Canadian woods. But it was the good lives of his father, mother, wife which held him when the waves of seemingly unanswerable unbelief, nourished by questions rising in his active thinking, came.

In the United States he found the home of his heart and the life work of which he never wearied. The building of the nation was his inspiration and he came to love it with all his characteristic enthusiasm. He



REV. WILLIAM G. PUDDEFOOT
In his later days. A snap-shot taken in front of the State House in Boston has left us with a prophet's work accomplished. It is good for us to remember how the educational and religious ideals of New England came to kindle his imagination and direct his thought. And, himself an immigrant, he was an optimist in regard to the future of all those who came. I have known no more patriotic, farsighted, and enthusiastic American than he.

The necessary background for any picture of this strangely mingled and effective life must be found in that gigantic, half-reckoned-with and already too much forgotten task of the American people—the occupation and right upbuilding of the West. The problem was and is to make the church grow up with the community. Mr. Puddefoot's earlier experience of pioneer preaching continued in the forests of Northern Michigan. Here is his description of a new-made county town. "It was so new that the stumps were in the streets; the church lot was full of them. The schoolhouse was unfinished and the only place for a meeting was over a grocery. . . . The room where I was to speak I found occupied with a lawsuit over a stolen trace or tug. The owner of the building seemed unwilling to entertain me, and both he and the people had forgotten that there was to be any meeting. The few cents in my pocket I gave to some small boys to advertise my lecture and the little room was crowded."

But the light of the genius of the man for oratory could not be hidden in a corner of the Michigan forests. There was a continual call for his presence in the East. The pastor was called upon to lay down his shepherd's pipe to take a trumpet. "It is more than thirty-five years," he wrote, "since I left my (shoemaker's) bench, and I have never been out of harness for a single day. From that time forth he divided his time between active superintendence of the pioneer churches and that inspiration and educational speaking in the older world of the East which helped to make it possible to keep on with the work of the churches in the new and needy places. They were "years of constant journeying, incessant speaking, and delightful fellowship with the churches and pastors of the East."

Our Glorious Liberty

By Susan Chenery

YES, we have had it. Even as children we realized that there were other churches as free as our own. We were not repressed in our religious life. Like Paul we were "free born." As flowers turn to the sun we lifted our faces towards our God of light and love. It was natural for us to believe that every one should have the right to worship God in his own way. There was a sense of order in those early days which gave our young life calm and security. We were not much consulted in the arrangement of things, but we had what was better than frequent diversion, happiness. We called our Sunday the Sabbath Day, and accepted it as different from the other six, different, but by no means irksome. It is not our religion that is to blame for the unhappy memories some seem to recall so vividly of their early Sundays, so much depends upon the atmosphere of the individual home. If we had lived long enough ago to have had the real Puritan Sabbath, we believe that our parents would have made it, if not attractive, at least acceptable, because they, too, would have been part of it. Our Sunday was indeed a holy day. We went to Sunday school and to church in the forenoon, and sometimes we went to the evening meetings, and oh, how we enjoyed the Sunday school concert recurring every four weeks at 6.30 P.M. We sang in its choruses, we recited our "verses" and "spoke our pieces," and we listened to holy men who told us interesting things that sometimes moved us deeply and made us wish to be better than we had ever been.

Sunday afternoons we generally spent at home reading, and our books were different on that day. They came from the Sunday school library and some we read over and over with lasting benefit. We accepted the rules without question or dissatisfaction. Were not our parents also at home with us resting or reading? They were not off "joyriding," leaving us to find such amusement as might occur to alert young minds. We were not victims of a dull, mournful Sabbath; it was simply different from the other days in the week. It was restful, peaceful, and O blessed memory, it was quiet!

We were brought up to expect to unite with our church at the age of fourteen, and we did it. It was a solemn thing to go before the church committee, and still more so to stand before the congregation, our knees trembling, as we agreed to the extraordinary things we were taught to believe in those days. We believed them. Was it not "our church"?—As if to quiet our fears, how gentle was our pastor's voice as he spoke to us separately and gave us that "right hand of fellowship." By becoming church members we felt more than ever that it was our church, ours to stand by, to support with our pennies, and ours to flourish in the face of any "Methody" or "Piscopalian." We realize today that this feeling of superiority was the natural outcome of loyalty to our own denomination, and we wonder if our parents did not share in it. Yet as the years passed we became really attached to those others, and today look forward to our summer services in the neighboring churches and welcome all the occasions that bring us together. We have passed beyond the belief that we posses the one sure and only road that leads to Heaven. In fact today we are not thinking so much about Heaven. We are more anxious that our lives shall follow the pattern of Him who came to show us how to live.

JAMES E. JONES

Assistant Prohibition Commissioner who is one of the most effective officials charged with prohibition enforcement; now at headquarters in Washington. He is from Ohio

It is the most natural thing in the world, and not a reason for criticism or regret, that we do not all take the same path in our Christian life. It is because of our "glorious liberty" that we do not all walk together. There was a time when the father apportioned the careers for his sons:—Edward was to be a preacher, John a doctor, Charles should be a farmer, Joseph should be a blacksmith, Peter should keep a store, George should be a teacher, Andrew should—Yes, there were that many once, and rarely did one have a chance to choose his vocation. But today the father says, "I'll give you a good education and you may choose your own path," and if he's the right kind of father, he adds, "Be a good man and I don't care what line you choose."—May it not be that our Heavenly Father smiles at all our diversities? Does he care by what path we come as long as we truly love him and try to do his will?

Our country needs our religion. It needs that religious liberty that perhaps has been the cause of our different denominations. There may be many branches in our religion, and they surely will turn to every point of the compass,—as branches generally do on a tree of any size given liberty to grow. Unlike we may be in forms and in our individual insistencies, but united in the big belief of the love of God our Father and in our duty to make the most of our lives after the pattern of our Lord and Master Jesus Christ. It was he who said, "I am the vine, ye are the branches." A vine is better than a tree to illustrate the diversities of human preferences. How wildly adventurous some of those vine-branches become, and how hard it is to follow their course! Yet as long as they hold their connection with the main vine they are alive, and the Master himself can prune them and make them more fruitful. In all nature does not growth mean branching out?

So let us love all our churches while we stand by and support our very own. When away from home it is a delight to visit and get acquainted with other denominations, but when at home, on Sunday morning at least, uninfluenced by the radio or other attractions, let us go regularly to our church. Let us go to church, not from fear of eternal damnation, but because we know that our country needs our religion, and to keep our religion we must keep our churches. Let us go—we make one more—if too deaf to hear a word. It will be our sacrifice. Not the burnt-offering of the olden time, but the good will offering of our love and loyalty, the kind that our Father will not despise.

KENNEDY'S SECOND BEST

BY JOHN FREEMAN

Rev. Gordon Kennedy is the successful young pastor of Rosemont Memorial Church, Toronto. He is thirty, and unmarried. A crowd of his merry, young people at the railroad station see him off, bound for the West on a summer vacation. They fill his Pullman section with fruit and other gifts. Before the train starts, a woman who introduces herself as Mrs. Wilcox presents her attractive English niece, Miss Margaret Pearson, to Mr. Kennedy as his traveling companion. Miss Pearson is on the way from her grandfather in England to her father, in Vancouver. Mr. Kennedy generously shares his fruit. He and Miss Pearson develop a pleasant acquaintance on the train as they travel westward together. Miss Pearson is interested in social problems, and tells about her social settlement work in London.

CHAPTER IV

KENNEDY spent the most of the forenoon in reading and writing letters to be posted in Winnipeg. When he had finished he went to Margaret Pearson.

"We're getting into the real West now," he said, "the land of hope. No one ever gets discouraged west of Lake Superior. Out here men never despair of their luck. They may suffer all kinds of losses, but they don't know what it means to get downhearted. They expect to strike it rich on the next venture."

"Is that what makes them such persistent gamblers? I'm told they do gamble tremendously."

"Perhaps they do, but they work tremendously as well. I'm glad to get into this life for a while. It stirs one's blood."

"But surely," she replied, "you are not going in either for gambling or hard work. You're a minister and you're on holiday."

"Yes, but while we're young the best form of recreation is a change of activity. I'm planning to lead a strenuous life on the ranch. As for gambling—isn't every earnest and venturesome man essentially a gambler?"

"Do you mean that he lays bets on chances?" she asked.

"Yes. He bets his life over and over again."

She looked at him questioningly.

"I mean to say that life is a critical affair. Great issues are constantly balanced on the razor edge of a single decision. We must often risk everything on a single throw. Perhaps we do that oftener than we are aware of. The critical circumstance may wear an ordinary look. The fateful moment may wear no garb to distinguish it from the common moments of our common days. But at the heart of it lies our destiny. When that moment arrives, if we have insight and courage, we bet our life, we stake our destiny on the chance it offers."

She made no comment for a moment, but presently she said:

"That makes life very interesting, doesn't it? Possibly very tragic, also."

"True," he replied, "but I'm inclined to believe that it's a wise arrangement. It tends to keep us awake and alert."

Owing to a blockade on the line, their train was delayed six hours in Winnipeg. Kennedy took Margaret around the city in a taxi, and they lunched together at the Grand Hotel. She listened eagerly to what he told her of the early days, and how the city had grown up around old Fort Garry.

"You'll notice the polyglot of peoples seen in the streets and at the railway station," he said. "It's a sort of clearing-house for the immigrants. From this point they are distributed all over the West."

"I suppose I'm really an immigrant," she replied. "It thrills me to think of it. I feel as if I am about to plunge into a great and unknown sea of experience."

An interesting day was followed by a pleasant evening on the train. As the sun bled down into the West leaving its red stains upon the sky, their conversation grew more personal. Margaret spoke quite freely of her early life and her experiences in her work, while Kennedy revealed to her some of the ideals and ambitions of his life.

"I suppose this must be good-bye," he said, when it was time to retire. "I leave the train at Calgary, 6.30 in the morning. You'll be sleeping then. This has been a most delightful journey for me. I feel that I have found a real friend."

"I feel just the same about it," she replied. "I've had a lovely time and I can never forget your kindness to me. But I shall be up before you leave. I always wake early, and tomorrow morning I shall be keen to get my first view of the Rockies."

The morning proved to be a glorious one. The air was like champagne. They were standing on the rear platform of the train, Kennedy sunk in thought, Margaret quivering with excitement and seeming like something ready to mount on wings.

"Oh, look!" she exclaimed. "What a wonderful bank of tinted clouds!"

"Something more substantial than clouds there," he replied.

"Are they the Rockies?" she asked, eagerly.

"Yes, they're there all right, though a good way off as yet."

Presently she said: "There's certainly something in this air that stirs the sporting instinct in one's blood. I feel as if I should like to start off this very minute on some big, bold adventure."

He leaned forward and looked earnestly into her face.

"Do you mean that?" he asked in a voice that startled her.

"Yes, that's how I feel."

"Then I'll suggest an adventure, a big and bold one, too. Break your journey here at Calgary and marry me!"

The hot blood rushed into her face and for a moment she stared at him in amazement. Then quickly regaining her composure, she smiled and answered lightly:

"Oh, thank you! Quite a brilliant idea! What suggested it to you?"

The corners of his mouth twitched humorously as he replied:

"A lot of things have suggested it, particularly the fact that I enjoy having you with me at the breakfast table."

She laughed: "Is that the acid test of congeniality?"

"I think it is. I like your morning face and your morning moods. They show the right attitude to life."

"You surely flatter me, Mr. Kennedy; but you have scarcely made out a convincing case for impromptu marriage."

"No, perhaps not; but I'm coming to the main point. Miss Pearson, I have learned to love you."

She looked at him steadily for a moment and then asked:

"Am I to take you seriously?"

"Yes, most surely. I do love you with all my heart. I want you for my wife."

"Today?"

"Yes, if you are willing. It's a big and bold adventure, I know, but I believe a safe one for both of us."

"No, it would be nothing of the sort," she replied, heatedly; "it would only be a silly stunt."

"Well, if you won't marry me now will you promise to marry me later on?"

"How can I promise such a thing? I don't know that I could love you."

He reached out and took her hands in his. "I hope it won't take you long to find out, because I'm going to keep on loving you for the rest of my life."

The train was now at the Calgary station. The porter was calling to him:

"Ah'll get your stuff out, Cap'n; no need to hurry. Train stops ten minutes."

"What time does my train leave for Mandeville?"

"Not for half an hour, Cap'n."

"Mr. Kennedy, I must send a telegram to Father from here," said Margaret. "Will you be good enough to hand it in at the office for me?"

"Most certainly."

He waited while she took her pencil and wrote—

"Arrive Vancouver ten tomorrow. Glorious journey."

She passed the slip of paper to him, saying:

"If you'll be good enough to copy that on to a form and send it I shall be so much obliged to you."

"This isn't enough," he replied; "it needs a few more words. I'll supply them.

"Have met my fate. Expect an early wedding."

She rippled with laughter as she crossed out the words, and said:

"If you take liberties like that I shall not be able to trust you with it."

"You can trust me now and always," he replied. "But when shall I see you again?"

"After you have had your holiday on the ranch. If at the end of it you feel as you do now, you may come to see me in Vancouver: 21, Garden Terrace. Then . . . perhaps! But now, au revoir, and good luck!"

He pressed her hands and said:

"Good-bye, until we meet in Vancouver."

3.

The train steamed out of the station. Margaret was choked with excitement and dazed with astonishment. She went to her section and gave herself over to her thoughts. She was amazed at Kennedy and no less amazed at herself. She had never been a creature of impulse. Hitherto she had been deliberate and circumspect in forming her friendships. Could it be possible that she was in love with a man whom she had known but three days? She had found him in rollicking holiday mood and she had played up to that mood until . . . until when? . . . until he took her hands in his and spoke to her of love. Then there came a flare of light, an uncontrollable rush of feeling, and she knew that she had been ushered into the wonderful mysterious kingdom of love.

During the remainder of the journey she talked but little with her fellow passengers. She was glad to have this first day of love among the mountains. They harmonized with her thoughts.

There were moments when it seemed to her that she could feel the mountains inbreathing the pure air of heaven, and other moments when, with summits wreathed in smoky mist, they seemed to breathe forth the incense of silent supplication.

Now the train would hang dizzily over some unsunned canyon, slowly creeping across a bridge which, from a curve in the rear distance had looked no more substantial than a spider's thread. Again the train groaned and wheezed and panted its way up some steep gradient to a mighty glacier, overtopped by heights of snow. At length they came to where, sheltered between wooded heights, the Fraser River flowed, with wigwams and fishermen's huts along its banks, and occasionally an Indian standing in mid-stream to spear the unwary salmon. It was the homely, work-a-day world again, the world of human hearts and homes and hopes.

A Christmas Acrostic

By Sarah F. Bel

Christmas joy be ours today
How the glad news rings!
Ring the bells; their merry chime
In glad chorus sings.
So may every gladsome one
To the Lord above,
Make such music in each heart,
And like joy-bells add a part,
Sounding hymns of love.

Parables of Safed the Sage

The Parable of the Pay for the Whistle

Keturah was reading the Paper, and I was reading a Book. And she was intent upon Increasing my Knowledge, so when I was in some very Interesting Place, she would now and again Read aloud to me.

And she said, Dost thou know how much it costeth the Railroads to blow their Whistles?

And I answered, That is one of a Great Many things on which my Ignorance is Profound.

And she said, Here is an article that telleth how many hundreds of Tons of Coal go to the making of the steam that is blown away by the Whistles of the Locomotives upon the Railways, and how it costeth many Hundreds of Thousands of Shekels every year.

And I said, Who hath discovered that fact?

And she said, It is a College Professor.

And I said, I could have been sure that it was no Railroad Man. For it is the habit of men to look but little into the wastes of their own business; and I hope that the Professor getteth a good Bonus from the Railways for his discovery, and not simply a Free Pass to Kalamazoo and back to visit his Grandmother, and be tortured all the way by the whistle of the Engine.

And Keturah said, This article saith that with all that the Railroads spend for their Whistles, the Noise is Ineffective. For the Whistle is located behind the Smokestack and behind the Bell and oft behind the Sandbox, and all these Deflect the Sound so that it goeth mostly to the sides and behind, and not much of it in Front.

And I inquired, saying, What else doth it say about the Railroad Whistle?

And she said, It saith that Whistles are made in all kinds of tone, and that the Big, Bass whistle carrieth the shortest distance, while a Little Shrill whistle would take less steam and carry the noise much farther if the Railroads had sense enough to use it.

And Keturah was silent and went on reading to herself to find another opportunity to Interrupt and Instruct me, but I was already Instructed, and came away to write this Parable.

For the stupidity of the Railroads is like unto the stupidity of the prophets of the Lord. For they waste much Energy in blowing the Whistle that ought to go into the moving of the Train, and they locate the Whistle where it scareth the innocent saints at the side of the Road and bringeth no Godly Fear to the hearts of sinners. Yea, and they know not how to tune their Whistles so as to get the best results at the longest distance for the smallest Expenditure of Steam.

And so, while the Children of this World are as stupid in their generation as the Children of Light, that is no credit to the Children of Light, who ought to know better.

And Keturah said, It seemeth to me that a good word should be said for the Professor.

And I said, In this Parable I am the Professor.

The Message of John's Gospel

Comment on the International Uniform Sunday School Lesson for January 3
John 1:1-5, 10-18

"The purpose and power of the Incarnation" is the special title of this opening lesson for the year. Following the Christmas season, and at the beginning of another "year of our Lord," could there be any more appropriate theme than this, of the Incarnation, the meeting of God and man in Jesus Christ? We may remember, too, what Dr. George A. Gordon has said concerning this prologue to the Gospel of John, that it is the best philosophical statement ever made concerning the ultimate relationship of God and man in Christ.

It should be recognized that we have in this prologue to John's Gospel a philosophical statement. It is a conception or theory of the nature and meaning of the Christ life. It is an effort to explain that life, which seemed miraculous and inexplainable except upon the basis of its uniqueness and its divine character. Is this theory or conception of Christ justified? Every man, as he studies the earthly life of Jesus, must decide that question for himself. The whole problem of the Incarnation and the Trinity has become, in history, overburdened with speculation, and men have made the deepest and holiest of all doctrines too often the occasion for unseemly and hateful controversy and strife.

The more strongly one believes in the Incarnation, the more deeply should his life be touched with the glory that shone in the life of Jesus of Nazareth. The measure of our imitation of Christ, the depth of our attainment of his life is, after all, the test of the quality of our faith in him. There can be little value in insisting upon his divinity unless through him our own lives have been made divine. This is a truly Scriptural conception, for the New Testament speaks of our privilege to be "partakers of the divine nature."

Few of us today are greatly interested in speculative and metaphysical theories of the Incarnation, but in proportion as we have lost interest in the theoretical aspects in most instances we have come all the more intensely to feel the reality of the divine life in Christ. So much is this the case that with many of us, if faith were slipping and we could find in the universe no real evidence of a loving God, we should turn to the earthly life of Jesus of Nazareth, and we should be disposed to worship a being so holy and to make him our ideal for character and service. We should find life taking on a new meaning and a new hope reviving as we realized that he was a fact and that life had encompassed so holy a man. For many of us the whole problem of faith, character, and destiny is settled largely by the evidence that centers and culminates in Jesus of Nazareth. He is the highest and best that we know. Through him we come to God, and seeing him we believe in God. It is easy to believe that God is love, for Jesus is love incarnate. It is easy to believe that God is a Father of tender mercy, for Jesus himself has revealed that character.

The ultimate meaning of these mysterious words in the opening of John's Gospel about the Word being in the beginning, and the Word being with God and being God, and the Word being made flesh is, after all, little more than a recognition of these simple facts concerning the significance of the earthly life of Jesus. It is the purpose of the writer to relate this earthly life to its eternal backgrounds. It was the spirit that was manifest in Jesus that was the power of creation. It was this spirit that constituted the essence of the Creator's character and purpose. The author of the Gospel is relating the universe to the highest thing that can be discovered in the universe. Is not this a very logical and natural procedure?

But after we have read these words and pondered them it is wise to remember that, after all, they constitute only a prologue. It is in the simple description of the life of Jesus and in the record of his teaching that we come to know him and that we come to feel the truth of these words. The knowledge of Christ should come first and the doctrine concerning Christ last. We are not in a position to have sound doctrine or a right outlook on life until we have come first of all to know Jesus. The doctrine of the Incarnation, we should remember, lays as much stress upon the humanity of Jesus as upon his divinity. The meaning of the Incarnation is that Jesus did become man.

The Parable of the Controversy of the Angel-Led and Star-Led

By William D. Street

The Shepherds went away from Bethlehem rejoicing, and they told about Christ and made converts to Christ. They told with pride of the glory in the heavens and of the angels' song and of the angel's message, and how they had found the Christ in a manger.

And the Wise Men also went away rejoicing and told about Christ and made converts to Christ. They told with pride of the star in the East, which they had studied and which had guided them towards the West, to the Christ in a manger.

The followers of the Shepherds organized themselves into the Church of the Angel-Led Christians. They planted other churches and built schools and colleges. They loved to paint angels over their pulpits. They appealed especially to the lowly and to the workers, yet emphasized the mystic experience of hearing angel music and angel voices and of seeing the glory of the Lord in the sky as the way the Shepherds had found Christ. And more and more this began to seem to them the right way and then the only way.

And the followers of the Wise Men organized themselves into the Church of the Star-Led Christians. They planted other churches and built schools and colleges. They loved to put a star high over their pulpits. They appealed to the learned and the thinkers. They emphasized the faithful study of the stars and the interpretation thereof as the way the Wise Men had found Christ. And more and more this began to seem to them the right way and, then, the only way.

And strife arose between the Church of the Angel-Led and the Church of the Star-Led. At last severe and uncompromising men in the Church of the Angel-Led said, "No man who is not angel-led is a Christian," and they cast out of their fellowship any man tainted with the heresy of the Star-Led. And severe and uncompromising men in the other church did the same. But the Jews of Jerusalem and the heathen of the East thought that these severe and uncompromising men were the only representatives of Christ and they turned from him.

And alas, many gentle and trustful souls in the Church of the Star-Led heard the criticism of the other church. They wondered if it might not be true and they began to fear that they only imagined they had found Christ. And alas, many gentle and trustful souls in the Church of the Angel-Led suffered the same hard experience of doubt and they feared that the foundations had been swept away from under them. And no man could tell which felt the more terrible grief and dismay.

The strife waxed from debate to blows, from heresy trials to actual fighting, and at last there was warfare over Bethlehem itself. One day the stable door was forced open by the contestants in their fierce struggle. Lo, the manger was there but not the Christ Child. And a figure like that of John, the beloved disciple, stood by the side of the manger. He raised his hand with sad and stern majesty to stop their strife, and spoke: "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, cannot love God whom he hath not seen." And he said further, "Remember the dying word of the Christ for whose glory ye think ye are contending, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; even as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." Together they cried, "What, not the sign of the Star-led, nor the sign of the Angel-led?" "Nay," said the angel, "by this sign shall men know, if ye love one another."

The interpretation of the parable and the meaning thereof is this: Not the Angel Song, nor the Star in the East made the first Christmas, but the Christ in the Manger.

Not any way by which men can come to Christ, not angels nor stars, not Bibles nor churches, not sacraments nor creeds, but the living Christ himself is still God's great Christmas gift and the Glad Tidings of Great Joy. All these other things may be good, but Christ is best. Hold fast to him, worship and obey him by loving one another. Then Christlike deeds of righteousness and mercy and self-sacrifice shall warm men's hearts. They still will differ at many points, but they will not be far from him nor from each other. According to his word, they truly will be his disciples and they will not hide him from the world.

Progress in Howard University

The trustees of Howard University, at a special meeting held in Washington on Dec. 10, gave thorough consideration to complaints that had been made against the administration and found not sustained by evidence. The administration of President J. Stanley Durkee was vindicated completely, and the findings of the trustees heartily approved his policy and strongly commended the remarkable progress made by the university during the last eight years under his leadership.

Opposition to President Durkee developed several years ago among some of the older friends of Howard University who disapproved the changes made in the university and which, as the trustees express it, have raised it from an institution "of moderate size and influence to the most important institution for the education of youth of the colored race in the United States." Reorganization and raising standards have made necessary the change of status and the displacement of certain teachers. They and their friends have developed agitation against Dr. Durkee rather widely and in ways by no means creditable. They have accused Dr. Durkee of arbitrary and irregular action and of being unfit for his position. The trustees gave a long day's hearing to complainants from the alumni association, even calling in the members of the faculty who could be reached, to the number of over 50. Naturally not all agreed on policy or methods, but the evidence was overwhelming and convincing in support of Dr. Durkee. The trustees themselves were responsible for the policies and most of the acts for which Dr. Durkee was blamed, the wisdom of which are demonstrated by results.

As a result of reorganization and consolidations voted by the trustees last June and by order of the executive committee a few days later, the services of four teachers were discontinued. They protested, claiming that they should be reinstated or given longer notice. In order that the teachers displaced may suffer as little as possible, the trustees generously have voted leave of absence to each of the four teachers for one year with full pay, their connection with the university to cease on June 30, 1926.

Conditions in Howard University today are better than ever before, and Dr. Durkee deserves chief credit for them.

"Failures of Liberalism"

To the Editor of The Congregationalist:

I have read with interest in the last issue of The Congregationalist the article, "The Failures of Liberalism," by a liberal. The president of Beloit College certainly did a thorough job in stating the failures of liberalism and I confidently expected before the article closed he would state, at least in outline, a program for constructive work and worship from the standpoint of the liberal interpretation of the Bible.

Having shown the fallacies of the old methods of Bible interpretation I fully expected to find a few paragraphs that would show the better way of the liberal method stated in Biblical terms,—terms of life in which I could sense the Master's own personal touch, which would warm my soul and give me a spiritual thrill and send me to my work with a new sense of responsibility to Christ for my fellow men.

It seems to me that if Liberalism has done a real work it should have laid bare the real Fundamentalism for higher Christian living. I like to think that there is such a thing as Liberal Fundamentalism.

Endorses Dr. Maurer

To the Editor of The Congregationalist:

The issue of Dec. 3 of The Congregationalist is one of unusual interest and inspiration. Among the best are the review of Dr. Sheldon's autobiography by the editor; Dr. Gordon's gracious sermon and prayer; the Parable of the Taj Mahal, by Safed the Sage, and the contributed editorial by Dr. Maurer.

It's my profound conviction that Dr. Maurer has treated in a frank and masterly manner a subject of vital import. He has struck every nail on the top with a solid blow. He has done it in such a beautiful spirit that all of us should appreciate it. I heartily endorse every word in the article. It has been my privilege for over a year to enjoy the luxury of being a sermon taster. More than half my Sundays have been given to hear all sorts of preachers. I have taken pains to divide myself between Fundamentalists and Modernists, and with hardly an exception the latter are weak on the points mentioned by Dr. Maurer as compared with the former. Last Sunday morning I listened to one of the best representatives of Fundamentalism in this city. He preached to a large congregation a simple and impressive sermon. I walked for nearly an hour after the service, and endeavored to express to myself the secret of his power. My conclusions were that he was definite and positive, that he was serious and devout; he was extraordinarily Biblical and spiritual, and he made a direct and unctuous appeal to the conscience. Those elements are often conspicuously absent in the preaching of the Modernist.

I have come to the painful conclusion that Fundamentalist preachers, as a rule, give evidence of a greater burden and passion for souls than the Modernists. And I am rather impressed that they have more of the wisdom that winneth souls.

I thank Dr. Maurer for his splendid article, and hope the subject will be thoroughly discussed. I think The Congregationalist is getting richer week by week. This is the testimony of a half-a-century reader.

Keep the Past in the Past

One of the hardest pieces of business in the world for some people is to keep the past in the past, and live for a new and better future. They look back to some action taken with most honorable intent: "It was an error of judgment," they say, "and has spoiled my whole life." Even no heaven can be bright enough, they think, no future creative enough, to transmute the grief-smitten life into something dear and satisfying, and let that ancient pang of regret cease to be a stabbing memory.

They forget that their eternal Partner is One who says, "Behold, I make all things new!" The pattern so sadly marred by life's inflictions, or by their own past awkwardness or inattention or wrongdoing, can even yet be turned into a thing of beauty, with the confidence that as the years go by it can be made into a thing always more beautiful and more radiant. Thus the soul makes use of the opportunity with which it is entrusted. Thus it learns the mastership that it must learn sometime, somehow. It makes itself a coworker with God, for bringing good out of evil, beauty out of ugliness, victory out of defeat, everlasting joy out of the sorrows of the world. It goes forward, with God, into a future wherein good shall triumph, tears be turned into laughter.

A little boy sat in a front pew in church now many years ago, and heard the minister announce for text the words, "Nevertheless afterward." Just those words. Strange text to boyish ears. But now, from fullness of experience, he can imagine what the point may have been. We are all bewildered by life as we experience it. We cavil at its dealings. We impugn its justice. We impeach it for letting us suffer the consequences of our own mistakes. Nevertheless, afterward we shall be glad for all the hardship, when we have permitted—and helped—life to bring us to the needed greatening and perfecting of our nature, and have become what we are meant to be. It is our business in life to see to it that the sculptor's maxim becomes true of our souls: "the more the marble wastes, the more the figure grows."

In the middle of the Atlantic, on a very foggy night this last autumn, a liner was ploughing ahead by dead reckoning. The incessant hoarse bellowing of the ship's horn was a portentous thing. Overwhelmed by the thought of the terrors of life and the lonely helplessness of the frail human struggler, a sleepless voyager found life's old question banging at her mind: how can it be true that God is love? But sharp on the heels of that thought came the memory of a tremendous affirmation that was once made: "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father." The troubled mind turned to the life of compassion, justice, and love unbounded that Jesus had lived, and sleep came with the thought, "I know what God is from Jesus' life, and I will trust him even though I cannot understand his ways."

Disappointed not once or twice alone as life's years go by, harassed by unsatisfied longings, tortured by the memory of our blunders, logic and appearance seem to give no hope for the future. How, then, shall the soul find strength to go on gladsomely and triumphantly? Only by maintaining heroic confidence in the truth of its own noblest intuition; by deliberately feeding itself on the thought of God as the Must-be-so who is great enough to bring compensation and beauty out of all life's bewildering tangle.

Closet and Altar

LOVE OF THE BRETHREN

Seeing ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth through the Spirit unto unfeigned love of the brethren, see that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently.—1 Pet. 1: 22.

Therefore, come what may, hold fast to love. Though men should rend your heart, let them not embitter or harden it. We win by tenderness, we conquer by forgiveness. O strive to enter into something of that large celestial charity which is meek, enduring, unretaliating, and which even the overbearing world cannot withstand forever. Learn the new commandment of the Son of God—not to love, but to love as he loved.—Frederick W. Robertson.

Love feels no burden, thinks nothing of trouble, attempts what is above its strength, pleads no excuse of impossibility; for it thinks all things lawful for itself and all things possible.

It is therefore able to undertake all things, and it completes many things, and brings them to a conclusion, where he who does not love, faints and lies down.—Thomas à Kempis.

Christ placed all rest, and had no resting-place;
He healed each pain, yet lived in sore distress;
Deserved all good, yet lived in great disgrace;
Gave all hearts joy, himself in heaviness;
Suffered them live, by whom himself was slain;
Lord, who can live to see such love again?
Countess of Pembroke.

For as Love has no by-ends, wills nothing but its own increase, so everything is as oil to its flame; it must have that which it wills, and cannot be disappointed, because everything naturally helps it to live in its own way, and to bring forth its own work. For the wrath of an enemy, the treachery of a friend, and every other evil, only helps the Spirit of Love to be more triumphant, to live its own life and find its own blessings in a higher degree.—William Law.

It is written, "To serve God and live to him is easy to him who doeth it." Truly it is so to him who doeth it for love, but it is hard and wearisome to him who doeth it for hire. But God rejoiceth more over one man who truly loveth, than over a thousand hirelings.—Theologia Germanica.

For Paul, as for Christ, there is no possible discharge from the duty of love, no substitute for it. Other things, even so-called spiritual gifts, are not only no substitutes, but themselves are worthless without love. No speaking with tongues, with its accompanying ecstatic emotional state—most highly prized of all the spiritual gifts of his time—is of any value without genuine love. No mystery-solving knowledge, no wonder-working faith can possibly profit, if there is not love in the life. No magnificent acts of liberality, Paul continues, no heights of ascetic torture, even unto death, without love, are of the slightest avail.—Henry Churchill King.

O Gracious Lord God, who deignest to make of man thy mirror, that we in one another may behold thine image and love thyself; unto every one of us grant, we beseech thee, thus to love and thus to be beloved. For Jesus Christ's sake—Amen.

Christina G. Rossetti.

The Love That Never Fails

Comment on the Prayer Meeting Topic for January 3-9

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: How Does God Show His Loving Care? Luke 12: 6-8; I Peter 5: 7; Psalm 23: 1-6. (Consecration Meeting.)

Light from the Bible Passages

God has no favorites among his creatures. He loves the little and the great. His providence is for all. Just and unjust both receive blessings from his hand. All the more condemnation falls on those who receive his gifts and still remain unjust. Men may forget him; he forgets none. Fear is a forgetting of his loving care. We can always be sure he cares for us. He never fails to acknowledge us as his children. No one fully recognizing this can fail to acknowledge him before men. Psalm 23 is the Christian's song of trust. God provides for us when we have needs; he renews us when we are fagged in spirit; he leads us when the way is uncertain; he accompanies us when we pass through the darkness; he continually pursues us with goodness.

Leads for Leaders

Two main thoughts in this New Year's meeting should be: a deeper recognition of what God does for us; and a firmer resolve that in response we shall do more for him. The more we realize the first, the more we shall feel compelled to do the latter.

Why does not God pay us in kind? Is he under obligation to care for us since he brought us into the world? Do we take his kindness as a matter of course with no obligation resting upon us? What does a receiver owe to a giver?

Some have to live in poverty or pain. Does God love them less and us more? Do we ever stop to consider how much we have to be grateful to him for blessings of competence and health that have come to us? Do we deserve them more than the others who do not have them? How do we show our appreciation?

Why were we born in a Christian land with all its privileges? Note some of these in comparison with those available for a young person in Central Europe or Central Africa. Does God love them less and us more? What should this mean in our lives?

Thoughts for Members

I know not where his islands lift
Their fronded palms in air;
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond his love and care.
—Longfellow.

Worry is something that may be transcended, and the power by which you transcend it is trust in God and the service of man.
—Oliver Huckel.

O love of God most full,
O love of God most free,
Thou warm'st my heart, thou fill'st my soul,
With might thou strength'nst me:
Warm as the glowing sun,
So shines thy love on me,
It wraps me round with kindly care,
It draws me unto thee.
—Oscar Clute.

A Moment of Prayer

O God, whose love is over all, the children of thy grace, whose rich and tender blessings fall on every age and place, hear thou the songs and prayers we raise in eager joy to thee, and teach us as we sound thy praise, in all things thee to see. Amen.
—John Haynes Holmes.

AMONG THE NEW BOOKS

Religious Education

FACING STUDENT PROBLEMS, by BRUCE CURRY (Council of Christian Association. $1.00). An outline for the discussion of thirty problems which face modern students. The materials and methods herein contained are the outgrowth of discussions conducted by the author in colleges and universities throughout the country. This book is for the leader of the group; a much simpler outline is also provided for the student members of the class.

RIGHT LIVING: A discussion course for Girls and Boys, by MAURICE J. NEUBERG (University of Chicago Press. $1.25. Teacher's Manual). This is a course for early adolescents based upon life experiences. The author has gathered over 600 incidents from real life, each of which presents some moral problem. These have been grouped according to the main problems represented, thus furnishing material for 26 lessons. Each lesson begins with the statement of one of these life situations, followed by a few questions to bring out its meaning, and by general discussion. The book is a step in the right direction. Its point of contact is the actual experience of real boys and girls. Its use should restore interest in many groups where it is now lacking and lead to a more practical appreciation of the Bible.

THE HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT OF CHRISTIANITY, by OSCAR L. JOSEPH (Scribners. $1.50). This volume, in the Life and Religion Series, is a concise, valuable handbook for individual reference or for use in classes. The author has managed to pack a great amount of solid and essential information into a little book of less than two hundred pages.

Two Books by Professor Myers

Reviewed by Jean Moore Cavell

WHAT IS RELIGIOUS EDUCATION? by A. J. WM. MYERS (National Sunday School Union, 57 and 59 Ludgate Hill, London, 1925). Dr. Myers, of the Hartford School of Religious Education, sets out with a carefully drawn and clearly elaborated statement of this definition: "Religious education aims to help each person achieve his own highest and best life, in fellowship with God, and in co-operation with and in service of his fellows, and to promote a civilization embodying ever more fully the ideals of Jesus." The following chapters present a sound and well-rounded conception of religious education as the achievement of character, not through creeds and belief alone, but through the development of life as a unified whole. These principles are regarded as fundamental to all religious education:

Life is a unit, both individual and social aspects must develop harmoniously.

Character is achieved through proper development of latent powers.

Growth takes place according to law.

Religious education must deal with vital experiences and interests of pupils.

Religious education is not identical with Bible study.

Convictions, not creeds, are of character-forming value.

Religious education is a continual and unending growth. While the discussion is scholarly and far-reaching, the author has succeeded in making the book very readable, and of value to all groups of readers.

EVANGELISM, by A. J. WM. MYERS (National Sunday School Union, London, 1925). Based upon the thesis that evangelism may be accomplished through sane education as well as through the emotional conversion, the book presents the position that religious education should so develop intelligence and emotions that the individual grows naturally into Christian character. A turning back to right paths is made unnecessary, because there has been no going astray, but rather a continually growing love for and fellowship with the Heavenly Father. The great work of the Christian Church is to conserve every life by developing each person to his highest and best possibilities as revealed by the life and ideals of Jesus. The subject of educational evangelism, in Dr. Myers' book, receives a thoroughly balanced and sane treatment.

The Social Outlook

THE RELATION OF GOVERNMENT TO INDUSTRY, by M. L. REQUA (Macmillan. $2.00). There is at the present hour no more interesting and vital theme than that of the relation of the State to indivdiuals and groups, and to the various functions of a complex society. It is the one phase of this theme—the State's activity in relation to industry—which Mr. Requa discusses from the standpoint of one who has had large engineering and administrative experience. In treating of the three conceptions, or ideals, of government in relation to industry—paternalism, communism, and individualism—Mr. Requa rejects the first two to hold with the latter. The chief defects of Mr. Requa's discussion seem to us to lie in a failure to see that modern developments in industry have been so rapid and so unique that historic precedents are rendered of doubtful value in their light upon the probable effect of new measures and relationships, and likewise a failure to appreciate the extent to which paternalism, communism, and individualism are no longer necessarily mutually exclusive, but are, on the contrary, ultimate and essential principles which almost inevitably will all find expression in complex modern society, each in some degree modifying and restraining the other two.

SOCIAL PATHOLOGY: A SCIENTIFIC INQUIRY INTO THE ILLS OF SOCIETY, by STUART A. QUEEN AND DELBERT M. MANN (Crowell. $3.50). This book of over seven hundred pages, in Crowell's Social Science Series, is an invaluable survey of the field of social pathology especially as social ills and situations constitute personal, human problems. The case and project method give the book great interest in its details and much direct practical worth in its suggestions for the social worker. While primarily a book of social pathology, rather than of social therapeutics, its method inevitably gives it great remedial and constructive importance. Its thirty-nine chapters are in four parts. Part I deals with family disorganization, Part II with economic disorganization, Part III with health problems in relation to social disorganization, and Part IV with social reorganization and the re-making of personality. The authors are Professor and Assistant Professor, respectively, in the department of Sociology in the University of Kansas.

FACTORS IN AMERICAN HISTORY, by A. F. POLLARD (Macmillan. $2.50). A part of the interest of this volume lies in the fact that it is an interpretation of various factors in American History, by an English historian, Professor of English History in the University of London. Professor Pollard's point of view is that American history is as much as history in the mother country, a continuation of mediaeval English history, and that of the two developments on independent, but parallel, lines since 1776, the study of each is necessary for the understanding of the other. In view of the fact that Americans are so commonly accused of provincialism, one reads with interest Professor Pollard's statement that "if Britons were as conspicuously eager to learn about the United States as American students are about England, there would be fewer obstacles to that better understanding which it is the object of the Sir George Watson Foundation [upon which these lectures were delivered] to foster."

SOCIAL PROBLEMS OF TODAY, by GROVE S. DOW (Crowell. $2.00). A practical textbook on Sociology for High Schools, based upon Prof. Dow's Society and its Problems. The book is freely illustrated and its narrative form is well adapted to win the interest of the immature student in a subject which, properly presented, is the most alluring of all studies.

Fiction

RUBEN AND IVY SEN, by LOUISE JORDAN MILN (Stokes. $2.00). The marriage of an Oxford-bred Chinese diplomat to an English society girl provided the theme for a former story by Mrs. Miln, entitled Mr. and Mrs. Sen. This book is the story of the dramatic results of that marriage as it affected the two children, Ruben and Ivy. The father had died when the children were young, prior to the opening of this story. Ruben, who is English in appearance, is intensely Chinese in spirit, proud of the memory of his father and full of love for his mother. Ivy, on the other hand, Chinese in physical characteristics, hates her name, and passionately resents her parents' marriage. She longs to see her mother marry again so as to free her from her name and the stigma of this former marriage. She is resolved also to marry the first man who asks her to do so, provided he has an English name. The situation gives a gifted author full opportunity for displaying her knowledge of Chinese backgrounds and for the dramatic portrayal of the emotions and problems involved in the contacts of two widely different civilizations, symbolized and made concrete in personal contacts. Mrs. Miln writes from the standpoint of strong admiration for the Chinese. Is a reviewer right in saying that the China she describes exists only in the pages of her novels, or do her novels faithfully depict a limited China—that of the "sash-wearers," or ancient feudal aristocrats?

THE PENCILED FROWN, by JAMES GRAY (Scribners. $2.00). Timothy Whnkoop, fresh from college, gets a position as dramatic critic on a daily newspaper, but finally becomes a police reporter. His disillusioning experiences are brightly and freshly told by an author with a real sense of humor. Romance enters into the story, but as in the proverbial tale, true love does not run smoothly.

PILGRIM CHEER, by the late REV. J. P. STRUTHERS (Doran. $2.00). A book of devotional readings, consisting of sixty-six selections from the sermon manuscripts of the late minister of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, Greenock, Scotland. The late Principal James Denney expressed the high attainment of Dr. Struthers in his reference to him as "original, deep, tender, and searching like the Bible itself."

WITH THE CHILDREN

Menka, Who Never Hurt a Living Thing

By Minnie Sloane Snell

In a bygone age, in a certain country, the boys and girls were taught to believe that, if they never wilfully hurt anything, they would come, in time, to know what the beasts and birds said, and to understand the language of the plants and trees. They were told that, if they never knowingly injured a living creature, they might expect to awake, some fine morning, able to make out the message the pine was tap-tap-tapping on the windowpane; able to tell what the cattle in the stable were gossiping about, and to enjoy the joke with the giggling brook. To prove to the little ones that this reward might be theirs for the earning, the grandmothers of that land told a story about a man who lived all his life without ever intentionally harming anything.

This man's name was Menka. By the time his age was seven times ten years, so the old women said, he had become attuned not only to animal and plant language, but to the voice of the wind, as well—and even to the tiny, soft voices of the snow-crystals. The funny part of it was that, except for an uncommon sweetness and gentleness of countenance, Menka looked just like an ordinary man.

In telling the story, the ancient dames did not say what Menka did for a living; but it appears that the pursuit of his calling (whatever it may have been) took him, one cold winter's day, to a settlement many miles from the village where he lived. The way to this place led through a thick wood.

It was not the first time Menka had made the journey. No indeed! He had made it, more than once, in the spring of the year, when shy gleams of color marked the path, birds warbled advice and directions, and crickets, new-thawed from their winter sleep, warned him of the turns. Many times he had gone through the wood in the summer months, when a warm wind had accompanied him and guided the old man by gently touching his white hair. Once he had safely traversed the strip of forest when the chill of autumn was in the air. Then gay leaves had fluttered before him all the way. They had dipped and danced and pointed and beckoned, until the route was as plain as the way of duty.

This time it was different. It was winter now, there was no mistake about that; no mistake whatever—and the winters in that country are very, very cold. For weeks, snow had covered the ground; it lay in white drifts against the thickets and fences and changed the whole contour of the landscape. As for the path through the wood—it simply wasn't.

Menka knew that, in going upon his errand, he was in danger of being lost; but he was brave, as well as kind, so he put a piece of bread and a bit of cheese in his pocket, took his stout staff in one hand and his courage in the other, and set off.

"K-tap, k-tap, k-tap," went the stout staff.

The first stage of his journey was across some miles of settled country. Houses along the roadside looked wonderingly at him, from out their window-eyes. His friends, the snowbirds, companioned him for a time, hovering delicately over his head or tripping lightly before him, the tracery of their footprints showing like a pattern of lace on the snow. One little fellow, brighter-eyed and lighter-winged than the others, perched on Menka's shoulder and pecked his cheek.

"Hark, hark, hark!" he twittered.

The old man inclined his ear and "harked" carefully.

"Menka-who-never-hurt-a-living-thing," the little bird chirped, "do not go through the wood! You may be lost in the forest, and, if night overtakes you there, you will surely freeze."

The warning words came in a succession of short, tremulous sounds. You and I would have taken them to be song-notes; but Menka understood. He replied:

"The people beyond the wood have need of me. I may lose my way—and my life—but I must go."

Upon hearing this, all the little birds were sad. They wheeled in the air and flew back to the place whence they came. "K-tap, k-tap, k-tap," went the stout staff on the frozen crust of the snow, while Menka trudged sturdily on.

When he came to the edge of the clearing, it was noon. He went a little way into the forest, and sat on a fallen tree to eat his lunch, sharing his bread with a squirrel, which, in turn, warned him of the danger, as his feathered friends had done. Menka and Plumy-tail had been fast friends since the squirrel was a wee thing with only fringes of hair along the sides of his tail—a baby-squirrel that could do little but squirm and squeal. At that time, even Menka used to be somewhat puzzled to know what the bright-eyed ball of reddish fur was trying to say. Now he was grace itself,—full grown and confident. He came leaping from branch to branch, calling out, "Kut-e-k' chuck! Kut-e-k' chuck! Whit, whit, whit, kut-e-k' chuck!" You and I would have made the mistake of supposing the chatterer to be merely scolding (the way those rogues do), but Menka understood and replied as he had to the birds. And the squirrel was sad, as they had been; for he, too, loved the gentle old man.

After Menka had finished his lunch, he went a short distance farther into the forest; then stopped to listen to what the trees might have to say to him. They were all about him, untouched by the ax of the lumberman; many were withered with age; others had fallen, and their decayed trunks were covered with mosses and lichens; but most were strong and straight and in their prime. Some stood so close that he could look up at the sky through their branches; countless others stretched away, in gray-green ranks; but every tree was different, every tree was itself.

He waited for their message. At first he could hear nothing but silence—that peaceful hush which comes before a storm. Then the pines began to whisper to him. They told him the wind was coming; and, before the whisper died, the wind came—the cold north wind which blew by, jostling him and wailing shrilly, as it passed:

"I can't stop now to talk to you-o-o-o, Menka-who-never-hurt-a-living-thing! I am trying to see how far south I can get before I die of the heat. You-o-o-o will excuse me, won't you-o-o-o?"

Although he was shivering, Menka managed to smile as he replied, "I will excuse you."

The boisterous wind snatched the words from the old man's lips and carried them away.

"K-tap, k-tap, k-tap," went the stout staff, as Menka trudged on.

After the wind had passed, the air grew so bitter cold that Menka felt stiff and shrunken inside his clothes, and wished he had twice as many clothes to feel stiff and shrunken inside of. Then the snow came. The air was thick with it. Now the voice of the snow is so small you and I would not have known the crystals were speaking; but Menka heard them murmur, as they fell past his face:

"Menka-who-never-hurt-a-living-thing, we are sorry to hide the path; but we were sent from our cloud-home to tuck the land under a fleecy white blanket. Please do not blame us."

Menka's lips were blue and his teeth were chattering, but his voice was gentle. "I do not blame you, snowflakes," he comforted them; "each of us must fulfill his purpose." And he stumbled blindly on until the snowstorm was spent, then stopped and looked about him, bewildered and uncertain which way to turn.

The sky cleared and the long light of afternoon slanted through the tops of the firs. Menka felt the beauty of the tree-trunks, the loveliness of their tossed branches; but he searched in vain among them for an old friend, to tell him the direction. The fir trees were indifferent to the old man's plight; and he turned away from them, hurt, and with tears in his eyes.

The new-fallen snow was soft under his feet (so that he sank deep with every step), and so light it rose like dust about him as he floundered through the drifts. It crept in over the tops of his shoes and searched out his toes with tiny cold touches. Very soon, his feet were as heavy as lead. Still, he kept going until supper-time (there was no supper, you know, only the time), when he finally gave himself up for lost. Then he dropped down, exhausted, where a huge old tree with outgrowing roots gnarled above the soil gave him some slight protection.

For a time Menka sat very still, at the foot of the tree. The red glow of the sky deepened to orange, then died out leaving a stretch of darkness. Night came. Seen through the black fingers of the pines, the stars looked like an endless garden of small white flowers, waving on unseen stems. As the old man watched them bow and dip, his relaxed body sank into the snow which had drifted against the twisted roots and great furrowed trunk of the tree. A delicious drowsiness stole over him. He forgot cold and hunger; and seemed falling, falling, falling, into peace.

After a while, his ear caught a sound hard to place, an odd, dull "thump, thump, thump." Curiosity was stronger than his desire to sleep. You and I would have thought the sound the throbbing of our own pulses; but Menka, after listening a minute, recognized it as the voice of the drift. He was even able to make out the words, which were run together like this:

"Men-ka-who-nev-er-hurt-a-liv-ing-thing-do-not-sleep-or-you-nev-er-more-will-a-wake. Menka admitted the truth of this, and tried to shake off his lethargy; but he found he could not move. His whole body felt dead, and sleep was creeping over him again, when he heard another voice. "Gr-r-r! Gr-r-r-r! Gr-r-r-r-r!" It was a strong, rough voice, and came from between the distorted roots of the tree.

Menka was puzzled this time, sure enough, and so curious to find out what was speaking that he managed, somehow, to struggle to a sitting position, his eyes wide with astonishment. Never before had he heard a tree growl.

Whisper? Oh, yes, he had often heard trees whisper, and sigh, and groan and moan and even roar, but never before had he heard one say, "Gr-r-r-r-r-r!" Moreover, although he listened carefully, he could not make out the meaning until the growl was repeated a third time, impatiently. "Gr-r-r-r-r-r-r-r-r-r-r-r! Woof! Woof! Woof!" Then Menka laughed aloud at his own stupidity. It was as clear, now, as the warning of the birds had been, as the admonition of the squirrel, the words of the pines, the wind, and the snow.

"Menka-who-never-hurt-a-living-thing, what do you mean by freezing to death on my front porch? Come on in, and get warm!"

It was plain as day, now, to Menka: and, although you and I could not have understood a single word of it, even we should doubtless have guessed, by this time, that the speaker was a bear, a brown bear that was hibernating in a den, between the roots of the huge old tree. And no wonder Mrs. Bruin was cross about being awakened from her nap. No wonder, either, that Menka was glad to overlook the crossness and accept the proffered hospitality.

The half-frozen man had to make more than one effort before he could drag his numb body into the bear's winter bedroom. You and I might have complained because the place was close and stuffy, but Menka was grateful for the warmth. He snuggled close up against the smelly, woolly, brown coat; and the chill went out of his bones.

The next morning, the sun rose bright and early and polished the forest till it fairly glistened. When Menka, very quietly (not to wake his bed-fellow) came creeping out of the hollow trunk, the sun tossed a golden ray into the old man's eyes. Then Menka saw that the trees all about him were not strangers, after all; nor indifferent to his welfare, but had only seemed so, yesterday, because his own understanding had been dulled by fear and fatigue. Now he recognized his friends, grandfather pines and great-grandfather spruces (which had been old when Menka was young), and whose sage advice came in wheezy tones; slim, young birches, which bent their silver bodies in the direction he should follow; and dark cypresses which spread their flat hands in benediction as he passed.

"K-tap, k-tap, k-tap." The snow had hardened, in the night, so that the stout staff did not break the crust. Thus, Menka-who-never-hurt-a-living-thing found his way safely through the wood, and arrived, in due season, at the settlement where the people had need of him.

The Christmas Star

A Children's Carol

By Hattie Vose Hall

All in the night—all in the night,
Glad Star of Bethlehem shineth so bright!
Where watchful shepherds are tending their sheep,
Where little white lambs are lying asleep,
Shineth the Star!
Shineth the Star!

Out of the sky—out of the sky,
Angels are chanting in Heaven so high;
"Glory to God!" is the song that they sing,
Great and glad tidings to all men they bring,
Peace and good will!
Peace and good will!

On Mary's breast, on Mary's breast,
Little Lord Jesus, how sweet is his rest!
Wise men are bending full lowly before him,
Kings bearing treasure have come to adore him—
Savior and Lord!
Savior and Lord!

With the Schools and Colleges

Bangor Convocation Plans

The annual convocation of Bangor Theological Seminary will be held Feb. 1-5, with an attractive program and distinguished speakers. The Quiet Hour services will be led by Prof. Rufus M. Jones, of Haverford College, author and lecturer. The lectures on preaching will be given by Dr. Raymond Calkins, of Cambridge, Mass., his subject being "The Christian Experience and the Christian University." Prof. Manley O. Hudson, of Harvard, international law expert, will give the Applied Christianity lectures. His subject will be "Instrumentalities of World Peace." Dr. Ambrose W. Vernon, professor of Biography in Dartmouth College, will speak on "Diverse Figures on the Outskirts of Christianity."

Whitman College Making Strong Advances

Whitman College, Walla Walla, Wash., is rejoicing in the fact that the college is now completely free from debt and is able to meet fully the conditions set by the General Education Board, offering to give $125,000 for endowment when $250,000 additional had been paid in for the set purpose. A new dormitory for women is now under construction. It will accommodate all the women that the college can take care of who come from out of town. It will also have a large reception room, parlors, library, guest room, and suites for the dean of women and the special advisor of health. The building will be ready for use in September, 1926. The increased endowment will make possible an increase in the salaries of the faculty who have been working for a small stipend.

The forward steps taken have been made possible by the generous statesmanship of the Whitman Building Corporation, an organization of alumni. It built three years ago for the college the Lyman House, a dormitory for freshmen boys, at a cost of $100,000. It rented it to the college on easy terms, which, without involving the college in indebtedness, will make it possible to turn the building over to the college at the end of 20 years. This corporation has made it possible for the college to secure the immediate benefits of its long-time subscribers. It has given the college $150,000 in money in exchange for outstanding subscription notes and has undertaken to build the new dormitory for women at a cost of $150.000 on terms similar to those mentioned above. The attendance at Whitman College this fall is unprecedented and there is a waiting list of students. The president is Stephen B. L. Penrose.

Convocation at Carlton

An experiment which has been tried and found good at Carleton College, Northfield, Minn., is being repeated this year during the Christmas season, when ministers of all denominations of the state are invited to a convocation, Dec. 28 to 31. This gathering is open to laymen as well as to ministers, and all will be entertained on the same plan in the men's dormitory of the college.

The openiñg session of the meeting will be held Monday evening in Goodsell Observatory, which was the scene of a meeting of the American Astronomical Society last summer; Pres. D. J. Cowling will preside and give the address of welcome. The response will be given by Rev. Everett Lesher, D.D., executive secretary of the Congregational Conference of Minnesota. A talk about "The Most Remarkable Star," by Prof. E. A. Fath of the Carleton department of astronomy, will be heard.

The Tuesday sessions of the convocation deal largely with education, and will consist of discussions on such subjects as intelligence measurement, work with boys, radio as an information distributor, philosophy, heredity, and evolution.

The faith of the research man, books and reading, the spirit of the age, moral aspects of business are topics on the program for the following day, and history of religion and science and an "interpretation of Minnesota" will occupy the final sessions. A farewell dinner, with business and social sessions the day before New Year, will complete the program.

As speakers, the college has secured Prof. E. R. Downing of the department of education, University of Chicago, who will lecture on heredity and evolution; Rev. Naboth Osborne, D.D., Burlington, Iowa; Bishop G. G. Bennett of the Episcopal Diocese of Duluth; Prof. T. C. Blagen of the department of history, Hamline University. Other prominent speakers have been secured, among them people from the faculty of Carleton College who are specialists in their particular fields.

Vice-President of Northland

Rev. Earle A. Munger, who has been field representative in Wisconsin for Chicago Seminary during the past three years, has just been chosen vice-president of Northland College, Ashland, Wis. The following is an appreciation of him by President Ozora S. Davis of the seminary.

Mr. Munger has the confidence of his colleagues and the warranted expectations of noble service by all the friends of Northland. He is a most faithful and devoted worker, interpreting all his tasks in the terms of personal Christian loyalty and never failing to add to an interview or a personal relationship of any kind the accent of spiritual vision and high idealism.

He was born in Minnesota and moved to Iowa in his early boyhood, where he received his education in high school and in Coe College, from which he was graduated in 1903. During this time he was engaged in practical business relations in the field of writing insurance, so that he combined with his studies a growing knowledge of real life through contacts with men.

Mr. Munger completed his seminary course at Oberlin, graduating in 1906, after which he undertook home missionary work in the state of Washington. In 1914 he was associated with the Central Congregational Church in Winnipeg, Manitoba, as associate pastor and business manager. He has also been connected with educational work as dean of Tabor College and as organizer and circuit manager for the Redpath-Vawter Chautauqua organization.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

A Community Work in Springfield, Massachusetts

What can be done with our small and relatively unsuccessful city churches? The experience of Olivet Church of Springfield, Mass., suggests one possible answer. For years the Olivet Church filled a real place in the life of the city. Its services were well attended, and some of the leading members of the community gave it their enthusiastic support. With the industrial development of Springfield, however, the neighborhood changed and the well-to-do Protestant constituency in the vicinity grew smaller and smaller. During the war the church's plight grew steadily worse, and the general rise in prices at the end of the war proved a problem that the little church could not solve. The Sunday morning congregations dwindled to less than 100, the building stood idle over 90 per cent of the time, the neighborhood grew less and less attractive, and the few loyal members of the church found themselves unable to raise the relatively small budget. What should the church do?

OLIVET COMMUNITY HOUSE, SPRINGFIELD

ADOPTED BY SOUTH CHURCH

In 1920 the Olivet Church offered itself for adoption to the South Church, of which Dr. P. S. Moxom had been the pastor for a quarter of a century and to which Dr. J. G. Gilkey had come as his successor in 1918. The story of the rejuvenation of the Olivet Church, its emergence as a Community House, and the development there of what has been called "one of the most significant child welfare movements in the United States," is one more proof of the familiar thesis that the church can survive in the changing social order of today if it will adapt itself wisely and courageously to its new environment. Whereas in 1920 not more than 200 people—all of them Protestant church members—were using the Olivet property per week, today the attendance averages over 4,000 per week, and includes representatives of some 15 different nationalities and nearly as many Catholics as Protestants. The total attendance at the Community House, as the old Olivet property is now called, reached, last year, the surprising total of 162,000. Two years ago, when the Social and Religious Survey Committee of New York conducted an extensive study of the Community House program, the leader of the investigators reported that only one other Community House in the United States had attempted a program as far-reaching and significant. Since 1920 articles about the Community House have appeared not only in religious journals, but in secular publications like the Boston Transcript, the Boston Post, the Kindergarten and First Grade Magazine, the motion picture magazines, and the Literary Digest. The article in the Literary Digest brought inquiries from all over the country to the Community House office.

MANY NATIONALITIES REPRESENTED

At the present time there are 1,772 families on the Community House mailing-list. The following nationalities are represented: American, Armenian, Canadian, Chinese, Czecho-Slovak, Danish, English, French, German, Greek, Irish, Italian, Jewish, Lithuanian, Negro, Polish, Scotch, Serbian, and Swedish. More than 40 regular activities—ranging all the way from a Well-Baby Clinic to semi-annual rummage sales—are listed on the Community House program. The building and the adjoining playground are in use almost every hour of the day, seven days a week. In addition to carrying on this program of local philanthropy, the Community House offers its facilities to the social agencies of the neighborhood with surprising results. All the health work of the section is now carried on by the city's Visiting Nurse Association from the Community House as a center. The district meetings of the Family Welfare Association are held at the Community House. The Junior Achievement Foundation of Springfield makes the Community House one of its main centers of child welfare work. Several of the employees associations of the city meet at the Community House for their annual festivities, and a number of semi-social clubs, such as the Maine Club, the Friendly Springfield Club, and the Junior League of Springfield, use the building for their regular meetings. Such an extensive program as this enables South Church to offer its members unusual opportunities for immediate and definite Christian service. Last year a careful count was kept of the number of people rendering such volunteer service in seven consecutive days at the church and the Community House. To everyone's surprise, the total proved to be 188.

LUNCHES FOR SCHOOL CHILDREN

In addition to the regular round of activities, such as Scout Troops, boy and girl clubs, and organizations for young men and young women,

MOTION PICTURE SUNDAY SCHOOL, OLIVET COMMUNITY HOUSE, SPRINGFIELD
More than 400 children come to get part of their lesson in the usual way, and the rest through motion pictures.

THE PLAYGROUND (25,000 square feet), OLIVET COMMUNITY HOUSE

the Community House is attempting several unusual philanthropies. One is a school children's lunch, organized for the benefit of the needy boys and girls of the section whose parents are working in industry and who, were it not for this lunch, would get no hot meal between school sessions. Last year 11,363 hot lunches were served during the school year, and the average daily attendance this year of over 100 indicates that all records will be broken before next June. The Community House records show that about one third of these children pay for their lunch (10 cents), about one third have their lunch provided for them by the Welfare Committee of the Springfield Teachers' Association, and about one third are given their lunch free by the Community House. A study made some months ago showed that the majority of these children were from Catholic homes.

Other interesting ventures in child welfare work are the Well-Baby Clinic (now attended by about 35 babies each week), the Free Music School (where the music teachers in the church give instruction to some 20 children who could otherwise not study music), and the playground (where the total attendance last July and August exceeded 22,000). At the playground the children pay approximately one cent a week for their membership during the summer, and a trained playground director, with several assistants, organizes their play. One of the business men in the church became so much interested in this particular activity that he donated $500 for the construction of a large wading-pool. There, during the hottest days of summer, dozens of children play in their bathing-suits and get at least a suggestion of what the seashore would be like.

SUCCESSFUL USE OF MOTION PICTURES

Perhaps the most significant development at the Community House is the religious program. The neighborhood is filled with people who are frankly uninterested in the conventional church service—either Catholic or Protestant. If "fishers of men" are to catch these particular fish, a special bait must be used. In the case of the Community House constituency, the successful bait seems to be high-grade motion pictures. Three years ago the first "Motion Picture Sunday School" in America was opened at the Community House with an attendance of 65. Today nearly 400 boys and girls—of all races, creeds, colors—fill the Community House each Sunday afternoon for this school. Everything is read from, or seen on, the screen. Hymns, Bible verses, announcements, and then a Biblical film, a health film, a good-citizenship film, or a film dealing with the practical problems of modern city children, come in order, while some 50 Sunday school teachers explain to the children the meaning of the pictures or discuss with them the lessons taught, in the period after the film is over. Questions may be raised by older people as to the propriety of using motion pictures in religious education. The important fact to remember is that this particular group of children will take their Sunday school with films or not at all!

The regular evening service at the Community House also makes use of motion pictures. The films are carefully chosen in advance, and the idea for the fifteen-minute address of the evening is taken from some incident in the film. After the address, always of a practical and evangelical nature, the film carries the same message through the eye rather than the ear-gate to the congregation. The attendance at these evening services has assumed almost phenomenal proportions. Last winter people stood in line in the snow for nearly an hour to be sure of admission. The crowds gradually became so great that the experiment was tried of giving the entire evening service twice—at six and again at eight—to accommodate the would-be attendants. From February to Easter the Community House (seating 420) was thus filled twice every Sunday night. This year the service will be given twice every Sunday night from December to Easter. The attendants represent in the main the non-churchgoers of the poorer classes. A questionnaire distributed one Sunday night revealed the interesting fact that fully one third of the congregation was nominally Catholic. Here is surely one evening service that cuts across the tragic lines of division found in so many industrial communities today.

Ripon's Seventy-Fifth

First Church, Ripon, celebrated its 75th anniversary, Nov. 15-22. The church was organized Nov. 21, 1850, in a hotel dance hall under the leadership of Rev. Franklin B. Sherrill, who had just graduated from Union Seminary. Three years afterward the new organization erected its first building. This later became famous as the meeting place of the group that first suggested the name and organization of the Republican Party. This church was also the meeting place of the historic Winnebago Convention, July 30, 1862, which saved

omething New in Annual Meetings

Plymouth Church, Minneapolis, Minn., Dr. H. Dewey, minister, introduced an unusual feare at its annual meeting, held the first week in ecember. The customary written reports of ıe various organizations and departments of ıe church were entirely omitted. By this eroic expedient the formal part of the church ısiness meeting was reduced to a minimum. fter the election of church officers, conducted the dinner tables, the congregation adurned to the social rooms. There they found most interesting and illuminating display, picting the work of the church school, the oy and Girl Scouts, the woman's organizaganization contained samples of the garments sewed, the bandages and surgical dressings made, at the weekly work meeting for the women. For the Settlement House display several children were to be seen engaged in some of the handicraft activities taught at their Settlement House club meetings. In this fashion the work of the church, at home and abroad, was vividly portrayed, in a manner long to be remembered, and what is more, was all made to seem intensely interesting.

After time enough had elapsed to enable all the people to visit the several exhibits, two entertainment "stunts" concluded the evening. In one of these there was shown upon the stage the desk used by the church secretary, with two telephone instruments. A young lady entered, explained that she had promised to "keep the church office" on a day when each member of the staff was absent. Then the telephones began to ring, and by her words into those instruments this capable actor regaled her audience with an interesting sample of the multiplicity of the demands upon the time and patience of the secretary of a busy city church.

The experiment is commended to any churches who have found the annual meeting a "problem."

A Strong Church in Pittsburgh

Since the group of Evangelical Protestant Churches was received into our fellowship at the National Council, attention should be called to a notable service held some time ago at Pittsburgh.

The Smithfield Evangelical Church in Pittsburgh has had a notable history since 1782, when it was founded. It is the oldest religious organization in the community, and during the 143 years of its existence has vitally influenced the higher life of the city. When the corner stone was laid for the new church edifice, an audience of 2,000 people or more witnessed the impressive ceremonies. Mr. H. W. Schove gave the address of welcome. Dr. J. R. Ewers, pastor of the East End Christian Church, spoke in behalf of other denominations. Rev. R. O. Eisele, Moderator of the Evangelical Protestant Conference of Congregational Churches, spoke eloquently in German. Dr. C. E. Burton brought the greetings of the Congregational Churches. His message was vital and inspiring. Dr. C. A. Voss, pastor of the church, placed the corner stone, assisted by Mr. John Dimmling chairman of the building committee. Mr. Ernst Nickel, secretary of the congregation, read the list of documents and articles to be placed in the corner stone, and the copper box containing them was sealed by Mr. John Luckhardt, treasurer of the church.

Dr. Voss, who for 20 years has been the beloved pastor of the church, has made a place for himself in our community life. In a remarkable degree he combines in his genial, friendly personality, profound scholarship, spir-

Conference of Pastors

A conference of pastors for the Island of Oahu was held at Kahala Beach on Nov. 4. The home of Mr. and Mrs. F. C. Atherton was generously loaned for this occasion. The pastors present were A. V. Soares, G. R. Weaver, Tsui Him Weng, H. K. Poepoe, A. S. Baker, P. A. Swartz, John Kauwalu, J. G. Tyssowski, J. K. Paele, T. Hori, Yee Kui, F. S. Scudder, J. P. Erdman, N. C. Schenck, and the treasurer of the Hawaiian Board of Missions, Mr. Theodore Richards. Two other ministers were guests of the conference: Rev. Pardee Erdman, son of Dr. C. R. Erdman, Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, and Rev. E. W. Perry, new pastor of Kahului and Wailuku Churches on Maui. The conference opened with a sermon by Rev. P. A. Swartz. The general subject of "The Church in Relation to the Community" was then taken up for discussion, the following angles of the subject being considered: (1) To the public schools; (2) To other churches; (3) To the city and county Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A.; (4) To matters of political and civic importance; (5) To the home; (6) To the every member canvass.

Filipino Workers Given Places of Leadership

Two Filipino Christian workers at Koloa, Kauai, have come into a position of responsibility and honor recently. The Hi-Y Club of Koloa has unanimously chosen Mr. Edward Emil, a young business man, as leader of their club, and the Pioneer Club of Y. M. C. A. boys has chosen Rev. Catalino Cortezan as their leader. Interest in these choices is increased because of the fact that there are no Filipino boys in the club, most of the boys being of Japanese ancestry.

WASHINGTON

New Church at Harrington

The new church of the Pilgrim faith, formed at Harrington, is rather unusual in at least two ways: in the way it came to be organized, and in the way of providing for its financial support. Realizing that the community was over-churched, both the Baptist Church and the Methodist Church agreed to disband to form a new Congregational Church. In this way nearly all the Protestants in the community came into the one organization. The town is in the midst of a rural district. In describing the financing of the new enterprise, Mr. Harry Reading, who with his wife was largely influential in bringing about the new organization, says, "We hit on a rather unique plan of raising the money for our church. We have asked each farmer to set aside a definite part of his farm, say five acres, the wheat from which shall be given to the support of the church. The men in town agree to give amounts equivalent to acreage of wheat, and so far every person in the community but one has gladly agreed to this plan, and we have promised between $3,000 and $4,000 for the work."

OREGON

Notes of Progress at Central, Salem

Extensive repairs have recently been made on the parsonage of Central Church, Salem,—the interior redecorated, floors revarnished, woodwork repainted, a new furnace installed, the roof reshingled, the back porch enclosed, and a garage added to the equipment. The revived men's club has had several enthusiastic meetings, one of them a Father and Son banquet. The chorus choir recently rendered two sacred concerts, the one on Thanksgiving Day packing the house, the program being repeated later at Willard. The church membership contains unusual musical talent.

Portland Loses Well-Known Pastor

Rev. J. W. Price has resigned from his notably successful work at Pilgrim Church, Portland, to accept an appointment as general missionary in Southeastern Oregon, with temporary headquarters at Klamath Falls. In accepting the resignation the church unanimously adopted resolutions expressing its deep appreciation of Mr. Price's service during the four years of his ministry and especially mentioning the spiritual results of his work, his optimistic outlook, open-mindedness, sincerity, and pleasing personality.

Under Mr. Price's leadership the church has made steady progress in all departments. One hundred new members have been received and the attendance at church services has more than doubled. The church school has nearly doubled in attendance and has been well organized. The salary has been increased from $1,300, without parsonage, to $2,000, with a splendid $5,000 parsonage, and two years ago the church became self-supporting for the first time in its nearly 40 years of history. Two small struggling women's societies were disbanded and all the women of the church were organized into the women's league, with five departments, missionary, social, work, commissary, and social welfare. The income of the new society jumped the first year from $350 to $850, and the next year to nearly $1,100.

Portland Organizes Men's Club

The Men's Congregational Club of Portland, organized this fall, has aroused much interest in all the churches of the city. Rev. F. E. Carlson, of Waverly, has given invaluable service in the launching of this movement. It was through this organization that a fine hearing was obtained for Rev. H. C. Herring and Mr. John Calder, of the Social Service Commission, who recently spent several days there presenting the social service principles adopted by the National Council.

Escondido Dedicates New Property

In a choice growing little city, about 35 miles from San Diego, in a valley famous for grapes and its annual "grape festival," as well as other fruits, the Congregational Church at Escondido occupies a place of large influence. This fall it is happy in a general rededication of its building with some notable improvements.

Plymouth Hall, 62 by 93 feet, is a two-story structure of heavy framework with stucco exterior. Downstairs there is an auditorium to seat 500, or to be used for banqueting purposes, with stage, dressing rooms, attachments for radio, motion pictures, and other conveniences. There are a large, well-equipped kitchen, and a nursery room, business rooms, dressing rooms and shower baths, and several rooms for classes in the church school.

In the second story is generous provision for the beginners, primary, junior, and intermediate departments, club rooms for Hi boys and girls, young people's hall, and ladies' parlor and suite. The cost of Plymouth Hall is $30,000 aside from the furnishings.

Rearrangement of the interior of the main building has been made to correspond with Plymouth Hall. Redecoration of wood work, new pulpit furniture and carpets, with gas

There was rejoicing, too, in the dedication, Nov. 1, of an excellent Pilcher pipe organ. There are 700 pipes in the room, with 33 display pipes. The value of the organ is $6,400. In the week previous to the dedication, there was an organ recital, in which the sweetness of tone and variety of service was generally appreciated. Rev. W. A. Schwimley is in his fourth year of service with this church, which has seen marked advance in strength both materially and spiritually.

Campbell's "Music Week"

"Music Week" at Campbell, under the leadership of Mrs. F. W. Hodgdon, was of great inspiration and uplift. She trained three choirs during this week: a junior group, the Camp Fire Girls, and a choir of adults. She also helped at the high school, gave private aid and instruction, and did much parish visitation.

Sunday evening an excellent sacred concert was given at the church, in which all of these groups participated. The singing of the Camp Fire Girls and the junior choir was remarkable, considering the amount of drilling they had been given.

Anniversary at Vernon Ave., Los Angeles

Vernon Avenue Church, Los Angeles, spent several days in early November, gathering its old friends with the present membership, exchanging stories of personalities and accomplishments during its 40 years of useful history, and girding its loins for the opportunities at hand.

On a Wednesday evening there was a dinner and informal reception to the members received during 1925. Brief talks were given by Rev. W. P. Hardy, former pastor; by Mrs. Hyla Davies and Rev. Paul Davies, from the family of Rev. William Davies who had a notable pastorate of nearly half the church's history; by Deacon James Gillespie and Mrs. George Syer; by Rev. Leon Austin, more recent pastor; and by L. E. Hughes, Margaret Bishop, and T. E. Hirschman for the young people. In conclusion there was an impressive candle lighting ceremony.

At the Sunday morning service there was a roll call of members, the celebration of the Lord's Supper, with Revs. J. L. Maile and Jacob Winslow presiding, and a greeting by Supt. G. F. Kenngott.

A fellowship meeting was held in the afternoon, when a brief history of the church was given and greetings were brought by neighboring churches.

Once a leading church in the city, the constituency has been so infiltrated with foreigners—25 per cent of the people in the neighborhood Negroes, with large numbers of Italians and other alien peoples—that the program must be transformed. Shall the church migrate or shall it adapt itself to the service of its differing neighbors? It has a large church school, and that the young people are a vigorous group is witnessed in their maintaining the Sunday evening meetings during the summer. The church still numbers eighth in membership of the Pilgrim groups in the city, and with its pastor, Rev. F. G. Reid, retains a program of good courage. For six weeks, the midweek service is utilized for a study of China and Japan, led by Rev. Paul Waterhouse. In its changing situation, an endowment fund would be a most valuable adjunct. Toward this, at the celebration, an anniversary fund of $500 was subscribed.

Church School Auxiliary at Wallace

A new effort that is proving helpful in solving the church school problems and in bringing into closer touch and co-operation the school and the community, has been started at Wallace, and is known as the church school auxiliary. It is made up of teachers of the church school and the parents of the pupils, and meets every Tuesday afternoon to discuss the problems of the different departments of the school and the needs of the homes and the community as related to the school. The auxiliary was organized by the pastor, Rev. Wilfred Withington.

Activities at Lyons

When Rev. A. J. Andrewson, pastor of Lyons, returned from a recent absence, the mayor of the town and a committee of business men met him and presented him with a paper containing the names of leading citizens who had contributed toward paint for the newly purchased parsonage. A check for $133 was then handed him. Fifteen new members were recently taken into the church, eight by confession and seven by letter.

Continuing Services at Green Mountain Falls

The church at Green Mountain Falls, situated in a summer tourist town in one of the most beautiful of the mountain regions at the foot of Pike's Peak, is at work to continue services during the winter. Occasional preaching services are held, and recently Supt. J. F. Walker met with them, a business meeting was held, new members were voted into the church, and all was put in order for the coming season. During the summer, ministers are secured entirely from the tourist visitors.

Leeds Methodists and Congregationalists Unite

An advantageous exchange has been made with the Methodist Church so that now the Congregational Church at Lawton has become Methodist, and at Leeds the Methodist Church has united with the Congregational. A parsonage has been purchased at Leeds and necessary repairs have been made upon the property, putting it in good condition for the coming winter. The ladies' aid society, church school, and Christian Endeavor Society are all in good working order. Work on the parish house has already begun. During the summer, services were held in the Empress Theater, the downtown service drawing large crowds.

NEBRASKA

Dedication at Curtis

For nearly 40 years the church at Curtis worked and worshiped in their first primitive building. A modern plant was long overdue but the vicissitudes of prolonged frontier life seemed to make it impossible. The church ministered to a wide area during the hardest years of pioneer life; they imparted the spirit of world service as evidenced by sending out from their own numbers four missionaries, but the ability to build a new church home was not theirs; and only with the greatest heroism and sacrifice could they do it now, and then only with the help of our fellowship.

Rev. Leon Moore, who is serving his second pastorate with the church, led them in the building project. Mr. Moore was strongly supported in this work by Dr. W. A. Tyler, superintendent of state work. It was fitting on dedication day that Dr. Tyler should preach the sermons, and the more so since he was pastor in Curtis in the early days.

An interesting feature of the dedication day service was greetings from former pastors, among which were greetings from Rev. W. D. Page, the first pastor, and Rev. C. W. Preston, the heroic pastor during the trying years of drought and "distribution of aid." Memorial windows were dedicated to James W. Ridgeway; Mary E. Sibley; D. W. Ellis and two grandchildren, Preston Ellis and Carl Heath. These windows honor families who had rendered special service to the church.

HYMNS for the LIVING AGE

Edited by H. AUGUSTINE SMITH

Director of Fine Arts in Religion, Boston University
Director of Music, Chautauqua, N. Y.

Important features of this book:

All words are between the staffs, making it possible to read and sing with ease.

The reinforced binding protects the book against the hard, if devout usage of over-zealous members of the choir.

The responsive readings, which mark a new epoch in Biblical literature for public worship are in the front pages where they can be used without throwing the book out of balance.

The index, which is so rarely used, is in the back of the book.

The musical settings constitute a rich and varied feast throughout and are fitted to the text with great care.

The music is within the range of the average voice and creates no unwilling sopranos and bassos.

No section of the book is over-populated; there are a number of social service hymns, but not at the expense of hymns of devotion.

The price of HYMNS FOR THE LIVING AGE is $1.75. The introductory rate is $1.35 with transportation additional, from New York or Chicago.

missionaries are: Rev. Emery W. Ellis, now in the Williams-Porter Hospital, Tehchow, China; Mrs. Ellis Hubbard, Paotingfu, China; Miss Carrie Hasseltine, under the Baptist Board at Rangoon, Burma; Miss Anna Marie Hansen, under the American Board, Guadalajara, Mexico.

The new building is of pressed brick. It has a light, roomy basement with modern conveniences, including kitchen, dining and social room, and some class rooms for the church school. The second or main floor is full eight feet above the ground level. Here is the ample auditorium furnished with beautiful oak pews; there are also two good class rooms, a choir room and a pastor's study.

It is a plain, modest, substantial building, but its significance can only be understood by considering its contrast to the primitive building which had occupied this same site for many years, and also by knowing its setting among the homes of the city. To the right of the church is the parsonage, an attractive stucco bungalow, which was built a year or two ago.

Melbourne Church Prospers

The church at Melbourne closes a good year, with 53 new members received during 1925 and 50 more on the list for the next Communion. The attendance of the Sunday school has doubled in the last three months and more would attend if there were room. The church is filled at all services and people turned away from the evening service. The young people's class, taught by Mrs. Hanscom, has increased from eight to 40. Dr. G. L. Hanscom, the pastor, will organize a large Bible class when the temporary enlargement of the church is completed. The church paid expenses of eight of its young people to the Young People's Week-End Conference at Winter Park. The centrally located church lot will soon be sold and an adequate house of worship built in a desirable section of the growing city.

Successful E. M. C. by Central, Atlanta

Dec. 6 was a great day with Central Church, Atlanta. Preparations for the every member canvass were thorough. Dr. D. W. The amount pledged for missions and local expenses was 25 per cent above that of last year. The sermons of Dr. Dodge are attracting thoughtful business and professional people. The value of the church property is much enhanced by the building of the Macy six-million dollar store on the adjacent lot.

ation, formerly the State Sunday School Association, and the Hartford Council of Churches to co-operate in religious work in the city of Hartford. One of its outstanding efforts has been the Community School of Leadership Training which has a membership of 100 and meets weekly in Hosmer Hall, Hartford Seminary, and conducts regular classes under the instruction of members of the three schools of the Hartford Seminary Foundation. The group meetings in connection with this annual meeting were under the lead of Rev. W. T. Aiken of the Connecticut Federation of Churches, Mrs. Jean M. Cavell of the Hartford School of Religious Education and Mr. J. W. Mason, one of the advanced students of the same school. At the business meeting Mr. Evan F. Kullgren, a graduate of the Hartford School of Religious Education and director of religious education for Center Church, was chosen president.

Going to Detroit

Rev. R. J. Clinchy has resigned the pastorate of the Cornwall Church to take effect Jan. 1, in order to become associate minister of First Church, Detroit, Mich. Mr. Clinchy has been with the Cornwall Church three years. Before that he was secretary of the American Friends Service Committee in Philadelphia. He is a graduate of Columbia and of Yale Divinity School.

MASSACHUSETTS

Dr. Cross Resigns from First Church, Milford

Dr. A. E. Cross, after 11 years of fruitful service at First Church, Milford, resigned his pastorate Dec. 1. In a brief and beautiful letter Dr. Cross expressed his affection for his people, and stated that he tendered his resignation because he felt that the pressure of compulsory business interests and responsibilities incident to the breaking up of his old home with his mother's death, and the challenge of future opportunity would not permit him to give the church an undivided service. He looks forward to a busy ministry through writing, and in this he will have opportunity to utilize more fully talents for literary creation well attested by an increasing body of hymns which are finding their way into recent hymnals and into enthusiastic use among the churches, as well as by other forms of composition.

His pastorate in Milford has been marked by effective community service, endearing him to the wider parish whose expressions of regret at his departure indicate a grateful appreciation of his larger ministry. His church, too, has received his resignation with profound sorrow. Dr. Cross began his ministerial work in Clifondale, after which he served Park Church, Springfield, several years. In 1902 he became associate pastor with Dr. G. A. Gordon, at Old South Church, Boston, where he remained until called to Milford. In his book, My Education and Religion, Dr. Gordon says, "Dr. Cross had a distinctive literary gift much appreciated by many of our people; he was and is a poet as well as a preacher. A more loyal and lovable soul I have never known." Dr. Cross has been a frequent contributor to The Congregationalist. F. D. T.

Raising Money for Parish House of First, Holyoke

The parish house project of First Church, Holyoke, after careful study was postponed last spring, owing to the severe industrial depression from which Holyoke is beginning to recover. Some large pledges had been made, and a site adjoining the church property had been secured, on which the rentals took care of the carrying charges. Recently deacon emeritus E. K. Judd conceived the idea of doing his part toward the parish house immediately. He quickly saw deacon emeritus William McCorkindale, and the same afternoon two equal checks reduced the parish note at the bank by $10,000. Mr. Judd interviewed about a score of people, securing a total of $17,500, enabling the parish to own the parish house site without encumbrance, and to be free from debt. At the recent annual meeting the pastor, Rev. C. N. Thorp, on his seventh year of service at First Church, voiced the amazement and joy of the people, that through the devotion of one hilarious giver, whose enthusiasm was contagious, this large sum had been raised without the customary tumult and shouting. The beautiful reception room which the skill and funds of the woman's guild have evolved from the old church parlor, was inspected at the meeting. The guild has about $4,500 on hand and has voted to redecorate the church auditorium next summer.

Services of South, Springfield, Broadcasted

The Sunday morning service of South Church, Springfield, was broadcast by radio Nov. 8 and Nov. 22, and in response the church received nearly 50 letters, and cash and checks totaling over $85, representing subscriptions to the church paper and gifts to the work of the church. Dr. J. G. Gilkey is minister of South Church.

Central, Lynn, Has Diamond Jubilee

The 75th anniversary of Central Church, Lynn, was observed Thursday evening, Dec. 10, and on Sunday, Dec. 13. Following a banquet, at which about 400 people sat down, Dr. Nat Breed took charge as toastmaster, and introduced the speakers. Reminiscences given by Miss Chesley, Mrs. Phillips, Mrs. Brock, Messrs. Sprague, Bauer, and Redfield, and Rev. Messrs. Weeden and Chase were most pleasing and bright. The past history of the church was recalled, and all who listened were impressed with the fact that through the years it had gathered to itself a fine type of men and women.

On Sunday morning, the fellowship class, which meets at 9.30, had an attendance of 640 men. There was a capacity attendance at the regular morning service and the pastor, Rev. Garfield Morgan, preached from the text, "He made known His ways unto Moses, and His acts unto the children of Israel." In the sermon a tribute was paid to the leadership of the church, and also to the faithful rank and file, who, together, had made a rich, historic past.

In the evening, Rev. J. M. Phillips addressed a crowded church on "The Strength and Symmetry of Christ's Life." It was a great appeal to all to respond to the charm and challenge, represented by the character of Christ. The day was one of the most significant in the history of the church.

Burlington's Pastor Ordained Forty Years Ago

The Church of Christ, Burlington, established on the hilltop in 1732, is now "carrying on" with renewed life and vigor. The pastor, Rev. C. H. Washburn, who is serving the people for the second time, after an interregnum of 37 years, has recently observed the 40th anniversary of his ordination. Consequently, the church and townspeople took occasion to show their appreciation by gathering in large numbers at the house upon their pastor's birthday. Deacon T. Q. Reed, for more than half a century identified with the material spiritual efforts of the church, acted as spokesman.

Mr. Reed referred to the new day for the old church, telling of the people's love for and devotion to their minister, and then presented Mr. Washburn with a beautiful floral offering together with a generous purse.

The Burlington Church is the only religious organization in a rapidly growing township, and therefore seeks to function as a community church (under Congregational fellowship and guidance).

Boston Evangelist to Work Especially Among Young People

The Greater Boston Federation of Churches, for the first time in its history, has engaged a professional Christian worker, or personal evangelist, Mr. William B. Oliver, who will begin, on Jan. 1, an "Open Bible Crusade," for the purpose of stimulating church attendance and deepening religious life among the young people. His services may be secured by a church, or a group of churches, which especially wishes to carry on evangelistic work of this kind.

Mr. Oliver's evangelism is of the quiet, persistent type which depends more upon the "follow-up" activity of the churches than upon any initial enthusiasm. He has had success in

A Notable Day for First, Somerville

First Church, Somerville, burned its mortgage at the morning service, Dec. 6, in connection with the observance of the sixth anniversary of the pastorate of Rev. S. C. Lang, who began his work with this church Dec. 1, 1919. The mortgage was incurred in April, 1920, for the purchase and extensive renovation of the parsonage. In addition the church organ has been rebuilt, a new heating plant installed, extensive repairs done on the roof and interior of the church, including general painting inside and painting of the woodwork outside, and grading and fencing the church ground. Mr. Lang began his pastorate with a church membership of 298, has received 274 into membership, and the loss by death, transfer, and revision of rolls has been 112, leaving a present membership of 460. This year the admissions have been 24 men and boys, 24 women and girls, of whom 32 were on confession of faith and 16 by transfer.

The mortgage was burned in the presence of a congregation that crowded the church, the burning being done by Deacon J. S. Newcomb, chairman of the executive (or business) committee, and H. D. Wickham, church treasurer. The pastor preached from Psalm cxix. 105—"Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and light unto my path." The every member canvass was held in the afternoon. Incomplete returns showed more than $6,000 pledged of the $7,000 church budget and almost $1,100 pledged of the $1,500 benevolence budget. One of the problems facing this church is larger quarters for the Sunday school departments and ampler provision for young people's organizations.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

Dedication of Parish House at Keene

The new parish house of First Church, Keene, Rev. H. E. Newcomb, pastor, was dedicated at a special service on Dec. 6. The pastor preached the sermon on "Except the Lord Build the House." The keys to the new building were presented to Ralph E. Haywood for the trustees, by William F. Holbrook, chairman of the building committee.

The new parish house is located in the rear of the church building and represents an expenditure of about $30,000. It is a two-story structure, with recreation rooms in the basement, a bowling ally, and a ladies' room, fitted up by Frank Huntress in memory of his wife. It is possible, by the use of folding petitions, to convert over one half of the main floor into one room. The basis for its construction was a gift to the church of the sum of $20,000 by Miss Sarah L. Wood.

Winter Activities at Gorham

At Gorham, Rev. William Sinclair, pastor, activities of the winter season have started in earnest. A men's club of 91 charter members has been formed, and Dr. C. W. Thing has been made president; the senior girls of the church school have held a literary and dramatic entertainment to raise funds for the new velvet curtain on the choir rail; the White Mountain Rangers (boys' club) recently enjoyed a baked bean supper followed by a hike; while the children of the church school were treated to a chicken supper at which over 100 happy children were entertained.

ARTHUR DART BISSELL

Dr. Arthur Dart Bissell, who died several months ago in Claremont, Cal., had been associated with Pomona College almost since its founding. In 1891 he went to Claremont, and there helped to build up a new and struggling college which now has a glorious name throughout the country.

Dr. Bissell was born at Sieur, Bombay, India, Oct. 25, 1858, spending his boyhood with his missionary parents in that country and coming to America in his early youth. He graduated from Amherst in 1879, and from Yale Divinity School in 1882, for the next two years being a graduate student in that institution. He was ordained a Congregational minister at New Haven, Ct., in 1884.

Dr. Bissell was a Christian scholar. He was especially fond of music and directed choirs many times. In 1920 he received the degree of Ph.D. from Yale on his thesis, "The Rôle of Expectation in Music."

Dr. Bissell leaves his wife, who was Ellen A. Gower of New Haven, Ct., a son, Howard, a daughter, Clara, two sisters,—Emily, in missionary work in India, and Dr. Julia, formerly a missionary in India, but now a resident of Wellesley, Mass.,—and a brother, Rev. Frank Bissell of

REV. ANDREW W. BOND

Rev. Andrew W. Bond, a well-known Oregon pastor, who resigned from University Park, Portland, last winter on account of failing health, died Sept. 28. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. F. W. Westwood and Rev. E. S. Bollinger. Mr. Bond built the beautiful Vancouver Church, near Portland, and later served the churches at Scappoose and Waverly Heights. In these pastorates Mr. and Mrs. Bond made many friends, who showed their sympathy in many ways during his long illness and were present in large numbers at the funeral services.

MRS. JENNIE PEARCE FOWLER

The Rockdale Congregational Church of Northbridge, Mass., mourns the loss of Mrs. Jennie Pearce Fowler, wife of Mr. George Thomas Fowler. Mrs. Fowler was one of the earliest members of this church and she has been closely identified with its work since 1881. She interested herself in the Christian Endeavor Society, was for many years a teacher in its Sunday school, and was, at the time of her death, one of its trustees. For five years she was president of the Woman's Missionary Auxiliary, to which she gave whole-hearted service. Her love for music, her devotion to children, and her warm hospitality were among the qualities which endeared her to a large circle of friends.

REV. JOHN W. GOFFIN

Rev. John W. Goffin died Nov. 3, at the age of 72, at Glendale, Cal. For more than 30 years of his life Mr. Goffin had been a Congregational minister, holding pastorates in England—his native land—Canada, and in Vermont and California. His reason for coming to California 18 years ago was for the sake of his wife's health, but Mrs. Goffin lived only about a year after coming West.

Mr. Goffin held the deep love and profound respect of each of his five children. They are Dr. J. L. C. Goffin, of Hollywood, Mrs. B. H. Conner, of Ventura, Mrs. Joseph Doman, of Springdale, Ct., Charles Goffin, of Pescadero, Cal., and Bailey Goffin, of Palo Alto.

REV. N. W. GROVER

Rev. N. W. Grover died on Nov. 21, at the home of his son, Prof. F. O. Grover of Oberlin College, Oberlin, O. Mr. Grover was born Feb. 13, 1835, in Bethel, Me. He graduated from Bowdoin College and Bangor Theological Seminary. He married Frances Osgood of Bangor, Me., who, with their four children, survive him. He served as pastor of the following Congregational churches: Mantorville, Minn., 1868-74; Bethel, Me., 1874-76; Topsham, Me., 1876-81; Colebrook, N. H., 1881-85; St. Johnsbury Center, Vt., 1885-91; Center Ossipee, N. H., 1891-1900, when he retired from service.

During the last years of his life Mr. Grover did much "wayside ministry" and some writing for publication. His Catechetical Bible Lessons for Children, published by the Presbyterian Board, is widely used.

MISS AMY E. HALLIDAY

Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints. They walk in splendor and vanish in light.

On Nov. 2, 1925, at her quiet home in Brooklyn Heights, N. Y., Miss Halliday died in her 88th year. Her going revives many memories and recalls a notable chapter of Christian experience. She was the daughter of the late Rev. Dr. Samuel B. Halliday, who for a time was what Mr. Beecher used to call him,—"my right arm." As Mr. Beecher's assistant, Miss Halliday's father became almost as well known in Brooklyn as was the great preacher himself. And his daughters were his assistants to a remarkable degree. Reared in the atmosphere of both piety and culture, Miss Amy, as we called her, came to possess a character of rare beauty and force. Many years ago she and her younger sister established a school for little children, in the Halliday home hard by Plymouth Church. Behind the house was an attractive garden, not too common in great cities, and in the midst of such surroundings this school became a center of a wide and gracious influence, and hundreds of boys and girls were taught in the old-fashioned way the usual subjects; but here, too, these children absorbed the better elements of all education, whether old or new,—a feeling of humanness, a spirit of kindness, an affection and a reverence for truth in life as well as in thought or fact. One of the chief delights of Miss Halliday's evening of life was the assurance which came to her from one and another of her former pupils, now grown men and women, of the love and gratitude in which she was held by them. She reaped the harvest of her life in the valley of her years.

Then, too, she opened her heart wide to human interests generally. The Brooklyn Home for Consumptives, Hampton Institute, some missionary on the foreign field, or it might be some lonely boy or a shut-in woman,—all appealed to her and won her support. She would trace an individual around the world, if once she had learned of his need, and it might be a hospital of the Grenfell Mission, or a school on the Western prairie, or a sailor on one of the U. S. ships; she rarely stopped seeking until she had found. And when she had found, her Christian faith shone from her face with a rarely refined and gentle glow.

To an outsider it was interesting to observe how these two sisters supplemented each the other. No human devotion could be greater. A good deal like Mary and Martha, only one could not always tell which was Mary and which was Martha. They were sisters to the last, not merely two daughters of the same parents.

About a quarter of a century ago, for reasons of convenience, Miss Halliday transferred her church relationship from Plymouth Church, yet she was just as loyal to the newer as she had been to the older. Full of the Beecher tradition, she rejoiced in the great days through which she had lived. Yet she never made discouraging comparisons with the past, but welcomed the present and looked wistfully ahead into the future. In her heart there was room enough and to spare for older and younger ways, for the great days gone and for the greater days to come. She was indeed a "beautiful soul," and her memory is treasured as fine gold. L. MASON CLARKE.

Minister Emeritus of the First Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y.

MRS. WILLIAM P. HARDY

Lill Jane Adams Hardy, wife of Rev. William P. Hardy, pastor of the Berean Congregational Church, Los Angeles, Cal., died at the Pasadena Sanitarium, Nov. 21, after years of illness in which she was a great sufferer. She had been a true helpmeet for 37 years. No other pastor's wife had been in service in Southern California so long.

Besides her husband she leaves a son, Prof. Paul Osgood Hardy of Occidental College, and a daughter, Faith Hardy McLain of South Pasadena, also a brother, Fred E. Adams of Marlboro, N. H.

The funeral services were held at the Berean Church and were attended by many of Mr. Hardy's former parishioners from Redondo Beach, Sherman, and Los Angeles and vicinity.

REV. EDWIN STODDARD HILL, D.D.

After a ministry of 59 years Dr. E. S. Hill passed into the better world Nov. 16, 1925, at National City, Cal., where he had been pastor 17 years, and was pastor emeritus at the time of his death. His only other pastorate was at Atlantic, Ia., where he served 40 years.

Born in Wakeman, O., Dec. 2, 1837, he reached the ripe age of almost 88 years, and was active to the end. His early manhood was spent in Iowa, teaching or attending Tabor College, where he received the degrees of A.M. and D.D., and was trustee for 30 years.

During the Civil War he served in Co. A, 4th Iowa Infantry. In 1865 he married Mattie Treat of Tabor. A son was born to them, Sidney T. Hill, who died at the age of 27, in 1895. Suffering the loss of his wife, also, he married Helen Jones of Tabor in 1870. After many years she, too, passed on, and in 1915 he married Lida G. Star, who survives him and is honored and loved the National City Church. Two brothers also main, Edgar Strong Hill, of Indianola, Neb., d Isaac Curtis Hill, of Los Angeles, Cal.

Funeral services were conducted in the Naonal City Church by the pastor, Rev. C. R. hatto, assisted by Rev. H. E. Clowes and Rev. . B. Roberts. Interment was at Redlands, where he service was conducted by Dr. R. C. Brooks, of omona College, a nephew of Dr. Hill.

There was a peculiar charm in both the charcter and life of Dr. Hill, a wholesome sanity judgment, a cheerful optimism, a power of pigrammatic statement, a breadth and cordiality spirit, a depth of devotion to Christ, that n never be forgotten by those who knew him. ith such rare gifts of mind and heart he made ultitudes of friends, and bound them to him lifelong affection. Dr. Hill might easily be ought of as the first citizen in the two cities here his long ministerial life was spent, Atlantic, ., and National City, Cal. His influence remains perpetual benediction.

DR. GERSHOM H. HILL

The Beloved Physician

At the burial service of Dr. Gershom H. Hill of es Moines, Ia., who died Nov. 23, in his 80th ear, it was said by one of the speakers that Dr. ill by his profession became an alienist. It eems that there are those who attend to their fairs and who come and go with a wide liberty. utside of them there are others, who are disarbed in their minds, aliens. Dr. Hill cast in is lot for life with these "others." He had the eart and skill and character to become an alient. He was for 21 years superintendent of the tate Hospital for the Insane at Independence, a. The same speaker stated that the governor f Iowa told him that this hospital under his are was the best managed institution in the tate. A judge in one of the courts stated that he placed great weight upon the evidence of Dr. Hill, as he considered him the most learned man in the state along the lines of his specialty. He founded and conducted the Retreat in Des Moines.

He was born in Iowa before it was formed into a state. There was no settled minister between his birthplace and the North Pole, and none west of his early home to the Pacific sea. His father founded five churches in the first five years of his home missionary service, and gave the first dollar to found Grinnell College, of which his son became a graduate, a benefactor, a member of the board of trustees, and one of its executive committee.

At the Sabbath service after his burial, at the great Plymouth Church in Des Moines, where he was senior deacon emeritus, the choir sang impromptu, "Hark, hark, my soul, Angelic songs are swelling," in memory of Dr. Hill. This tribute, it was said, is without a precedent in the history of the church. He was active in 20 philanthropic organizations. His joy was in his home.

He married Louie B. Ford of Lynn. He also left a daughter, Dr. Julia F. Hill, a physician at the Retreat. James L. Hill, D.D., of Salem, is a brother. As a conductor on the underground railroad Dr. Hill helped in sending 1,000 black fugitives on their way to freedom. In his country's peril he enlisted in the United States service and his compatriots of the Grand Army elected him to occupy in succession all their different chairs.

Make Your Church Attractive

REV. CHARLES H. RICHARDS, D.D.

The importance of the place of beauty in the church—in its buildings, surroundings and ritual—cannot be over-emphasized, so believed Dr. Richards. He recognizes beauty as one of the most potent drawing powers, and in these pages sets forth plans and suggestions for making the church more attractive to the people of a community.

Outstanding Chapters

The Attractiveness of a Well-Organized Church
Music in the Church
A Beautiful Service of Worship
A Plan for Scriptural Reading in the Church Service

The Lectionary

One of the special features of this book is the "Lectionary" furnishing readings and teachings which give a general survey of the whole Bible in the course of a year.

Dr. Richards passed away last Spring in his eighty-fifth year. At that time the manuscript of this book had been turned over to us for publication, and we are glad to have the privilege of presenting it to the public in this most attractive form. His long years as pastor in various Congregational churches and as an official of the Church Building Society and the Church Extension Society fitted him admirably to write this practical and inspirational volume.

One of Dr. Richard's outstanding interests was that of music, and for a time he was lecturer on hymnology and church music at Yale. He also edited several hymn books, and was chairman of the Commission of the National Council of Congregational Churches which prepared the "Book of Church Services," the manual used by thousands of ministers the world over.

Aids to Enrich the Church Service

Book of Church Services

REV. CHARLES H. RICHARDS, D.D.

With the aid of this book as a guide, services of worship will become more attractive, dignified, effective and reverent. The services here presented cover all possible requirements: they include orders of worship; services for baptism, marriage, reception of members, ordination, communion, funerals; as well as services for other similar occasions. Thirty pages of prayers and collects. A manual which meets the minister's every need. $1.50

New Testament in Modern Speech

(New Revised Edition)

RICHARD FRANCIS WEYMOUTH

The dignity and charm of Dr. Weymouth's original have been retained throughout, thus avoiding the colloquialism and harsh literalism, for which other modern versions have been criticized. Dr. Norman E. Richardson of Northwestern University says: "The dignity and reverence of this translation has not been sacrificed to ultra-colloquialism while the style has been a great aid in making clear and meaningful the spiritual concepts originally expressed in Greek. I am delighted with the revised edition." Send for circular listing editions and prices. Pocket edition without notes. $1.50

The Pilgrim Hymnal

(Revised Edition)

This hymnal provides a collection of hymns by which adequate utterance is given to the religious spirit of our day. It contains, therefore, an unsurpassed collection of those hymns, new and old, in which the social interpretation of Christianity is set to music. The responsive readings, prayers, and other aids to worship are unequaled in richness, dignity, and reverence. Send for a sample copy. $130.00 per hundred.

Worship and Song

(Revised Edition)

The ideal song book for general church-school use and for the smaller church desiring a book for all services. It contains a collection of hymns which have proved their worth through centuries of use, and many of the newer hymns which express the growing consciousness of world brotherhood, Christian patriotism, and social service. The simple, dignified worship services are built around such themes as gratitude, praise, and thankfulness. There are also worship services for special days and seasons. Send for a sample copy. $75.00 per hundred.

The Autobiography of Dr. George A. Gordon

"My Education and Religion"

ONE of the most notable series of personal reminiscences of recent years has been written by Dr. Gordon, the distinguished minister of the Old South Church in Boston. Beginning with boyhood days in Scotland and the delightful Scotch life of over half a century ago, he gives his own experiences as a youthful worker, as a student who acheived exceptional scholarship, as a seeker after truth in religion and life, as a great preacher and religious leader. The times in which Dr. Gordon has lived and prominent personalities in America and abroad are interpreted and described. The weekly installments of these interesting and important autobiographical sketches will be featured in The Congregationalist through the early months of the coming year, 1926.

The Editorial Outlook

Indigestion in Pulpit and Pew

IN his inaugural address as president of the University of Michigan, Dr. Clarence C. Little said: "I have often wondered why graduate students in psychology have failed to utilize as thesis topics such as 'The Effect of Dyspepsia in the Teacher upon the Prospect of Graduation of the Student.'"

This and some other of Dr. Little's remarks might be appropriately applied to religious work. Long ago a keen observer noted that many a good sermon has been spoiled by a bad beefsteak outside the parsonage. Too many ministers suffer from dyspeptic minds in others. After all, the quality of pulpit utterances may be gauged and at times controlled by conditions apart from the speaker. He may himself be in normal health. His mind may be clear as required. He may have reached a high quality in spiritual experience. Yet much value may be lost, where he hoped to focus with effectiveness, through the incapacity of his bearers. There may be a hundred reasons for this: indigestion, overwork, needless worry, slovenly reading, lack of preparation for the worship, overcrowding of the soul with materialism. All these contribute to the activity of the despoiler; they give more power to his arm.

A minister told his congregation not long since that Getting Ready for Church—to use an expression that seems to have lost fashion and meaning—is a process that starts Monday morning. Both before and after service, during the week preceding and following, the people are under obligation to supply life-material by which to receive the message and through which to make most effective use of it. Under such a definite program text, theme, and parts of the sermon would be recalled. Hymns would have new meaning. The choir or quartet would be less subject to analysis. The Sunday dinner would have other—in some instances—preferred topics for conversation. Children would have larger interest in services of worship if parents distinctly prepared for it and by that means were able to carry from morning or evening hour clear and certain teaching and inspiration.

The Movies in India

INDIA is rapidly learning that Western civilization is not all gold. For many decades she judged the West by those that had been sent to rule over her, and by the men who came there for business and also by the missionaries, and she got the impression that the West was not only wealthy and wise but also righteous and religious. Then came the war which partly tore the veil from her eyes, and then came the movie which completed the task. India now knows that there is much of evil in the West and is beginning to think that the West is not much, if any, better than India herself.

Films depicting the triangle of love and jealousy, unfaithful husbands and wives, crime and dishonesty of many kinds, as well as much of the surface life that speaks to India of looseness and license have made India think that perhaps even the Westerners in her midst are not as good as she once thought. Even the poorer street Arabs from their two anna (four cent) seats have learned to jeer and hiss as well as applaud in the right place, as the film is thrown on the screen. They even seem to understand the Wild West scenes. But it has not been a far cry from the screen to daily life, and much of the decrease in respect and reverence shown of late to Europeans in the Orient may well be laid to the door of the screen. Were only the best in Western life shown on the screen the result might be different, but the West must pay the price in loss of prestige for the dollars she has received for her realistic films.

A Jewish Tribute to Jesus

A RINGING Christmas message to Jews comes from Rabbi Stephen S. Wise of New York. In crowded Carnegie Hall on the Sunday before Christmas he declared that "Jesus was," although the Rabbi had been taught in early life that Jesus was a myth. He said, according to the press reports, that Jews should accept the teachings of Jesus, that they comprise a code of ethics unparalleled in any writings in history, being the very foundations of morality. If Christianity has seemed to be impractical and unattainable, as Jews say it is, it is because Christians have not lived up to Jesus' teachings, Rabbi Wise explained. His call to Jews to live up to those teachings may well be repeated to Christians. His spirit and that of his brilliant son, James Waterman Wise, to whom we referred editorially in The Congregationalist of Dec. 3, are essentially what we know as the Christian spirit. They are helping to transform the world in accordance with the teachings of Jesus. We welcome most heartily the friendly co-operation of Jews and Christians in every good work. That co-operation is bound to increase as we know each other better and as misunderstandings give place to knowledge, good will and the spirit of Jesus himself.

A View of China

IN an extensive and highly favorable review of The Laughing Buddha, the remarkable story of China by James Livingstone Stewart, to which reference was recently made in these columns, the Central China Daily Post, remarking that the novel is "a narrative of what is indisputably taking place almost every day in many places of this bleeding land," inquires, "What hope is there for China?"

What hope is there for China [says the review]? Can she possibly survive as partially civilized nation with such a complication of mortal troubles assailing the vitality of the country? Mr. Stewart's frank and arresting pages supply an answer which will not be seriously disputed by those who are really acquainted with the general situation and the obvious trend of things. There can be little hope for a land so misgoverned and so ill-used as China is today by her own selfish—we had almost written the word brutal—and acquisitive authorities. The wild slogans about the iniquity of unequal treaties, the unfairness of present tariff impositions, and the alleged "superior" attitude of the wicked foreigner who is everywhere proclaimed as the real fons et origo of China's tribulations may, as they apparently do, convince the agitators and schoolboys of the country. The wise man, be he Chinese or foreigner, knows to look elsewhere, and has no difficulty in discovering and naming the real root of all China's distresses. The cause is in China herself!

We doubt whether the hated "foreigner" should be let out so completely in the consideration of China's problems, but this critic represents a view, the partial truth of which we find that many who know China intimately are disposed to emphasize.

Name Your Five

REV. THOMAS E. NUGENT, minister of the First Congregational Church in Valley City, N. D., writes us concerning plans for a course in Congregationalism in the form of biographical studies in connection with the N. D. Young Peoples' Camps next summer. He states that there will be five periods of instruction, and the teacher will be limited to a choice of five characters, the story of whose lives will give a comprehensive idea of the origin, growth, and achievements of the Congregational fellowship.

The list of five leaders suggested for this purpose by the committee with the particular phase that each represents is as follows:

John Robinson (Beginnings).
Thomas Hooker (Impress on civil and political institutions).
Jonathan Edwards (Intellectual power and spiritual awakening).
Horace Bushnell (The church and its youth).
Cyrus Hamlin (The missionary enterprise).

The committee is desirous of having other suggestions and would welcome any improvement upon this list. Suggested lists ought to be confined to five names related respectively to the subjects indicated. As the matter is one of general interest we should be glad to publish in The Congregationalist any alternative proposals that may be offered.

The Tale That Is Told

THIS issue of The Congregationalist falls upon the closing day of the year. The somberness of change and ending hangs too heavily for a sense of deep, exultant gladness in the new. We hope in our next issue to catch, and impart, something of the inspiration of the new summons to a new adventure. It will be an issue instinct with hope, and fervor, and optimism.

Meanwhile, there is a preparation for the new in reflection upon the old. There is a place for thought, and retrospect, and introspection. Much of the richest of philosophy and expression centers around the mystery of the changing and passing years. The Hebrew prophets and poets felt the stateliness and wonder of the eternal procession. The Ninetieth Psalm stands as a masterpiece of the expression of man's sense of frailty and bewilderment, but of his confident hope that in the midst of change and at the center of time and eternity is that that responds to the spirit of man himself, for whom the years pass, and who has power to reflect upon the changing universe of which he forms a part. It was through this faith, looking out through eyes of the soul, and reaching out with hands capable of supporting earthly children that men came to feel the reality of God and to cry, The eternal God is thy refuge and underneath are the everlasting arms.

But the beauty of the ancient faith of Israel's saints is not greater than that of modern expressions of the eternal awe and hope which the ancient scriptures have done so much to inspire. Watts' great hymn, Our God our help in ages past, might have been taken out of the ancient Word, so true is it to the noblest Psalms of time and eternity, in feeling and expression.

The measured solemnity of a worship that responds to the measured tread of the years is inherently related to the optimism of a living faith. Life's procession is not meaningless. It is a procession in which afflictions blend with glory and beauty, and in which the sense of end and purpose becomes inevitably fixed in the souls of the devout. Its natural expression is in the prayer, And let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us; and establish thou the work of our hands upon us; yea the work of our hands establish thou it.

"We spend our years as a tale that is told." But a tale is never told. The better the tale the more assuredly is that true. It is in the attainment of its best that life becomes immortal, and that the passing years have permanence, even as "a tale that is told," in the library of eternity.

The New Greece

THE truth of the eternal adage, "There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth, and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty," has never been better, and, many of us would say, more satisfactorily, illustrated than in the contrast between the situation of Turkey and that of Greece, following the tragic expulsion of hordes of its inhabitants by the former country and the reception of the refugees, seemingly at immense cost and sacrifice, by the latter country. There were many who admired but at the same time very deeply sympathized with Greece in the days when she was making heroic efforts to give the harried victims of the Near East a place of refuge. It begins, however, to appear that not only has Turkey suffered tremendous loss in the expulsion of the Armenian and Greek populations but that the coming of these people to Greece has been the occasion for an immense access of prosperity to this land.

Dr. White, President of Anatolia College, has recently called our attention to an editorial in a daily newspaper referring to the facts presented by John W. Mace, Field Director of the Near East Relief, in an article on The Changing Near East in the American Review of Reviews, and offering general comment on the situation which Dr. White says is thoroughly justified by the facts. Referring to Turkey's disposition to defy the League of Nations this editorial says: "The Turkish government has apparently been shunted off the line of international affairs. Side-tracked at Angora, it does not obtain a comprehensive view of world movements, and it cannot see or understand much more of them by merely sending messengers to Geneva, not to learn, but to promulgate its decrees."

The retention of Constantinople and Smyrna, this article states, does not make up for the loss of Mesopotamia, Syria, Palestine, and Arabia, much less for the loss of the millions of Greeks and Armenians who were the mainstay of trade and industry. Mr. Mace says that Constantinople looks meaner and shabbier than ever it did before, and that if its appearance is any sign, the Turk is still the sick man of the Orient. The harbor of Constantinople is empty. Trade has departed, and Smyrna remains very much as it was following the days of its ruin by fire and sword. But "the thrift and genius which made Smyrna great having streamed out with the expatriated Greeks and Armenians," one is possibly prepared for the contrast in the improved situation of Salonica. In three years this city has increased in population from 150,000 to 500,000, and evidently the increase in population is being accompanied by an immense access of commercial prestige and power which all Greece is sharing.

Of course much of what Greece has done has been assisted by American effort. Perhaps one of the very finest chapters in American history is the story of what the well-disposed and benevolent in America have accomplished in the Near East. But it is gratifying to learn that American help has not in any way lessened the vigor and efficiency of the Greek public authorities. Mr. Mace says that these "never let down any of their own efforts because Americans were helping, but shouldered the utmost of their own burden, and co-operated besides in everything that the American organizations asked."

Can one help rejoicing in the just reward that apparently is coming to Greece? "Athens," Mr. Mace says, "is a city on a boom, distinctly American in spirit." It is stated that all Greece is prospering, that there is unprecedented building going on everywhere and no unemployment. It may be that practical Christian benevolence may yet prove a means of accomplishing what the romantic heroism of men like Byron could not achieve in the building of a new Greece with a glory comparable to her past.

The Vision of Clear Atmospheres

WE wish that we could have shared with every reader of The Congregationalist, and especially with every young man and young woman in America the privilege of "listening in," which was the Editor's high experience on the evening of Dec. 20, when Dr. Wilfrid T. Grenfell addressed the young people's society of the First Church in Newton. We mean really sitting in, for it was not a mere radio experience, and part of the inspiring power of Dr. Grenfell, as perhaps of any outstanding figure, is that of the living personality.

The Editor had met and conversed with Dr. Grenfell, corresponded with him, received articles from him (another is promised, by the way), but had never had the opportunity of hearing him speak until this evening.

The address in its artless simplicity of narrative was the very highest art in talking to young people. Even the clear and delightful stereopticon pictures were secondary to the charm of Dr. Grenfell's personality and words. Without seeming to preach he drove home the deepest truths and lessons with irresistible appeal.

For one hearer at least the occasion became symbolic of the world's deepest need and of the way of meeting it. Here was a man of faith, in an age of doubt, cynicism, and despair; here was a man of joy, healthy, clear-visioned, enthusiastic, in an age of jazzy hurrying after disillusioning pleasures; here was a man of simple, heroic virtues who made one feel instinctively the real worth and permanence of sacrificial and unselfish living in an age of blasé supermen; or of would-be supermen who fail to rise above the seat of the scornful.

Here, one felt, was a master of life; not a theologian, nor a great philosopher, nor a keen and well-versed critic; but a man who had tested in practice the ultimate verities, and who had found the peace and joy that Jesus offered with such assurance to those who would follow his way of life. In that presence one recalled the quiet conviction with which Jesus spoke of the realities of eternal life, If it were not so I would have told you. As one listened to Dr. Grenfell he saw the tawdry things of selfishness and worldliness stripped of all their glamour. The dignity, beauty, and allurements of the higher things of self-expression through love, service, and sacrifice become revealed with irresistible power and attractiveness. It was an apologetic for Christian faith, in action, a demonstration of a higher way than men ordinarily follow, but of a way so simple that every one might find and follow it.

Here was a man whose ordinary daily living was inspired with a nobility of vision and motive as high as that that drew men at the call of Lincoln, or that brought forth peace-loving men at a later day in willingness to sacrifice all for democracy. And yet to this man heroism —the real heroism of following Jesus in service to his fellowmen—had become so much second-nature, that he was manifestly unconscious of anything heroic in himself. Never have we felt so much as in listening to Dr. Grenfell the contrast between the flesh-pots of Egypt and the forth-going, liberating Moses, enduring as "seeing the invisible."

There are many Labradors of life that are awaiting today the touch of romance and glory that service can impart. The conquest of these undeveloped fields offers a wealth of living to those who have eyes to see, but this wealth of living can be acquired only by spiritual as well as physical conquest. We have been reading of late many books of travel and adventure—the records of strange, restless men, repellant of ease, convention, and softness, inured to hardship, scornful of beaten paths, and eager for new and unexpected experiences. They have been interesting books, dazzling, entrancing; but too often they have lacked depth. They have moved largely without end or purpose. There has been a meaninglessness to the life that they have described. It was against this background that we listened to Dr. Grenfell. Here was a man as interesting as any of these, but with the depth and power of an adventurer for God, a man who had found the hidden places of life as well as the neglected and untrodden places of the world.

Nor for such a man are life's Labradors sought afar. The beauty of this address was its clear relationship to the life of every one who heard. Its power was in its revelation of the values that every man can appreciate if he will but test them. One felt that he had been on a mountain-top of vision where the map of faith and service was very clearly revealed. But above all, in the contact with that simple, consecrated life, devoid of anything unduly emotional, one came down from the mountain-top with a deeper determination to live, with a profounder faith in love, and kindliness, and brotherly helpfulness, with a clearer sense of the need of one's fellowmen, and with a glowing joy in the consciousness of fellowship in Christ—a fellowship that binds all true-hearted men in the service and tasks of love. We recommend for anybody who doubts whether life is worth while an allopathic dose of the faith, optimism, and contagion of spirit of Wilfrid T. Grenfell.

Honoring Phillips Brooks

IN commemoration of the ninetieth anniversary of the birth of Phillips Brooks, a service of unusual interest was held in Trinity Church, Boston, the scene of the great preacher's ministry, on the morning of Dec. 13. This service was as notable for what it symbolized as for the man in whose memory it was held. In fact, its nature and its symbolical significance were in themselves the most fitting memorial to a man whose whole religious outlook centered in tolerance, and who practised the Christian unity that many men merely preach.

The larger symbolism of this service was found in the fact that the preacher on the occasion was Dr. George A. Gordon, of Old South Church, across the way, an old friend and neighbor of Phillips Brooks, during the years when both men were becoming pre-eminent in prophecy.

There are Congregationalists whom one might expect to find in an Episcopalian pulpit—they are Episcopalian in feeling and sentiment—but one cannot but reflect upon Dr. Gordon's appearance in that place. He is a Congregationalist of Congregationalists, an independent of independents. It is this that gives his presence in Phillips Brooks' pulpit significance—it is a demonstration to the world of that spirit—the spirit of the Lord Jesus—in which good men, not only in spite of their differences, but because of their differences, may be drawn together in love, and in the allegiance to Truth which is larger than any man's conception of it. This was the thing that Phillips Brooks proclaimed in his book on Tolerance. May the spirit that produces these larger evidences of fellowship, without compromise and without blinking at differences, become ever more widely extended and more powerfully expressed!

Needless to say, Dr. Gordon's tribute was worthy of himself and of the great friend whom he eulogized in Christ. He closed a striking analysis of the nature and power of Phillips Brooks' ministry with these words:

> Never has his power been paralleled to bring all that is highest in men and women into vigor and beauty. He was a hallowing influence, a spiritually generating influence in the life of our city; and wherever he went men had only to touch the hem of his garment, and the sense of the healing power of God came upon them.
> The last point at the end of a service like this is the creation of faith in the people of God. That was the great ideal for which Phillips lived. He was the producer of faith. He helped men to believe in their capacity for nobleness, for heroism, for self-sacrifice, for living the life of love and sharing the life of the God of love. He helped men to believe in the reality of the kingdom of man in this world, the reality of the divine humanity in the world. He helped men to believe that this little world of time and space in which we are pilgrims is embraced by the mighty unseen world of God.

The Secretary of War has approved the design and the location for the tablet which is to be placed in Arlington Cemetery as a memorial to the twenty-three chaplains who gave their lives in the World War during the period of actual hostilities. The tablet is simple and pleasing in appearance and has been accorded one of the choice sites in our National Cemetery.

From Our Western Editor

The Christmas holidays and the closing of the year bring to many of us more vivid memories than any other season. Its experiences remind us of childhood, of father and mother, the old home and school, and make it easy for memory to assume a somber hue. We almost inevitably at this time of year take account of the losses that the passing years have inflicted upon us—we remember the true, the noble, the loyal, those whom we have loved and lost a while. If we have come to middle life and beyond, the taking stock of the losses may easily lead us to believe that they far outrun the gains of life, and we may be seized by a sort of pessimism. If we are to keep our poise in a world where death and disaster are never idle, we must learn somehow to take such an inventory of the gains and losses that the former may overmatch the latter. Only in such a spirit can we go forward to victory and to joyous living.

It is more than just the personal, individual question. The older we become, if we are making real progress in character, the more we identify the fortunes of the race with our own. "For ourselves alone" did not prove a good motto for Shinn Fein. It's not a good motto for any individual or nation. More than ever before the needs of the world lie heavy upon the conscience of a multitude of people. In a certain sense now a great many folks can never be happy again—they are crucified daily with those of their fellows who suffer. It is not enough that we look forward to fortunate circumstances for ourselves alone.

The "for others mood" was permanent in the life of Jesus. It ought to be so in ours. In that greatest book of the World War, A Minstrel in France, by Harry Lauder, there occurs a phrase which may furnish our text today. Harry was in Australia when the war began. He hurried home and found that John, his only child, had enlisted in the British army. Harry went about recruiting with those inimitable songs of his. In December, 1916, he was in London singing for the Three Cheers Company. John was expected home at the holidays to be married. Then the fatal telegram came—"Captain John Lauder has been killed in action." Harry and his wife withdrew from the world—they would let it go by, but the world would not have it so. By letter, telegram, and personal visit, it urged Harry to return. One day he and his wife had a great experience, for the one whom Moffatt terms "The Eternal" came, and Harry and his wife bowed in prayer and said, "Thy will be done." Back to London Harry went to sing to the boys, and one of his songs was "of the boys who had lost and won." The British Government sent him over to sing to the boys in the trenches, and the expedition came to be known as the Rev. Harry Lauder M. P. Tour. One day a soldier took him to a group of graves, and one was marked, "Captain John Lauder." The soldier withdrew while Harry stayed to pray, and again he had that wonderful experience of "The Presence," and he was confirmed in his belief that Captain John, though he were dead, had not lost but won.

When Sir George Adam Smith was in this country, speaking on the moral aims of the war, he made an address in First Church, Oak Park. Among the questions asked him was, "What, in the thinking of the British people, has become of the bad boys who have given their life on the battlefield?" His reply was to the effect that Britain, with all her shortcomings, had been fairly true in her thinking to Jesus. He indicated that in the first years of the war the great losses of life had made some of the British people waver in their belief in immortality, but that after three years of war they had come to rest their case again with Jesus. He would be the judge and Britain was content to leave its boys in His hands.

Apparently these two men, each great in his own way, had by different routes, but both through great tribulation, come to the same goal. They rested their case with the Eternal as manifested in Jesus Christ. The losses of the great war made vivid for us the losses of the race by war throughout its history. What a multitude of young men in every age of the world have laid them down in their last sleep because of war. Most of these were unknown beyond a limited circle. They went into nameless graves, unwept, unhonored and unsung, save by a very few. What a toll the wars of the ages have taken, especially of the common folk! The names of a few leaders have been immortalized in song and story, but what of the great crowd? They lost and won, if the faith of Sirs Harry Lauder and George Adam Smith is well founded. Most of these boys fought in the wars of the ages, through no will of their own; the quarrels were not of their making. They are nameless to us, but not to the One who notes even the fall of a sparrow. They are in the hands of the Judge of all the earth. They have won; we are willing and content to leave them in the Master's hands. A verse of the last war may express our feeling concerning all of them:

> God rest you, happy gentlemen,
> Who laid your good lives down,
> Who took the khaki and the gun,
> Instead of cap and gown.
> God bring you to a fairer place
> Than even Oxford town.

Our thought may well turn also to the multitude of folks who fight the battle of life under a great handicap, those "whom unmerciful disaster follows fast and follows faster," the defeated, the unrecognized and the unknown. The world in peace, just as in war, takes the labor and the sacrifice of a vast multitude and recognizes only those for the most part who have something unique, novel, or sensational about them. An athletic or intellectual prowess will make a man a head-liner in the newspaper. He may lack many of the fundamentals of character, but little the world cares.

What a multitude the unknown and the defeated are, so far as the world's notice goes! What pastor does not know them, what minister has not had their burdens and sorrows become his own? There was a veteran of the Civil War, broken on the field of battle and beset the rest of his life by illness and poverty. He was loyal, devoted to family, church, and community, and loved the best things. He toiled for those who were never his equals in education and ideals, and received scanty wages. He dropped one day at his toil. His wife lingered on in blindness and poverty, almost deserted. She was a woman of fine mind and a beautiful Christian. They made their contribution to the real things of life and passed on comparatively unknown; they lost—and won.

I would sing, if I could, the song of the workers of the ages, in whose ranks have been millions of the loyal, the noble, the true, of every race and color, who have worked out life's little day in the spirit of the Christ. Their names have not been spoken outside of a small circle, they have received little or no praise, they have for the most part been counted beneath the notice of the so-called nobility of earth. I knew an eighty-year-old. Her husband was a ne'er-do-well, a son was a criminal and broke his mother's heart. Her life was one, from girlhood up, of constant toil. She took in washing for years—she worked like a slave. At eighty she came into a quiet haven; blind and quite alone, but the evening twilight found her gentle still. She lost most of what the world strives for, but she is in the hands of the same Master to whom Harry Lauder and George Adam Smith committed their loved ones. W. W. Story has put it well in Io Victis:

> I sing the hymn of the conquered, who fall in the Battle of Life,—
> The hymn of the wounded, the beaten, who died overwhelmed in the strife;
> Not the jubilant song of the victors, for whom the resounding acclaim
> Of nations was lifted in chorus, whose brows wear the chaplet of fame,
> But the hymn of the low and the humble, the weary, the broken in heart,
> Who strove and who failed, acting bravely a silent and desperate part;
> Whose youth bore no flower in its branches, whose hopes burned in ashes away,
> From whose hands slipped the prize they had grasped at, who stood at the dying of day
> With the wreck of their life all round them, unpitied, unheeded, alone,
> With Death swooping down o'er their failure, and all but their faith overthrown,
> Speak, History! Who are Life's victors? Unroll they long annals and say,
> Are they those whom the world called the victors, who won the success of a day?
> The martyrs, or Nero? The Spartans, who fell at Thermopylae's tryst,
> Or the Persians and Xerxes? His judges or Socrates? Pilate or Christ?

We are told that pious moralizings about war get us nowhere. Numerous cliques deplore the fact that religion is more interesting in defeating the real devil of armed conflict than in minding what they call its own business. What may one ask is religion's business if war upon war cannot be so defined? Who has the obligation to resist armed violence if we do not? Who, again, can ponder the political courses run by the pre-war world without a sense of inexpressible shame and repugnance?—S. Parkes Cadman.

Drawing Power, Jesus, and the Cross

A Sermon by Edward C. Boynton

Rutland, Vermont

And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me.—John 12:32.

TERRIFIC statement! "Will draw all men unto me." Has Jesus at last been driven to fantastic and infinitely pathetic vagary by the over-strain of mounting, blood-thirsty opposition? Has he been driven from his habit of seeing plain truth?

On the contrary, he is seeing with exactitude things as they are. He sees in the world the power of attraction,—so great, so august. He sees in himself the one who understood how to handle this great power, and who embodied it most effectively. And he sees in the coming tragedy of the Cross precisely the one thing yet necessary to make possible the full appeal of his friendship.

I

Jesus is placing his whole weight on the principle which God has wrought into the nature of things, the principle of attraction. "I will draw all men unto me," said Jesus. This is noteworthy.

In the world of physics and of chemistry, of course, attraction is a fact. We do not know what it is, but we do know that the power of attraction is there. In physics it may appear as magnetism; in chemistry as capillarity. In the great and in the small we find it. "The force which molds the tear, rounds the planet."

Higher in the scale of created things you see this fact of attraction. Here is the effect of the sun upon this spring vegetation. You can almost see attraction at work, with all the reaching up of branch and of tendril towards the warmth which renews the flowering impulse. In the animal world there is the attraction which obtains between the animals themselves, between themselves and the objects of their world. And in the world of men it is so widely active! Outer attractions and inner; natural and artificial, low and high,—indeed, where is the limit beyond which we do not find this fact working away in human kind? When we turn from the fact of this principle to ask what is its function, we find that it is a veritable drudge, so many purposes does it serve. In the heavens above we see that it is attraction which keeps order among those hurtling bodies. In the atom it is the same power which keeps it from bursting apart. It is this power which draws atoms together to form matter. In the plant and animal world it is this principle which builds up the cell structure, which is operative in preservation of the species by drawing individuals together into groups, and is primarily the force upon which the propagation of the species depends. In the world of men it is this power which accounts for the warp and woof of our life, personal and social. It is the attractiveness of life which ties us into the bundle of life together, lifting us above the common round because of the ardors and endurances which are breathed into the soul along the reach of the higher attractions of devotion to noble ends. This principle is nowhere more nobly operative than in the splendid loyalties and noble ministries of friendship which have crowned the race with glory and with honor.

Such is the briefest and crudest sort of a hint regarding the fact of God's will upon which Jesus leaned his whole weight in looking down the long aisle of the future. The power of attraction he knew would work through him. "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me."

II

I find this to be more impressive when I consider the pitiable failure of the wise ones of our day to make this principle work for them. I find that the measure of the failure or "us humans" sharpens the relief in which Jesus stands out from the rest,—and this on the most practical ground. He knew how this thing works. We make quite a mess of trying to use the principle.

I suppose that today is the heyday of man's attempt to exploit the principle of attraction. To offer attractions, to be attractive, to make a thing appear attractive, is the first study of mankind and of his mate in this Western world! And thus premier interest is given to advertising, to selling, to promoting, to propaganda,—these particular arts and artifices which have to do with attracting folks to us or to our designs or to our enthusiasms or to our wares.

Not in business alone! Bless your soul, no! A new novel depicts the set of the "up-to-date" medical mind, which is not primarily to be professionally skillful, but which is primarily to be successful in a worldly sense. And I have heard ministers who avowed that their most important duty was to "sell" themselves to the community in which they lived!

The consequence is that men have concluded that attraction lies within the realm of manipulation, or organization, of mob-psychology with its drives, of advertising, and all the rest of the tawdry ruses which are being rushed on every hand.

But there is a growing feeling that there is something wrong with the thing after all. Maybe to organize does not lay effectual grip upon the power to attract! Maybe to sell oneself to a constituency, whether doctor or minister, does not draw all men unto you in the ways which satisfy your (and their) deeper hunger! Maybe indeed, all this manipulated present is dust and ashes and not at all the reign of peace and joy which is the reward of the power of attraction at its higher level! Maybe we do not know very much about the principle which we have tried to take into camp and make to serve our bidding!

Certain it is that when we try to manipulate folks for our selfish advantage, the attraction upon higher satisfactions does not hang on. And it is becoming clear that when we try to manipulate folks to good ends by bad means, the thing does not last either.

"Engineered" attractions are probably not worth very much, for sooner or later they inevitably involve the participants in pretense. Too often an emotion is assumed before it is engendered. Or as often again, it is proclaimed after it has died down. When pretense enters in, attraction departs. Thus it is that "engineered" college loyalty, whether from the office of a zealous alumni secretary, or from the frantic labors of the cheer leaders before the bleachers, this sort of "engineered" loyalty is getting tawdry. Thus it is that "engineered" commercial sentiment, such as we find in organizations which put faith in "pep" programs, issued from a central office, will fade; that "engineered" patriotism which uses propaganda as its organ will not stand up; that "engineered" religion with its "attractive programs" and its parlor tricks by means of which it is hoped to manipulate the "elect" is becoming weariness unto the flesh. In this latter regard it is interesting to note a recent guess of the wise Dean Inge, to the effect that the future form of religion in this country may be quietistic in character, and will most certainly be notable for the sincerities of simplicity.

No! man's perfervid attempt to lay hold upon the principle of attraction by exploitation and by manipulation, is at least faulty, and, I suspect, is nearly tragic. The principle does not stand by these methods. In other words, we moderns do not know what's what in so simple a matter.

III

But now turn to Jesus. In him we find no foolish idea that attraction had the remotest thing to do with "boosting!" He clearly saw the fallacy of the idea that "display" was near the heart of the matter. One cannot by the remotest stretch of an obscene imagination draw an inference that it was the shocking sight of the Cross which Jesus would put to the use of drawing men unto him!

But what Jesus did see, and that clearly, was the very nature of God's way with his universe in this matter. Jesus saw that at the very heart of the principle of attraction there throbbed "the love which will not let me go." Jesus saw quite clearly that in the spiritual world the power of straight-forward, open-hearted love has the greatest pull on the lives of men.

Friendship without any tag to it,—just friendship,—this is as nearly irresistible as attractiveness goes in this world. And as I understand it, this is what Jesus primarily offered. I do not think that Jesus loved folks primarily because he could do them good. Primarily, he loved them because he loved them. I do not believe that it is friendship for the specific end of making us bad people better, which Jesus offers. We are curious folk. We hate to be reformed! And some of us are hating it more and more as the increasing pressure of pre-

Comrades of the Gleam

By Lucius H. Thayer

God grant this gift to you, my friend,
Throughout the coming year,
To hold as true the visions seen,
In spite of doubt or fear.

Mind may not prove, eye may not see
The things of faith and dream,
But know God's chosen ones to be
The Comrades of the Gleam.

There's something tells the prophet soul
His vision is not vain,
That love and justice shall prevail,
The Prince of Peace shall reign.

Though far the goal, this thing shall be;
And sure that other dream
Of life within the great unknown,
To Comrades of the Gleam.

fessional improvers "cramps our style!" With the Psalmist we may be willing to pray: "Let the righteous rather smite me friendly: and reprove me." But we are getting to the point where we want to burst out, as did he: "But let not their precious balms break my head!" We hate to be too thoroughly reformed!

But we do want to be loved! Loved for what we are, poor as it is! We want a sincere friendship "as is" primarily; not on a basis of what we may become. A person who is drawn to others because he desires to make them like himself is a thoroughly unlikable sort of a person. But a person who is drawn to others because of what they are, who can see the loveliness of the unlovely, who, taking them on their own ground, finds them attractive,—such a person commands the heart of those to whom his own heart goes out. And one who loves in this way, we, too, can love. Indeed, it is such love between the holy and the sinful, which pulls as nothing else in all Creation can pull!

Now it is clear that in proportion as a life has been lived in the realm of purity, in such proportion will it wield the power of attraction. Pure insight, which sees things as they are, pure relationships, which do not confuse ends with means, nor influence with integrity, and pure friendship which does not arise primarily because of the desire to redeem, but is born of the hunger of the heart to love,—here is the mightiest force of attraction which the world knows! And Jesus, sensing things as they are, in awareness of self-knowledge, knew that these conditions were fulfilled in him!

"And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me."

IV

But why did Jesus think that the cross would help? Well, just because you and I are the suspicious kind of "poor worms" that we are! We not only grudge the throe of life, but we grudge believing any better of another than we are obliged to! The one thing which could keep men from accepting the friendship which Jesus offered was the possibility of entertaining the suspicion that his fidelity to others would have broken down under the acid test of the death penalty. If Jesus had not been killed for being a true friend who could not mislead in word or act, we undoubtedly would be wondering whether Jesus really meant what he said, whether he was willing to stand by what he stated, whether he would back it all up if it were to cost him his life.

And with the wonder would come the suspicion that maybe it would have been too much for him, that maybe he would have hedged a bit here or softened his stand a bit there when it came right down to a matter of life and death. And with the suspicion would have shriveled the reach of his friendship into our souls and the blight of suspicion would have rested upon the pull which friendship exerts. And this suspicion would have killed the greater part of the attraction between us.

But when a man has died for the stand he has taken, one cannot be suspicious of his integrity of spirit. And so the cross, unwittingly to the perpetrators, undesignedly so far as Jesus was concerned, but inevitably because of the nature of things, became as Jesus so clearly foresaw it would become, the needed proof for which there was no substitute as to the reality of his friendship through and through. The cross became the mute, yet eloquent, validation of the friendship of Jesus. The cross erases any shadow of doubt as to the devotion of Jesus. He was true; he meant what he said; he would not save himself at the cost of trimming his actions or his words or his sympathies or his loyalties. The cross forever authenticates, as nothing less could, the absolutely devoted friendship which Jesus gave to God and to man. And Jesus, who knew what was in the heart of man, clearly saw that his death would perform this service. "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me."

V

He was lifted up. Has he drawn all men unto him?

No, not yet. But the spirit of Jesus is proving the most attractive personality in ever widening circles of human kind! At present men in miraculous numbers are feeling the pull of Jesus! Warrior, statesman, labor leader, business man, professor,—I think of these as giving testimony to the pull which they feel issuing from the personality of Jesus. Churchman, outcast, the humble and the high,—I think of individuals from these varying estates who give testimony to the compelling attraction which Jesus exercises on them. Occidental, Oriental, Negroid,—the record of the devotion, often unto death, of the thousands and the tens of thousands of these folk of every clime is testimony to the pull of Jesus at the heart of folks, across the barriers of years and of custom and of vision, finding common response in them all.

And it is true that more and more of us, right round here in the homeland, are finding that there is a distinction between a cross which is a scaffold upon which to hang a dogma, and a cross which was smeared with dripping blood of a Friend of Friends. And there is a ring in the subdued voice, and a throb in many and many a waiting heart, as the spirit breathes the prayer,

"O come to my heart, Lord Jesus!
Thy Cross is my only plea."

There are some men who are only as desert reeds! They move to the breath of the desert wind. They bend before it, no matter in what way it may be blowing. They never resist the wind. They never become "hiding places from the wind," stemming a popular drift. They are the victims of passing opinions, and are swayed by the current passions.

And some men are "clothed in soft raiment"! They shrink from the rough fustian, the laborer's cotton smock, the leather suit of George Fox. They are ultra-"finicky." They are afraid of the mire. They touch the sorrows of the world with a timid finger, not with the kindly, healing grasp of a surgeon.

And some men are "prophets"! They have a secret fellowship with the Infinite. When we listen to them it is like putting one's ear to the seashell: we catch the sound of the ocean roll. "The voice of the Great Eternal dwells in their mighty tones."

And others are "children of the Kingdom." They are greater than the old prophets, because the mystic voice has become a Presence, and they have "seen the Lord." The veil has been rent, and they "walk in the light" as "children of light."—J. H. Jowett.

Iowa's Leading Layman

President Seerley of Iowa State Teachers' College

By Roger Leavitt

AMONG the very few nationally known Congregational laymen of Iowa, the name of Homer H. Seerley stands easily first. He is just entering upon his fortieth year as president of the Iowa State Teachers' College.

Graduating from the Iowa State University in 1873, he taught country school, high school, and was superintendent of the Oskaloosa public schools for thirteen years. In 1886 he was called to his present position. He found a small Normal School with 297 students and eight teachers housed in one small building. The annual income of the school was $36,000. There is now a faculty of 175 and a total of faculty, extension workers, clerks, and employees of 424. The annual income is over $1,000,000. There are 2,617 students this term. The summer term had over 3,200 besides 1,800 in the six extension summer schools. The buildings and 120 acre campus are valued at $3,000,000.

This school has been built by the energy and about the personality of its great leader.

A few years ago an article in the Chicago Tribune called him a "human dynamo." He is a great man physically, intellectually, morally, and spiritually. One of his faculty spoke of "the balanced blending of intellectual and spiritual in his life." When the school was small and he was able personally to pick all of the faculty he always made special inquiry about the religious life of a prospective teacher. The first requisite was character and he believed character was founded on religion. He cared more for ability to teach than scholastic degrees.

Broad in his religious beliefs, to his intimate friends he shows a constant deepening of his spiritual life based on a humble trust in God, the Father, and Christ the Redeemer of the World. Fred L. Shaw, state superintendent of South Dakota, recently said, "President Seerley has stimulated thousands of students to want to try to make the most of life's spiritual energies." He believes in the church and is a generous supporter of its local work and its world-wide activities, though his heavy work in the college prevents his giving much time to his church.

Last summer the Boston Journal of Education published a special number in his honor, every article referring to his work, written by educators all over the country. In this issue a distinguished Iowa educator said, "I presume there is no one now living who has touched as many lives to mold them as President Seerley has." I once heard Dr. J. P. Huget of Brooklyn, N. Y., a former pupil, say to a large audience, "President Seerley once called me to his office intending to dismiss me from school, but instead he talked to me and gave me another chance. He inspired me with a desire for better things. All that I am in the world I owe to him." Many of the successful public school men and women of Iowa and adjoining states look to him as the source of their greatest inspiration. He has magnified teaching as a great profession. The Journal of Education says he has had more to do than any other person in raising Iowa to her present high position educationally.

President Seerley was raised on a farm and earned his way through the university by janitor work. He understands the educational problems of an agricultural state like Iowa. If space permitted I would speak of his common sense, his keen business judgment, his tactfulness and universal kindness to teachers and pupils, his generosity in overlooking others' faults, his justice, his ability to think through a problem, his big view ahead, his freedom from arrogance, his big-heartedness, his capacity for friendship. He cannot help being a leader. For fifty years he has been one of the big assets of Iowa, and Iowa trusts and honors him as she does few of her citizens.

A Missionary's Love Story

By Frank R. Shipman

[EDITORS' NOTE: Just after we had given for printing a brief review of "Red Blossoms," a book by a missionary of the American Board, this tribute to the book arrived. Our readers will find it interesting alike for its estimate of that book, and for its effective criticism of much current literature.]

EARLY in September a train was running out of the train shed in Atlanta, over the low land covered by tracks and crowded cabins. The great drought of 1925 had lasted for weeks. The city's inadequate sewerage system, unassisted by rain water, had been unequal to flushing the mains; and a slight but unmistakable odor of stagnant sewage rose from "mean streets" on either side of the rolling Pullmans. A few hours later one alighted in Demorest at the doors of Piedmont College. There was heat even in the hills of northeast Georgia, but the sewage smell was gone.

A few days ago I had been turning over the "reviews" (novels and plays) in the New Republic and the Saturday Night Review. The same unescapable smell of sewage came to my nose. Our young novelists seem unable to make the distinction, which the ordinary man makes clearly enough, between sexual passion and affection. It is one of the supreme moments in life to look into the eyes of a woman and love the soul behind the eyes. But the mere sexual impulse is so common that it hardly ranks as a sign of virility at all. Yet our youthful writers seem to think that there is a personal distinction in feeling the passion of lust. As for indulging it without regard to existing moral ties, that appears thought to be an achievement as difficult as it is rare. There is, in short, a moral draught in the land, and up-to-date fiction moves about in heat and sweat and frowsiness and stained sidewalks and fetid smells, though social tradition still saves us from moral pestilence, and actual life keeps on going with a fair amount of outward decency.

But it is good to get out of the atmosphere. So the writer felt when he turned from those book reviews to a book called Red Blossoms, the work of Mrs. Isabel Brown Rose of Sholapur, India, a member of the American Marathi Mission. Congregational supporters of the A. B. C. F. M. are familiar with her vivid letters and those of her husband, Rev. Richard S. Rose. And now comes this more extended reflection of a sound, busy, helpful life, facing concrete hills, trying to remove them in a sensible way, a life not too pious to be merry and not too fond of laughter to be religious, life moving at such a rapid rate that healthful moral breezes are created by its very motion.

The play called Rain pictured a life so slow in its abnormality, so languid in its narrowness, that in it sensuality got the better of spirituality. Such a missionary life is not impossible, of course. Human beings can do almost anything with themselves. But this book is worth a thousand "Rains." It shows missionary life actually operating in this old world of ours, as it operates from Labrador to Micronesia, from China to Brazil.

Mrs. Rose has portrayed successive phases of missionary work, and she has done this with her accustomed sparkling colors and spirited brush. To some extent her reportorial task interferes with her love story. But the love story outlasts the mission annals, and is modern enough to end unexpectedly and—in a way—sadly. Yet the sadness is not the vague or hopeless sadness of the sex-novels before alluded to. The heroine is a real woman, she has the clean, fine memory of a real man to buoy her up, a real faith and useful work to carry her forward, and so she lifts the reader away from the sewers to the healthful moral hill-life which is really going on all the time. It is a pity that the Sherwood Andersons and Eugene O'Neils have not had a summer of life at a missionary station to broaden their education. It would do them good to have it. It would do us all good to have it.

Parable of an American Traveler

By Clifford L. Miller

An American, gathering checks of credit, journeyed into all far countries: and no man spake unto him, except those anxious to have him spend his substance.

And when he came to himself he said, "I perish with hunger to be loved. In these far countries we Americans are hated; and are only tolerated as long as we spend our American dollars."

And he embarked, and returned to America. And when he was landing, 100 per cent Americans ran, and fell on his neck, and welcomed him home.

But he said unto them, "I desire also the welcome of all strangers within our gate." So he began to make merry with all racial types.

And when his elders mocked him for his friendliness with those without social standing he replied, "I'm beginning at home to make this loveless world more lovable by loving everybody."

And his elders were angered by his attitude and decided to ostracize him.

KENNEDY'S SECOND BEST

BY JOHN FREEMAN

Rev. Gordon Kennedy is the successful young pastor of Rosemount Memorial Church, Toronto. He is thirty, and unmarried. He boards a train at Toronto bound for the West on a summer vacation. Before the train starts, Mrs. Wilcox presents her attractive English niece, Miss Margaret Pearson, to Mr. Kennedy as his traveling companion. Miss Pearson is on the way from her grandfather in England to her father, in Vancouver. Mr. Kennedy and Miss Pearson develop a pleasant acquaintance on the train as they travel westward together. Miss Pearson is interested in social problems, and tells about her social settlement work in London. Mr. Kennedy leaves the train at Calgary. Just before he does so he proposes immediate marriage to Miss Pearson. She insists upon time for both to consider, but says that he may visit her in Vancouver at the end of his vacation if he continues to be interested in her.

CHAPTER V.

AFTER leaving Calgary Kennedy had a tedious journey in front of him. The road was rough. The car was uncomfortable and smelly. The heat was intense. No meals were served and there was nothing to drink except brackish lukewarm water. Ten minutes were allowed for lunch at Stamer's. Here he got a couple of rank sandwiches and a cup of vile coffee. It was late when the train reached Mandeville, the station nearest the ranch, which was fourteen miles away.

Jim was there to meet him. He was a towering broad-shouldered man, an inch taller and five years older than his brother. Gordon was fond of saying that he had looked up to Jim all his life and expected to keep on doing so.

"Well here you are, Don! Never mind about your luggage. Peters will take it in the buckboard. I've got a horse for you. Come on!"

Jim threw an arm around Gordon and led him away.

"Good journey?"

"Fine, most of it. Pretty rotten on this line."

"Yes; invalid engines and worn-out coaches. The whole of the rolling stock needs to be scrapped. 'Twill be presently. The railway people are going to build a line to link up Tremaine and Mandeville. Been surveyed already. It will run through the southern part of the ranch. They may start work next year. When that line is built it will throw a lot more traffic onto the Mandeville-Calgary end and they'll have to give it a new equipment. Incidentally, it will be a big thing for me. Increase all values thirty per cent. Revolutionize the whole situation. Did you find it hot?"

"The heat found me. I'm a rag."

"Then perhaps you'd better ride in the buckboard with Peters."

"Not on your life, Ken."

"All right. Just as you say. Here's your horse. Call him Larkspur!"

They unhitched the horses and mounted. Just as they were seated the locomotive gave a shriek and Larkspur went up in the air. He reared until it looked as if he would go over on his back. Gordon slipped his feet out of the stirrups. Then grasping the pommel of the saddle with his right hand, he threw his weight forward. Gently and gracefully Larkspur's forefeet descended until they touched the ground again.

"Neatly done for a tenderfoot! Larkspur will love you for that," said Jim.

"Is he so affectionate?"

"Heart of gold. Best of my bunch."

"How many have you now?"

"About sixty, counting the bronchos. You'll like Larkspur when you get used to him. Easy action, eh?"

"Delightful! Beats a rocking chair."

They cantered side by side through the cooling evening air, while the light slowly faded and rich scents rose around them from the beating of their horses' feet upon the beflowered grass now wet with dew.

"It's great to have you here again," said Jim. "Four years since your last visit. We've opened up a lot of country since then."

"It's fine to be here, Ken. I'm going to have a good time."

After their late supper that night they sat for an hour on the west verandah of the bungalow facing a ridge of the Rockies, faintly outlined against the sky.

"Don," said Jim, "I believe this life would suit you."

"It's certainly a fine life, Ken. You're getting things in good shape here. This is a charming bungalow."

"Best in Alberta, I'm told. Plenty of room in it, isn't there?"

"Surprisingly roomy. You could do with a big family here."

"Some different from the shack thing I had when you were out here before, eh?"

"I should say so. It's delightful. But what surprises me most is your music room. I never dreamed of finding the like of that in an Alberta bungalow."

"A little fad of mine. I like music, you know. The men like it, too. They often sprawl on the verandahs in the evening and smoke their pipes while I strum on the piano. They seem equally fond of sacred music and the ragtime stuff. They're great boys, Don."

"They've certainly got a great boss," replied Gordon.

Presently Jim said: "I wish you'd join me out here for good and all. Why not chuck your sky-piloting and link up with real life?"

Gordon smiled.

"The West has properly got you, hasn't it?"

"Sure thing! Got me through and through and for keeps. This is God's country and it offers a man the fullest and freest life that can be lived on earth."

"Of course you can't expect me to feel just as you do about that. A man's life is with his work and my work lies elsewhere."

"Look here, Don. I'd like to ask you something: just what are you driving at in your work among these pleasant people in Rosemount? Have you a definite objective? Some target you're trying to hit?"

"Of course I have a target. I want to build and consolidate a great church."

"In other words, you want to get a lot of people combining to meet under one roof for the purpose of enjoying sacred music and listening to prayers and sermons. Is that a man's job? Is it a life work for a fellow with guts in him?"

Gordon laughed. Then he fell silent for a moment. After a while he said:

"You put the thing down on much too low a level, Ken. The matters you mention are only means to an end."

"What end?"

"The betterment of the people, of course."

"In what way?"

"By lifting up their aspirations. By bringing them into touch with the Almighty."

"Have you anything in your mind that you want them to do? I mean real, practical, costly things? Something for the direct and immediate improvement of human conditions?"

"I'm not a social reformer, Jim. I'm a preacher of religion. I try to give good impulses to the people."

"Leaving the people to work those impulses out, or perhaps to let them die out?"

"I suppose that is the situation. What more can I do? I can't perform another man's duty for him or live his life for him."

"You preach, expecting him to practice, and count that a fair division of labor, eh?"

"Not exactly. I try to practice what I preach and set a good example."

They sat silent for a while and then Jim asked, "I suppose you have some sinners among your people at Rosemount?"

"Sure! They're all sinners," replied Gordon.

"Do any of them ever repent?"

Gordon looked serious as he replied, "I don't know that they often do, Jim."

"Well, isn't that the real test? Do the people need preachers to tell them of their duty? Don't they know it right well? What they need is to be stirred up to do it. When a man quits his meanness and his slacking and stands up to duty, I guess that's repentance; what do you say?"

"Good theology, Jim!"

"No theology at all; only plain horse sense."

"It's the truth anyhow; but the preacher's job is to strengthen the motive for standing up to duty."

Silence for a while; then Jim asked, "Does the prodigal son ever come your way

—the fellow who is ragged, dirty, hungry, and wants to get home? Ever meet any girls gone wrong and tobogganing to hell on drink and drugs?"

"Not much of that thing has come my way yet."

"Well, I guess there's some of 'em in Toronto, and like enough in Rosemount. I know we have 'em in the Western towns. But it's late. We must get to bed."

Gordon rose and stretched his arms.

"Strikes me you should have been the preacher, Ken."

"And you the ranchman?"

"Perhaps you think I'd do better as a play actor." Jim put his hand affectionately on Gordon's shoulder.

"I think nothing of the sort, Kid. But I want to know that you're doing a real man's work. I want to see you get bang up against reality while the going's good."

Shall I or Shall I Not?

By Mrs. Franklin Warner

To me one of the most disagreeable things about life is that it is a continuing procession of choices. Free will has made us slaves to constant decisions, large and small. I am deciding right now whether I will take time to type off this thing which is clamoring to be said or go at once to the pile of unanswered letters encumbering my desk. None of us so rich or so poor but that we must choose, "Shall I have this or that?" "Shall I go here or there?" The woman of the household, being the purchasing agent of the firm, makes what seems to be minor choices every day. It is always before her, shall she buy more of this and pay less or less of that and pay more. Or shall it be all of that and none of the other.

I remember an old man and woman out in the Middle West who sold the farm for a goodly sum and found themselves released from grinding economies and with money in their hands to be spent. They must choose and their choice was a large and expensive house in the county seat, furnished with the things which had all their lives seemed most desirable but utterly inaccessible. In this new home they settled themselves down to spend the rest of their days, released from the need of economy but not from the habit, for the old woman pulled shut every blind in every room of the house but the kitchen and one bedroom and in these they lived, happy in the consciousness of glories for which they had no use, content with their choice. Neighbors told of how she said, "When butter goes high, we eats lard. We eats it and we likes it, too."

I have never fed my family lard, but I, too, choose. I go to "cash and carries" and see my friends going to the plate-glass, white-apron, keep-an-account shops. I price the package goods and get it where it is twelve cents a package instead of twenty cents. Twenty cents in order to insure the crediting merchant interest on his slow paying charge accounts. And then I take my eight cents saved and start on a trip to China. Lots of people cannot afford to have a trip to China but we can, you see, because we have that eight cents. Of course, beside the twelve cents paid for my package, I must stand the loss of a little respect from my neighbors; I must be willing to have a little friendly contempt come my way. But so long as I show myself perfectly willing they should choose plate glass and white aprons, they have not yet ostracized me for my bundle carrying habits.

We women are constantly choosing, shall we have new curtains in the living room this spring or a dining room rug,—or both,—or neither. Sometimes the decision is made for us by the holes in the dining room rug, but oftener our neighbor's new rug is what decides the question. And here is another choice. Shall I or my neighbor be the arbitress of the family exchequer? To whom is the decision more important? I know that if I buy the rug I give up something else, some desire of my heart of which my neighbor may know nothing. Into that rug will go a concert, or music lessons, or magazine subscriptions, or my share in the missionary apportionment, or the trip to China.

If we happy, middle class, American women were ever hungry or cold, hungry without knowing where food could be gotten, cold without hope of getting warm, no one would have any right to preach economy to us. But so long as it is a matter, not of necessity but of choice, we should talk it over together. I wonder if sometimes we have not paid an intangible price, sacrificed a spiritual something beyond value, when our neighbor decided for us that it was time we should have a new dining room rug. For we who have never been hungry ourselves are not so uninformed nor so stupid but that we know of hundreds, of thousands, of millions of women who are starved physically, mentally, and spiritually.

With the coin which paid for the rug of our neighbor's ordering has there gone the joy of giving, the inspiration of serving which might have been ours? We knew of One who looked with full comprehension of the beauty and desirability of a home and chose to be homeless that there might in the fullness of time be something called a Christian home in which we might live. He looked with understanding, though not with envy upon the birds who had nests and the foxes who had holes; understanding but not envy, for He had made His choice and was ready to pay the price for that which He had chosen, even unto death.

A Prayer for the New Year

O Thou who art from everlasting to everlasting, without beginning or end of days: Replenish us with heavenly grace, at the beginning of this year, that we may be enabled to accept all its duties, to perform all its labors, to welcome all its mercies, to meet all its trials, and to advance through all it holds in store for us, with cheerful courage and a constant mind. O Lord, suffer us not to be separated from thee, either by joy or sorrow, or any sin or weakness of our own; but have compassion upon us, and forgive us, and keep us in the strong confidence of thine eternal love in Jesus Christ; that as thou hast called us to immortality through him, so we may pass the residue of our years in the power of an endless life; and to thy Name shall be all the praise. Amen.—From the calendar of the Second Congregational Church of Putnam, Ct.

Parables of Safed the Sage

The Parable of the Good-Luck Garage

Now there was a man who builded an house for his Automobile, and he fain would place above the door a symbol of Good Luck. And he found the Shoe of an Horse, and he nailed it above the door of that Temple dedicated to the worship of speed.

And it came to pass that I and Keturah we went that way. And I said unto her, Keturah.

And she said, Behold I am here.

And I said, Behold that horseshoe above the door of the Garage.

And when Keturah beheld it she smiled.

And she said, That man may have the Right Idea of what will bring him Good Luck.

And I said, It is even so. He may yet have to call for the aid of some farmer's horse to bring his Motor Car back to the Garage.

And Keturah said, An horse may be a vain thing for safety, even as the Psalmist declared, but it is a good reliance when the Motor breaketh down.

And I said unto her, Men do not easily rid themselves of bondage to the past. When they no longer drive an horse, they still will not choose their emblem of Good Luck from the shoe of the Beast they have turned out to grass. Even so did Saul, the first king of Israel, despise Samuel while he was alive, and seek to call up his ghost after he was dead. For ideas that once have ruled the minds of men give way but slowly to new thoughts and ideals, and then leave Vestiges of their continuity, and the dead hands of Institutions that have given way to other things better or worse still exercise their influence on Human Conduct, and the great men of the past, and some others as well, still Rule us from their Urns.

And Keturah said, Thou and I, my lord, are very nearly free from superstition, and we put not our trust in Horseshoes and such like. Neither do we fear things numbered Thirteen nor remember not to do things on Friday.

And I said, It is even so, and I do not take too seriously other people's fondness for old wives' fables and the symbols thereof. If any man careth for an Horseshoe over the Barn Door, I see no objection to it. But for a Garage, I think that I should prefer something at least as up to date as the automobile.

And Keturah said, What symbol wouldest thou prefer for Good Luck above the door of the Garage?

And I said, As I own no Garage I will select no Symbol for it. But this I would desire, that my Good Luck sign be as nearly up to date as my means of transportation.

And Keturah said, Yea, and they may have the Motor Cars. But I enjoy the rides they give to us.

And so do I.

But if I sought a Symbol, it would be the Wings of an Airplane, or the Motor of a Blimp. For I would choose my Ideals from things that belong to the Future.

Religious Beliefs of Forty-Five College Girls

Results of a Questionnaire

By E. Albert Cook, Ph.D.

IN a college for girls of one of the Southern states, the effort was made, a short time ago, to find out what religious ideas had been inculcated and were still held by the girls of the state who came to college. In a class in sociology, in which forty-five were present, each girl was given a list of statements of religious views on four subjects: I. Religion (in general); II. The Bible; III. God; and IV. Jesus. Under each of these general heads, five sets of alternative statements were presented, and the student was asked to check that one of each set of two statements which most nearly represented the views she had held up to that time.

The girls were asked, but not required, to give their names, class in college, and denominational preference, on their papers. Of those who did so, the following data were given: Twenty-four were freshmen, thirteen were sophomores, and four were juniors. Thirteen expressed their preference for the Methodist Church, ten for the Baptist, ten for the "Christian," three Presbyterian, one Catholic. Eight gave no preference.

From Churches of Conservative Type

Probably all of the churches from which these girls came were of the decidedly conservative type, as there are very few in the state of any other kind. It is doubtful whether any of them had any scientific religious instruction, by a teacher well trained in the best knowledge and thought of today. In this college, a state institution of high academic standards, they had had no instruction of a systematic sort, in the Bible or religion. In the sociology class they had had some reading and discussion emphasizing the need of a rational interpretation of Christianity and one which should help to socialize society, but there had been no discussion of particular doctrines, such as this questionnaire involved. The students were instructed not to ask themselves which of the alternative statements was the most reasonable, but which most nearly represented the views they had been holding in the past. Most probably the note added by one girl in a place provided for notes or explanations, "Many of these statements I had never thought about and scarcely know how to say I believe" would have represented the fact with regard to many others. Still, the result seems to me interesting and not without significance.

I. Religion

The first alternative statements offered were: a. There is one true religion, Christianity, and all the rest are false. b. All religions have some truth in them, but Christianity has more truth than any other. Seven girls checked the first of these statements and thirty-seven, the second. One did not commit herself on the issue.

The second set was as follows: a. That religion is best which can give one the strongest assurance of a happy life after death. b. That religion is best which can help one to live the most satisfactory life in this world before death. Fourteen of the girls chose the first statement as best expressing their views, and thirty-one, the second. Of course these two statements are not mutually exclusive, but the point at issue is the matter of emphasis and of the fundamental value of religion. The result in this case may have been considerably influenced by the position taken in the class work, that there is great need for a form of religion which will help to solve the pressing problems of society. Still the "vote" seems interesting, and, to my mind, hopeful.

The third set read: a. That which determines whether or not you are a Christian is the creed or belief which you hold. b. The kind of life you live. Here the choice was one for the first statement and forty-four for the second.

Next were given these alternatives: a. There are probably errors or weaknesses in the faith and practice of all churches and the best is only striving toward a perfection not yet attained. b. One of the sects or denominations of Christianity is entirely right and all others are wrong in so far as they differ from this right one. Somewhat to my surprise, every member of the class chose the first statement.

The fifth set was: a. There is some religious experience, ceremony, or act of some kind which, when once enjoyed or performed, secures one's salvation for all time. b. One needs to have religious experience every day to enjoy the fullest life. The choices were: "a" 4; "b" 41. Here again the alternatives were not mutually exclusive, yet I think the different emphasis and point of view suggested in the statements and in the choice between them by the students is significant.

It may be interesting to note that the Catholic girl, an unusually bright and sweet-spirited member of the class, chose what might be called the "liberal" statement in each of these five cases, and indeed in all of the other alternatives between which she chose. In four cases out of the twenty presented, she made no choice, and added the note: "The questions I left unchecked I did not feel capable of answering."

In general, the choices indicated, in this section of the inquiry, based more upon ordinary common sense and experience than upon church dogma, seem decidedly encouraging.

II. The Bible

The first alternatives were: a. The Bible is a book in which God has completely, perfectly, and supernaturally revealed his will. b. The Bible contains a carefully selected collection of the highest thoughts men have had about God and his will, but not without mistakes such as men naturally make. The choices were: "a" 21; "b" 24.

The second set was: a. From the earlier to the later books of the Bible there is progress shown in the understanding of God's nature and his will for men. b. Every sentence in the Bible, from Genesis to Revelation, is absolutely true and correct and has the same authority as any other sentence. Choices: "a" 34; "b" 10; "not voting" 1.

The third question concerned the recognition of God's word in the Bible: a. We know that God speaks to us through the Bible because we find teachings in it which we can see to be true or helpful. b. We know that the Bible is God's Word because there is evidence that its authors were supernaturally inspired. Our judgment of its truth or value has nothing to do with its authority for us. Choices: "a" 34; "b" 10; non-committal 1.

Fourth: a. We are bound to consider every command given in the Bible as binding upon us, even if the action enjoined might seem to us wrong. b. We should get all the light we can upon right and wrong action, from the Bible, but our reason and conscience must be followed if they seem to disagree with a Biblical command. Choices: "a" 18; "b" 26; no choice 1.

Fifth: a. We should expect to find the views with regard to "science," "history," etc., of the times in which it was written, reflected in the Bible, and should not be surprised or disturbed if they disagree with our present knowledge. b. Every statement in the Bible is to be taken as absolutely correct, scientifically, historically, and every other way. Choices: "a" 34; "b" 9; no choice 2.

The views expressed about the Bible appear surprisingly "modern" in trend. It may be suspected that while the conservative position was probably assumed by preachers and teachers from whom these girls received their instruction, there was little or no discussion of the alternative views, and the general intelligence and common sense of the girls, in the absence of specific instruction, led them toward the modern views when the alternatives were put before them in definite form.

III. God

The first choice of views offered was as follows: a. God is a consciousness active throughout the universe and just as truly present in the place where any human being is, as up in the sky. b. God is a being having a body shaped like that of a man, whom we may see when we go to heaven, but who is not present on the earth. The students expressed their views unanimously for the first alternative. This seems somewhat surprising. Probably many of the students if expressing their own thought in their own words would have made a combination of the ideas expressed in the two statements, holding to something like the first, but also holding the idea that God would be seen in visible form, more or less like a man, in Heaven.

The second alternatives were: a. The special evidences of God's activity are to be found in events which we cannot explain, supernatural events, miracles, etc. Without such mysterious events we should have no evidence that there is any God. b. All events except those coming from man's sin are to be thought of as showing God's activity, but those in which the spirit of love is manifested are the clearest evidences of his presence and work. Choices: "a" 6; "b" 37; no choice 2.

Third: a. God has at different times favored or chosen people, nations, or races, and has less interest, if any at all, in the other races, nations, or groups. b. God loves every human being of every race and nation, and is displeased with every action which tends to hurt or hinder any person of any race or country. Choices: "a" 1; "b" 44. We suspect that the rejection of the "chosen people" doctrine is due more to ignorance of the Old Testament than to disagreement with some of its teachings, and that the statement of "a" was somewhat too general. The almost unanimous acceptance of "b", however, indicates, quite hopefully, the present-day emphasis on the love of God.

Fourth: a. God acts in the most loving possible way toward every man, no matter whether he is Christian or Buddhist or Mohammedan or atheist, wise or ignorant, and is ready to forgive and help everyone who desires forgiveness and help. b. God has revealed in the Bible the conditions on which he will forgive, help, and save men, and no one can expect his favor unless he fully conforms to the conditions there laid down. Choices: "a" 34; "b" 11.

Fifth: a. God can do everything which can be imagined or put into words, and he knows everything which has happened or which will happen throughout eternity. b. God can do only the things which are according to the laws of reality and according to his loving will, and he can know of the future, only those things which it is certain that the forces now active will bring about. Choices: "a" 36; "b" 6; no choice 1. That feature of the traditional idea of God to which men "instinctively" cling most tenaciously is the one that God knows everything in the past and future, and can do everything which can be imagined or named, no matter how absurd.

IV. Jesus

The first issue presented, concerning Jesus, was: a. We know that Jesus was the Son of God because he was born of a virgin, worked many miracles, and was miraculously raised from the dead. b. We call Jesus the Son of God because his life, teachings, and death show pre-eminently the loving spirit of God. He would be just as certainly the Son of God even if nothing miraculous was associated with his life. Choices: "a" 17; "b" 26; no choice 2.

Second: a. The purpose of Jesus' ministry was to teach the people the righteousness and love of God and the spiritual nature of his Kingdom. b. The purpose of Jesus' ministry was to prove by his miracles that he was the Son of God and the only way of salvation, so that people might believe on him and be saved. Choices "a" 28; "b" 15; no choice 2.

Third: a. By his death Jesus accomplished something in view of which God will forgive our sins, if we believe that Jesus died for us, although, otherwise, God would be angry at us and punish us forever after this life. b. By his life and death Jesus showed men the loving, forgiving spirit of God, and thus made it a great deal easier for us to trust in God's love and forgiveness. Choices: "a" 1; "b" 44.

Fourth: a. No matter how good we may live, unless we believe certain things about Jesus, we shall be lost eternally. b. We are being saved when we are growing more Christlike in character, whether we have ever heard of Jesus or not. All the influences which come to anyone from the life and death of Jesus are ways in which he is saving us, if they make us better. Choices: "a" 13; "b" 32.

Fifth: a. Jesus will conquer the earth and reign in it, just so far as his principles and his loving spirit come to control the lives of men, but not as a visible earthly monarch. b. Jesus will return to earth and there reign visibly as a king, punishing and destroying the wicked. Choices: "a" 37; "b" 5; no choice 3.

The views with respect to the last three issues seem to indicate rather clearly that the churches in the state concerned, while conservative, are not consciously fundamentalist. Altogether the results of this inquiry seem decidedly encouraging, and suggest that conservatism itself, where it has little stimulus or competition with "modernism," is yet undergoing a rather rapid transformation. It is becoming broader, more rational, and more socially useful.

The New Year

By Robert Elliott Brown

Farewell Old Year!
Amid the sun and dun
  Of oak clad hills
  In memory thou shalt lie;
Among the heart's most treasured things
  That never die.
Farewell receding shores!
  Each island in the bays
  Bespeaks a month,
That makes us clutch
And strive to hold its happy days.
  But we must hurry on,
Spite of the way the heart inclines.
Farewell the inner waters
Plumbed by last year's sounding lines!
Farewell familiar depths
With buoys well sown!
Farewell the harbor of the known,
That time compels us clear!
Crowd sail, port helm, and boldly steer
  Out through the golden gate
  Into the opening year.

Evolution

By Edyth Welles Warner

The dust, the mud, the clay—
  What matters it, the stuff!
An age, a year, a day—
  Is it not enough
A breath of Holy Spirit?
  And lo! no more the clod;
Instead, a soul created,
  Forever linked with God!

Nash Workers Join Labor

At a meeting of the entire group of factory workers of the A. Nash Company, Cincinnati, O., Dec. 8, Arthur Nash made an address recommending that all the workers join the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, the trade union of the industry, and that the workers invite Mr. Sidney Hillman, the president of the Amalgamated, to address them. The workers at once passed the resolution in favor of hearing Mr. Hillman, who went to Cincinnati and spoke before them on Dec. 10. Immediately thereafter the resolution to affiliate with organized labor went through.

The Nash plant, the largest of its branch of the clothing business in the country, thus goes over to the position of the "Amalgamated." The action is doubly significant because of the bitter warfare in the past waged upon the A. Nash Company by the Amalgamated because of its open-shop policy, although its wages were higher and its hours shorter than any other similar plant, and its policies steadily directed toward labor control.

The Nash Company has grown in seven years from a sixty-thousand dollar to a three-million dollar corporation without calling for any outside financing. The stock is held by Mr. Nash and the workers. The phenomenal growth has come from good feeling among all classes of workers, strenuous efforts to make good and increase the output, skillful advertising, and by what Mr. Nash characterizes as the application of Christian principles to industry.

Mr. Nash urged the action upon his workers because he asserted that they should not be contented with their own welfare but take responsibility for the welfare of toilers everywhere. This he believes can be done only by united effort. He plainly told his own workers that they had nothing to gain materially, and that the appeal he was making was based on the ideas of brotherhood they held in common.

A gentleman is one who does not have to prove it.—The Tale End.

Religion and Education

Professor Weigle's address at the meeting of the Federal Council Executive Committee in Detroit

By Frederick L. Fagley

WHEN the representatives of the various denominations met in Detroit, Dec. 11, to discuss matters relating to their common work, there was no subject that drew more interest than the subject of Religion and Education. The two phases of this problem were stated thus: Should the churches make a vigorous effort to secure larger attention for religion in the public school system? or, should the churches themselves carry on all religious education?

The discussion was opened by Professor Weigle of Yale, and his address on "The Relationship of Public Schools to the Program of Religious Eduation" was most masterly and was received by all the representatives with great interest. Professor Weigle began with a review of the history of religion in the schools. He described the old-time Connecticut school with its emphasis upon the Bible and Bible teachings, and how it was that the curriculum of the public schools centered very much around the Bible, learning to read the Bible, and understanding the teachings of the Bible. That when the Congregationalists were "unhorsed" in Connecticut, it was done quite largely by the incoming of those of other believers who did not agree altogether in the Congregational interpretation. This being the part of dispute the natural result was that the Bible and religious training should be eliminated from the school. This same process occurred in other New England states. Dr. Weigle pointed out that the public schools have been almost completely stripped of religious teaching not by atheists and infidels, but in the name of religion and quite largely by Protestants.

The final blow to religion in the schools in New England came at the time of the Unitarian controversy, where one of the main points of attack by the new element was that the traditional Bible interpretation and the traditional attitude of religion should not be taught all children regardless of the religious beliefs of their parents.

What, then, is the proper method of procedure now that the issue has been raised and results are as they are at present? It is obviously impossible to unite all the various creeds today to the support of any one program. The ideals and objectives of the various religious bodies are so at variance, and the opportunities of turning the thoughts of the young are so many, that the religious leaders of the various church bodies cannot be expected to unite in the support of any one program of religion in a school conducted by the public school teacher.

Continuing along this line Professor Weigle said: "The remedy is for the churches and synagogues to maintain church schools for the teaching of religion that will match up in point of educational efficiency with the public schools.

"America is a land of churches and of schools. Most of its citizens profess religion and desire education. Yet in America, as throughout the world, a relative secularization of education has taken place within the last hundred years. The control of the schools has passed from the hands of the churches into those of the state; and religion has been almost wholly eliminated from the program and curriculum of public education.

"This practical secularization of the public schools is an incidental result of the working out, under sectarian conditions, of two principles which are fundamental to American life.

"1. The principle of religious freedom, which insures the separation of church and state, and guarantees to all the right to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences;

"2. The principle of public education for citizenship in a democracy, which lays upon the state itself the duty of securing its own perpetuity and shaping its own future by the education of those who, as citizens and voters, constitute its sovereigns.

"The fulfillment of these principles, throughout almost 150 years of our national history, has brought about, on the one hand, a constant increase of emphasis upon civic, social, and industrial aims in public education, as contrasted with religious aims, and, on the other hand, has put the public schools at the mercy of minorities with respect to matters of religious conviction. The result is our present situation, with the public schools almost completely stripped of religious elements.

"We have thrown upon the public schools a multitude of new duties. We are relying upon them very largely, not only to impart to the children the new knowledge and power with which the progress of science, invention, and discovery is so richly endowing our time, but to afford to them much of the sense-experience, motor training and moral discipline, which under simpler social conditions were afforded to children by the incidental activities and contacts of everyday life in the home and in the community. The schools of today are expected to constitute a sort of epitome or reproduction, on a small scale, of life itself.

"For such schools to emit religion is a matter of far more serious consequence than for the schools of a generation ago. The older schools obviously afforded to children but a fraction of their education; the larger, and in many respects the more important, part of education was left to the home and community.

"The principle of the separation of church and state must not be so construed as to render the state a fosterer of non-religion or atheism. Yet that is precisely what we are in danger of doing in America today.

"The most potent religious influence in the life of any school is to be found in the moral and religious character of the teacher. The public schools of America are not irreligious because their teachers are almost everywhere men and women of strong moral character and of definite religious conviction. Without the direct teaching of religion, these teachers, by the character of their discipline and the spirit which they maintain in the life of the schools, have been and are of profound influence in determining the character of American boys and girls.

"Even the religious heterogeneity of our population does not necessitate the present degree of exclusion of religion from public education. It is because we have held our different religious views and practices in so jealous, divisive, and partisan a fashion that the state has been obliged to withdraw religion from the curriculum and program of its schools.

"The movement to establish week-day schools of religion, in addition to the Sunday schools which have long been a feature of American life, is spreading rapidly. In some cities time is granted for their work out of the schedule of the public schools. In others they are conducted before or after public school hours. It seems clear that the movement is destined to bear permanent results, and that ultimately week-day sessions of the church schools will be as a general rule granted a reasonable portion of the time from the public school schedules. A demand for time is not the first consideration; churches should begin by making sure that they have a program and curriculum of sufficient educational value to justify the grant of time.

"Let the various religious bodies agree on an educational policy with respect to their own teaching work and to the sort of recognition that they desire religion to be afforded by and in the public schools; let them do their share of the education of children in a way that merits recognition, and a fit measure of recognition is made possible and will almost certainly follow."

Because God Is

By Ralph Baxter Larkin

I see Power, manifested in tiny atom and growing cell, in circling planets and a billion blazing suns.
I perceive that these things are what they are because the Infinite God is what He is, and that in them He is expressing Himself.

I see Beauty, manifested in form and color, in flower and sunset and human face, in snowy summit and wooded vale and in the starry heavens.
I perceive that Beauty is because God is, and that in it His nature is expressing itself.

I see Character, a thing of grace and moral grandeur, of truth and purity and the beauty of holiness.
I see it not in star and flower but in persons, beings endowed with the priceless gift of moral freedom, who, using their freedom aright, permit the infinite God to express in them His own moral perfections.

A Sunday Evening in a Cleveland Church

I arrived five minutes before the time to begin, and found the large audience room nearly full, but was shown to a good seat near the front. Soon the organ started, and the chairman of the Sunday evening committee took his seat on the platform. The service, as a whole, was not a duplicate of the morning service, nor any like the usual evening meeting, but was rather a big family gathering of the ideal home. It was divided, like all Gaul, into three parts. The first was musical and entertaining. The latter was taken by a young woman from the Tucker School of Expression, who rendered beautifully a modern selection. At this point the pastor appeared, and took his seat behind the desk. The second part consisted of a lecture by the pastor on the subject, "Are our Morals Slipping?" He quoted from the figures on crime given in a current number of a popular magazine, and in the course of his address was applauded several times.

I have heard a good many Chautauqua and lyceum lectures, and venture to say it would compare favorably with the average of these.

The third part was devotional, with Scripture reading, prayer, and appropriate music. As the great audience filed slowly out of the church, I thought to myself, "Have we here the problem of the Sunday evening service solved by a Congregational pastor and church in the fair city of Cleveland?" It seemed so, and I determined to come again to Hough Church.

Old Vows with New Resolutions

By John Moore

I HAVE sometimes thought that if cynics smile surely angels must weep at the pledging of our New Year vows. For though they were made in an assumption of piety and with all the fervor of an evangelist, one has not gone far before these resolutions prove to be as brittle as any others. It becomes so easy for cynics to sneer: "Ah! your morality is a matter of Calendar rather than Conscience; you move at the impulse of an artificial date, not under the stimulus of a worthy motive. You thought there was some special magic in New Year's Day, but now where are you?—the wheels are off your chariot, your Red Letter Day has turned out to be a Red Sea Day!"

Now this is humiliating to flesh and blood. One stands accused, condemned, feeling the weight of ball and chain!

And yet in spite of this experience I shall keep the first of January as a Day of Vows, and make afresh my New Year's Resolutions. And this for several reasons. First, a fresh start is made in so many other directions that it seems appropriate to begin again in my moral life. Secondly, atmosphere counts; by it the lungs are fed, the will braced, the personality poised. The sense of renewal is in the air and the climate is congenial to resolution-making and I can feel the thrill of ascending effort. Thirdly, man is a resolution-making biped, not what he is but what he longs to be is his measure, so no matter how Augustinian others may think me to be I shall once more renew confidence in myself—with Pelagius! I am not going to be brow-beaten by what the cynics say.

So I am going to remake an old vow and reenforce it with new resolutions that next year, please God, I will live a simplified life. Mark, I do not say a simple life. This great life of ours will always be a strange tangle of complexities. Nevertheless, I mean to bring into the welter and confusion of it certain grand simplicities. I have been asked so many times this year to spend my money for that which is not bread, and my labor for that which has given no satisfaction, that I have felt a great struggle in my interior against an ever-growing accumulation of fripperies, fropperies, superficialities, artificialities, and superfluities, and I am not going to be buried beneath this flood of externalism. I mean to match my strength against a lot of trivial things that leave one no time for great; against fictitious things that are always ousting the real; against Mr. Betterday, who is always wasting my time on some new-fangled notion, program, or invention; against Mr. Fritterday, who is so adept at filching my time and wasting my leisure. I am not going to be at the beck and call of my body, nor yet at the whim and caprice of other people. I am going to make opportunity to be myself, take time to think, and spend effort to save my soul.

Resolved, also, that I will cultivate more assiduously cheerfulness, charity, and magnanimity. The world is full of travail—the cares of business, the indolence and dishonesty of servants, the injustice and prejudice of masters, the failure of correspondents and customers, the fluctuation of trade, the demands of trade, the fashion of trade, the ebb and flow of commercial currents, the incalculable trickery and diplomacy of those who would cut out new channels of life, the "burden and the weary weight of this unintelligible world"—all of this has been poured this year into my ear. It will be next year, but I shall medicine myself with God's great gift of cheerfulness, walk in its warmth and light. The charity that "beareth all things, and thinketh no evil," that is not conscious of itself as pity or forbearance or anything but love, shall be my constant companion. And I shall cultivate magnanimity by endeavoring to think the best of others and put the kindest interpretation on their conduct, by giving a ready word of appreciation, by lending a hand to all toilers and strugglers and stragglers. To stop the weeds from choking life I must grow the fruits of the spirit.

A third resolution for the New Year is that I will strive to love Nature more and more, with the increasing consciousness that she never betrays the heart that loves her. How amazing are her wonders! How delightful her beauties! Only today I read from Thomson's Seasons: "I know no subject more elevating, more amusing, more ready to awake the poetical enthusiasm, the philosophical reflection, and the moral sentiment more than the works of Nature. Where can we meet with such variety, such beauty, such magnificence?—and all that enlarges and transports the soul? What is more inspiring than in calm, wide survey of them? In every dress Nature is greatly charming, whether she puts on the crimson robes of the morning, the strong effulgence of noon, the sober suit of evening, or the deep sables and blackness of tempest. How gay looks the spring, how glorious the summer, how pleasing the autumn, how venerable the winter. But there is no thinking of these things without breaking out into poetry, which is, by the by, a plain and undeniable argument of their superior excellence." The poet is right! I must get close to Nature, interest myself in her million illuminated miracles, and revel more deeply in her rolling seasons and spectacular phenomena.

Finally, I shall resolve to make the very most of my social relations, and in worth-while ways. Certain phases of society are a trial to me. Many times a year I find myself quoting James Thomson's (B.V.) dictum that "a meeting is less than a man." But now, can I carry into my social contacts more interest, sympathy, sincerity? Sometimes one feels that sincerity in assemblages, clubs, parties, is almost impossible. But what a need of it! Then let me be sincere in every fiber and sinew and cell of my being! No word of mine shall have a hollow ring; tact shall not claim me more than truth; my soul shall go into my speech. Seeing that the art of conversation has fallen on degenerate days and public speech has become deplorable in style if not in substance, I will open the doors of my conversation wide to all parts of my mind and let my expression be discriminating, but direct and immediate. I will not build a great wall round the countries of my mind, nor insulate myself into a tradition of isolation in things of the spirit. I will "walk with men nor lose the common touch," and I will let the term "gentleman" be the salt of my speech and the bones of my style, for I will have recourse to the verbal ending of manners! I will make much of friendship, and have as many friends as I can. By God's grace I will pay attention to some of my weaknesses, root out bad habits, get rid of unlovely traits of character, which mar myself and give pain to others. The sins that clingeth so closely I will conquer. God helping me, my life this year shall be as Oliver Wendell Holmes once said, "a challenge, not a truce."

OUR READERS' FORUM

War and Crime

To the Editor of The Congregationalist:

It is a good thing to have public attention focussed on the subject of crime, as is now being done in an effort to diminish it, but it is quite another thing to achieve results. It will be as impossible to check crime to any appreciable degree without removing its roots and causes as it would be to stop an epidemic of typhoid while the community continues to get its water supply from a polluted source.

Crime does not just happen. It is a definite result of existing conditions. Therefore it is ever present. There are many psychological factors that enter into its continuance which only psychologists can adequately discuss. Here is where M.D.'s who specialize in mental conditions of all varieties can render valuable service by enlightening the public on these lines. An intelligent public opinion based on the latest scientific knowledge is the great need of the day if crime is to be successfully combated.

There is, however, one powerful factor in this crime problem that is easily recognizable and can be entirely eliminated if people are sufficiently aroused and desirous of eliminating it. That factor is war. War is the sum total of evils. It is lawlessness let loose. It is the giant atrocity that breeds all other atrocities. From the evil passions engendered by it, what wonder that crime is rampant during a war and seems to gather impetus after its close?

War is legalized crime. How shall we abate and prevent crime when the greatest of all crimes is maintained as a lawful institution and its threat is held constantly before us by our Army and Navy chiefs who feel they neglect their duty if they do otherwise?

What wonder that the minds of the young are receptive to ideas of crime when, from their earliest childhood, they hear about war and their minds are filled with thoughts of death by violence—and with more and more suggestions of increasing these deaths by additional and more dreadful and subtle devices? Try to soften this as much as may be, the ugly spector of mass murder will not down and it will create its sinister mental effects.

What wonder that children grow up to become criminals of all shades and grades of depravity when they are given pistols and small guns and soldiers to play with, and mock battles and killings are part of the sports that leave imprint upon their impressionable minds? And military training in high school and college serves to make the impressions of their childhood well-nigh indelible!

Should not our experts in medicine and psychology deliver strong messages about this to our good citizens—especially now that the tremendous effects of the sub-conscious mind on both mental and physical health are being so widely recognized?

The answer to this is: abolish war! It can be done! The Locarno treaties point a way. The co-operative spirit should be steadfastly championed to the exclusion of militarism. If the will to peace be strong enough war can be abolished. And with war eliminated, criminality will lose one of its worst breeding places. The wonder is that human nature shows up as favorably as it does when all the drawbacks to noble development under which it labors are considered! What are the influences for good or evil that are brought to bear on the great majority of our children who will be the adults of tomorrow? Think it over!

AMONG THE NEW BOOKS

Joan of Arc

JOAN OF ARC: MAID OF FRANCE, by ALBERT BIGELOW PAINE (Macmillan. 2 vols.) These two large and beautifully illustrated volumes constitute the most notable of all the many biographies of Joan of Arc that have appeared in recent years. Among Mr. Paine's many literary labors has been that as authoritative biographer of Mark Twain, and it was in reading Mark Twain's Personal Recollections of Joan, thirty years ago, that as he states in his preface, Joan first emerged for him from the land of myth and fable to become a reality. The present biography is the fulfillment of a dream of some day following the Maid's footsteps in person and setting down the historic sequence of her life. Mr. Paine has studied carefully both the ground and background of his strange figure of spiritual and romantic interest. He has been anxious to preserve every known utterance of Joan herself, and every accurate record that may throw light upon any phase of her character and career. He spent four years in France collecting material for this work, visiting every place connected with Joan's story and many places again and again. It has been his aim to make her life vivid in this modern setting and to display the human qualities in one who emerges from his pages, beneath soldier and saint, as a simple and lovable daughter of the people. Mr. Paine's biography will be found a great help toward understanding the fifteenth century and the events and experiences that have become symbolized for all time in the Maid of Orleans.

General Religious Books

AS AT THE FIRST, by JOHN A. HUTTON (Doran. $1.25 net). A vivid and intensely interesting portrayal of the early Christians and the apostolic church. The Christians were designated by their contemporaries as disciples, witnesses, saints, believers, friends, and fools. Dr. Hutton interprets them under each heading. Also he gives some biographical studies of Andrew, Thomas, Aristarchus, Epaphroditus, and "certain women" that are vital and compelling. He closes with a real climax on "The Inevitable Christ." The book is a graphic piece of work.

"THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN IS LIKE . . .", by CONSTANCE L. MAYNARD (Revell. $1.25). Miss Maynard is principal of Westminster College, University of London. She interprets for us the parables of nature and explains the witness of nature to primary truths of religion. The first half of the book deals with the great field of impression and to the general teachings of nature. The second half deals with parables that require a certain knowledge of science to decipher them. Astronomy, physics, and biology are all made interpreters of religion. A deeply devotional spirit pervades the whole book.

THE PROGRAM AND WORKING PHILOSOPHY OF JESUS, by GEORGE DAVIS (Revell. $1.25). Years ago Henry Drummond gave us his fresh, vital brochure on "The Program of Christianity," taking as his text the passage in Isaiah which he read in the synagogue of Nazareth. Dr. Davis has followed in his steps and elaborated the same theme. The eight items in the program are good news, wealth for the poor, healing and health, liberty, light, sight and insight, joy, comfort and beauty. Well adapted for a study group.

CHRIST IN HIGH SCHOOL LIFE, by RALPH P. CLAGGETT (Abingdon Press. $1.00). Mr. Claggett's experience with boys in Y. M. C. A. work and summer camps has given him insight into the high school boy's problems and needs, hence this handbook for daily devotions based on the application of the principles of Jesus. The first part has to do with common ailments and cures like ambition, jealousy, spooning, loafing, cussing, and cheating. The second part takes up "guides to successful living," like comradeship, citizenship, leadership, and stewardship. "Keys to the Kingdom," in the last section, includes love, prayer, faith, work and God. Besides being a handbook for the morning watch, it is well adapted for group discussions.

THE MASTER LIFE, by W. P. LIVINGSTONE (Doran. $2.50). The author is best known for his book, Mary Slessor of Calabar. In this volume he has sought to present in a realistic way the story of Jesus for today. It is not a scholarly or critical life of Jesus, but is a dramatic narrative cen tering around the significant events in the Gospel story, with the great purpose of making the spiritual appeal of Jesus irresistible for the modern reader.

EVERLASTING SALVATION, by CHARLES FORBES TAYLOR (Revell. $1.00). A volume of sermons by the "Boy Evangelist," though the "boy" must be growing up. They are filled with anecdote and appeal. The style is the so-called "popular." The theology is conservative.

MUST WE PART WITH GOD? by ERNEST F. CHAMPNESS (Macmillan. $1.00). Here is something more than a succinct and earnest study of theism. It is the path of a soul through devious ways out of agnosticism to a sincere and sound faith in the living God. It is a fragment of spiritual autobiography, a waymark which may help other seekers after truth and light. It is more a book of religion than of systematic philosophy or theology.

THE VIGIL AT THE CROSS, SELECTED AND ARRANGED BY REV. FRANK J. GOODWIN (Macmillan. $1.00). Prayers and meditations from the Cross with an order of worship for a three-hour service on Good Friday.

ASPECTS OF THE WAY, by A. D. MARTIN (Cambridge University Press: Macmillan. 6s.). Twelve studies of the mind and character of Christ written with a practical and devotional purpose. The author writes for the general reader from the standpoint of the conception of Christ and Christianity as primarily and essentially constituting a way of life, even as Jesus said, I am the way.

THROUGH THE ETERNAL SPIRIT: A STUDY OF HEBREWS, JAMES, AND I PETER, by JOSEPH F. MCFADYEN (Doran. $2.00). The author is Professor of New Testament Language and Literature in Queen's Theological College, Kingston, Ont.,—a notable home of philosophy and scholarship. He is a brother of the better known Dr. John E. McFadyen, successor to Sir George Adam Smith. The essential aim in Professor McFadyen's treatment of the three epistles is to show the significance of the writings for our age, keeping in mind constantly the need of first discovering what they meant for their authors and their first readers. His book is not a technical and meticulous commentary though the text is closely followed in the setting forth and interpretation of the distinctive teachings of the epistles.

Various Books of Fiction

THE RIM OF THE PRAIRIE, by BESS STREETER ALDRICH (Appleton. $2.00). Mrs. Aldrich has followed Mother Mason, an unusually good story of the Middle West, by another novel dealing with life in a small town in Nebraska situated on what was once prairie. Here still dwells one of the early settlers who has ten acres of virgin prairie he has never allowed to be plowed. His love for the land is a delightful feature of a story that is wholesome, refreshing and full of sentiment. It is a book that will be welcomed by readers who are continually asking for books that are not problem novels, or novels of sex, or filled with the extravagant flippancies of the younger generation.

THE GREAT PANDOLFO, by WILLIAM J. LOCKE (Dodd, Mead. $2.00). The Pandolfo as we meet him first in this novel is Sir Victor Pandolfo who has risen by his own efforts from the humble position as son of a poor Italian peddler of plaster images to that of a man rich and famous as an inventor, who has been knighted for service in war time. Mr. Locke delights in a hero of strikingly unusual personality, whose indomitable energy and irresistible will to conquer are directed toward winning the love of Paula, the young widow of an English officer, after whom he daringly names a new metal, the discovery of which is about to revolutionize everything. But Paula, devoted to her husband's memory, proves stubborn, the sources of the new metal fail, and disaster crosses the path of Pandolfo after he has been lured into marriage with another woman. It seems a situation from which nothing pleasant or satisfactory can emerge, but Mr. Locke's skill manages to bring things to a favorable and romantic conclusion.

TREADING THE WINE-PRESS, by RALPH CONNOR (Doran. $2.00). From the far West and from Glengarry Ralph Connor turns in his newest story to Nova Scotia. It is a story of the war and of the days following in which the reported death of a young man and the marriage to another of the girl whom he had loved create for him a difficult situation when he returns from the war. The book deals with the problems of faith and providence as they arise in a life sorely tested. It will appeal to all who have found in Ralph Connor's former books interest and inspiration.

COUSIN JANE, by HARRY LEON WILSON (Cosmopolitan. $2.00). Readers who chuckled over Mr. Wilson's great hit of last year, Professor How Could You! will find something entirely different in his novel of this year, Cousin Jane. Less extravagant and unusual, but more subtle in its humor and more tender in its pathos is this story of a little girl whose life is deeply affected by the loss of a fortune originally produced from a California mine. The "prancing," debonair high-liver and stock-gambler, stricken with paralysis in the climax of the loss which his foolish adventures have occasioned, the brother coldly cynical in his sharing of the risks and the loss, the cousin resentful over the destruction of her social aspirations, the Chinese servant sharing his master's gambling optimism, and the ineffective old retainer who considers himself the mainstay are all skillfully drawn, but the chief interest is in Cousin Jane who reveals an unexpected strength in this strange environment to which she comes when the loss of fortune compels her withdrawal from a select boarding school.

The Process of Creation

Discussion of the Midweek Prayer Meeting Topic for the Week Beginning January 3

BY FREDERICK L. FAGLEY

Romans 8: 22. Read Romans 8: 16-25.

Paul, in writing to the Romans, calls the attention of his friends to the way in which progress is made. First there is the ideal which is born in the minds of men. This is spiritual, but it dominates not only the spiritual but the material; and the material seeks to conform itself to this ideal. This process is not one of ease, but as Paul has pointed out, one of great struggle that the creation of successively higher standards of life and higher forms of living comes not from a task of ease but by groaning and travailing in pain together.

By pointing out that this process was one of pain and labor, Paul yet calls to the minds of his friends the fact that they have this encouragement: they discover from their own inner consciousness that they are growing together toward a more glorious life, and that as they progress under the leadership of the spirit of God, they have God's commendation.

In Paul's mind there were immanent organic forces working steadily and perpetually, without break, which had promise of ultimate success. This is the idea of evolution as applied to the individual soul. This is the process by which is created a higher form of life. When we realize the truth of evolution in our own life, it makes it easier to understand the great process of social evolution and the more complex processes of development in the realm of organized matter.

We may never expect to agree in our thinking on the deepest subjects, especially on the nature of God, Christ, or even of ourselves. In his lectures on "Theism and Thought," Arthur James Balfour says: "I hazard the suggestion that there is not a single important assertion to be made about the true nature of the self which would at the present moment obtain the assent of all instructed thinkers." If this is true of ourselves how much more is a similar statement true of our thinking about God and ultimate reality.

Fortunately, however, we may live without intellectual agreement; therefore let us magnify in these six great themes those things which contribute to noble Christian life. Take these six themes:

1. The unfolding of the wonders of creation from the electron to conscious personality witnessed in the past generation should make our conception of the process of creation one under which no soul could live irreverently.

2. The fundamental necessity of the presence of God imminent in all things and persons, which is essential to a sane conception of the universe and ourselves, should compel men to breathe the atmosphere of the Divine.

3. Never was the dignity of man so evident as today. Let us face men with a challenge of their responsibility for a divine inheritance.

4. Prayer in the conception of today is or should be dignified and worthy, it is true, but as vital as the conversation of a child with his parents.

5. Men are reading the book of nature today as never before. The Bible is better understood than ever it was. Our part is to make sure that men read the meaning of the message of God in his word and works.

6. Finally, the uniqueness of Christ is to be found for us in his absolute worthiness to be our Lord, and whatever our conception of his person it cannot but be rich enough to demand that we "follow him" and "keep his commandments."

THE OPENING YEAR—THE COURAGE OF THE FORWARD LOOK

Teach me thy way, O Lord, and lead me in a plain path, because of them that lie in wait for me. . . . Wait for the Lord: be strong, and let thy heart take courage; yea, wait for the Lord.—Psalm 27: 11.

What is going to be our truth for the New Year? Is it not that the love which has never deserted us shall come closer to us, because it finds us readier to receive it,—making us better, stronger, purer, nobler, more manly, more womanly, more fit for life; not because God loves us any more, but because we, with new openness, are more ready to receive him into our lives?—Phillips Brooks.

May I this year have energy, patience, good will and good faith. May I be guilty of no treason against duty and my best self. May I acquire more system, order, and wisdom in the use of things. May I, if God wills, carry out some of my plans for making my studies useful to others. This is much to ask, but not too much of Him who giveth all.—Julia Ward Howe.

A year to be glad in,
Not to be bad in;
A year to live in,
To gain and give in;
A year for trying,
And not for sighing;
A year for striving
And hearty thriving;
A bright new year.
Oh! hold it dear;
For God who sendeth
Only lendeth.

Mary Mapes Dodge, abr.

The days are indeed evil, unless we make them good. Let us say that time means opportunity. To redeem the time, then, will be to seize and improve the opportunity. Century after century, men have stood looking out over the unworn path of a new year, and wondering what will happen by the way. And every year, throughout the centuries something notable, something important, something which makes opportunity precious and a man's life worth living that year, has happened.—George Hodges.

Remember how swiftly the shuttle flies and how a broken thread may mar the fabric. Remember that without a good pattern, all weaving is to no purpose; take much thought, therefore, as to the pattern of a good life and be greatly instructed by that Life which is the Exampler for us all.—Gaius Glenn Atkins.

O God of the years that are past, and the years that are coming—through whose hand run the fleeting sands of the present, pardon us for the errors and sins of the days that are dead; help us in all our thinking and doing in the days that are to be. Let us not remember too much the sorrows that have been. Lift up our hearts and our hopes to the dreams and ideals that are before us that we may rise above the weaknesses, meannesses, and sinfulness which do so often dog us to our fall. Give us gladness in thine own time, leading us, by thy pity, nearer Christ; comforting us when we grow weary, by thy love, and saving us at last through thine unending mercy.

The Great American Crusade

Discussion of the Christian Endeavor Prayer Meeting Topic for January 10-16

BY CHARLES ERNEST WHITE

Topic: How is Prohibition Succeeding? Proverbs 23: 29-35.

Light from the Bible Passage

The writer of the Book of Proverbs does not split hairs over what constitutes drunkenness. He is not concerned over what makes a drink intoxicating or non-intoxicating. He holds up the whole question on the basis of what it brings in its train. Given certain results he asks, "what caused them?" He does not deny the allurement of drinking but warns of its treachery. The physical effects are followed by the mental and the spiritual. Sensibility to the finer things is dulled if not deadened. And its bitternesses even act as an enticement to repetition. It is relentless.

Leads for Leaders

Christian Endeavor by its very name and nature is committed to the great crusade of the present day of winning a victory for Prohibition. This meeting ought to be a sort of rededication service to this high purpose. Very much more of the success of this movement depends upon the young people than they seem to recognize.

What effect is Prohibition having on the poor of our communities? Discuss better work and wages, better food and clothes, more comforts, more savings-bank deposits, more health and happiness.

What effect on community life? What are the advantages of having no open saloons? Are these advantages lost because a few secret stills are maintained by law-defying criminals?

What effect on young people? Is there any drinking among young folks of your town? What is the attitude of non-drinkers toward them? Do we laugh at it, or let our views be known? Are we silent Crusaders?

What effect on our nation? How much of our prosperity, sufficiency of work, good wages, manifold comforts, are traceable to Prohibition? The value of having a President and a strong majority in Congress determined that this country shall become more and more Dry.

Thoughts for Members

The results of intemperance are its best testimonials.

A genuine brother's-keeper is more concerned with his brother's peril than his own pleasures.

More arrests for drunkenness may mean greater vigilance of the police, or fewer offenders, so that the police can arrest them.

The success or failure of a great moral movement should never be judged by the noise of those who are opposing it. Deep waters move silently.

"You will hear, on every side, men bewail the loss of their drink, of their personal rights, but the rights of the few, who cannot see ahead or have not the future of this nation at heart must be regulated to safeguard the rights of that great body of future citizens who are now ready to step into the ranks."—Charles Mayo, M.D.

A Moment of Prayer

Most gratefully, O thou Great Defender of the Right, we lift glad hearts to thee for the progress already made in our crusade for sobriety of life and high moral purpose among our people. Inspire us afresh for new and irresistible efforts that shall win success for thee. And make our beloved land a people after thine own heart and a worthy example to the nations of the earth. Amen.

Vistas and Values

Carlyle speaks somewhere of that vision which sees all things that are seen as but the vesture of the Unseen, the Divine. "Here is no hearsay," he says, "but a direct insight and belief," which puts a man "in earnest with the universe, though all others were but toying with it."

How long since you have treated the eyes of your soul to any such vision of the Reality which, continually, it craves? How long since you have consciously tried to make your life proclaim any grandeur and beauty? Are you satisfied with your days of incessant rushing and excitement, which year after year bring you, before the winter is over, to the bed of sickness with exhausted nerves, pestering body, and mind all a-wearied of the task of living?

An acknowledged dissatisfaction lies near the beginning of any experience that is to be deeper and dearer. Send out the eyes of your soul after the distant view, and existence starts on a new career. Fribbles that had so filled the foreground of life that no greater values could be seen, begin now to appear as the trivialities they are. Things unheeded before show unguessed and wonderful preciousness. The spirit finds itself possessed of a new zeal for whatever life may bring. "I walked home as if on wings," said one who, ascending a little hill in the sickening heat of a midsummer city day, had suddenly come full tilt upon a glimpse of Wachusett, majestic and serene, fifty miles away. Learn to see the Lasting back of that which is fleeting, stretch out eager and determined hands after that Lastingness, and life becomes something finer than it has been, fearless as it looks toward the future, satisfying as not before. The daily talk and conduct begin then to fall into some kind of harmony with those hours of better insight when the soul aspires to get loose from specious judgments, bootless activities, slavery to the fad of the moment, and shams of every kind.

If not the body only, but also the spirit, be filled with turmoil and torment, depression and unrest, then is life a bitterness indeed. There is no need so to live. All about us men and women are feeling that this must be so, and are wistfully trying to find the great secret. Trying so often in ways mistaken. For strength and peace come not from untroubled conditions. The soul may be in torture in the midst of the surroundings of peace; and the soul may be in uttermost peace in the midst of torture. Not from life's conditions come strength and peace, but from the spirit's attitude. Their source is confidence in God and confidence in the issues of life—confidence in the issues of life because of confidence in God.

There was a young student whose days passed so happily, and whose problems found such agreeable solutions, that he used to fear lest his soul should turn out only a dwarfed, impoverished, and unripened thing. Time passed, and the fierce blows of life rained upon him, one hot upon the bruise of another. Then his anxiety was lest he should fail to learn from suffering the things his soul had need of. But when grief had torn his heart savagely and handicap had withdrawn him from life's activity and many beloved associations, there came rewards: an enriching and glorifying of friendship, a deepened insight into life's greater possibilities, more eager relations with God, the displacement of the restless worry of life by peace and joy. New vistas brought new values.

Bringing Others to Christ

Comment on the International Uniform Sunday School Lesson for January 10
John 1: 35-49

The general title of this lesson is given as "Five Men Believe on Jesus," but the lesson's story is much more than that. It tells how men came to believe, and it reveals the process by which the Christian Church had its growth in the beginning, and by which it has attained its greatest power and effectiveness in every age. Out of this narrative has been derived the name of an organization that has set before itself the special business of evangelism, and that has been instrumental in bringing many men to Christ—the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip. Whether or not we belong to that particular organization we ought all to be in the larger brotherhood of Andrew and Philip, for they have revealed the privilege and obligation of every Christian. Their witness was that of a simple experience. Having found the Christ, and having their vision enlarged and their lives enriched through him, they were immediately anxious that others, and especially those nearest to them, should have this new experience also.

People speak sometimes as if it were a hard thing to do Christian work, to be evangelists, to speak to others of the deep things of religion. Is this not because we make it a hard and complex thing? If one has really found a wonderful man, a great friend and savior, should it not be the most natural thing in the world to speak to others of this great discovery? Would it not, indeed, have been strange if Andrew, having found Christ, had not said to his brother, Simon Peter, "We have found the Messias"?

What was, perhaps, more striking was that Andrew brought Peter to Jesus. One wonders whether Peter were easily led. He was usually impetuous and himself ambitious to lead. One would not be surprised if he had needed some urging and convincing, if he had not, in fact, been somewhat contemptuous of Andrew's ready and easy faith. None the less, Andrew did bring Peter to Jesus, and Philip brought Nathanael.

The implications of this early beginning of Christian evangelism are not hard to seek. Andrew, so far as our record goes, would seem to have been a very ordinary faithful disciple without anything about him spectacular or conspicuous. Peter, on the other hand, looms up as one of the greatest figures among the twelve, only one apparently comparing with him in intensity and strength, namely, John. Has not this been the process all through history that relatively unimportant Christians, faithfully doing what it was possible for them to do, have set in motion the greatest causes or have been the means of bringing into the Christian way men who have been profoundly great in initiative and accomplishment. It should remind us that there is no such thing as an unimportant Christian, nor is there any such thing as unimportant service.

It is only as we grasp the simple elements of this narrative, and as they reproduce in us something of the spirit of these early disciples who found the Messiah, that we can ourselves derive the benefits of this lesson or learn simply and adequately to serve the King and the Kingdom. Perhaps the way to simple, effective service is in finding the simple reality of a new knowledge of Jesus.

Blessed is the Sunday school that co-operates with other schools in a community program, for it will learn much it needs to know, and will be saved from self-conceit.—Marion Lawrance.

And Her Dream Came True

By Blanche E. Nowell

I suppose there are other churches with congregations as small and even as poor as the one I have in mind, but if so I have never heard of them. This one my grandmother attended the greater part of her life. It is a little white church, with horse sheds along one side and across the back, and is situated two miles from the post office and the nearest store.

Forty or fifty years ago, I am told, it was not unusual to find well over a hundred persons in attendance at the Sunday morning services, but during the last twenty years there rarely have been more than a dozen or twenty persons in the church at one service. In the early days every house for several miles around was occupied and most of the farmers had large families. Now, however, many of the older people have passed on and their houses have been closed, while the young people have moved away to other parts of the country. The few who are left are very poor, at least in a financial sense.

Knowing that the congregation could not raise two dollars a week to pay a poor preacher who was willing to conduct the Sunday afternoon services for that amount, you can imagine my surprise when my grandmother, several years ago, announced that she was going to start a subscription to buy a bell for the church.

"I have always wished that the church had a bell," she said. "How nice it would sound on a Sunday morning! It would bring more people to the church, too. These last few years I have wanted it so badly that I think now we will get it."

"But where do you think you will ever get the money?" I asked.

"'Ask, and ye shall receive,'" she quoted, and went on to say, chuckling, "I was just going to ask you how much you will give."

"I am safe in saying that I will give as much as any one!" I retorted.

Then she turned to my uncle and asked how much he would give.

"I will give as much as Nellie," he replied, referring to my aunt, who was present also.

Well, in less time than it takes to tell we three had put our names down for ten dollars each, which, I must admit, none of us ever expected to be called upon to pay. We were much mistaken, however. That very afternoon my grandmother drew up an agreement, signed by us, promising to pay our subscribed amounts when called for. Then she made a list of names and addresses of relatives and friends in states ranging from Maine to California. This list and the agreement she enclosed in a letter to the first person on the list, asking that person to subscribe and then to send the list on to the next person with a similar letter. Thus it was to go on and on, until the last name had been reached.

It was Easter when this first letter was sent out. My grandmother was visiting me. She had come up from her home in Maine to go to church with me on Easter Sunday, a practice she had begun a number of years before and which she kept up until she was eighty years old.

The next New Year's Day the new bell in the old church rang for the first time. Eight ministers assisted in conducting two services. Every seat in the church was occupied and even a few extra chairs had to be brought in.

Even after the belfry had been built and other expenses in connection with placing a bell in the church had been taken care of, there was still some money left, with which the

WITH THE CHILDREN

Unhistorical Dates

By Eunice Hale Pierce

Kenneth pranced about the house one Friday evening, too excited to keep still. Uncle John had just telephoned that the following day he was going to drive some men to the Imperial Valley on a business trip, and he invited Kenneth to go with them.

Marjorie, his younger sister, was as pleased as her brother himself.

"What a good time you will have!" she said; and added, "I—I wish I could, too."

"Oh, this is a men's party," Kenneth declared loftily. "No room for girls."

When Uncle John honked his horn next morning, Kenneth was ready. Just before they started, Daddy slipped a fifty-cent piece and a quarter into his hand, saying, "You may want to buy something in the Valley." Kenneth felt rich indeed, and clinked the coins together in his pocket.

The trip was over a hundred miles long, with plenty to see all the way. They went up and up, turning and twisting up one grade after another. Finally, they came to a place where they could catch the first glimpse of the desert, far beyond and below. Then down, down, a long stretch of level pavement, and the car drew into a town, where the night was to be spent.

Kenneth walked up and down, looking in the store windows, and tried to decide what to do with his money. However, he saw nothing he wanted especially, so he made up his mind to wait.

After breakfast the next day, they all climbed into the car again and rode for miles. Kenneth knew that dates grow in the reclaimed desert land of Imperial Valley, so he was pleased when his uncle said that they were going to stop for a while at a date ranch.

The dates hung low on the palms and were completely covered with big white bags to keep out the birds and bees, but many had fallen to the ground. Kenneth sampled one or two that were edible, then Uncle John offered him some from a bagful he had bought from the ranch owner, who was starting out with a machine-load of bags and boxes to sell by the roadside, where many cars were passing.

It seemed to Kenneth that he had never tasted anything more delicious than those dates, so fresh, moist, and sweet, better than any candy. The others were all buying some to take home. Kenneth thought of his money and an idea came to him. He would get a boxful for Marjorie! It would take every cent, to be sure, of the whole amount his father had given him, but he wanted Uncle John and the men with him to see what a generous brother he was!

Presently they went on and on, with only a short stop for lunch. Kenneth was unused to sitting still so long, and the men were all talking together of dry business affairs. The time dragged. He began to think of the box of dates. Surely, it would do no harm to eat just one of them. How good it tasted! Marjorie wouldn't care if he took another.

Late the following afternoon, nearly at home again, Kenneth peered anxiously into the box. There were exactly ten dates left in it! Yes, one by one, he had eaten all the rest. He felt very uncomfortable. Wouldn't the box that had held a whole pound look funny, with so few rattling around lonesomely inside? Well, there was no help for it. He certainly hadn't meant to gobble so many, but they were gone now!

Marjorie, however, jumped for joy when she was handed the box, and ate one immediately.

"How good that tastes!" she cried. "Thank you, Ken!"

She passed the dates around. He refused to take any, but Father and Mother each accepted one. Their faces wore rather odd expressions when they saw the scanty number of dates, but neither said a word. Kenneth plunged hastily into the tale of all he had seen and done.

Next morning he came upon Marjorie looking earnestly at her six remaining dates.

"I'm only going to eat one a day, to make them last," she told him. "I can't decide whether to have today's now or wait until evening."

Kenneth felt more guilty than ever. He thought back over his trip, three days full of pleasure, and couldn't stand his accusing conscience any longer. He went up to his room, picked up his bank in which he was hoarding hard-earned nickels and dimes to buy a football, and shook out some money.

After school, in the afternoon, he hurried downtown, and bought a box of Imperial dates which, luckily, had come in fresh that day.

"I ate your other dates—I'm sorry," he mumbled as he handed the package to his sister.

Her eyes grew large and round when she saw the tempting layers inside the box. Then she popped a fat date into his mouth, and cried:

"Ken, you are the best, most generous brother in the world!"

And Kenneth thought no praise had ever sounded so sweet to him before.

White Nanny Goat and Fun

By Anne Miltimore Pendleton

Jean and Buddie and Lolela had gone back to the city.

Billie Buster was all alone again in the little mountain home with Forest Ranger Father and Mother Dear. There was no one else. And Billie Buster was very lonely and sad.

Oh, but I forgot! There was White Nanny Goat.

White Nanny Goat was very well for a pet. But Billie Buster wanted some one to play with him. He wanted some one who could take turns riding on the Kiddy Kar, or who could totter up and down with him on the teeter-totter board. What is the use of a teeter-totter board for one little boy? None at all, so Billie Buster thought.

Billie Buster sat down very uncomfortably down hill on the down end of the teeter-totter board. He put his chin in his two hands, and he thought, and he thought.

He thought it wasn't much fun being just one little boy in a quiet mountain place. He thought of Jean and Buddie and Lolela having a good time in the city playing with lots of other boys and girls.

White Nanny Goat poked her head into Billy Buster's hands.

"Baa-aa-aaaa!" said White Nanny Goat. That was her way of asking Billie Buster to play with her.

But Billie Buster pushed White Nanny Goat away. He didn't want to play with White Nanny Goat. He wanted to play with little boys and girls who could teeter-totter with him, or ride on his Kiddy Kar.

Billie Buster got up from sitting down uncomfortably down hill on the down end of the teeter-totter board. He went over and sat on his Kiddy Kar. But he didn't try to run it. He just sat there. White Nanny Goat followed Billy Buster over to the Kiddy Kar.

White Nanny Goat poked her head into Billy Buster's lap.

"Baa-aa-aaaa!" said White Nanny Goat most pleadingly.

"Go away!" said Billy Buster most exceedingly crossly.

And he gave White Nanny Goat a hard little shove and a bad little push.

White Nanny Goat went away. She went straight to the teeter-totter board. She walked uphill on the down end of the teeter-totter board. She walked downhill on the up end of the teeter-totter board which went down so quickly that White Nanny Goat slid down the last half of the way. Then she walked uphill again, and this time she stopped right in the middle of the teeter-totter board.

She teetered it, and she tottered it, and my goodness, gracious me, but she just had the best time teeter-tottering! Then she looked over at Billie Buster.

Billie Buster had stopped looking lonesome and sad. He was looking most happy and glad.

"Baa-aa-aaaa!" said White Nanny Goat.

Billy Buster knew exactly what White Nanny Goat was saying. He rushed back to the teeter-totter board. He sat down very comfortably on the down end of the teeter-totter board. But he didn't stay on the down end long. Before he knew it White Nanny Goat had moved a little bit, and Billy Buster was on the up end of the teeter-totter board. And White Nanny Goat was on the down end. And then Billie Buster was down again, and White Nanny Goat was up.

And there they were, Billie Buster and White Nanny Goat, teetering and tottering away just as if they were two little boys, or a little boy and a little girl, or two little girls. My goodness, gracious me, but they did have the best time!

And then Billie Buster taught White Nanny Goat to ride on the Kiddy Kar with him. White Nanny Goat would stand up on the Kiddy Kar on her hind feet and put her front feet on the handles. Billie Buster would sit behind White Nanny Goat and do the pushing. Oh, playing with White Nanny Goat was such fun!

For many, many weeks Billie Buster and White Nanny Goat played together this way. Billie Buster thought up other ways to play, too.

Then one day Forest Ranger Father and Mother Dear took Billie Buster to the city to visit with Jean and Buddie and Lolela. And didn't they all laugh when Billie Buster told them of his fun with White Nanny Goat? They wished they had a White Nanny Goat, too.

Billie Buster stayed in the city with Jean and Buddie and Lolela a long time, and he had a happy time with them. But he was glad when Forest Ranger Father and Mother Dear were ready to go back to the little mountain home.

Billie Buster could hardly wait to get home to see White Nanny Goat again.

And my goodness, gracious me, but he did have the surprise of his life when he did see White Nanny Goat. She was just the same as ever, but with her were three tiny little kids—a black one, a white one, and a black-and-white one!

"Baa-aa-aaaa!" said White Nanny Goat to Billie Buster.

"Bee-ee-eeee!" said the little black kid.

"Bii-ii-iiii!" said the little white kid.

"Bee-eee! Biiiiii!" said the little black-and-white kid.

Billie Buster tried to hug the three little kids and White Nanny Goat all at once. He couldn't do it very well, because they were all so wriggly.

So right then and there, Billie Buster named the little black kid Jean, and he named the little white kid Buddie, and he named the little black-and-white kid Lolela.

"Oh, White Nanny Goat," said Billie Buster, "won't we have the mostest fun, you and me and Buddie and Jean and Lolela!"

"Baa-aa-aaaa!" said White Nanny Goat.

"Bee-ee-eeee!" said the little black kid who was Jean.

"Bii-ii-iiii!" said the little white kid who was Buddie.

"Bee-eee! Biiiiii!" said the little black-and-white kid who was Lolela.

Writing a Book

By Herbert D. Gallaudet

I wonder if you boys and girls will be surprised if I tell you that I hear you're busy writing a book? I wonder if some of you will say, "O no, Mr. Gallaudet, you're mistaken, I'm not old enough to do that. Perhaps I will when I get grown up. But not now; you must have made a mistake." No, I haven't made a mistake, I'm quite right,—you're writing a book. You will begin it in a few days. It's a book that nobody else can write but you, and you'll write a page a day every day this year, and on the 365th page next December 31 an invisible hand will write Finis, which means end, and the book will be done.

You're not the only one that's writing a book. We're all of us writing books like that, just as many of us as read this little corner of The Congregationalist, and just as many of us as opened our eyes when we got up this morning, and just as many of us as began the New Year, 1925, in the whole wide world. We're each of us writing a book, a page a day, every day in the year.

You can't see the pages, like the pages of an ordinary book, because they're way down inside you, where no one can really see except God. And you don't use pen and ink or a typewriter or a new "Eversharp" pencil—the one you got for Christmas—to write your book. You use the things you think and the things you do and the things you say,—your tongue, your hands and body and feet, your mind and will and heart,—they are writing for you all the time.

Every time you say a mean or an unkind or a cross word, down it goes in the book of your life, a big ugly blot on the clean white page. Every time you do something wrong, something that you don't want even mother to know about, there it is in the book within you, whether you think anybody sees it or not. Every time you have a hateful feeling inside you, and are angry because somebody wouldn't let you do what you wanted to do, there it is in the book in your heart, looking about as pretty as a long splash of ink on a tablecloth.

And every time you say something that's kind, do something that's helpful, think something that's thoughtful and generous, down it goes in letters of gold. You might be quite surprised if you saw it there, for you hadn't thought very much about it,—but there it is, in letters that shine like the lights on a Christmas tree, just as beautiful as that!

There was once a little boy who, on New Year's Eve, when he went to bed and was all tucked in and fast asleep, dreamed a dream. And in the dream he saw a beautiful and splendid angel standing by his bed with an open book in his hand, turning the pages one by one. And the angel said, "I am the angel of the Year that is just gone, and this is the book of your life." And he turned the pages one by one. And he came to a page that was all splotched and spotted and dirty. And the little boy cried, "Did I do that?" And the angel said yes, very gently, for he saw the boy was sorry. And he turned the pages one by one. And he came to a page that was all shiny and bright, written in letters that burned and danced like the flames of a fire, as if the letters themselves were happy for the things that were written there. And the little boy's eyes grew big as saucers, and he was very much surprised. "Did I do that?" he asked, wondering. "Yes," said the angel, smiling, "there are a good many just as nice as that,—but a good many of the others, too." And he kept turning the pages one by one.

And just then the whistles blew and the bells rang for the New Year, and the little boy sat up in bed with a start. And there was his mother in a new party dress bending over him to tuck in the bedclothes that he seemed to have tossed off in his sleep. And the little boy put his arms around her neck, and drew her down close to him, and said: "O mother, I'm going to write a new book this year, a page every day, and I'm going to try and make all the pages clean and good and nice, like the ones the angel just showed me; and none of them blotted and smirched and ugly, like some of the other ones he showed me."

What kind of a book are you going to write with your life this year, day by day, a page each day? And what will the pages of that book look like,—the things you say, and the things you do, and the things you think in your heart,—if an angel should come and show them to you in your sleep next New Year's Eve, standing splendid and smiling by your bedside, and turning the pages one by one?

Where Christian Endeavor Has Stayed

(Come Everybody—Christian Endeavor)

By Charles N. Sinnett

Christian Endeavor has come to Carrington, North Dakota, in various forms. It has never lost its helpful grip. Early in 1883, when the present county seat was a tiny burg, a missionary called the people together in front of a partially finished building. Most of the plank seats were occupied when a man who, as he said, had "imbibed down the track," plumped down on the creaking front seat. Up he bounced and said he must have the text in order to get any help there. When the text was repeated he nodded approval, then faced the congregation with an appeal something like this: "Neighbors and Friends. Text is all right—all right. I want you to be all right. Start the town on the Hallelujah track. You are members of different churches—all right so far. But to have a good town, Bunch! Bunch! All join in one church—Come Everybody." "What do you say to the Come Everybody call?" asked the big-hearted missionary. And in less than an hour the First Congregational Church was organized from members of eight religious denominations. Soon a little wooden church was erected. Now it has a fine cement block building. A letter from the pastor lies before me in which he says that the church is making fine progress. The "Come Everybody" slogan has never lost its power.

On a bleak autumn night of 1888, seven young people came together and organized the Christian Endeavor Society. Some of these came in from six miles out on the prairie. It was one of the most discouraging seasons in North Dakota, for a frost had gripped all the wheat fields. But this band of boys and girls had the true Christian Endeavor spirit. This society grew so sturdily that from it forty-five members were added to the church. One of the first presidents of this society was John Miller, now Rev. John X. Miller, who for many years has been doing grand missionary work at Pasumalai, Southern India. His brother, W. S. A. Miller, of Ambrose, North Dakota, was a successful pastor at East Bridgewater, Mass. Other boys and girls have carried the Gospel far and wide. One of the original members of this Christian Endeavor Society is Miss Edna Parker, who has for some time been the clerk of the Carrington Church.

World Peace

By Katherine Birch Voorhees

A hymn written after Armistice Day by a fourteen-year-old student in Bradford Academy

The night with all its shadows, black,
Will pass; the dark be gone:
For on the dim horizon breaks
The first pale light of dawn.
The lightness slowly broadens till
The brightness of the sun
Fills every nook and corner, and
A new day is begun.

Chorus

O let us strive for thee, O God,
To live the upright way;
To lift, to love, to worship
Till dawns the endless day.

So after strife and turmoil, war
And chaos, comes at last
The day of peace, when war is put Forever in the past,
Until some ill-begotten wave
Of sin arise again
And smite with all its force upon
The feeble hearts of men.

But then the healing wings of peace
Return, like daytime bright.
The realms of shadows peace doth spurn
And puts all wrong to flight.
God meant the world to be at peace,
O'ercoming bad with good;
And Jesus taught the glory of
An earthly brotherhood.

O let us try with one accord
To bravely grasp, and do
Our utmost part to live The Word,
And make the world anew.
When each man does his best to live
In harmony as one,
Then on this earth, and only then
Shall God's own kingdom come.

The Old Year

The year is closed, the record made,
The last deed done, the last word said;
The memory alone remains
Of all its joys, its griefs and gains;
And now with purpose full and clear
I turn to meet another year.
Though days to come may often be
With burdens crowded full for me;
Though hope deferred may cast a shade
Across my spirit, undismayed
I'll meet them one by one, for through Such days he brought me hitherto.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES

Our Finnish Churches

That the work among the Finnish Congregational churches is rapidly growing is evidenced by figures recently compiled by Rev. H. M. Bowden, Director of Foreign-Speaking Work for the Home Missionary Society. The review shows that we now have 25 churches with 1,116 members, 1,134 Sunday school enrollment, and 34,579 people reached in homes connected with the church. There are over 2,300 who are financially contributing to the support of these churches, and they hold property to the extent of $178,100.

The first church organized was in Ashtabula, O., in 1891; then comes Fitchburg, Mass., 1895; Quincy, Mass., 1896; Astoria, Ore., 1897. The balance were organized since 1900. Two churches recently organized in Engelwood, N. J., and Eveleth, Minn., would add about 60 members to the totals as given above.

Getting the People to Church

Suggestions for filling empty pews are always welcome. The plan carried out by Columbia Church, Barberton, O., has proved successful. The minister of the church, Rev. J. W. Quinton, has outlined it as follows:

My plan starts first in the office of the pastor and it gets hold of the people and gets them to church, if the job of pastoral visiting is taken seriously. The second step is to start from the study and give them something in the pulpit and service when you get them there. It is about the office and the list that I want especially to tell you. This may be only one of many plans, but it works for me and will for any one if he will use it and work with it. It will bring order out of chaos and will give the pastor lots of real enjoyable work in visiting with a purpose. I use 11 separate lists (card index or Kardex may be used).

List 1. Calling list by streets.
" 2. Calling list by alphabet.
" 3. Membership list active and inactive.
" 4. Sunday school (some are prospects for membership).
" 5. Non-members but attend church or Sunday school (prospects).
" 6. New families (prospects).
" 7. Sick.
" 8. Mailing list includes all names on other lists and non-church-goers in neighborhood.
" 9. Birthdays (send card on birthday).
" 10. Organizations and officers.
" 11. Pocket list.

This appears complicated, but it is not so.

Three colors of cards are used in making up the above lists—red for non-members; white for members; yellow for inactive.

Lists 1, 2, and 11 contain names in lists 3 active, 5, 6, 7.

List 9 is same as list 1 excepting list 6.

Special Cards

1. Visitors' or strangers' welcome card.
2. Sick people.
3. New Sunday school scholars (filled by teacher).
4. Names of new families in neighborhood.

Pastor's Files

1. Sermon notes with Wilson Index of same.
2. Sermons pastors may want to keep.
3. Private letters.
4. Church business, including state and nation.
5. Advertisements and catalogs.

Helps to Build Church Membership Lists

1. Have congregation hand in list of people who are not church members or are non-active church members.
2. Have one leader for each section or street.
3. Weekly parish paper mailed to all in district who are not church attendants. (Use list 8.)

All the above will make your work interesting and will keep you and your church in contact with the people. They will attend because they are interested. Then start from the study and give them something real and vital, not sensational, and you can hold their interest and later win them for church membership.

Results of Personal Evangelism

"Plan your work; then work your plan." Belleville Church, Newburyport, Mass., obeyed this counsel with gratifying results. With the idea of promoting Christian decisions and securing additions to church membership, the pastor, Rev. G. W. Hylton, early last year asked 50 or more members, carefully selected by the deacons and standing committee, to assist him in the work of personal evangelism. He assigned to each one a family, the members of which were to be visited with reference to joining the church on Easter Sunday. Helped by his instructions, in which emphasis was put upon getting decisions for Christ as well as securing new members, this large group accepted its task in prayerful humility. Some results were immediately achieved, others will follow, and many of the workers admit having received a rich experience themselves. In connection with this effort the pastor conducted two training classes for church membership.

During the Lenten season the social activities of the church were set aside as much as possible, that the thoughts of the people might be centered on spiritual things. The pastor, in his talks and sermons, portrayed vividly the life and teachings of Jesus, seeking to make his hearers understand that only as those teachings are reproduced in Christ's followers today can the world be made better. Special emphasis was laid on the personal responsibility of church members for the religious welfare of the people of the community.

All the services were well attended. The devotional period at the midweek meetings was especially helpful. A "family night" service was held on Ash Wednesday, when fathers and mothers were asked to come with their children, those quite young being entertained in another room with singing and stories. The number of young people who offered prayer made this an impressive service.

The Sunday morning sermons were on subjects appropriate to the Lenten season, and in the evening the pastor preached a series of sermons on the Cross of Christ. A beautiful feature of these evening services was the call to prayer. All the lights were turned out, and an illuminated cross on the wall behind the pulpit glowed forth. The young people's surpliced choir sang softly one stanza of "In the Cross of Christ I Glory" before the prayer and the "Amen" at the close. Many young people were moved by the appeal of the cross presented in this way.

Palm Sunday was devoted to the church school. The classes gathered in the parish house and marched into the church. As they passed up the two center aisles to their seats at the front, numbering about 250, and led by a boy bearing the Stars and Stripes, also a girl with the church flag, the rest of the large congregation were visibly surprised and much impressed. A young lad, president of the junior congregation, was in the pulpit with the pastor, and read the Scripture lesson. Other features of the service, including the pastor's sermon to the children on "Lessons from a Palm Tree" and musical selections by the school and the church choir, made it both instructive and inspirational.

During Holy Week this church, on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, joined in the union meetings of the Protestant churches of the city, and on Thursday and Friday evenings met with the Oldtown Church, the meeting on Friday evening being a Communion service.

Interest in the church's Lenten program reached its climax on Easter Sunday. In the morning the pastor, assisted by the superintendent of the Cradle Roll, Mrs. T. W. Towne, baptized seven infants and children. He also baptized seven young people and adults, one of the latter presenting her little son for the same purpose. He was assisted in this part of the service by J. Y. Crockett, chairman of the board of deacons. These seven and 11 other persons who had been previously baptized were received on confession. Another was received by renewal of her covenant, and seven others by letter, making 26 in all. As the pastor extended the right hand of fellowship he was followed by the board of deacons, who, as representatives of the church, welcomed each member with a cordial grasp of the hand. Special music and the pastor's Easter message completed a service that will linger long in the memory.

The other services of the day were in keeping with the morning service, and served further to emphasize the consciousness of achievement on the part of pastor and people as the result, under God, of having together planned the work of the church, and then faithfully worked the plan.

Member of Same Church for Seventy-One Years

On Nov. 3, 1854, Miss Lucy Gale Pond united with Evangelical Church, Westboro, Mass., and it was especially fitting that Miss Pond was present and gave to her fellow-members an inspiring message at their annual reunion on the evening of Nov. 3, 1925. Seventy-one years a member of this church, and for many years a teacher in the public schools, there will be many once associated with her who have gone from Westboro and will read with pleasure her inspiring message.

Miss Pond, now 86 years of age, is an active worker in the interests of the church and conducts an adult Bible class for women every Sunday noon.

She has been an inspiration and a guide to each and every pastor, a comfort and strength to all when bereaved, and her presence at any meeting is in itself a benediction.

"Many shall rise up and call her blessed."

Her message follows:

Dear Fellow-Members, Each and All:

Occasions like this give me almost my only opportunity to meet many of you, or even to look into your faces, but I am glad this evening, personally, to welcome you to our fellowship.

In response to our pastor's request that I, your oldest member, give you a message at this time, may not the thought be helpful that by uniting with the church, each becomes a member of a large family, whose interests, whose honor and integrity depend upon the loyalty of every one?

As in a home, so in the church, the presence or the absence of any is noted, and tends to encourage or depress the life of all.

It is your privilege, and mine, to promote the "work of the church" by using our varied gifts in its service.

Praying for its prosperity, combined with effort to attain that result; manifesting by thoughtful kindnesses, sympathy in joy as well as in sorrow, these are in the power of all, and go far toward commending the religion that we profess.

May we all, younger and older, "take up the whole armor of God" and "go forward," always trusting in His strength to put away and overcome whatever hinders our Christian growth and influence.

"The Lord bless you, and keep you;
The Lord make His face shine upon you and be gracious unto you;
The Lord lift up His countenance upon you, and give you peace."

Your sister in Christ,
LUCY GALE POND.

Madison Church Progress

The church in Madison has been going steadily forward, and especially during the past five years has progress been made to indicate a growing realization of the church's place in the community. During this time the salary of the minister has been doubled and the budget increased two-thirds. The past year the pastor's salary was increased $200, and renovations on the parsonage were made at a cost of $300. Rev. C. H. McElhiney is pastor at Madison.

Hancock Association One Hundred Years Old

The Hancock Association of Churches has this fall celebrated, at Ellsworth, the 100th anniversary of its founding, and as a feature of the event has issued an attractive and informing booklet giving the history of the association. It is compiled by Rev. G. S. Brookes, pastor of First Church, Ellsworth, who has accepted a call to Rockville, Ct. This is the first time that a history of an association and of the churches of an association has been printed in that state.

Rev. G. S. Brookes

The centennial booklet gives interesting glimpses into the problems which the churches have had to face during the century, as, for instance, that of Sunday observance, the place of women in the active work of the church, the use of tobacco, and the church's stand on the slavery question. The association has had a difficult but successful course, and has reached its centennial year with a record to be reviewed with pride. Also contained in the memorial booklet are the history and pictures of the churches in the association and a list of the conference preachers, with the places and dates of the meetings.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

Professor Cumming at Laconia

Prof. C. G. Cumming of Bangor Seminary has recently spent a week at Laconia, giving Bible readings and interpretations. Meetings were held every afternoon in various homes to listen to discussions of the Psalms. In the early evening Professor Cumming spoke to the young people of the parish on "The Early Chapters of Genesis," while later each evening there was a general meeting in the church to consider the message of the Hebrew prophets. At all these meetings the speaker welcomed questions. It was the hope of the committee arranging this series that they would assist many of the church people in their thinking about the place and use of the Bible in personal religion, in the life of the home, and in the solution of the problems of modern life. Rev. R. W. Roundy is pastor of Laconia.

MASSACHUSETTS

Installed Pastor of Belleville, Newburyport

The installation of Rev. G. W. Hylton at Belleville Church, Newburyport, Nov. 17, was a notable event in the history of the church. Before a large and representative council Mr. Hylton, in a carefully prepared paper, gave an interesting and stimulating account of his religious history and present beliefs. His paper and his ready answers to questions showed him to be an earnest evangelical minister with a distinctively modern mind. He was heartily approved by the council.

At the impressive service in the evening, Dr. A. D. Leavitt preached the sermon, taking for his topic "A Christ for Every Man, and Every Man's Christ"; and for his text the words, "If any man," Luke 9: 23. Dr. Leavitt stressed the bigness of Christ, said there is something in him for every man, and that therefore he belongs to every man. It was a fine plea for the open mind and tolerant spirit. Rev. H. E. Hurd, in words both genial and brotherly, gave the right hand of fellowship; and Rev. G. E. Cary, in the charge to the minister, gave much helpful counsel. The service reached its climax when Dr. F. E. Emrich, speaking out of a long and rich experience, gave the charge to the people. His words will long be remembered.

Santa Claus Again to Quincy Churches

Just before Christmas, and on his 81st birthday, Theophilus King, long identified with Bethany Church, Quincy, made the annual distribution to beneficiaries of the King Family Fund, which now amounts to $515,000. Thirty-seven checks were sent to as many churches, including the 13 Congregational groups of the city. The total amount disbursed was $11,179.

Riverside, Haverhill, Pays Off Deficit

Riverside Church, Haverhill, which previous to a year ago had for some time been aided by the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society, is now rejoicing in being free from debt, having recently paid off a deficit in its current expenses of $500. Rev. J. H. Allen is pastor.

Rev. A. W. Mellinger Ordained at Rowley

Rev. A. W. Mellinger, who was ordained at First Church, Rowley, Dec. 4, is a promising addition to the Christian ministry, and especially to our Congregational fellowship. His training for the work, both as regards religious experience and educational preparation, has been varied and thorough. He became a member of the Mennonite Church by baptism in 1910, transferred to the Evangelical Association in 1914, to the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1922, and to the Congregational Church in 1925. He received his early education in the public schools of Ohio; graduated from Mount Union College, Alliance, O., with A.B. degree, in 1920; entered the Boston University Theological School, and received the S.T.B. degree in 1923. This was followed by a year at Harvard University, and then he re-entered Boston University and received the S.T.M. degree last spring. In August he was married to Miss Edith Marion Ford. She is a Mount Union A.B. graduate, has received the M.A. degree from Boston University, and, at the time of her marriage, had been for two years

Rev. J. C. MacDonald Called to Waban

Through the resignation of its pastor, Dr. C. H. Cutler, Union Church, Waban, has lost the services of its faithful leader of the last 12 years, and the community has lost one of its most respected and loved citizens. He and his family are in Italy, where they are spending the winter.

J. C. MacDonald

Under Dr. Cutler's leadership Union Church has achieved a unique position in the community, fulfilling the requirements of a large number of persons of varied previous denominational connections to a degree most assuring and with a unity of faith such as is obtained in few churches in such communities. His work in Waban is to be carried on after the first of the New Year by Rev. J. C. MacDonald, now minister of Christ Church, New York City.

Mr. MacDonald was born in Bangor, Me. At Bowdoin College, from which he was graduated in 1915, he was awarded signal honors both by the college and by his fellow classmen. On graduating from Bowdoin, he entered Union Seminary. He broke off his work there to go to France with an ambulance corps before the United States entered the war, and distinguished himself by his services in the ambulance corps, and at the close of the war had just obtained his license as a pilot in aviation. He returned to the seminary and completed his course in the spring of 1920.

During his seminary days Mr. MacDonald served as student assistant to Dr. Tertius Van Dyke, pastor of Park Avenue Presbyterian Church, and was in charge of the summer services for two years. Upon graduating from Union, he was chosen pastor of the Congregational Church in Wilton, Me. His services there were attended with the same success as his earlier experiences. One of his most outstanding accomplishments was the organization of a state-wide young people's conference for Maine. He was also chaplain and afterwards commander of the local post of the American Legion.

After three years in Wilton he went to Christ Church, New York City, his duties there including not only the pastorate of the church, which has a membership of some 600, but also the leadership and management of a wide range of institutional activities—educational, charitable, social, and religious—connected with his church. His experience, his personal breadth of vision, and broad fundamental religious principles fit him to an unusual degree to carry on the work of so able a leader as Dr. Cutler. It is expected that Union Church will continue its growth under his leadership and will achieve a still greater position among the families of this growing suburb of Boston.

Congregational Pageant Writer

Mrs. Suzanne C. Gruver, a member of First Parish Church, Brockton, has been engaged to write the pageant for the town of Stoughton, in connection with its 200th anniversary next August. Mrs. Gruver, now wintering in Paris, was the author of the Brockton, 1921, pageant, and that described in these columns commemorating the life and character of the late George E. Keith, leading layman of South Church, Campello.

Fellowship Suppers at Maynard

The families of Union Church, Maynard, sat down by groups on three successive Wednesday evenings in November to "Fellowship Suppers." Each group filled the commodious dining room, and after enjoying identical menus, similar informal programs were carried out, concluding with a devotional service. Before being seated, each group sang, to the tune America, the following verses, written for these occasions by the pastor, Rev. William Boicourt.

This church in which we stand
Is best in all the land
To you and me.
For this church is our own,
We rule here all alone,
Beneath God's mighty throne,
We here are free.

O Lord of Life above,
In Christ's outreaching love,
Now make us one.
From thee comes every good,
Life, health, and daily food,
We pray in gratitude
"Thy will be done."

Evangelistic Services at East Northfield

An outstanding feature of the celebration of the centennial of the church at East Northfield was the series of evangelistic services held each evening during the week of Nov. 29 under the direction of Rev. Melvin E. Trotter of Grand Rapids, Mich. A centennial choir of 60 townspeople had been formed, and sang at each service, while there was also special singing by soloists and by the students of the schools. One night about 25 members of the junior choir of the Hinsdale (N. H.) church drove over and sang some selections. Many out-of-town people were present at every service.

A women's mass meeting on Wednesday was impressive, and a men's mass meeting on the second Sunday afternoon was largely attended by Brotherhood members from all over the county.

A resolution was adopted, expressing the gratitude and good will of the church to the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society for the help this society had accorded the church during its first 50 years, that is, until the time of D. L. Moody's return, when the church became self-supporting. Rev. William Anderson, the county evangelist, spent the week at Northfield.

The greetings of the church were also sent to Rev. Silas P. Cook, only surviving former pastor of the church, who was not able to be present at the celebration.

Mr. Trotter's sermons were of the highest order. He is well known in Northfield, having been a speaker at the August conference for the past 22 years. But none knew him as an evangelist in a series of meetings. He made a deep impression on the community.

Results? Lots of fine results.

All the young people in the church of high school age and of both sexes have taken a frank and open stand for Christ. Many adults confessed Christ for the first time, and many more renewed their allegiance and cleaned up their records. Eight days is hardly long enough to move a hard-boiled town like Northfield, but even before Mr. Trotter got here the church people were revived in prayer and effort. The centennial choir will help in the singing throughout the winter.

Mr. Trotter spoke daily during the week at morning chapel at Northfield Seminary and Mount Hermon School. On the closing day numbers of the students took their stand for Christ. It is probable that none of these young people had ever heard such straight and cumulative gospel preaching before in their lives, or had even been in evangelistic meetings where there was deep emotion without emotionalism.

Plans are under way by the pastor, Rev. F. W. Pattison, and a committee to follow up the work with Bible classes and other activities.

Topsfield Churches Federate

Within the past two years several interesting events have occurred in the church at Topsfield. During the pastorate of Rev. Charles Reeves, the auditorium was newly carpeted, and the pew cushions renovated and recovered at an expense of $1,000, shared equally by the church and the women's society. During the past year two new furnaces have been installed. Of special note is the consummation of

HYMNS for the LIVING AGE
Edited by H. AUGUSTINE SMITH
Director of Fine Arts in Religion, Boston University
Director of Music, Chautauqua, N. Y.

Important features of this book:

All words are between the staffs, making it possible to read and sing with ease.
The reinforced binding protects the book against the hard, if devout usage of over-zealous members of the choir.
The responsive readings, which mark a new epoch in Biblical literature for public worship are in the front pages where they can be used without throwing the book out of balance.
The index, which is so rarely used, is in the back of the book.
The musical settings constitute a rich and varied feast throughout and are fitted to the text with great care.
The music is within the range of the average voice and creates no unwilling sopranos and bassos.
No section of the book is over-populated; there are a number of social service hymns, but not at the expense of hymns of devotion.

The price of HYMNS FOR THE LIVING AGE is $1.75. The introductory rate is $1.35 with transportation additional, from New York or Chicago.

a long-looked-for event, the federation of the two churches of the town—Methodist and Congregational.

At the present time a large chorus choir under the direction of Mr. Hartman is furnishing the music of the church in an acceptable manner. Rev. P. H. Doney has succeeded Rev. Charles Reeves as pastor.

Theater Meetings in Brockton

On Jan. 17, the Brockton Committee of 100 begins its annual Sunday afternoon services in the Colonial Theater. Among the speakers are several prominent Congregationalists: Dr. J. G. Gilkie, of Springfield; Dean C. R. Brown, of Yale; and Rev. Garfield Morgan of Central Church, Lynn.

CONNECTICUT

Inter-Racial Good Will Service in Hartford

An inter-racial good will Christmas service was held in Windsor Ave. Church, Hartford, on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 13, under the auspices of the Inter-Racial Committee of the Hartford Council of Churches, of which the pastor of this church, Rev. John Barstow, is chairman. A Ukranian minister led in the responsive service, a Danish minister read the Scriptures, a colored minister offered the prayer, a Swedish Lutheran minister preached a most appropriate Christmas sermon, and other ministers participated. There were Christmas songs by choruses from Italian, Swedish, and colored churches, some singing in their native tongue.

About 400 were present, representing more than a half-dozen different races and creeds, but they were "all together with one accord in one place," and every one felt the spiritual uplift and the ennobling influence of the service. It is the first time in the religious life of the city that such a gathering has been attempted, and its unqualified success leads the Council of Churches to feel that a real step has been taken toward breaking down the racial barriers that are so foreign to the spirit of the Master.

Redecorated Interior of First Church, Branford, Connecticut

Building Improvements at Branford

At an expense of over $9,000, the meeting-house of First Church, Branford, has been thoroughly repaired and redecorated, following plans by Orr and delGrella, Architects, of New Haven. In the auditorium, the color scheme presents the ceiling and side walls of the creams,—wood in ivory, retaining the mahogany trim on the pews and wainscotting; window draperies, cushions and upholstering in copenhagen blue. The floor, under the pews, is covered with linoleum, the aisles with cork tile, and the pulpit platform and stairs with velvet carpet. A complete new system of electric wiring and lighting does much to add to the beauty of the rooms.

The previous decoration of the auditorium was in the fresco style of 1868, and the present appearance is a great change, but it is now much nearer the colonial, which this, one of the oldest New England churches, should represent. Rev. J. H. Gaylord is pastor of First Church.

NEW JERSEY

Bergen County Rally at Haworth

A virile and enthusiastic organization of the younger churches in northern New Jersey, known as the Bergen County Rally, held a large meeting with the Haworth Church early in November. One secret of the success of these rallies is a plan which provides a three-year term for the managing officers, all of whom are taken from the same church so that it is convenient for them to map out the work together.

Improvements to Woodbridge Property

At a cost of over $1,800, the interior of the Woodbridge house of worship has recently been redecorated and a lighting system installed. The improvement in the auditorium is striking and satisfactory.

New Jersey Association

The 48th annual meeting of the New Jersey Association was held with the Rutherford Church on Dec. 5. The sermon was preached by Rev. C. P. Beach, of River Edge. A telling address on religious education was given by Dr. Jay T. Stocking, and a timely talk on the Social Creed of the Churches by Dr. H. E.

Pittsburgh Rally

Sunday, Nov. 29, and the Monday following, were days long to be remembered in the Pittsburgh District. A rally was held in connection with the church visitations for promotional purposes, and assumed also the form of a general fellowship gathering, celebrating the coming of the Evangelical Protestant Churches into Congregational fellowship. Visitors were Rev. O. C. Grauer of Chicago, Rev. H. M. Bowden and Rev. H. S. Leiper of New York, Rev. R. G. Clapp of the Schauffler School, Cleveland, besides Superintendent Carroll and his assistant, Rev. H. F. Gould. On Sunday morning and evening, the visiting clergymen spoke in the various churches of the city. The gatherings on Monday were held in the auditorium of the Smithfield Evangelical Protestant Church. There were present representatives of the Slavic, Welsh, German, and English-speaking churches—all now members of the Congregational fellowship. In the evening the large auditorium was filled for a mass meeting at which addresses were given by Dr. C. H. Patton, Rev. Henry S. Leiper, and Rev. E. L. Nolting, a returned missionary from India. An advisory committee of seven members, five of whom are laymen, was appointed to represent the different language groups in the Pittsburgh area. To this committee it is expected that all matters of interest and importance shall be presented for their judgment and advice.

FLORIDA

Providing for West Palm Beach Young People

Two weeks ago the Minute Men's Club of Union Church, West Palm Beach, assumed the full financial responsibility for a recreational and educational worker for the young people of the church and school, including the Boy Scouts. A syndicate was formed, and 350 shares were offered for sale at $10 per share, the most of which has already been purchased by the members of the club. Rev. A. G. Lyon is pastor of Union.

MICHIGAN

Church Dedicated in Suburb of Grand Rapids

Burlingame is a rapidly developing suburb just outside the city limits of Grand Rapids, with a present population of 5,000. Rev. Herbert McConnell, pastor of Smith Memorial Church, Grand Rapids, has been actively interested in the development of Burlingame, which is adjacent to his parish. At an opportune time, in co-operation with Rev. C. W. Merriam of Park Church, Grand Rapids, he secured a desirable site for a church opposite the new high school building. The first unit of the church building was dedicated on Sunday, Dec. 7. The services were conducted by Mr. McConnell and were enriched with music furnished by the choir of his church. The sermon was preached by Rev. C. W. Merriam, and Supt. Sutherland led in the service and prayer of dedication. Already the heads of more than 90 families have signified in writing their interest in the church. The charter membership roll will be kept open until after the holidays. The first unit of the church cost $20,000, toward which Park Church contributed $5,000. Because of no suitable place for meeting, the first public service held by the church was the service of dedication. A Sunday school and woman's association will be organized at once and regular services will be held. For the present the work will be carried on under the supervision of Rev. Herbert McConnell.

The Missionary Ford at Work

The town of Carter, situated 18 miles from the railroad, possesses an unusually fine, aggressive, and appreciative group of people who are united in the work of the church. Ours is the only Protestant organization within a radius of ten miles. A comfortable house of worship was secured three years ago, a monument to the spirit of devotion and self-sacrifice of the whole neighborhood. Rev. G. M. Turner, by the aid of a home missionary Ford, is able to reach Crystal Springs and Mission on alternate Sundays, 12 and 26 miles away. He also holds services in various schoolhouses.

MISSOURI

Immanuel, St. Louis, Dedicates

For several years Immanuel Church, St. Louis, has been carefully planning its building program. Last year it dedicated a beautiful new nine-room parsonage—the first unit of its building program. At some future time it hopes to have a satisfactory building for religious education—the third unit in its building plan. Sunday, Dec. 13, the second unit was dedicated. This consists of a brick meeting-house with recreation room, kitchen, etc., on the first floor; class rooms off its mezzanine floor; and auditorium with a seating capacity of 400 on its second floor.

The dedication sermon was preached by Dr. N. S. Bradley, pastor of First Church, Saginaw, Mich., and contributions were solicited by Supt. A. R. Atwood, the Immanuel Church members and friends having contributed $15,500. The St. Louis City Missionary Society and the National C. C. B. S. have each put $10,000 into the new meetinghouse.

The present pastor is Rev. L. L. Steadman, who came to Immanuel Church last Easter, after a successful pastorate of several years at Rochester, Mich.

Immanuel Church is located in a good residential section which is fast developing. Indications point to its becoming a large and efficient church.

COLORADO

Rev. Louis Gale Covers Large Parish

In addition to serving a large field, including Paradox, 45 miles away, and Redvale, 15 miles distant, Rev. Louis Gale is a member of the school board of Nucla, where is located the home church. The work is going forward encouragingly on all the fields, although, as the people depend on agriculture, finances are in a rather desperate condition. A new car, equipped for the mountain roads, was recently given to this church by friends in Connecticut.

A Young Church in Denver

The charter membership list of Washington Park, Denver, is growing steadily and now numbers over half a hundred. The Sunday school and young people's work is in a healthy condition, and this church, situated in the midst of a fine residential section in one of the choicest parts of the city, is going steadily forward.

Rev. J. E. Elder's Large Parish

Rev. J. E. Elder, who recently undertook the work at Cope, is finding that the parish expands as he is able to answer calls to the various school districts and communities adjacent. He is already covering a territory 24 by 26 miles in extent. The home missionary car makes this large service possible.

A Church at a Mining Camp

Rico, a mining camp which has been practically deserted for more than 20 years, is gradually coming back. One hundred and fifty men are now on the payroll, a company has recently invested $150,000 in reopening the mines, and more will be expended during the next few months. Our church there is not slow to awaken to the new condition. Mr. E. H. Dickinson, of Telluride, holds services once a month on a week night. The people of the church have recently reshingled the roof and decorated the interior. Rico is the county seat of San Miguel County.

Church Organized at Lone Star

The pastor of Doby Springs, Rev. H. P. Omo, preaches regularly also at Greenleaf and has recently become responsible for a new church at Lone Star. After hearing an address on Congregationalism by Assistant Supt. L. H. Marsh, the people of this community voted to organize a church of that order. This is a large circuit on the prairies in the western part of the state.

Rev. Archie Toothaker Leaves Phoenix

Rev. Archie Toothaker recently resigned from Neighborhood Church, Phœnix, leaving behind many friends and the work in fine condition. The church was exceedingly sorry to see him leave. He will be succeeded by a former pastor of the church, Rev. E. R. Bellingham, who has been serving Sixth Ave., Denver.

Scouts Find Unusual Way to Raise Money

The Boy Scouts of Helena recently adopted an unusual method of raising money by distributing telephone books throughout the city. In this way they realized over $90. A church choir of 25 high school boys and girls is greatly appreciated. Rev. James Elvin is pastor of the Helena Church.

WYOMING

Lusk Coming Back After Collapse

Lusk is a town which collapsed after an oil boom, but it is steadily coming back. The church, which was unable to employ a resident minister for many months, rejoices in the fine work of Rev. H. H. Koontz, and a building program is now being considered. The town is the natural center for a large ranch district, the church serving a great territory in the cattle country both to the north and to the south.

Laymen Get Together at Seattle

Following up the splendid gathering of men at the recent State Conference, a second gathering of laymen was held with the Men's Club of Plymouth, Seattle. It was largely in honor of the new chairman of the laymen's movement of the conference, Mr. Sam Stocking of First Church, Tacoma. He was given the assurance of the laymen to follow loyally his leadership in enlisting and directing the services of the men in the churches for the ensuing conference year. Reports of the recent National Council were made by several who had been in attendance, Mr. A. H. Lundin speaking for the laymen, and Dr. F. J. Van Horn and Dr. H. C. Mason for the ministers. Messrs. Calder and Herring of the Social Service Commission were also present as guests and gave illuminating reports.

Appreciate New Man

Oregon Congregationalists rejoice in the coming of Dr. H. D. Davies, who is proving a strong addition to the forces on the firing line in this state. Under his able leadership our church in the beautiful city of The Dalles, on the famous Columbia River Highway, is moving forward with much happiness and confidence. Extensive additions and improvements are being made to the church plant.

Dr. Davies comes to the coast from a place of valued leadership in Wisconsin, where since 1912 he has been pastor of the strong Wauwatosa Church. He is a graduate of Ripon College, 1904, and received his M.A. degree from Princeton in 1906 and his B.D. from Princeton Seminary in 1907. Then for a year he studied at Halle, Germany, and Basel, Switzerland. In 1922 his Alma Mater honored him with the degree of D.D.

HAWAII

Union Thanksgiving Service in Honolulu

Central Union Church, Honolulu, was the scene of the union Thanksgiving service this year, when representatives of churches of different national groups united to express their gratitude to Almighty God for his blessings during the year. This was in the nature of a community meeting and was conducted by the Honolulu Interchurch Federation. Rev. H. K. Poepoe, pastor of the Kaumakapili Hawaiian Church, Rev. N. C. Dizon, pastor of the Methodist Filipino Church, Prof. S. C. Lee, acting pastor of the 2d Chinese Church, Rev. T. Okumura, pastor of the Makiki Japanese Church, and Rev. W. C. Jones, pastor of the Honolulu Christian Church and president of the Interchurch Federation, took part in the services, along with Gov. W. R. Farrington, who read the Proclamations of the President and the Governor, and Rev. P. A. Swartz, who preached the sermon on "Foundations of the American Thanksgiving Day." The Kawaiahao Hawaiian Choir sang three beautiful anthems. The church was filled with representatives from many different national groups. An offering of $450 was received for the benefit of Yenching University, Peking, China.

A Festival of Song was held in Honolulu Harbor on Thanksgiving Eve. A beautiful Treasure Ship with gossamer-like sails was escorted by boats filled with choruses, singing Thanksgiving hymns. Huge headlights donated by the Army illuminated the harbor, and the boats were lighted with lanterns and decorated for the occasion. The Navy provided a Guest Ship, which took its place in the harbor, and its band added beautiful music to the occasion. Thousands of people viewed the pageant from the piers, and choruses of church choirs and the Hawaiian Band sang from specially provided points of vantage, so that the harbor was brilliant with light and glorious with song.

AIKINS, REV. J. E., South Windham, Me., at the 250th meeting of the Cumberland Association of Churches and Ministers, held at South Portland in November, was given a rising vote of appreciation for 32 years of faithful service as scribe of the association. He was ordained Nov. 11, 1885.

CUSHMAN, MR. and MRS. A. E., POULTNEY, Vt., recently celebrated the 50th anniversary of their marriage. Mr. Cushman is the son of Rev. Rufus S. Cushman, D.D., who was a Congregational minister for 20 years in Manchester, Vt. Mr. and Mrs. A. E. Cushman were married Nov. 18, 1875, in the Congregational Church in Manchester, the former's father performing the marriage ceremony.

ESTABILIO, REV. S. N., and MRS. ESTABILIO have taken up their work at Hawi, Hawaii, as missionaries to the Filipino people of that district, succeeding Mr. Roque Bansuelo, who has been transferred to Kapaa and Kealia, on the Island of Kauai.

IESS, REV. A. F., pastor of the church at Beaumont, Tex., recently gave an interpretation of Browning before the Woman's Reading Club. Wide publicity is given his sermons through the columns of the daily press, a fact much appreciated by people living at a distance from the church and in nearby towns.

IOOD, REV. E. LYMAN, AND MISS MARGARET O'LAUGHLIN EVANS were married on Oct. 5, at the beautiful beach place of Rev. and Mrs. W. D. Westervelt, Hawaii. The ceremony was performed by Dr. H. N. Manchester. The bride was given in marriage by Hon. Sanford B. Dole, former Governor of the Hawaiian Islands. Dr. and Mrs. Hood are living on Avon Way in Honolulu, where Dr. Hood is teaching in the Honolulu Theological Seminary and in the University of Hawaii.

IAYLOTT, REV. W. F., has this year completed ten years as pastor of First Church, Derby, Ct. During these years Mr. Maylott has been able to preach and conduct the service every Sunday. One hundred and forty-nine new members have been received, 145 persons have been baptized, and Mr. Maylott has officiated at 145 weddings. The church paid the expenses of the minister and his wife to the National Council meeting in Washington, and gave them a generous purse which represented the contributions of many givers. The membership of the church is now the largest in its history. Last summer the interior of the house of worship was repainted and redecorated.

IOULTON, J. W., formerly pastor of the church at Worthington, Mass., is now residing in Gorham, Me.

IAUSS, REV. AND MRS. E. F., of First Church, Nashua, N. H., kept open house recently to members of the church and parish, and to other friends in celebration of the first anniversary of their coming to Nashua. A large number called during the afternoon and evening with congratulations to the pastor and his wife on their work since coming to the city.

IELSON, MRS. WYLIE, deaconess of First Church, Valley City, N. D., has for over 36 years provided and prepared the bread and the wine for the Communion services of this church. During that period she has missed but two Communion services. She is still active in all the affairs of the church and looks forward to many more years of happy service.

'ERRY, REV. E. W., MRS. PERRY, and their two children arrived in Honolulu on Nov. 2, on their way to the Island of Maui, where Mr. Perry will take up his work as pastor of the Wailuku and Kahului Union Churches. Mr. and Mrs. Perry have been in China as missionaries. Mrs. Perry is a sister of Mrs. Royal G. Hall who, with her husband, spent three years as a missionary of the Hawaiian Board of Missions at Koloa, Kauai. After spending a week in Honolulu, getting acquainted with various phases of mission work, Mr. and Mrs. Perry and their children sailed for Kahului on Nov. 9.

ACELIS, REV. PEDRO, of Waialua, Hawaii, has just returned to Honolulu, after spending a month on the Island of Hawaii in a campaign of evangelism. The expenses of his trip were entirely paid by the churches and missions affiliated with the Hawaiian Board of Missions on the Island of Hawaii.

:OUSE, REV. F. T., pastor of Pilgrim Church, Worcester, Mass., for the past seven years, has been granted a leave of absence until April 1, 1926, on account of ill health. He has gone to Manatee, Fla., where he will pass the winter.

Dr. Bradley on "The Pilgrim Procession"

The annual Forefathers' Night of the Boston Congregational Club was observed Dec. 21. As usual, it was ladies' night and a large number were present. It was a delightful social occasion, with an excellent dinner and a pleasing program. The musical feature was the singing, repeatedly encored, by the Lotus Male Quartet. Dr. Frank W. Merrick made an excellent chaplain for the evening. The guests introduced included the presidents of other denominational clubs—Alvin F. Pease of the Boston Baptist Social Union, Edward H. Redstone of the Boston Methodist Social Union, Fletcher P. Osgood of the Universalist Club of Massachusetts, and William G. Perry of the Episcopalian Club of Massachusetts,—accompanied by their wives. The following American Board missionaries were introduced as honored guests: Dr. and Mrs. William L. Thompson of Rhodesia, Africa; Rev. and Mrs. B. V. Mathews of India; Rev. and Mrs. George Shepard of China; also Dr. Charles H. Beale.

The president of the club, Harry G. Dixon, presided felicitously and well. The speaker of the evening was Dr. Dan Freeman Bradley, of Cleveland, Associate Moderator of the National Council.

Dr. Bradley spoke on "The Pilgrim Procession." It was an interesting, instructive, and breezy address, showing the progress made by Congregationalists since the days of the Pilgrims. He said that in freedom and in fellowship we have remained true to our traditions. We have left behind certain theological causes of unhappiness. On the way we have had our share of unhappy divisions and peculiar personalities. The unifying of our missionary societies' relationship to the National Council at Kansas City made inevitable the merger voted at Washington last October. Dr. Bradley said that we have neglected our colleges and should now make amends, that the National Council should be endowed, that women should come into all our organizations upon terms of equality. As an example of the needed coming together of Christians, Dr. Bradley cited the example of Presbyterians and Congregationalists in Cleveland, who have come together declaring that the Westminster Confession and the Kansas City statement they "held in high esteem"; thus, as if hanging them framed upon the wall like football trophies to be forgotten, they then make the sole basis of church membership loyalty to Jesus. Dr. Bradley urged stronger help of our colored churches, notably St. Mark's Church in Boston.

MRS. ABIGAIL MORSE

Mrs. Abigail Morse, wife of Rev. C. G. Morse, first pastor of the First Congregational Church of Emporia, Kan., died in Emporia, Dec. 6, at the end of her 92d year.

Mr. C. G. Morse, with his bride, came to Kansas as a member of the Andover Band in 1857, and was pastor of this church for 13 years. Mrs. Morse was buried in Maplewood Cemetery in Emporia. All the life interests of Mrs. Morse centered in Kansas and especially in Emporia. After the death of her husband in 1871, she taught for a number of years in the Emporia public schools and in the Kansas State Teachers' College.

Two sons and four grandchildren survive her.

An Ode to an Old Calendar

As I turn the old calendar leaf by leaf
I see days of happiness, days of grief
And best of all, to top the sheaf
Red lettered Sundays on every leaf.

And a whimsical sadness steals over my soul,
As I take down the record of days that are old
The year's stories end—a tale that is told.

'Tis said, "Let the dead past bury its dead."
Not so—No day, no hour, no moment is dead,
No thought, no word, no motive, no deed,
But lives in the future as we sow the seed.

Oh! days that are past, were you merry and glad?
Or with thwarted ambitions, were you sorry and sad?
Days of chaos, and a world war mad;
Was there aught of good to redeem the bad?

After all—does it matter to you and to me
If the days count for time and eternity
On the side of God and humanity.

The soul that in honor lives up to the test
Of the day, of the hour, that which in him is best
Tho' he fail—God who knows—will take care of the rest.

So I take the old calendar, down from the wall,
And I sigh as I ponder its worm-wood and gall
But I laugh, and I sing what past days can appall!
As I answer the New Year's glad challenging call.

building was newly papered and painted inside and out.

Of course the secret of her success in getting a new bell for the church lay in her words, "I've wanted it so badly these last few years that I think now we'll get it." If we really wish for anything hard enough, the chances are that our wish will be gratified. Of course really wishing for a thing doesn't consist in lying back and trusting to luck to get it for us; it means planning and working and then working some more until finally success comes to us, just as my grandmother planned and worked for a bell for the little white church.

A new story is told about Bishop Henry C. Potter. It seems that a lay reader had been complaining to the Bishop that he and his fellows were nowhere recognized in the Prayer Book. There were references to bishops, priests, and deacons, but never an allusion to lay readers. "Why, of course there is," said the Bishop. "Don't you remember that verse in the Benedicite, 'O all ye green things upon the earth, bless ye the Lord'?"—Churchman.

Abner, the farmhand, was complaining to a neighbor that the wife of the farmer that employed him was "too close for anything." "This morning," he said, "she asked me, 'Abner, do you know how many pancakes you have et this morning?' I told her I didn't have no occasion to count 'em. 'Well,' says she, 'that last one was the twenty-sixth.' And it made me so mad I jest got up from the table and went to work without my breakfast."—Scratch.
